BOUILLAUD (Ishmael) a perſon of diſtinguiſhed learning, and one of the moſt univerſal geniuſes of his time, was born at Loudun, on the 28th of September, 1605. He abjured the proteſtant religion, and embraced the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic; he obtained great ſkill in the belles lettres, mathematics, and law; kept up a correſpondence by letter with the learned; travelled into Italy, Poland, and the Levant; and having publiſhed a great number of books, which are eſteemed by the learned, died at Paris, on the 25th of November, 1694.

BOUILLON, a town of France, in the duchy of the ſame name, and in the country of Luxemburg, with a fortified caſtle. The French took it in 1676, and gave it to the duke of Bouillon; but the king keeps the caſtle himſelf, which is ſeated on a rock that is almoſt inacceſſible. It is eight miles north eaſt of Sedan, ſeventeen eaſt of Charleville and Meſſeres, thirteen north of Mouſon, and thirty-eight weſt of Luxemburg. Long. 5. 20. E. Lat. 49. 45. N.

BOUIN, an iſland of France, on the coaſt of Poitou, from which it is ſeparated by a canal. It is two miles in length, and of the ſhape of a triangle.

BOVINO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Capitinate, with a biſhop's ſee. It ſtands at the foot of the Appenines, ſeven miles ſouth of Troga, and thirty north-eaſt of Benevento. Long. 16. 15. E. Lat. 41. 17. N.

BOULAINVILLIERS (Henry de) count of St. Saire, was born at St. Saire, on the 21ſt of October, 1658, of a noble and ancient family. He gave in his infancy proofs of his wit and abilities. His principal ſtudy was hiſtory, which he at length cultivated with much aſſiduity. He wrote, 1. Reflections on the Life of Mahomet. 2. A Hiſtory of the Arabians; and other works; and died at Paris, on the 23d of June, 1722, aged ſixty-four.

BOULAY (Cæsar Egasse du) in Latin Bulæus, was born at St. Ellier, a village of Maine, a province of France, and became profeſſor of humanity at the college of Navarre, regiſter, rector, and hiſtoriographer of the univerſity of Paris, and died on the 6th of October, 1678, after having publiſhed ſeveral works. The principal of them are, a Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Paris, in Latin, in ſix volumes folio, and the Treaſure of Roman Antiquities, in one volume folio.

BOULEN (Anne) wife of Henry VIII. king of England, and mother to queen Elizabeth. See Boleyn.

BOULLONGNÉ (Lewis) painter to the French king, and profeſſor of the Academy of Painting, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his art, and died at Paris, in 1674, at ſixty-five years of age. There are three of his pictures in the church of Notre Dame. He left two ſons and two daughters, who followed his ſteps, and were admired for their ſkill in painting.

The eldeſt, who is well known under the name of Bon Boullongne, was born at Paris, in 1649, and was firſt inſtructed by his father, after which he went to perfect himſelf in Italy, and for that purpoſe the king allowed him a penſion; at his return, he was made profeſſor of the Academy of Painting. Lewis XIV. employed him in adorning ſeveral of his palaces; and there are a great number of his pictures at Paris, where he died in 1717.

Lewis Boullongne, the youngeſt brother of the former, was born in 1654, and, after being inſtructed by his father, gained the prize of painting at eighteen years of age, upon which he obtained the king's penſion. He ſet out for Italy at his brother's return, and obtained great ſkill in deſigning and colouring. At his return to Paris, he was much employed, and at length became director of the Academy of painting, knight of the order of St. Michael, and firſt painter to the king. Lewis XIV. allowed him ſeveral penſions, and raiſed him and his poſterity to the rank of nobility. He embelliſhed by his pencil the church of the Invalids, the chapel of Verſailles, &c. and died at Paris, in 1733, leaving great wealth and four children, the eldeſt of whom is at preſent counſellor of ſtate, and intendant of the finances.

BOULOGNE, a large and handſome town of France, in Picardy, and capital of the Boulognois, with a harbour and a biſhop's ſee. It is divided into two towns, the Higher and the Lower. The former is ſtrong both by nature and art, and the latter is only ſurrounded with a ſingle wall. The harbour has a mole for the ſafety of the ſhips, which at the ſame time prevents it from being choaked up. The Lower Town is inhabited by merchants, wherein there are three large ſtreets, one of which leads to the High Town, and the other two run in a line on the ſide of the river. Many of the Engliſh and Scots reſide here, who, from rebellion, or any other cauſe, are obliged to fly from their native country. It is ſeated at the mouth of the river Laine, twenty-two miles weſt of St. Omer's, fifty north-weſt of Arras, fifty-five north-eaſt of Liſle, and ſeventeen ſouth of Calais. Long. 1. 42. E. Lat. 50. 42. N.

BOULOGNOIS, a territory of France, in the north part of Picardy, about thirty miles in length, and twenty in breadth. Its principal trade conſiſts in pit-coal and butter. Its capital town is Boulogne BOULTER (Hugh) archbiſhop of Armagh, primate and metropolitan of all Ireland, was born in or near London, and was a perſon as much diſtinguiſhed by his learning, his virtue, his humanity, and natural endowments, as by his high ſtation. He was educated at Merchant-Taylors ſchool, and at Chriſt-Church college, Oxford, and afterwards at Magdalen college. In 1700, he was appointed chaplain to ſir Charles Hedges, principal ſecretary of ſtate, and alſo to Dr. Thomas Tenniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury; and by the intereſt of Charles Spencer, earl of Sunderland, he was ſoon after preferred to the parſonage of St. Olave, Southwark, and the archdeaconry of Surry. In 1719, he was commanded to attend king George I. to Hanover as his chaplain, where, at the king's deſire, he took prince Frederic under his care, to inſtruct him in the Engliſh tongue, and was the ſame year promoted to the biſhoprick of Briſtol and deanery of Chriſt-Church. In this ſtation he was extremely aſſiduous in the diſcharge of his paſtoral duty, and while he was thus employed in one of his viſitations, he received a letter by a meſſenger from the ſecretary of ſtate, acquainting him that his majeſty had nominated him to the archbiſhoprick of Armagh. What would have given joy to another to this good biſhop afforded only matter of grief, and taking a few hours to recollect himſelf, he called for a pen and ink, and ſent an anſwer by the meſſenger, in which he declined the honour the king intended him; but the meſſenger was ſoon diſpatched back, with his majeſty's abſolute commands that he ſhould accept the poſt, on which he, with reluctance, ſubmitted to the king's pleaſure. On his arrival in Ireland, in 1724, he immediately ſet about ſtudying the real and ſolid intereſt of that kingdom. In innumerable inſtances, he exerted himſelf in the nobleſt acts of beneficence; in ſeaſons of the greateſt ſcarcity, he was more than once inſtrumental in preventing a famine which threatened that nation. On one of theſe occaſions, he diſtributed vaſt quantities of corn throughout the kingdom, for which the houſe of commons paſſed a vote of public thanks; and at another time, two thouſand five hundred perſons were fed at the poor-houſe, in Dublin, every morning, and as many every evening, for a conſiderable time together, moſtly at the primate's expence. When ſchemes were propoſed for the advantage of the country, he encouraged and promoted them not only with his counſel but his purſe. He had great compaſſion for the poor clergy of his dioceſe, who were diſabled from giving their children a proper education; and he maintained ſeveral of the children of ſuch in the univerſity; he erected four houſes at Drogheda, for the reception of clergymen's widows, and purchaſed an eſtate for the endowment of them. His charities for augmenting ſmall livings and buying glebes amounted to upwards of thirty thouſand pounds, beſides what he deviſed by will for the like purpoſes in England. In ſhort, the inſtances he gave of his generoſity and benevolence of heart, his virtue, his piety, and his wiſdom, are almoſt innumerable, and the hiſtory of his life is his nobleſt panegyric. This excellent prelate died in London, on the 2d of June, 1742, and was interred in Weſtminſter abbey, where a beautiful monument of finely poliſhed marble is erected to his memory.

BOUQUIN (Peter) a Carmelite friar, prior of the convent of Bourges, was born April 22, 1539, and might have arrived to the higheſt dignities in his order, if he had not rather choſen to lay aſide the habit to retire into Germany to the proteſtants, where he was received with great friendſhip by Luther and Melanchon. He wrote, 1. Defenſio ad Calumnias Doctoris cujuſdam Avii in Evangelis Profeſſores. 2. Theſes de Cœna Domini. 3. Exegeſis divinæ Communicationis; and other works.

BOURBON (Nicholas) a famous Latin poet in the ſixteenth century, was a native of Vandeure, near Langres, and the ſon of a wealthy man, who was the maſter of ſeveral forges. Margaret de Valois appointed him preceptor to her daughter Jane d'Albret of Navarre, the mother of king Henry IV. At length he retired to Conde, where he had a benefice, and died there about the year 1550. He has left eight books of epigrams, and a poem on the forge, which he has intitled Ferraria. He had great knowledge of antiquity and of the Greek language. Eraſmus praiſes his epigrams.

Bourbon (Nicholas) a celebrated Greek and Latin poet, the nephew of the preceding, was the ſon of a phyſician. He taught rhetoric in ſeveral colleges of Paris; and the cardinal de Perron cauſed him to be nominated profeſſor of eloquence in the Royal College; he was alſo canon of Langres, and one of the forty of the French Academy; at length he retired to the fathers of the Oratory, where he died on the 7th of Auguſt, 1644, aged ſeventy. He paſſes, with reaſon, for one of the greateſt Latin poets France has produced. His poems were printed at Paris, in 1630, in duodecimo. His imprecation againſt the murderer of Henry IV. is a maſter piece. He is the author thoſe fine verſes over the gate of the arſenal at Paris, in honour of Henry the Great:

Ætna hæc Henrico Vulcania tela miniſtrat;
Tela Gigantæos debellatura furores.

Bourbon (Iſle of). See Mascareigne.

Bourbon-Lancy, a town of France, in the duchy of Burgundy, ſeated on the declivity of a hill. The town itſelf is not above five hundred paces in compaſs, it has three gates and three towers; the caſtle is ſeparated from it by a ditch; the ſuburb joins the walls of the town on the north ſide; and that of St. Leger is at the foot of the ſame rock whereon the caſtle is built. There are baths, with thirty or forty houſes to lodge thoſe who come to drink the waters. It has three pariſhes in the town, a convent of Capuchins, a nunnery, and two ſmall hoſpitals. There is a marble pavement, called the Great Bath, which is the work of the Romans. The town ſtands near the river Loire, thirty miles ſouth-weſt of Autun, eighteen eaſt of Moulins, fifty north-weſt of Maçon, and one hundred and thirteen ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 46. E. Lat. 46. 37. N.

Bourbon l'Archambaud, a town of France, in the Bourbonnois. It contains about three hundred houſes and one thouſand two hundred ſouls; it has but a poor ſituation between two hills, on one of which ſtands an old ſquare caſtle, formerly the ſeat of its lords. It has no walls, but is famous for its hot baths. It is fifteen miles weſt of Moulins, twenty-five ſouth of Nevers, thirty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Bourges, fifty-eight north of Riom, and one hundred and ſeventy-three ſouth of Paris. Long. 3. 28. E. Lat. 46. 37. N.

BOURBONNE LES BAINS, a town of France, in Champaign, and in the Baſſigni, famous for its hot baths. It is ſeventeen miles eaſt of Langres, and twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Chaumont. Long. 5. 45. E. Lat. 47. 54. N.

BOURBONNOIS, a province of France, with the title of a duchy. It is bounded on the north by Nivernois and Berry, on the weſt by Berry and a part of Upper March, on the ſouth by Auvergne, and on the eaſt by Burgundy and Forez. It is about ſeventy-five miles long and fifty broad. The country is level, and fertile in corn, fruit, and paſture for cattle. There are a great many woods and ponds, with plenty of game. It likewiſe produces wine for home conſumption, for it will not bear tranſportation. The air is temperate in general, but is ſometimes very cold, on account of the mountains of Auvergne, which are covered with ſnow. Theſe, with the foreſts, excite ſtorms of hail every year, which damage the harveſt. Beſides, the melting of the ſnow on the mountains, ſwells the river Allier ſo much, that it overflows in July, and creates great diſorders along the banks.

The three principal rivers are, the Loire, the Allier, and the Cher; beſides theſe there are three others, leſs known. There are no mines but ſome of pit-coal, which are inconſiderable. The rocks near Bourbon l'Archambaud have ſtones like Briſtol ſtones, which will cut glaſs like diamonds. There are more mineral waters in this province than in any other in France. The mineral waters of Bourbon l'Archambaud proceed from three ſprings. Above the wells there is the Poor's Bath, and juſt by theſe is a houſe which contains the other baths. There is one bath for men, and another for women, beſides a third which is not uſed. The waters are clear, limpid, and ſo hot, that you cannot bear your hand in them above a moment, and yet they will not boil an egg. If they taſte of any thing it is of nitre, or rather the natron of the ancients, becauſe the ſalt which is gained from it by evaporation will crackle, but not flaſh, when thrown on live coals.

The inhabitants carry on a trade in corn, cattle, hemp, fiſh, and wood. The iron and cutlery ware employ a great number of hands. Tapeſtry weaving brings in a great deal of money, and the baths are of conſiderable advantage to this province. There is no univerſity; and but one college where philoſophy is taught.

The principal towns are Moulins, Bourbon l'Archambaud, Vichy, St. Amand, Montrand, Luay le Sauvage, Poligni, Braudiere, Champroux, and nine other ſmall places.

BOURBOURG, a town in French Flanders, which was taken by France, in 1657. It is ſeated on the canal which leads to Dunkirk, a mile and a half ſouth-eaſt of Gravelines, fourteen ſouth-weſt of St. Omer's, ten weſt of Berg St. Vinox, and ten from Dunkirk. Long. 2. 15. E. Lat. 50. 55 N.

BOURCHENU DE VALBONAIS (JOHN PETER) born at Grenoble, in 1651, made ſeveral voyages in his youth, and was a-board the Engliſh fleet at the battle of Solbay. He became at length preſident of the chamber of accompts in Dauphiné, and died in 1730. He wrote a good Hiſtory of Dauphiné, which he compoſed when he was blind, and was remarkable for his beneficence and liberality to men of learning.

BOURCHIER, BOWSCHYRE, or BOWCER (THOMAS) archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the ſucceſſive reigns of Henry VI. Edward IV. Edward V. Richard III. and Henry VII. was the ſon of William Bourchier, earl of Ewe, in Normandy, and the counteſs of Stafford, and brother to Henry, earl of Eſſex. He was educated at Oxford, and was three times chancellor of that univerſity. His firſt dignity in the church was that of dean of St. Martin's, in London; from whence he was raiſed to the ſee of Worceſter; from thence to that of Ely, and from thence to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury, in the year 1454. He was ſoon after created cardinal-prieſt, and lord high chancellor of England. This prelate deſerved highly of the learned world, for being the principal inſtrument of introducing the moſt noble art of printing into England; but he was ſtrangely impoſed upon by the ſpecious pretences of Richard, duke of Glouceſter, when he undertook to perſuade the queen to deliver up her ſon, the duke of York, into the protector's hands. Among other benefactions, he gave to the church of Canterbury a fine image, or repreſentation of the Trinity, of ſolid gold, adorned with precious ſtones. He died on the 30th of March, 1486.

BOURCHIER (JOHN) lord Bernars, grandſon and heir of a lord of the ſame name, who was deſcended from Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, and had been knight of the garter, and conſtable of Windſor-caſtle, under Edward IV. Our lord John was created a knight of the bath at the marriage of the duke of York, ſecond ſon of Edward IV. and was firſt known by quelling an inſurrection in Cornwall and Devonſhire, raiſed by Michael Joſeph, a blackſmith, in 1495, which recommended him to the favour of Henry VII. He was captain of the pioneers at the ſiege of Therouenne, under Henry VIII. by whom he was made chancellor of the exchequer for life, lieutenant of Calais and the Marches, appointed to conduct the lady Mary, the king's ſiſter, into France, on her marriage with Lewis XII. and had the extraordinary happineſs of continuing in favour with Henry VIII. during eighteen years. He died at Calais, in 1532, aged ſixty-three. He tranſlated, by king Henry's command, Froiſſart's Chronicle, which was printed in 1523, by Richard Pinſon, the ſcholar of Caxton, and the fifth on the liſt of Engliſh printers. His other works were a whimſical medley of tranſlations from French, Italian, and Spaniſh novels, which ſeem to have been the mode then, as they were afterwards in the reign of Charles II. Theſe were The Life of Sir Arthur, an Armorican Knight; The famous Exploits of Sir Hugh of Bourdeaux; Marcus Aurelius; and The Caſtle of Love. He compoſed alſo a book, Of the Duties of the Inhabitants of Calais; and a comedy, intitled, Ite in Vineam, which is mentioned in none of our catalogues of Engliſh plays. Anthony Wood ſays it was uſually acted at Calais, after veſpers. Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors.

BOURDALOUE (LEWIS) a celebrated preacher among the Jeſuits, and one of the greateſt orators France has produced, was born at Bourges, on the 20th of Auguſt, 1632. After having preached in Provence, he, in 1669, went to Paris, and there met with ſuch applauſe, that the king reſolved to hear him; on which he was ſent for to court, and frequently preached before Lewis XIV. He aſſiſted the ſick, viſited the priſons and hoſpitals, and was very liberal in giving alms. He died at Paris, on the 13th of May, 1704. The beſt edition of his ſermons is in octavo.

BOURDEAUX, one of the principal cities of France, capital of Guienne, and of Bourdelois. The people of theſe parts have a good capacity, but they are opiniated, and unwilling to be taught, and are addicted to rhodomantadeing in the higheſt degree. However, this is not without exceptions. The city of Bourdeaux is one of the fineſt, moſt trading, and flouriſhing towns in all France. It has a very commodious and advantageous ſituation, on account of ſeveral rivers that meet there, and the beauty of its port. The form of this place repreſents a bow, of which the river Garonne is the ſtring. There is a large quay on its banks, and as the tide riſes above twelve feet, the largeſt ſhips may enter it with eaſe. The caſtle, called Trompe, is ſeated at the entrance of the quay, and is flanked with ſix great royal baſtions. The river runs round the walls, which are defended by large foſſes or ditches. It has twelve gates, and all the principal ſtreets terminate at the quay. But they are all narrow, except that called Chapeau rouge. The metropolitan church is worth the attention of the curious, for the largeneſs of its body, and two lofty towers. Its chapter is one of the moſt auguſt in France. The archbiſhop's palace is near the ramparts of the city, where is the caſtle of Haa, which conſiſts only of one large ſquare tower, flanked with four round towers, by which a ſmall river enters into the city. This caſtle is ſeated near the fine walk of the platform of St. Eulalia, upon the ramparts, which are ſhaded with ſeveral long alleys of trees, from whence there is an agreeable proſpect into the adjacent fields. Theſe walks are frequented by the merchants, when they expect the arrival of any of their ſhips, which they can ſee from hence at a conſiderable diſtance. Fort St. Louis is alſo ſeated on the river, oppoſite to the Trompe caſtle.

The other conſiderable churches in this city are St. Michael's, whoſe ſteeple is built in the form of an obeliſk; it is very high, and well contrived. The collegiate churches of St. Sernin, in a ſuburb of the ſame name, whoſe tombs in the church-yard are very ancient. The ſteeple of the Cordeliers is like that of St. Michael, and the Jeſuits church as well as the Cordeliers is worth ſeeing; as alſo the Hotel Dieu.

The other curioſities of the city are, the parliament houſe, which is ſaid to be an ancient palace of the Romans; the univerſity which was founded in 1441; the town-houſe; the arſenal; the cuſtom-houſe; the mint, &c. which are all worthy the notice of a traveller.

The academy was eſtabliſhed in 1713, under the protection of the duke de la Force, who gives a golden medal every year to the perſon who beſt anſwers the queſtion which is propoſed. The moſt remarkable antiquities are, the palace of Tutele, a temple dedicated to the tutelary gods, but it is almoſt demoliſhed to make way for the glacis of the Trompe caſtle. The Gallian palace, from the emperor Gallus

Gallus, in whoſe reign it was built, made like an amphitheatre; the Port Baſſe, whoſe conſtruction is extremely ſolid, and ſhows the manner of building in the Auguſtan age. The fountain of Duge, which yields ſo great a quantity of water, that it immediately forms a ſmall river. At the time of the fairs, which are twice a year, there generally arrive five hundred ſhips, which carry away one hundred thouſand tuns of wine and brandy. We ſhould have obſerved, that near the river they have built a fine ſquare, in the middle of which they have placed the equeſtrian ſtatue of Lewis XIV. Bourdeaux is eighty-eight miles ſouth of Rochelle, three hundred and twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Paris, and thirty-five north-weſt of Bazas. Long. 0. 39. W. Lat. 44. 50. N.

BOURDEILLE (Peter) a French gentleman, more known by the name of Brantôme, of which place he was abbot, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſeveral courts of Europe by his wit and talents. He ſpent great part of his life in travelling, was baron of Richemont, gentleman of the chamber to Charles IX. and Henry III. and chamberlain to the duke of Alençon. He died on the 5th of July, 1614, aged eighty-ſeven. His Memoirs have been printed in fifteen volumes, duodecimo.

He ought not to be confounded with Claudius de Bourdeille, count of Montreſor, ſecond couſin to the former, who was much talked of under the miniſtries of cardinal de Richelieu and Mazarin, and who wrote Memoirs under the name of Montreſor. He died at Paris, on the 2d of July, 1663.

BOURDELOT (John) a learned advocate in the parliament of Paris, and maſter of the requeſts to queen Mary de Medicis, died at Paris, in 1638. He wrote Notes, which are eſteemed, on Lucian, Heliodorus, and Petronius.

He muſt not be confounded with the abbé Bourdelot, his nephew, who was alſo called Peter Michon. This laſt gentleman was a celebrated phyſician, who wrote a Treatiſe on the Viper, and ſeveral other works which are eſteemed.

BOURDON (Sebastian) a famous painter, born at Montpellier, in the year 1619. He ſtudied ſeven years at Rome, and acquired ſuch reputation, that at his return to France, he had the honour of being the firſt who was made rector of the Academy of Painting at Paris. He particularly excelled in landſcapes, but the moſt eſteemed of his works is the martyrdom of St. Peter, in the cathedral church of Paris. He died in 1673.

BOURG (Annas du) counſellor, clerk to the parliament of Paris, and a native of Riom, in Auvergne, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his erudition, his knowledge of the laws, and his firm adherence to the proteſtant religion: but being declared an heretic, he was degraded, hanged, and afterwards burnt, at the Greve, in 1559, at the age of thirty-eight.

BOURG en Bresse, a city of France, capital of Breſſe. It is ſeated on the river Reſouſe, and is about two miles and a half in circumference. There are ſeveral convents for men and women, beſides an hoſpital. It is badly ſituated for trade, and yet it diſpoſes of horſes, cattle, and ſkins. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Maçon, twenty-three north-eaſt of Trevoux, thirty-eight north-weſt of Belley, forty-three ſouth-weſt of Gex, and one hundred and thirty-three ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 19. E. Lat. 46. 13. N.

Bourg en Bresse, a town of Guienne, in Bourdelois, with a pretty good port at the confluence of the rivers Dordogne and Garonne, fifteen miles from Bourdeaux. Long. 0. 37. W. Lat. 45. 2. N.

Bourg sur Mer, a ſea-port town of Guienne in France, and in Bourdelois, with a tolerable good harbour. It is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Dordogne and Garonne, fifteen miles north of Bourdeaux. Long. 0. 35. W. Lat. 45. 0. N.

BOURGES, a city of France, the capital of Berri, with an archbiſhop's ſee. The archbiſhop aſſumes the title of the patriarch of the Aquitains, and enjoys the rights of primacy with regard to Albi. It is ſeated between two ſmall rivers, the Evry and the Orron, upon a hill that has a gentle deſcent down to theſe rivers, by which it is almoſt ſurrounded, for there is but one avenue to it by land, which is that of port Bourbonnoux. It ſtands upon a great deal of ground, but one part of it is without houſes, and the reſt is but thinly peopled with eccleſiaſtics, gentlemen, and ſtudents, and the whole number of ſouls amounts but to one thouſand eight hundred. They have no manner of trade but for their own neceſſaries. It is divided into the old and new town. The walls of the old are almoſt entire, and the new town is almoſt as large as the old. There are ſeveral churches, convents, and nunneries: the pariſh church, dedicated to St. Stephen, is a fine old gothic ſtructure: it is ſeated on the higheſt part of the city, and on each ſide of the front are two handſome high towers. The new one, which is built in the room of one that fell down, is almoſt two hundred feet high. Bourbon ſquare is the largeſt in the city, where there was formerly an amphitheatre, and now a market. There is a fine walk from St. Michael's-gate into the fields, and three alleys, formed by four ranks of trees, the middlemoſt of which is ſpacious; beſides which, there is a very long mall. The univerſity is famous for the ſtudy of the law. It ſtands almoſt in the centre of France, and is thirty miles north-weſt of Nevers, fifty-five ſouth-eaſt of Orleans, ſeventy-five eaſt-by-ſouth of Tours, ninety-three eaſt of Limoges, and one hundred and twenty-five ſouth of Paris. Long. 2. 30. E. Lat. 47. 10. N.

BOURGOGNE, or Burgundy, as it is called by us, is a conſiderable province of France, with the title of a duchy. It is one hundred and thirty miles in length, and ſeventy-five in breadth. It is bounded on the eaſt by the Franche Compté, on the weſt by Bourbonnois and Nivernois, on the ſouth by Lyonnois, and on the north by Champagne. It is very fertile in corn and fruit, and produces excellent wine. It is watered by the rivers Seine, Dehune, Brebince, Armançon, Ouche, Suzon, Tille, and Saone. There are four mineral ſprings at Apoigny, Premeau, Bourbon Lancy, and St. Reine. The firſt are obſcure, and the two laſt in high reputation. In the canton of Breſſe there are two ſubterranean lakes, which often overflow in times of the greateſt drought, and lay a large tract of ground under water; one of them has no apparent ſpring, or opening, and yet in a dry ſeaſon it throws out water enough to overflow the meadow-land near it.

The grottoes or caves of Arcy are ſeated on the left of the river Yonne, eighteen miles from Auxerre; over them is arable land, with ſoil about ten feet deep. The entrance into theſe cavities is narrow, but is two hundred paces long. There are arches which form ſeveral vaults, from whence drop clear water, which turns into a brilliant hard ſtone. Twenty paces from the entrance is a lake, which ſeems to be formed by that part of the water that will not petrify. The higheſt of theſe vaults is not above eight feet. About eighty paces from the entrance there is a kind of hall, with a coffee-coloured cieling, wherein there are a thouſand odd figures, which have a very agreeable effect. In a meadow near Vezelay, by the river Care, there is a ſalt ſpring, which they boil into ſalt. At Pourrain there is a very uſeful ſort of oaker.

This country is fruitful in corn and hemp. It is full of fine paſtures, and lakes with plenty of fiſh. The moſt remarkable places are Bourgen, Breſſe, Mont-luel, Pont de Vaux, and Coligny. Bugey is ſeparated from Dauphiné and Savoy by the Rhone. It is full of hills and mountains, and yet is tolerably fertile. It has a great many lakes, foreſts, paſtures, and rivers abounding with trouts. There is a great deal of game, ſuch as partridges, pheaſants, woodhens, birds of paſſage, hares, rabbits, bears, deer, wild boars, lynxes, roe-bucks, &c. The remarkable places are Belley, Soiſel, St. Rambert, Cerdon, St. Sorlin, Chateau-Neuf, and Montrevel. The bailiwick of Grex is in part poſſeſſed by the republic of Geneva, and is ſeparated from Savoy by the lake of Geneva, and by the river Rhone. Gex is the only remarkable place. The principality of Dombes is between Breſſe and the river Saone. It is a very fertile and pleaſant country, and conſiſts of eleven chattellanies, Beauregard, Montmerle, Toiſſay, Lans, Chalaman, Chatelet, St. Trivier, Villeneuve, Amberieu, Ligmieu, and Trevoux. This laſt is the moſt remarkable of them all.

BOURIGNON (Antoinette) was one of thoſe devotees who imagine themſelves to be conducted by inſpirations. She was born at Liſle, January 13, 1616, ſo deformed, that it was debated ſome days in the family, whether it was not proper to ſtifle her as a monſter; but her deformity diminiſhing, ſhe was ſpared, and afterwards obtained ſuch a degree of beauty, that ſhe had her admirers. From her childhood to her old age ſhe had an extraordinary turn of mind. She ſet up for a reformer, and publiſhed a great number of books filled with very ſingular doctrines, the moſt remarkable of which are intitled The Light of the World, and The Teſtimony of Truth. She was an enemy to reaſon and common ſenſe, which ſhe maintained ought to give place to the illumination of divine faith; and aſſerted that whenever any one was born again by embracing her doctrines, ſhe felt the pains and throws of a woman in labour. She died at Franeker, October 30, 1680. Her works have been printed in eighteen volumes, octavo.

BOURLOTE (Claudius de la) a ſoldier of fortune, who raiſed himſelf by his valour. See Labourlote.

BOURMONT, a town of France, in Barrois, and the chief place of a bailiwick and ſeneſchalty, ten miles from Neufchatel.

BOURN, a town of Lincolnſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and three fairs, on March 7, May 6, and October 29, for horſes and horned cattle. It is ſeated near a ſpring, called Burnwell-head, from which proceeds a river that runs through the town. It is a pretty large place, and has a good market for corn and proviſions. It is noted for the coronation of king Edmund. It is ſeventeen miles north of Peterborough, thirty-five ſouth of Lincoln, and ninety-eight north of London. Long. 17. 15. E. Lat. 52. 40. N.

BOURO, an iſland in the Eaſt Indian Ocean, between the Moluccas and Celebes. It is well cultivated, and is now ſubject to the Dutch, who have built a fortreſs here. Some mountains in it are exceeding high, and the ſea on one ſide is uncommonly deep. It produces nutmegs and cloves, as well as cocoa and banana trees, and many vegetables introduced by the Dutch. It is about fifty miles in circumference. Long. 129. 0. E. Lat. 4. 30. S.

BOURSALT (Edme) a French author, who wrote ſeveral works in proſe and verſe, which have been eſteemed; among theſe are his Æſop at Court, and a Treatiſe on the Education of a Prince, for the Uſe of the Dauphin. He died September, 1701.

BOURZEIS (Amable de) abbot of St. Martin de Cores, and one of the forty of the French Academy, was born at Volvic, near Riom, in 1606, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf under the miniſtries of Richelieu, Mazarine, and Colbert. He wrote ſeveral works, and died on the 2d of Auguſt, 1672.

BOUTON, an iſland in the Eaſt-Indian Sea, about twelve miles diſtant from the ſouth-eaſt part of the iſland of Celebes, or Macaſſar. The inhabitants are ſmall, but well ſhaped, and of a dark olive complexion. The principal town is Callaſujung, which is about a mile from the ſea, on the top of a ſmall hill, and round it there is a ſtone wall. The houſes are not built on the ground, but upon poſts; and it is a clean pleaſant place. Their religion is Mahometaniſm. Long. 127. 5. E. Lat. 4. 30. S.

BOW, a town in Devonſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and two fairs, on Holy Thurſday and November 22, for cattle. It is ſeated near the ſpring-head of a river which falls into the Taw, and is a pretty ſmall town, but the market is inconſiderable. It is eight miles weſt-by-north of Exeter, thirty north-by-eaſt of Plymouth, and one hundred and eighty-nine weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 4. 0. W. Lat. 50. 45. N.

BOXHORNIUS (Marc Zuerius) a learned critic, born at Bergen op Zoom, in 1612, was profeſſor of eloquence at Leyden, and at length of politics and hiſtory, in the room of Heinſius. He publiſhed, 1. Theatrum Urbium Hollandiæ. 2. Scriptores Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ, cum Notis. 3. Poetæ ſatyrici minores, cum Comment. 4. Notes on Juſtin, Tacitus, and a great number of other works. He died on the 3d of October, 1653, aged forty-one.

BOXTEHUDE, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, ſubject to the Danes. It is ſeated on the rivulet Eſſe, which falls into the Elbe, and is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Hamburgh, and ſeventy-three north-by-weſt of Bremen. Long. 9. 35. E. Lat. 53. 40. N.

BOXTEL, a town in Dutch Brabant, with ſluices, ſeated on the river Bommel, eight miles ſouth of Bois le Duc. Long. 5. 15. E. Lat. 51. 30. N.

BOYDE (Robert) deſcended from one of the moſt ancient and noble families in Scotland, was the ſon of ſir Thomas Boyde, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his great abilities, which raiſed him to the higheſt pitch of grandeur. By the favour of king James II. he was created a baron, by the name and title of lord Boyde of Kilmarnock, and upon the unhappy death of that prince, in 1460, was made juſticiary, and named one of the lords of the regency, in whoſe hands the adminiſtration of affairs was lodged during the minority of the young king. The lord Boyde, together with his brother ſir Alexander Boyde, ſoon began to inſtil into the young king, then twelve years old, notions of manhood and liberty, inſinuating that he was now capable of governing without the help of guardians and tutors. To this advice the king readily liſtened; he was then at Linlithgow, where the lord Kennedy, another of the regents, had a watchful eye over him; it was therefore neceſſary to remove his majeſty to Edinburgh. To this purpoſe, the lord Boyde having ordered an hunting match for the king, on the 10th of July, 1466, they, with ſome other friends, inſtead of purſuing the chaſe, turned into the road leading to Edinburgh, in which they had not gone far before the lord Kennedy, who ſuſpected this to be a game of ſtate, came up with them, and taking hold of the bridle of the king's horſe, deſired him to return to Linlithgow, and bid him beware of thoſe guides who thus treaſonably attempted to convey him away; for, by a late ſtatute, it was declared high-treaſon to carry away the king's perſon without the expreſs conſent of the eſtates aſſembled in parliament; but the Boydes thought the king's perſon would guard them from the penalty of the law, and that an after-ſtatute, which they doubted not of obtaining, would cancel the former; with this aſſurance, ſir Alexander Boyde, as if he meant to reſent the inſult offered to the king, after ſome angry words, gave the lord Kennedy a blow with his hunting-ſtaff, who thereupon went off, and left them to purſue their journey to Edinburgh. Thus were thoſe ſeeds of enmity ſown between the two families, which at laſt grew up to the total ruin of one of them.

The lord Boyde having got the king to Edinburgh, began to provide for his own ſafety and that of his friends; a parliament was called at Edinburgh the ſame year, which having met, he threw himſelf on his knees before the throne on which the king ſat, and, in an elaborate harangue, complained of the hard conſtruction put upon the king's removal by his enemies, humbly beſeeching his majeſty to declare his own ſenſe of that event. The king, after conſulting the lords, replied, that the lord Boyde was not his adviſer, but rather his companion in that journey, and was therefore more worthy of reward than puniſhment, and that this he was willing to declare in a public decree of the ſtates. His lordſhip then deſired that this decree might be regiſtered in the acts of the aſſembly. This was alſo complied with; and an inſtrument to that purpoſe was granted to his lordſhip, who, at the ſame time, was made ſole regent till the king arrived at the age of twenty-one. Some time after, he was made lord great chamberlain of Scotland; and ſtill farther to aggrandize his family, his ſon, ſir Thomas Boyde, was created earl of Arran, and married to the king's eldeſt ſiſter. A marriage being concluded by ambaſſadors ſent into Denmark, the young earl of Arran was ſent to eſpouſe the Daniſh princeſs, in the king his brother-in-law's name; and he was no ſooner gone, than the ſeeds of enmity, long ſince ſown between the Kennedies and the Boydes, began to ſhoot out with the greateſt vigour, and every art was tried to alienate the king's affections from the Boydes. The king, young, weak, credulous, wavering, and naturally jealous, began to be alarmed, and quickly became the tool of their revenge. The lord Boyde, his ſon, though then in Denmark, and ſir Alexander, were all ſummoned to appear before the parliament in 1469, where they were indicted for high treaſon, for carrying away the king contrary to an act of parliament. Sir Alexander only appeared, when, notwithſtanding the king's pardon, he was condemned and beheaded; and the lord Boyde would doubtleſs have ſuffered the ſame fate, had he not fled into England, where he died in the year 1470, as the earl of Arran alſo did at Antwerp about four years after.

Boyde (William) the unfortunate earl of Kilmarnock, was deſcended from the above family, and was the ſon of William Boyde, earl of Kilmarnock, who, in the rebellion in 1715, was very active in the ſervice of the government, and died two years after. The earl who is the ſubject of this article was but thirteen years of age when his father died; part of the family eſtate was then alienated, and the reſt pretty much encumbered. As he grew up, he lived above his income, which ſtill farther reduced his eſtate; hence, with the hopes of mending his fortune, he, in the late rebellion, joined the pretender's ſtandard, upon which he was made colonel of the guards, promoted to the rank of general, and declared of his privy council. His lordſhip was, however, taken priſoner at the battle of Culloden, and being brought to England, was put into the Tower, and on Monday, the 28th of July, 1746, was, with the lord Balmerino and the earl of Cromartie, conducted to the bar of the houſe of lords, in Weſtminſter-hall, and tried by his peers, before the lord high ſteward, when, pleading guilty to his indictment, he ſubmitted himſelf to his majeſty's mercy and clemency. Being brought from the Tower on the Wedneſday following, to receive ſentence, he delivered an eloquent ſpeech, after which ſentence of death was pronounced upon him, and on the 18th of Auguſt, 1746, he was beheaded on Tower-hill, at forty-two years of age. The Rev. Mr. Foſter, who attended him in the Tower, obſerves, that his whole deportment, from the time of his being condemned till his execution, was exceedingly becoming; and as he gave the moſt lively marks of a ſincere repentance, his behaviour in the hour of death was reſigned, decent, and awful, free from an extreme dejectedneſs; it may therefore be ſaid, that he died with a becoming reſolution; for, as his lordſhip himſelf juſtly obſerved, for a man who had lived a diſſolute life, and yet believed the conſequences of death, to put on an air of daringneſs and abſolute intrepidity, muſt argue him to be either very ſtupid or very impious.

BOYER (Claudius) a French poet, born at Alby, and one of the forty of the French Academy, was the author of the tragedies of Judith and Jeptha, and ſeveral other pieces. He died in 1698, aged eighty.

Boyer (Abel) a native of Caſtres, and a famous Engliſh and French writer. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he went to Geneva, then to Franeker, and at length came to England, where he taught French to perſons of diſtinction. He wrote, 1. An excellent French and Engliſh, and Engliſh and French Dictionary. 2. A French Grammar. 3. The political State of Great Britain. 4. The Hiſtories of King William and Queen Anne; and other other works; and alſo publiſhed ſeveral tranſlations from the French. He died at Chelſea, on the 16th of Nov. 1729.

BOYLE (RICHARD) one of the greateſt ſtateſmen of the laſt century, and generally ſtyled the Great Earl of Cork, was the youngeſt ſon of Mr. Roger Boyle, and was born at Canterbury, on the 3d of October, 1566. He ſtudied at Bennet college, Cambridge, where he was remarkable for early riſing, his indefatigable ſtudy, and great temperance, and afterwards became a ſtudent in the Middle Temple. Having loſt his father and mother, and being unable to ſupport himſelf in the proſecution of his ſtudies, he became clerk to ſir Richard Manhood, one of the chief barons of the exchequer; but finding that by this employment he could not raiſe his fortune, he went to Ireland, in 1588, with fewer pounds in his pocket than he afterwards acquired thouſands a year. He was then about two and twenty, had a graceful perſon, and many accompliſhments, which enabled him to render himſelf uſeful to ſeveral of the principal perſons employed in the government, by drawing up for them memorials, caſes, and anſwers. In 1595, he married Joan, the daughter and coheireſs of William Anſley, who had fallen in love with him, and ſhe dying in labour of her firſt child, who was born dead, in 1599, left him an eſtate of five hundred pounds a year in land. Some time after, ſir Henry Wallop, and ſeveral other perſons of rank, envying him on account of the purchaſes he made in the province of Connaught, repreſented him to queen Elizabeth as being in the pay of the king of Spain, who, they pretended, had furniſhed him with money. Soon after the rebellion broke out in Ireland, and the earl of Eſſex being nominated lord deputy of that kingdom, Mr. Boyle, who was then at London, was recommended to his lordſhip; but ſir Henry Wallop, treaſurer of Ireland, knowing that Mr. Boyle had ſeveral papers in his cuſtody that could detect his roguiſh manner of paſſing his accounts, reſolved to cruſh him, and renewed his former complaints againſt him to the queen, upon which he was ſuddenly taken up and committed cloſe priſoner to the Gatehouſe, and all his papers ſeized. At length, with much difficulty, he obtained the favour of the queen to be preſent at his examination, and having fully anſwered what was alledged againſt him, he gave a ſhort account of his own behaviour ſince his firſt ſettling in Ireland, and concluded with laying open to the queen and her council the conduct of his chief enemy, ſir Henry Wallop, with ſuch force that her majeſty declared him innocent, ſtripped ſir Henry of his poſt of treaſurer, and gave Mr. Boyle her hand to kiſs before the whole aſſembly. A few days after, ſhe conſtituted him clerk of the council of Munſter, and recommended him to ſir George Carew, lord preſident of Munſter, who ſent him to the queen with the news of the victory gained, on the 24th of December, 1601, near Kinſale, over the Iriſh and their Spaniſh auxiliaries, who were entirely routed, one thouſand two hundred being ſlain in the field, and eight hundred wounded, when he made ſuch expedition, that he left the lord preſident at Shannon caſtle, near Cork, on the Monday morning at two o'clock, and the next day delivered his packet, and ſupped with ſir Robert Cecil, principal ſecretary of ſtate, at his houſe in the Strand

Upon his return to Ireland, he aſſiſted at the ſiege of Beerhaven caſtle, which was taken by ſtorm, and the garriſon put to the ſword. He ſoon after received the honour of knighthood. He now roſe with great rapidity to the higheſt offices, and even to the dignity of the peerage in Ireland, to which he was raiſed by king James I. on the 29th of September, 1616, by the ſtyle and title of baron of Youghall, in the county of Cork; four years after, he was created viſcount Dungarvan, and earl of Cork; and, in 1631, was made lord treaſurer of Ireland, an honour that was made hereditary to his family. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the noble ſtand he made, when the fatal rebellion broke out in that kingdom, in the reign of Charles I. and in his old age acted with as much bravery and military ſkill, as if he had been trained from his infancy to the profeſſion of arms. He turned the caſtle of Liſmore, his capital ſeat, into a fortreſs capable of demanding reſpect from the Iriſh. He immediately armed and diſciplined his ſervants and proteſtant tenants, and by their aſſiſtance, and a ſmall army raiſed and maintained at his own expence, which he put under the command of his four ſons, defended the province of Munſter, and in the ſpace of a year took ſeveral ſtrong caſtles, and killed upwards of three thouſand of the enemy, during which time he paid his forces regularly, and when all his money was gone, like a true patriot, converted his plate into coin. This great man died on the 15th of September, 1634.

BOYLE (RICHARD) earl of Burlington and Corke, ſon to the former, was a nobleman of unblemiſhed loyalty in rebellious times, and of untainted integrity in times of the greateſt corruption. He was born at Youghall, October 20, 1612, while his father was in the beginning of his proſperity, and only ſir Richard Boyle. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his loyalty to king Charles I. he not only commanded troops, but raiſed, and for a long time paid them, and continued to wait upon the king as long as any one place held out for him in England, and then was forced to compound for his eſtate. He contributed all in his power to the Reſtoration, on which king Charles II. raiſed him to the dignity of earl of Burlington, or Bridlington, in the county of York, in the year 1663. He died Jan. 15, 1697-8, in the eighty-ſixth year of his age.

BOYLE (ROGER) earl of Orrery, younger brother of the former, was the fifth ſon of Richard, ſtyled the Great earl of Cork, and was one of the moſt learned, able, and valiant perſons of the age in which he lived. He was born April 25, 1621, and, by the credit of his father with the lord deputy Faulkland, raiſed to the dignity and title of baron Broghill, when only ſeven years old. He was educated at the college of Dublin, where he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an early and promiſing genius. He afterwards made the tour of France and Italy, and at his return aſſiſted his father in oppoſing the rebellious Iriſh, in which he behaved with all the ſpirit of a young, and the diſcretion of an old officer. After the ceſſation of the rebellion in Ireland, he paid his duty to the king at Oxford, and returned to Ireland, by his majeſty's orders, to perform ſome important ſervices there, where he continued to act till the murder of the king, when he left his country, and retiring to Marſton, in Somerſetſhire, hid himſelf in the privacy of a cloſe retirement: but being at length aſhamed to ſit the tame ſpectator of all the miſchief that appeared around him, he reſolved to attempt ſomething in favour of the king, and, and under the pretence of going to the Spa for the recovery of his health, he determined to croſs the ſeas, and apply himſelf to king Charles II. for a commiſſion to raiſe what forces he could in Ireland, in order to reſtore his majeſty, and recover his own eſtate. To this purpoſe, he prevailed on the earl of Warwick to procure a licence for his going to the Spa, and having raiſed a conſiderable ſum of money, came up to London to proſecute his voyage; but he had not been long in town when he received a meſſage from Cromwell, who was then general of the parliament's forces, that he intended to wait upon him. The lord Broghill was ſurpriſed at this meſſage, having never had the leaſt acquaintance with Cromwell, and deſired the gentleman to let the general know, that he would wait upon his excellency; but while he was waiting the return of the meſſenger, Cromwell entered the room, who, when mutual civilities had paſſed between them, told him in few words, that the committee of ſtate were apprized of his deſign of going over, and applying to Charles Stuart for a commiſſion to raiſe forces in Ireland, and that they were determined to make an example of him, if he himſelf had not diverted them from that reſolution. The lord Broghill interrupted him, by aſſuring him that the intelligence which the committee had received was falſe, and that he neither was in a capacity, nor had any inclination to raiſe diſturbances in Ireland; but Cromwell, inſtead of making any reply, drew ſome papers out of his pocket, which were the copies of ſeveral letters which the lord Broghill had ſent to thoſe perſons in whom he moſt confided, and put them into his hands. The lord Broghill, upon the peruſal of theſe papers, finding it to no purpoſe to diſſemble any longer, aſked his excellency's pardon for what he had ſaid, returned him his humble thanks for his protection againſt the committee, and intreated his directions how to behave in ſo delicate a conjuncture. Cromwell told him, that though till this time he had been a ſtranger to his perſon, he was not ſo to his merit and character; but that he had heard how gallantly his lordſhip had behaved in the Iriſh wars, and therefore, ſince he was named lord lieutenant of Ireland, and the reducing that kingdom was now become his province, he had obtained leave of the committee to offer his lordſhip the command of a general officer, if he would ſerve in that war; that he ſhould have no oaths or engagements impoſed upon him, nor be obliged to draw his ſword againſt any but the Iriſh rebels.

The lord Broghill was infinitely ſurpriſed at ſo generous and unexpected an offer; he ſaw himſelf at liberty, by all the rules of honour, to ſerve againſt the Iriſh, whoſe rebellion and barbarities were equally deteſted by the royal party and the parliament; he deſired, however, ſome time to conſider of what had been propoſed to him; but Cromwell briſkly told him, that he muſt come to ſome reſolution that very inſtant, that he himſelf was returning to the committee, who were ſtill ſitting, and if his lordſhip rejected their offer, they had determined to ſend him to the Tower; on which the lord Broghill, finding that his liberty and life were in the utmoſt danger, and charmed with the frankneſs and generoſity of Cromwell's behaviour, gave him his word and honour that he would faithfully ſerve him againſt the Iriſh rebels; upon which Cromwell once more aſſured him, that that the conditions which he had made with him ſhould be punctually obſerved; and then ordered him immediately to repair to Briſtol, adding, that he himſelf would ſoon follow him into Ireland. Lord Broghill, therefore, having ſettled the buſineſs of his command, went over into that country, where, by his conduct and intrepidity, he performed many important ſervices, and fully juſtified the opinion Cromwell had conceived of him.

He was fruitful in the moſt ingenious artifices, an inſtance of which we cannot forbear mentioning. At the ſiege of the caſtle of Carigdroghid, he informed the garriſon, that if they did not ſurrender before his heavy artillery came up, he would ſhew them no mercy. At this his own army were greatly aſtoniſhed, as they knew he had not a ſingle piece of battering cannon, but ordering ſeveral large trees to be cut, and drawn at a diſtance by his baggage-horſes, the beſiegers judging by the ſlowneſs of their motion that they were cannon of a vaſt ſize, capitulated as his lordſhip had adviſed. He afterwards defeated an army of three times the ſtrength of his own, by repeating, in the heat of the action, in conjunction with thoſe about him, They run! they run! He had afterwards a principal hand in the Reſtoration, and was by Charles II. advanced to the honour of earl of Orrery, on the 5th of September, 1660. This great man died October 16, 1679. His lordſhip wrote, 1. a work intitled The Art of War. 2. Partheniſſa, a romance, in one volume folio. 3. Several Poems. 4. Dramatic Pieces, two volumes. 5, State Tracts, in one volume folio, &c.

Mr. Walpole, ſpeaking of this nobleman, ſays, he never made a bad figure but as an author. As a ſoldier, his bravery was diſtinguiſhed, his ſtratagems remarkable. As a ſtateſman, it is ſufficient to ſay, that he had the confidence of Cromwell; as a man, he was grateful, and would have ſupported the ſon of his friend; but like Cicero and Richelieu, he could not be content without being a poet, though he was ill qualified, his writings of this kind being flat and trivial.

BOYLE (ROBERT) a man illuſtrious by his birth, his learning, and his virtue, and particularly as the author and encourager of the new philoſophy, by which he has not only rendered his memory immortal, but derived honour to his country. He was the ſeventh ſon and the fourteenth child of Richard, earl of Cork, and the youngeſt brother of the two noble perſons laſt mentioned. He was born at Liſmore, in the county of Cork, in Ireland, Feb. 25, 1626-7, educated at Eton college, and, in the year 1638, ſet out on his travels, from which he did not return till the year 1644. He was one of the firſt members of that ſmall, but learned body ſtyled by him the Inviſible, and, by themſelves, the Philoſophical College, and which, after the Reſtoration, were incorporated by the title of the Royal Society, of which he continued one of its moſt induſtrious and uſeful members, during the whole courſe of his life. He invented the air-pump, made a multitude of ſurpriſing diſcoveries in chemiſtry, and the moſt abſtruſe branches of philoſophy: he was thoroughly verſed in the knowledge of the whole circle of the ſciences, and was equally remarkable for his piety to God, whom he never mentioned without a pauſe in his diſcourſe, and a viſible reverence at pronouncing the ſacred name. His noble foundation for Lectures in Defence of the Exiſtence of the Deity; the Tranſlation and Impreſſion of the New Teſtament in the Malayan Tongue, which he ſent over all the Eaſt Indies, at his own expence, and the great ſums he otherwiſe expended for the propogation of the Goſpel, with his boundleſs charity and extenſive acts of beneficence, together with his unwearied labours to promote the cauſe of moral and phyſical truth, ſhew that he was not only an honour to his country, but to human nature; and for this reaſon foreigners endeavour to outvie us in their commendations of him. His works are very numerous. Among thoſe of the religious kind, are, 1. His Seraphic Love. 2. His Chriſtian Virtuoſo. 3. His Free Diſcourſe againſt Cuſtomary Swearing, and his Conſiderations on the Style of the Holy Scriptures. Among his philoſophical works are, 1. New Experiments touching the Spring of the Air. 2. The Sceptical Chemiſt. 3. Experiments and Obſervations relative to an experimental Hiſtory of Cold. 4. Hydroſtatical Parodoxes. 5. A Diſcourſe of the Atmoſpheres of conſiſtent Bodies. 6. Eſſays on the Nature of Effluvia. 7. A Collection of Tracts on the Saltneſs of the Sea. 8. Memoirs for the natural Hiſtory of the Human Blood; and many other pieces. He died on the laſt day of the year 1691.

BOYLE (CHARLES) earl of Orrery, in Ireland, and baron of Marſton, in the county of Somerſet, was the ſecond ſon of Roger, the ſecond earl of Orrery, and was born in Auguſt 1679. He was educated at Chriſt-church, in Oxford, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning and abilities. Like the firſt earl of Orrery, he was an author, a ſoldier, and a ſtateſman. He tranſlated the Life of Lyſander from the Greek of Plutarch, and publiſhed a new edition of the Epiſtles of Phalaris, which engaged him in a literary diſpute, in which he defended the genuineneſs of thoſe epiſtles againſt Dr. Benltey. He was three times member for the town of Huntingdon; but his elder brother Lionel, earl of Orrery, dying on the 23d of Auguſt, 1703, without iſſue, he ſucceeded to that title, and entering into the queen's ſervice, had a regiment given him, when he behaved with ſuch bravery, that in 1709 he was raiſed to the rank of a major-general, and ſworn one of her majeſty's privy-council. At the famous battle of the Wood, he gave the ſtrongeſt proofs of his intrepid courage, remaining at the head of his regiment in the warmeſt part of the action, till the victory was complete, which, as it was one of the moſt glorious, ſo it was the deareſt bought of any of that war. His lordſhip had the honour of being appointed the queen's envoy to the ſtates of Brabant and Flanders, and having honourably diſcharged that truſt, was raiſed to the dignity of a Britiſh peer, by the title of lord Boyle, baron of Marſton, in Somerſetſhire. He enjoyed ſeveral additional honours in the reign of king George I. but having the misfortune to fall under the ſuſpicion of the government, his lordſhip was committed to the Tower: he was, however, at length admitted to bail, and nothing being found that could be eſteemed a ſufficient ground for a proſecution, he was diſcharged. His lordſhip died Aug. 28, 1731, in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age.

BOYLE (JOHN) earl of Corke and Orrery, a nobleman diſtinguiſhed by his learning and genius, was the only ſon of Charles, earl of Orrery, and was born on the ſecond of January, 1707. He was educated at Church-church college, in Oxford, but, as he himſelf declares, early diſappointments, indifferent health, and many untoward accidents, rendered him fond of retirement, and of improving his talents for polite lierature and poetry, of which laſt art he gave ſeveral excellent ſpecimens, particularly a copy of verſes to the memory of that much-beloved youth and relation, Edmund, duke of Bucks. He alſo wrote a Tranſlation of Pliny the Younger's Letters, with various notes, for the ſervice of his eldeſt ſon the lord Boyle, in two volumes, quarto. This was firſt publiſhed in 1751; the following year he publiſhed the Life of Dean Swift, in ſeveral Letters, addreſſed to his ſecond ſon, Hamilton Boyle, and afterwards printed Memoirs of Robert Cary, earl of Monmouth, a manuſcript preſented to him by a relation, with explanatory notes. He died in November, 1762.

BOYNE, a river in Ireland, which riſes in Queen's County, in the province of Leinſter, and runs north-eaſt by Trim and Cavan, and falls into the Iriſh Channel a little below Drogheda. It is memorable for a battle fought on its banks between James II. and William III. wherein the former was beaten.

BOYS (JOHN) D. D. dean of Canterbury, in the reign of James I. was educated at Clare-hall, in Cambridge. He was famous for his Poſtils, and was alſo much eſteemed for his good life. He gained great applauſe by turning the Lord's Prayer into the following execration, when he preached at Paul's Croſs, on the 5th of November, in this reign. But we imagine that no Proteſtant, at this time, who is poſſeſſed of that candour and charity which is the ſpirit of the Chriſtian religion, would give the leaſt approbation to the ſubverſion of the words of the mild and gentle Saviour of the world, into ſuch harſh and uncharitable language. This prayer is as follows: "Our pope, which art "in Rome, curſed be thy name; periſh may thy kingdom; "hindred may thy will be, as it is in heaven, ſo in earth. "Give us this day our cup in the Lord's Supper, and re"mit our monies which we have given for thy indulgen"cies, as we ſend them back unto thee; and lead us not "into hereſy, but free us from miſery, for thine is the in"fernal pitch and ſulphur, for ever and ever. Amen." He died in September, 1625.

BOYS, BOYSE, or BOIS, (JOHN) an eminent divine, and one of the tranſlators of the Bible in the reign of king James I. was born at Nettleſtead, in Suffolk, January 3, 1560. He was the ſon of Mr. William Bois, rector of Weſt-Stowe, near St. Edmond's Bury, who taught him in his infancy the firſt rudiments of learning, inſomuch, that when he had attained the age of five years, he read the Bible in Hebrew, and not only wrote that language intelligibly, but in a fair and elegant character by that time he was ſix. He was afterwards ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his great ſkill in the Greek language, and his prodigious application to ſtudy. He had once ſome thoughts of applying himſelf to phyſic, with a view of making it his profeſſion; but being troubled with a weakneſs, frequently incident to perſons of a delicate conſtitution, viz. that of believing themſelves afflicted with every diſeaſe of which they read, he quitted the ſtudy of phyſic for that of divinity. On the death of his father he ſucceeded him in the rectory of Weſt-Stowe; and he afterwards became rector of Boxworth, and prebendary of Ely.

Ely. When king James the First directed a new translation of the Bible to be made, by persons of the greatest learning, as well at London as the two universities, Mr. Boyse was chosen one of the Cambridge translators, and in this arduous work, he performed not only his own task, but also that of one of his colleagues. He likewise assisted sir Henry Savile in the laborious undertaking of publishing the works of St. Chrysostom. He died January 14, 1643, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, leaving behind him a great many manuscripts, particularly a Commentary on almost all the Books of the New Testament.

BOYSE (SAMUEL) a poet, remarkable for his extravagance, his meanness, and his letting slip the greatest advantages, was the son of the rev. Mr. Joseph Boyse, an eminent dissenting minister in Dublin, and was born in 1708. He was educated at a private school in Dublin, and at eighteen years of age was sent to the university of Glasgow; but he had not been a year at that university when he fell in love with Miss Atchenson, the daughter of a tradesman in that city, and married her before he was twenty. The natural extravagance of his temper soon exposed him to want, and having now the additional charge of a wife, he was obliged to quit the university, and to go with his wife, (who also took a sister with her) to Dublin, where they relied on the old gentleman for support. Young Boyse was of all men the farthest removed from a gentleman; he had no graces of person, and fewer still of conversation. Never were there three persons of more libertine characters than young Boyse, his wife, and sister-in-law, yet the two ladies wore such a mark of decency before the old gentleman, that his fondness for them was never abated. An estate he possessed in Yorkshire was sold to pay his son's debts, and when the worthy old man lay in his last sickness, he was entirely supported by presents from his congregation, and buried at their expence.

Soon after his father's death he went to Edinburgh, where his poetical genius raised him many friends, and some patrons of very great eminence. In 1731 he published a volume of poems, addressed to the countess of Eglington, to which is subjoined, The Tablature of Cebes, and a Letter upon Liberty, by which he obtained a very great reputation. That amiable lady was the patroness of all men of wit, and greatly distinguished Mr. Boyse, while he resided in that country. Upon the death of the viscountess Stormont, who had the most refined taste in the sciences, and was a great admirer of poetry, he wrote an Elegy, entitled, The Tears of the Muses, which was much applauded by her ladyship's relations, and the lord Stormont was so pleased with it, that he ordered a handsome present to be given to Mr. Boyse, by his attorney at Edinburgh. The notice which lady Eglington and the lord Stormont took of our poet, recommended him to the patronage of the duchess of Gordon, who was so solicitous to raise him above necessity, that she employed her interest in procuring the promise of a place for him, and gave him a letter, which the next day he was to deliver to one of the commissioners of the customs at Edinburgh. It happened that he was then some miles distant from that city, and the morning on which he was to ride to town with her grace's letter proving rainy, this slender circumstance prevented his going, and the place was given to another.

Boyse having at last defeated all the kind intentions of his patrons, fell into poverty and contempt, and being obliged to quit Edinburgh, communicated his design of going to London to the duchess of Gordon, who having still a high opinion of his poetical abilities, gave him a letter of recommendation to Mr. Pope, and obtained another for him to sir Peter King, lord chancellor of England; the lord Stormont also recommended him to his brother the solicitor-general, and to many other persons of rank. Upon his arrival in London he went to Twickenham, in order to deliver the dutchess's letter to Mr. Pope, but that gentleman not being at home, Mr. Boyse never gave himself the trouble to repeat his visit. He wrote poems, but though they were excellent in their kind, they were lost to the world, by being introduced with no advantage. He had so strong a propensity to grovelling, that his acquaintance were generally the lowest and most ignorant people, and those in high life he addressed by letters, he not having sufficient confidence or politeness to converse familiarly with them. Thus, unfit to support himself in the world, he was exposed to a great variety of distresses, from which he could find no means of extricating himself, but by writing mendicant letters. Yet notwithstanding this, and though he had not the least taste for any thing elegant, he was so luxurious and expensive, that when he had received a guinea in consequence of a supplicating letter, though he had not another shilling in the world, and scarcely shoes to his feet, he would send for a bottle of Champaign or Burgundy. About the year 1740 he was reduced to the last extremity of human wretchedness, and had not a coat, a shirt, or any kind of apparel to put on; even the sheets in which he lay were carried to the pawn-broker's, and he was obliged to be confined to his bed, with no other covering than a blanket. Thus he remained six weeks, during which he was employed in writing verses for the magazines. Whoever had seen him in his study must have been shocked at his appearance; he sat up in his bed with the blanket wrapt about him, in which he had cut a hole large enough to admit his naked arm, and placing the paper upon his knee, wrote in the best manner he could. Perhaps he would have remained much longer in this distressful state, had not a compassionate gentleman, upon hearing this circumstance related, ordered his cloaths to be taken out of pawn, and enabled him to appear again abroad. This six weeks penance one would have imagined sufficient to deter him, for the future, from suffering himself to be exposed to such distresses; but want was grown familiar to him, and as he had less delicacy than other men, he was, perhaps, less affected with this exterior meanness. For the future, whenever he was so distressed as to dispose of his shirt, he made use of an expedient to conceal the want of it, by cutting some white paper in slips, which he tied round his wrists and neck, and in this plight he frequently appeared abroad.

About the year 1745 Mr. Boyse's wife died; he was then at Reading, and pretended much concern on hearing of it. He affected to appear very fond of a little lap-dog, which he always carried about with him in his arms, imagining it gave him the air of a man of taste; and his circumstances being then too mean to put himself in mourning, he resolved that some of his family should, and therefore buying half a yard of black ribbon, fixed it round his dog's neck, by way of mourning for the loss of its mistress. As he had no spirit to keep good company, he was accustomed to retire to some obscure alehouse, and regaled himself with warm two-penny, which he drank to excess. At Reading he composed a Review of the most material Transactions at Home and Abroad, during the last War; and at his return translated from the French Fenelon on the Existence of God, and composed several works for the booksellers, during which time he married a second wife, a woman in low circumstances. Towards the close of his life he began to shew a greater regard to his character, and in his last lingering illness had the satisfaction to observe a poem of his, intitled, The Deity, recommended by two eminent writers, the ingenious Mr. Henry Fielding, and the rev. Mr. James Harvey, author of the Meditations While he was in this lingering illness, his mind was often religiously disposed. Indeed the early impressions of his education were never entirely obliterated, and his whole life was a continual struggle between his appetites and his conscience, and in consequence of this war in his mind, he wrote an excellent poem, called The Recantation. In May, 1749, he died in obscure lodgings, near Shoe-lane, and was buried by the parish.

Never was a life spent with less grace than that of Mr. Boyse, and never were such distinguished abilities given to less purpose. His genius was not confined to poetry and literary productions, he had a taste for painting, music, and heraldry, with the latter of which he was very well acquainted. Two volumes of his poems have been published in London, and if the rest were collected, they would all together make six moderate volumes. Many of them are scattered in the Gentleman's Magazine, marked with the letter Y, or Alceus.

BOZOLO, a town of Italy, in the Mantuan, capital of a territory of the same name, with a castle. It is sixteen miles west of Mantua. Long. 10. 25. Lat. 45. 9. N.

BRABANT, a province of the Low Countries, with the title of a duchy, seated between the rivers Scheld and the Meuse. It is about one hundred and eight miles in length, and almost as much in breadth on the north side, but not so much on the south, it being but fifty-four miles broad. The rivers that run thro' this province are the Scheld, the Meuse, the Dyle, the Deiner, the Aa, the Jeker, the Domel, Great and Little Nephte, and the Mert. There are several lakes and marshes. Modern geographers divide this duchy into four parts, which have their names from the following cities; Antwerp, Brussels, Lovain, and Bois le Duc. The three first belong to the House of Austria, and the last to the Dutch. It is bounded on the north by the county of Holland and duchy of Guelderland, on the east by the same duchy and the bishoprick of Liege, on the south by the counties of Namur and Hainault, and on the west by Flanders and Zealand.

BRACCIANO, a town of Italy, in the Patrimony of St. Peter, with the title of a duchy. It is seated on the Lake Bracciano, seventeen miles north-west of Rome. Long. 13. 4. E. Lat. 42. 6. N.

BRACCIOLINI (FRANCIS) an Italian poet, a native of Postoia, and the friend of pope Urban VIII. died about the year

1644, at eighty years of age. He wrote, 1. An Epic Poem, intitled, The Croſs Reconquered, under the Emperor Heraclius. 2. An Heroic Poem, intitled, The Mockery or Raillery of the Pagan Gods. 3. The Election of Pope Urban VIII. in twenty-three books. This poem pleaſed that pope ſo highly, that he gave him the ſurname of Bracciolini of the Bees, in alluſion to the Bees in the arms of his own family.

BRACKLAU, a ſtrong town in Poland, capital of a palatinate of the ſame name. The houſes are built of wood. It was taken by the Turks in 1672, but retaken three years afterwards. It is ſeated on the river Bog, one hundred miles eaſt of Kaminieck, and one hundred and fourteen north of Tekin. Long. 29. 20. E. Lat. 48. 5. N.

BRACKLAW, a palatinate of that name, which is the eaſtern part of Podolia; it is alſo called Lower Podolia, and is of greater extent than Upper Podolia, but is more deſolate, on account of the neighbourhood of the Tartars.

Bradford (John) a faithful profeſſor of, and ſuffered for, the Reformed religion, under the cruel perſecutions of popery, in the reign of queen Mary, was born at Manchеſter, in the former part of Henry VIII's reign. He took his degree of maſter of arts at Catherine-hall, Cambridge, and at length was promoted to a prebend of St. Paul's, and afterwards, in 1552, was ſworn to ſerve king Edward VI. as one of his chaplains. He was remarkable for his humility, his piety, and his zeal for the Proteſtant religion. He was thrown into priſon in the beginning of the reign of queen Mary, before the laws made in favour of the Reformation were repealed; and after undergoing ſeveral examinations, was burnt at the ſtake in Smithfield, together with a youth named John Lyefe, an apprentice in London, on the firſt of July, 1555. He wrote ſeveral pieces, as, 1. A Treatiſe of Repentance. 2. His Complaint of Verity. 3. The Hurt of hearing the Maſs. 4. Two Sermons, one on Repentance, and the other on the Lord's Supper; and other Tracts.

BRADFORTH, a town in the weſt of Yorkſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and three fairs, on March 14 and 15, on June 28, 29, 30, for horned cattle and houſhold furniture, and December 20, 21, 22, very large, for hogs. It is ſeated on a branch of the river Are, and the houſes are built with ſtone. It is thirty-ſix miles north-weſt of Doncaſter, thirty ſouth-weſt of York, and two hundred and one north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 35. W. Lat. 53. 40 N.

BRADLEY (Dr. James) Savilian profeſſor of aſtronomy in Oxford, fellow of the Royal Society at London, and member of the Academy of Sciences and Belles Lettres of Paris, Berlin, Boulogne, and Peterſburgh, was born at Shireborn, in Glouceſterſhire, in 1692, and educated at Oxford, and in 1719 was inſtituted to the vicarage of Bridſtow, in Herefordſhire. He received the firſt rudiments of the Mathematics from his uncle, Dr. James Pound, who reſided at his living in Eſſex, and on the death of John Kiel, M. D. was, in 1721, choſen Savilian profeſſor of aſtronomy in Oxford, on which he reſigned his living. Notwithſtanding the veil which his innate modeſty had caſt over him, he was ſoon diſtinguiſhed by the friendſhip of ſir Iſaac Newton, lord chancellor Macclesfield, and Dr. Edmund Halley, his colleague in the Savilian profeſſorſhip. In 1730 he ſucceeded Mr. Whiteſide as lecture-reader of aſtronomy and experimental philoſophy, in the univerſity of Oxford; and, at the deceaſe of Dr. Halley, was choſen aſtronomical obſervator at the Royal Obſervatory at Greenwich, and honoured with the degree of doctor of divinity. In 1747 he publiſhed his Letters on the apparent Motion obſerved in ſome of the fixed Stars; and on account of this curious diſcovery, obtained the annual gold prize medal from the Royal Society. In conſequence of this letter, his late majeſty cauſed him to be paid a thouſand pounds, to repair the old inſtruments in that obſervatory, and for providing new ones, which enabled him to furniſh it with the nobleſt and moſt accurate apparatus in the known world. He was afterwards offered the living of Greenwich, which he refuſed, from a conſcientious ſcruple, that the duty of a paſtor was incompatible with his other ſtudies, on which his majeſty granted him an annual penſion of 250l. He was remarkable for the evenneſs of his temper, and for his ſweet and amiable diſpoſition, and was particularly diſtinguiſhed for his modeſty and taciturnity; yet when drawn into converſation, none were more ready, more open, or more clear, nor took more pains to adapt himſelf to the capacity and underſtanding of thoſe with whom he converſed. He was always temperate, eaſy of acceſs, humane, benevolent, and kind, was never tenacious of his own opinion, and was free from bigotry and oſtentation. In ſhort, he was a dutiful ſon, an indulgent huſband, a tender father, and a ſteady friend. He died at Chalford, in Glouceſterſhire, of a ſuppreſſion of urine, on the 13th of July, 1762, in the ſeventieth year of his age. Few of his works have appeared in public, but his Obſervations are contained in thirteen volumes, folio, and two in quarto, and are lodged in ſafety for the public uſe.

BRADY (Robert) a famous hiſtorian and phyſician in the laſt century, was born in the county of Norfolk, and admitted in Caius college, in Cambridge, Feb. 20, 1643. He took his degree of doctor of phyſic in 1660, and the ſame year was elected maſter of that college. About the year 1670 he was appointed keeper of the records in the Towen of London, and ſome time after was choſen regius profeſſor of phyſic, in the univerſity of Cambridge. The largeſt and moſt conſiderable of his works are, 1. An Introduction to the old Engliſh Hiſtory, in one volume, folio; and, 2. A complete Hiſtory of England, from the firſt entrance of the Romans to the reign of king Richard II. in two volumes, folio. He died October 22, 1688.

Brady (Nicholas) an excellent divine and poet, born at Bandon, in the county of Cork, October 28, 1659. He ſtudied at Weſtminſter-ſchool, and afterwards at Oxford and Dublin college. He was a zealous promoter of the Revolution, and, in 1690, when the troubles broke out in Ireland, by his intereſt with Mac Carty, king James's general, he thrice prevented the burning of the town of Bandon. Having quitted ſeveral preferments in Ireland, he ſettled in London, where he was ſucceſſively promoted to ſeveral livings, and at the time of his death was rector of Clapham, miniſter of Richmond, and chaplain to the duke of Ormond's troop of horſe guards. He wrote part of the new verſion of the Pſalms, now ſung in many churches in England and Ireland, the Æneids of Virgil, in four volumes, and three volumes of Sermons. He died May 20, 1726, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age.

BRAE-Mar, a mountainous territory of Scotland, in the ſhire of Aberdeen, where the late earl of Mar began to raiſe a rebellion in 1715. It is twenty-ſeven miles north-weſt of Aberdeen.

Brae-Murray, a mountainous and woody tract of land, lying in the ſhires of Elgin and Nairn, in Scotland.

BRAGA, a city of Portugal, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Cavallo, fifteen miles from the ſea. The archbiſhop is lord of it, both with reſpect to temporals and ſpirituals, for which reaſon he carries a croſs in his hand, and a ſword by his ſide. The land about this city is fertile in corn, wine, and fruits, as alſo in paſture and pulſe, and rich in flocks and grain. It is eighty-eight miles ſouth of Compoſtella, ninety weſt of Braganza, and one hundred and ſixty-five north of Liſbon. Long. 7. 20. W. Lat. 41. 30. N.

BRAGANZA, a city of Portugal, capital of the duchy of Braganza. It is ſeated on an eminence, by a brook called Fervença, and is divided into two parts, the Old City and the Town. The former is upon an eminence, and fortified with a double wall. That part next the town has five baſtions, baſtions, but no ditch; the citadel is on the oppoſite ſide, joined to the wall. The town is in a plain, and defended by a fort with four baſtions. It is thirty-three miles north-weſt of Miranda, and ninety eaſt of Braga. Long. 6. 15. W. Lat. 41. 47. N.

BRAHE (Tycho) a famous aſtronomer, deſcended from an illuſtrious family, was born December 14, 1546, at Knudſtorp, in Denmark, and was the ſon of Otho Brahe, lord of that place. He ſtudied rhetoric, and philoſophy at Copenhagen, when the great eclipſe of the ſun, which happened Auguſt 21, 1560, engaged him in the ſtudy of aſtronomy. In the winter of the year 1574, he, at the king's command, read lectures upon the theory of planets, at Copenhagen. The year following, he began his travels thro' Germany, and proceeded as far as Venice; he then reſolved to remove his family, and ſettle at Baſil; but Frederic II. king of Denmark, being informed of his deſign, and unwilling to loſe a man who was capable of being ſuch an honour to his country, promiſed to enabled him to purſue his ſtudies, to beſtow upon him for life the iſland of Huen, in the Sound, to erect an obſervatory and laboratory there, and to defray all the expences neceſſary for carrying on his deſigns. Tycho Brahe readily embraced this propoſal; and accordingly the firſt ſtone of the obſervatory was laid Aug. 8, 1576. The king alſo gave him a penſion of two thouſand crowns out of his treaſury, a fee in Norway, and a canonry of Roſhild, which brought him in a thouſand more. James VI. of Scotland, afterwards raiſed to the throne of England, going to Denmark in order to marry the princeſs Anne, paid a viſit to our author in his retirement at Uraniaburg, made him ſeveral preſents and with his own hand wrote a copy of verſes in his praiſe; but ſoon after the death of king Frederic, he was deprived of his penſion, fee, and canonry; upon which, finding himſelf incapable of bearing the expences of his obſervatory, he went to Copenhagen, whither he brought ſome of his inſtruments, and continued his aſtronomical obſervations in that city, till Valkendorf, chamberlain to the houſhold of Charles IV. commanded him by the king's order to diſcontinue them. He then removed his family to Roſtock, and afterwards to Holſtein, in order to ſolicit Henry Ranzou to introduce him to the emperor, and that gentleman complying with this requeſt, he was received by the emperor, at Prague, with the utmoſt civility and reſpect. That prince gave him a magnificent houſe, till he could procure one for him more proper for aſtronomical obſervations, aſſigned him a penſion of three thouſand crowns, and promiſed him, upon the firſt opportunity, a fee for him and his deſcendants; but he did not long enjoy this happy ſituation; for, upon the 24th of October, 1601, he died of a retention of urine, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and was interred in a very magnificent manner in the principal church at Prague, where a noble monument was erected to him. His ſkill in aſtronomy is univerſally known, and he is famed for being the inventor of a new ſyſtem, which he endeavoured, though without ſucceſs, to eſtabliſh upon the ruins of that of Copernicus. His principal works are, 1. Progymnaſmata Aſtronomiæ. 2. De Mundi ætherei recentioribus Phænomenis. 3. Epiſtolarum aſtronomicarum Liber.

Sophia Brahe, his ſiſter, excelled in poetry, and left an excellent epiſtle in Latin verſe.

BRAINLE Comte, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the province of Hainault, fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Bruſſels. Long. 4. 11. E. Lat. 50. 35. N.

BRAINTREE, a town in Eſſex, with a market on Wedneſday, and two fairs, on May 8 and October 2, for cattle, butter, and cheeſe. It is ſeated on a hill, and is a large place, with a great market for corn and proviſions. It is eleven miles north of Chelmsford, ſixteen weſt of Colcheſter, and forty-two north-north-eaſt from London. Long. 0. 35. E. Lat. 51. 50. N.

BRAKEL, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, in the biſhopric of Paderbourn. It is ſeated on the rivulet Brught, thirteen miles eaſt of Paderborn. Long. 9. 8. E. Lat. 51. 46. N.

BRAMA, among the Gentoos or pagans of India, is eſteemed the firſt who civiliſed the people of that country, and who was their legiſlator. He divided the people into four caſts or tribes, namely, the brachmans, the rageputs, the Banians, and the artizans. The caſt of the brachmans is compoſed of the prieſts, who are at the ſame time the judges, the maſters, and the doctors of the Indians; that of the rageputs comprehends the ſoldiers and military people, who are the gentlemen of the country; the banians are the merchants, and theſe employ the artizans and diſpoſe of the fruits of their labour. Brama gave general laws to all the caſts, the principal of which are, that one caſt ſhall never enter into an alliance with another; that a man can never exerciſe two profeſſions, nor change from one to another; for inſtance, that a labourer, a weaver, or a goldſmith, can never learn his ſon any buſineſs different from his own, or ever marry his children to thoſe of any other profeſſion. Perſecution for religion is there never practiſed; for it is an eſtabliſhed opinion, that all religions are good. Adultery, fornication, robbery, lying, and murder are forbid by a general law. Brama even prohibited the taking away the life of any animal, and ordered his people to have a great veneration for cows. Brama is held in ſuch veneration in the Indies, and eſpecially in the dominions of the mogul, that he is adored as a god.

BRAMBER, a town in Suſſex, which ſends two members to parliament, but has no market. It is twelve miles weſt of Lewes, and forty-nine ſouth-weſt of London. Long. 0. 15. W. Lat. 50. 50. N.

BRAMHALL (John) archbiſhop of Armagh, was born at Pontefract, in Yorkſhire, about the year 1593, and educated at Cambridge. After ſucceſſively enjoying ſeveral livings in England, he obtained the archdeaconry of Meath, in Ireland, from whence he was promoted to the biſhoprick of Londonderry, when he diſtinguiſhed himſelf, not only by advancing the rents, but in recovering lands detained from his predeceſſors, by which means he doubled the yearly profits of that biſhopric; but the greateſt ſervice he did to the church of Ireland, was by getting ſeveral acts paſſed, in purſuance of which he aboliſhed the fee-farms charged on church lands, by which and various other methods, he recovered to the church, in the ſpace of four years, thirty or forty thouſand pounds a year; but on the 4th of March, 1640-41, articles of high treaſon were exhibited againſt him, for attempting to ſubvert the fundamental laws; but the proceedings of the parliament againſt him were ſtopt by a letter, for that purpoſe from the king. When his majeſty's affairs grew deſperate, the biſhop went to Bruſſels, where he conſtantly preached every Sunday; but at the Reſtoration returned to England, where, on the 18th of January, 1660-61, he was appointed archbiſhop of Armagh, and primate and metropolitan of all Ireland. This prelate died in May, 1663. His works are printed in one volume folio.

BRAMPOUR, or Brampore, a city in the dominions of the great mogul, in Aſia, and capital of Candiſch. It formerly ſtood on as much ground as London, but is now greatly decayed. It is ſeated in a low and healthy valley, at the head of the river Tapta, and is chiefly inhabited by banians. The ſtreets are numerous, but narrow, with low thatched houſes made of earth, though a few are covered with varniſhed tiles. In rainy weather, many of the ſtreets are overflowed. There is a large caſtle, in which the governor reſides; and a caravanſera for lodging the treaſure, beſides one for travellers. The market-place is five hundred and fifty paces long, and three hundred and fifty broad, filled with ſtalls of herbs and fruit, they being the banian diet. There is here the ſtatue of an elephant, in red ſtone, as big as the life. They are remarkable for marrying their children very young, for they cohabit at nine or ten years of age. On the other ſide of the river, they have built a new town, which is in a better ſituation. They carry on a great trade in this town, and in all the province, where there is made a prodigious quantity of cotton cloths. Some are ſtained with various colours and flowers, which are uſed by the women in thoſe parts for veils, ſcarfs, handkerchiefs, and coverlets for beds; ſome are quite white, with a ſtripe or two of ſilver or gold, and ſome are half cotton and half ſilver. Cotton is in greater plenty here, than in any other place in the empire, and there is a great deal of tobacco in the neighbourhood. Long. 77. 25. E. Lat. 21. 10. N.

BRAMPTON, a town of Cumberland, with a market on Tueſdays, and two fairs, on the ſecond Wedneſday after Whitſunday, and the laſt Wedneſday in Auguſt, for horſes and horned cattle. It is ſeated not far from the Picts wall, and on the river Irthin. It is a very ancient place, but at preſent is very ſmall. It is ten miles eaſt by north of Carliſle, nine weſt of Newcaſtle, and three hundred and eleven north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 40. W. Lat. 54. 50. N.

BRANCAS, or Brancacio, (Francis Maria de) a cardinal of the noble and ancient houſe of Brancas, or Brancacio, in the kingdom of Naples, was a man of merit, and the friend of learned men. He compoſed a Treatiſe on Chocolate, and ſome other works, and died on the 9th of January, 1675, aged eighty-four.

BRANCHUS, a youth of Theſſaly, to whom Apollo gave the gift of divination, and in memory of whom a fine temple was erected.

BRANDENBURG (the Marche of) is one of the largeſt provinces of the circle of Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is bounded on the weſt by the duchy of Lunenburg, on the north by that of Mechlenburg and by Pomerania, on the eaſt by Poland, and on the ſouth by Sileſia and Luſatia, with the duchies of Saxony and Magdeburg. It is three hundred miles in length, and three hundred and fifty in breadth, and is watered by ſeveral great rivers, the Elbe, the Oder, the Havel, the Speke, and the Swart, which are of great advantage to the country. It is not very fertile, being ſandy in ſome places and woody in others; however, it produces paſture, corn, particularly excellent rye, and ſome wine along the Oder; yet, by making ſluices, and introducing manufactures, the country is in a much better condition than formerly. The religion of the greateſt part of the inhabitants is the proteſtant.

BRANDI (CAVALIER GIACINTO) was born at Poli, in the Eccleſiaſtical State, in 1623, and was one of the beſt painters that came out of the ſchool of Lanfranc. His performances in the cupolas and cielings in ſeveral of the Roman churches and palaces, are a ſufficient proof that he merited the reputation he acquired. He died in 1691, aged ſixty-eight.

BRANDOLIN (AURELIUS) a native of Florence in the fifteenth century, was ſurnamed Lippus, becauſe of the defluxions from his eyes. He was a great orator, a great muſician, and a good poet. He publiſhed, in heroic verſe, the Hiſtories contained in the Old and New Teſtament; he alſo wrote a Commentary on St. Paul's Epiſtles, and other works. He died of the plague, at Rome, in 1498.

BRANDON, a town of Suffolk, with a market on Thurſdays, and three fairs, on February 14, for cattle and toys, on June 11 and November 11, for toys. It is ſeated on the leſſer Ouſe, over which there is a bridge, and a ferry at a mile diſtance, whence it is divided in Brandon and Brandon-Ferry, at which laſt place moſt buſineſs is tranſacted, becauſe commodities are brought thither from the iſle of Ely, for which reaſon the market is now come to nothing. It is eighteen miles north-north-eaſt of Newmarket, twelve north of St. Edmund's Bury, and ſeventy-nine north-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 55. E. Lat. 52. 30. N.

BRANDT (GERARD) a learned divine of the reformed religion, an able hiſtorian, and a good poet, was born at Amſterdam, in 1626, and was ſucceſſively miniſter in ſeveral places of the Netherlands, and wrote ſome works which are eſteemed, the principal of which are, The Hiſtory of the Reformation of the Netherlands, in four volumes quarto, and The Life of Admiral Ruyter, which are both written in the Flemiſh tongue. He died at Rotterdam in 1685.

Gaſpard Brandt, one of his ſons, was miniſter of ſeveral Arminian churches, and at length of that at Amſterdam. He wrote the Life of Arminius in Latin, and ſeveral Sermons in the Flemiſh Tongue, and died in 1696.

BRANTOME. See BOURDEILLE.

BRASAVOLUS (ANTONIUS MUSA) a phyſician and profeſſor of philoſophy at Ferrara, flouriſhed about the middle of the ſixteenth century. He taught logic eight years, and philoſophy nine years, at the univerſity of Ferrara, after which he applied himſelf to the theory of medicine. His Commentaries on the Aphoriſms of Hippocrates were eſteemed; he alſo wrote ſeveral other books on the nature of medicines and the method of preparing them.

BRASIDAS, a celebrated general of the Lacedemonians, about 424 years before the birth of Chriſt. He defeated the Athenians by land and ſea, took many places, and rendered his country formidable to all the neighbouring ſtates. He conquered the Athenians on their attempting to ſurpriſe Amphipolis, and died of the wounds he received in that battle, four hundred and twenty-two years before the Chriſtian æra.

BRASIL. See BRAZIL.

BRASLAW, a town of Poland, in Lithuania, and palatinate of Wilna. It is ſeated upon a lake, and all the houſes are of wood; it has a caſtle built on a high craggy rock; it is ſeventy-five miles ſouth of Wilna. Long. 26. 5. E. Lat. 56. 20. N.

BRASSAW, or Cronſtat, a town of Hungary, in Tranſylvania, and province of Burceland, is the moſt populous place in all Tranſylvania, inhabited by Germans, who call it Cronſtat; but the Hungarians and Walachians are permitted to live in the ſuburbs. There is a proteſtant college, with a fine library, and the trade is very conſiderable. The place is well fortified, and has a caſtle which ſtands on a hill. It is fifty miles from Hermenſtadt, fifty north of Tergewiſe, and fifty ſouth-eaſt of Cheſburg. Long. 25. 0 E. Lat. 47. 0. N.

BRAVA, one of the Cape Verd iſlands, on the coaſt of Africa. It is very high land, and the mountains ſeem to riſe in pyramids one above another. It is almoſt uninhabited, and yet produces wine, bananas, gourds, horſes, aſſes, goats, and hogs. The beſt harbour is on the ſouth-weſt ſide of the iſland, where there is a hermitage and a hamlet.

BRAVA, a town ſeated in the eaſt ſide of Africa, on the coaſt of Ajan, between two arms of the river Quilmancy. It is a large town, ſurrounded with walls, and the houſes are built after the Mooriſh faſhion, the chief families being Mahometans, whoſe complexion is dutky, but not black, and their hair long. Some tell us it is a free ſtate, and yet they pay an annual tribute to the Portugueſe; however, the town is governed by twelve ſhieks choſen out of the moſt ancient families. They trade in the produce of the country, which is principally gold, ivory, and ſlaves. It is about eighty-eight miles from Magadoxo. Long. 41. 35. E. Lat. 1. 0. N.

BRAUN (GEORGE) in Latin Braunius, archdeacon of Dortmund, and dean of Notre Dame in Gradibus, at Cologne. He publiſhed a Latin Oration againſt the Prieſts guilty of Fornication; he alſo wrote the Life of Jeſus Chriſt, that of the Holy Virgin, and a controverſial Treatiſe againſt the Proteſtants; but his chief work is the Theatrum Urbium, in ſeveral volumes in folio.

BRAUNA, a town of Germany, in Bavaria, ſeated on the river Inn. It has a ſtrong fortreſs, notwithſtanding it was taken by the Auſtrians, in 1743. It is twenty-four miles ſouth-weſt of Paſſaw, and eight from Burkhauſen. Long. 13. 3. E. Lat. 48. 10. N.

BBAUNBOM (FREDERICK) a proteſtant author of Germany, who, in the year 1613, publiſhed, with great oſtentation, a book which he imagined to be full of new diſcoveries, relating to the explanation of the prophecies of the Old and New Teſtament. He ſettled every period of the reign of Antichriſt, his birth, his juvenile ſtate, his greateſt ſtrength, the beginning of his decay, his decrepitude, and his death. According to him, Antichriſt would die in 1640, and the end of the world happen in 1711.

BRAUNSBERG, a town of Poland, ſeated on the river Paſſerg, near the port of Friſch, on the Baltick Sea. The Jeſuits have a fine college there. It is fifty miles eaſt of Dantzick, twenty-three north-eaſt of Elbing. It belongs to the king of Pruſſia. Long. 20. 0. E. Lat. 54. 15. N.

BRAURONIA, Βραυρωνια, in Grecian antiquities, a feſtival in honour of Diana, ſurnamed Brauronia, from Brauron, an Athenian borough, in which the famous ſtatue of this goddeſs, brought by Iphigenia from Scythia Taurica, remained till the ſecond Perſian war, in which Xerxes took it away. This feſtival was celebrated once in five years, and the victim offered was a goat. At this ſolemnity, certain men ſung one of Homer's Iliads; here were alſo a number of young virgins, from five to ten years of age, who were called αρκτοι, or bears, upon the following account. Among the inhabitants of a borough in Attica, there was a tame bear that was uſually admitted to eat and play with them; but a young maid happening to be too familiar with it, it tore her to pieces, and was afterwards killed by the virgin's brethren, which being followed by a dreadful peſtilence, the inhabitants were adviſed by an oracle to appeaſe the anger of Diana, on account of the bear, by conſecrating virgins to her in memory of it. This the Athenians punctually executed, and enacted a law, that no virgin ſhould be married till ſhe had undergone this ceremony. Potter's Antiq.

BRAWER (ADRIAN). See BROWER.

BRAY (Sir REGINALD) a celebrated architect and politician, was the ſecond ſon of ſir Richard Bray, one of the privy-council to king Henry VI. Sir Reginald was inſtrumental in the advancement of king Henry VII. to the throne of England, and was greatly in the favour of that prince, who beſtowed honours and wealth upon him. His ſkill in architecture appears from Henry the Seventh's chapel at Weſtminſter, and the chapel of St. George at Windſor, as he had a principal concern and direction in the building of the former, and the finiſhing and bringing to perfection the latter, to which he was alſo a liberal benefactor. In the middle of the ſouth iſle of the above chapel, is a ſpacious chapel built by him, and ſtill called by his name. He died on the 5th of Auguſt, 1501, and was interred in the above chapel, probably under the ſtone where lies Dr. Waterland; for, on opening the vault for that gentleman, who died in 1740, a leaden coffin of ancient form was found, which, by other appearances, was judged to be that of ſir Reginald, and was, by order of the dean, immediately arched over.

BRAY (THOMAS) doctor of divinity, and an eminent, learned, and pious divine, was born at Marton, in Shropſhire, in the year 1656, and educated at Oxford. He was at length preſented to the vicarage of Over-Whitacre, in Warwickſhire; and, in 1690, to the rectory of Sheldon, where he compoſed his Catechetical Lectures, which procured him ſuch reputation, that Dr. Compton, biſhop of London, pitched upon him as a proper perſon to model the infant church of Maryland, and eſtabliſh it upon a ſolid foundation, and for that purpoſe he was inveſted with the office of commiſſary. He now engaged in ſeveral noble undertakings, procured ſums to be raiſed for purchaſing ſmall libraries, for the uſe of the poor miniſters in the ſeveral parts of our plantations; and the better to promote this deſign, he publiſhed two books, one intitled Bibliotheca Parochialis, or a Scheme of ſuch theological and other Heads, as ſeem requiſite to be peruſed, or occaſionally conſulted by the Clergy, together with a Catalogue of Books, which may be profitably read on each of thoſe Points; the other, Apoſto-lical Charity, its Nature and Excellency conſidered. He endeavoured to get a fund eſtabliſhed for the propagation of the Goſpel, eſpecially among the uncultivated Indians, and by his means a patent was obtained for erecting the corporation, called The Society for the Propogation of the Goſpel. He, by his induſtry, procured relief for priſoners, and formed the plan for the Society for the Reformation of Manners, charity-ſchools, &c. He wrote, 1. his Martyrology, or papal Uſurpation, in one volume folio; 2. his Directorium Miſſionarium; and other works. This excellent man, and worthy divine, died February 15, 1730, in the ſeventy-third year of his age.

BRAY, a port town of Ireland, in the county of Wicklow, and province of Leinſter, ſeated on St. George's Channel, eight miles ſouth of Dublin. Long. 6. 16. W. Lat. 53. 8. N.

BRAY SUR SEINE, a town of France, in Champagne, and in Senonois, on the confines of Brie, between Nogent on the eaſt and Montereau on the weſt. Long. 2. 15. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

BRAZIL, or BRASIL, a country of South America, with the title of a principality, which belongs to the preſumptive heir of the king of Portugal. This name comprehends the moſt eaſtern region of South America, and is almoſt all comprehended between the equator and the tropic of Capricorn; its greateſt breadth is ſeventeen degrees, it lying between thirty-five and ſixteen degrees of weſt longitude, which make about one thouſand miles; its extent from north to ſouth is twenty-five degrees, which come to one thouſand five hundred miles; but along the coaſt, which is bordered with mountains, it is near two thouſand miles, in which there are many good ports and harbours, where ſhips may ride in ſafety.

Brazil was diſcovered by chance, in 1500, on the 24th of April, by Don Pedro Alvarez Cabral, who gave it the name of the Holy Croſs; and he being a Portugueſe, that nation has poſſeſſed it almoſt ever ſince; though ſome time after, the Dutch threw off the Spaniſh yoke, and became maſters of it, but were forced to leave it in 1655. The air of this country, though ſeated under the torrid zone, is indifferently mild and healthy, for people live there to an advanced age. The ſoil produces tobacco, cotton, Indian corn, and all ſorts of fruit, beſides ſugar-canes, which flouriſh there admirably well. The Portugueſe are ſettled only on the coaſt of Brazil, the inland country being inhabited by ſavages of different nations. The Portugueſe have divided it into fourteen governments or captainſhips, three of which are towards the north, Para, Maragnan, and Siara, and eleven on the eaſt coaſt, from north to ſouth, namely, Rio Grande, Paraiba, Tamaraca, Fermambouc, Scregippe, the Bay of All Saints, Rio dos Ilheos, Porto Seguro, Porto de Spiritu Sancto, Rio Janeiro, and St. Vincent.

The natives called Toupinambous, by which you may judge of all the reſt, are of the ſize of the Europeans; they are a ſtrong healthy people, and have none with any deformity among them; their ſkin is of a red colour, like the reſt of the Americans, but darker than thoſe of the north, on account of their nearneſs to the ſun. The men, women, and children go quite naked, without the leaſt concealment, and they have no hair on any part of their bodies, except the head; it was ſaid formerly, they pulled out their beards and the hair of other parts by the roots; but the lateſt and moſt judicious travellers have declared this to be a falſity. All the males have a hole bored through their under lips, in which they put a bit of bone as white as ivory, which ſtands out above an inch, and is ſecured by a broad head, which is placed between the lip and the gums; this is worn while they are very young; but when they are men grown, they change it for a green ſtone like an emerald; ſome have holes in their cheeks as well as lip, and adorn them in the ſame manner. In many parts of Brazil, they daub themſelves all over with a ſort of gum or balſam, and then roll themſelves in down and ſmall feathers, which gives them an odd frightful appearance; ſome paint and colour their bodies in divers manners, as is done in many other places where they go naked; they wear ſtrings of ſhells about their neck, and adorn their hair with the feathers of birds of the moſt beautiful colours; the men always cut off ſome of their hair; but the women let it grow long, and it generally hangs looſe about their ſhoulders, but ſometimes they tie it behind with a red cotton ſtring; they make no holes in their lips and cheeks; but they bore their ears, and the holes are wide enough to admit the finger; in theſe they hang ſea-ſhells, which are as long as a common candle, which dangle about their ſhoulders and breaſt in a very odd manner; they paint their faces with red, blue, and yellow colours, and wear bracelets of different kinds, which formerly were of their own invention, but now they uſe glaſs beads, which they purchaſe of the Portugueſe.

When the firſt colonies went over, they endeavoured to perſuade the women to cover their nakedneſs, and provided a ſort of linen garments for their uſe; but could never prevail on them to wear them, for which they gave this reaſon, that as they went into the water to bathe ſeveral times in a day, it would be too troubleſome to put any thing on and off, though never ſo ſlight. The ſavages make their bread of a ſort of root, which we ſhall have occaſion to mention more particularly elſewhere; they likewiſe have Indian corn, which they uſe in the ſame manner as the roots, and in which none but the women are employed; they likewiſe brew a ſort of drink with the ſame materials, which they quaff very plentifully at every public feaſt; they have no ſet meals, but eat when they are hungry, during which time, they are always ſilent. Authors have ſaid a great deal of their roaſting and eating their enemies; but theſe ſtories have been found to be falſe. They have a beaſt not much unlike a cow, whoſe fleſh taſtes like beef, which they are very fond of; they likewiſe hunt a ſort of deer, and when they would preſerve a part of this or any other creature, they roaſt it thoroughly, for they never ſalt it, ſome keeping it at the fire twenty-four hours.

The camel ſheep is another remarkable animal, which is to be met with in ſeveral parts of South America, even as far as the Streights of Magellan; it is of the ſhape of a camel, but not ſo large, and has very fine wool, which is pretty long, and of the colour of dried roſes; the neck is long, with the ears and head like that of a ſheep, and their upper lip is cloven; their feet are like thoſe of a deer, and the tail has a tuft at the end of it, which is reddiſh; they are uſed as beaſts of burden, and, like the camel, kneel down to take up their load; they are conducted by a kind of bridle, and when they are ill uſed by their driver, they ſpit at him; if the ſpittle falls upon the ſkin, it will produce itching pimples. There is a ſort of hog, which has different names in different places, but is moſt commonly known by the name of pecari, and has this very remarkable diſtinction, viz. the navel on its back. The agouti is a kind of hare, which partakes a good deal of the hog; it is of the ſize of a pig of two months old, with a head and body not unlike it, except the ſnout, which is not ſharp; its ears are ſharp, thin, and round, which it pricks up like a hare; the ſkin is white, and the hair reddiſh, rough, and in ſmall quantity; its tail is ſhort, and without hair; its feet exactly reſemble thoſe of a hare: thoſe before have four claws, and thoſe behind ſix; the fleſh is white, fat, tender, and delicate. The tatou is of the ſize of a pig of a month old, with a ſmall long head, and a mouth well furniſhed; the eyes and ears are ſmall, and the tail long, with little rings of ſhells round about it; its legs are ſmall and thick, with four claws on each foot; the body, from the head to the tail, is ſurrounded with ſeveral rows of ſhells, about a dozen in all; they are joined together by a kind of griſtle, and are of a dirty grey colour, with white ſpots: when this creature is afraid, he wraps himſelf as round as a ball, juſt like a hedge-hog; he lives upon leaves, fruit, and roots; the fleſh is fat, white, and delicate.

The beaſt called a tyger is brown, and very unlike thoſe of Europe, though ſome affirm they have ſeen thoſe that are ſpotted. They have, properly ſpeaking, no ſuch animal as a lion; for thoſe that they call ſuch have no mane, beſides their being much ſmaller than thoſe of Europe. They have a ſort of deer, which are much leſs than ours, with hair as long as that of a goat, and ſmall horns. The pac, is a quadruped of the ſize of a hound, with an ugly head, and a fine ſkin, which is ſpotted with white, grey, and black; the fleſh eats like veal. There are rats as big as ſquirrels, and of the ſame colour, which taſte like rabbits. The opoſſum is an animal that has ſomething of the rat, the fox, the monkey, and the hog; it is ſome what larger than a cat, and its hair is of a dark grey colour; its head is like that of a fox, with a ſnout that partakes of the pig; it has teeth like a cat, with whiſkers in the ſame manner, with a tail twice as long as its body, which is naked towards the end, and with which it will hang on the boughs of trees. There is one now in London, while I am writing this, that will twiſt the end of its tail round the man's finger that ſhows him, who lifts it up by it from the ground. The greateſt oddity of this animal is its falſe belly, which is made like a purſe, and hairy within: it is ſuppoſed their young are formed within it; however, it is certain, they run in and out of it at pleaſure; and within it are the teats which they ſuck. The ant-bear, called by the Brazilians tamandui, is of the bigneſs of a middle-ſized dog, with a round head, long ſnout, ſmall mouth, and no teeth; the tongue is roundiſh, and ſometimes two feet and a half long; it lives upon ants, or piſmires, and to catch them, ſtretches out its tongue on the ſpot where they are, till the ants have ſettled upon it, and then it draws it in, and devours them. The leſſer ſort is called coati, and is of the ſize of a ſmall hare; the fur is ſmooth and ſpotted; the ears are ſmall, erect, and pointed; the head is ſmall, but the ſnout is a foot long, and round like a ſtaff, pretty near of an equal thickneſs; the mouth is ſo ſmall it will ſcarce admit the end of the little finger; it lives on ants like the former.

The ſluggard or ſloth, is about the bigneſs of a middle ſized fox, and is in length from the neck to the tail a little above a foot. The head is ſmall, and the mouth, which is never without foam, is round and ſmall, and its teeth are neither large nor ſharp. The noſe is black, high, and ſmooth, and the eyes are ſmall, black, and heavy. The hair is aſh coloured, and about two fingers long; round about the neck the hair is longer than elſewhere. It keeps upon the trees, and creeps along very ſlowly, ſcarce moving above a ſtone's throw in fifteen days. It lives upon the leaves of trees, drinks nothing, and ſticks ſo cloſe to trees with its claws, that it is not eaſily removed. It makes a noiſe like a cat.

The Braſilian porcupine is of the ſize of a large ape, and its whole body is covered with quills, three or four inches long, without any hair. The lower part of theſe quills is yelloviſh, and the upper black, except at the points, which are white, and as ſharp as an awl. When they are vexed, they can throw out theſe quills with ſuch violence, as to endanger the lives of man and beaſt. Though theſe have ſomething in common with the African porcupine, they differ in many reſpects. Their bodies are but a foot long, from the head to the beginning of the tail. This laſt is ſeventeen inches long, and has quills on the back, with briſtles on the other parts. Their eyes are round, ſtaring, and ſhine like a carbuncle. They have whiſkers about their mouths, four inches long, like a cat. Beſides theſe, they have another animal, like a pole-cat, which ſtinks ſo horribly, that nobody cares to come near it.

The different kinds of monkies are ſo numerous, that it would be a difficult matter to reckon them all up; ſome of them are as large as grey-hounds, and others as ſmall as rats. The hair of theſe laſt is long and bright, and of a cheſnut colour, and ſometims ſpotted with a ſort of yellow. Their tails are twice as long as their bodies, their heads ſmall and ſquare, their ears ſharp and erect, like thoſe of cats, and they have the air and look of a little lion. The ears, face, and noſe are of ſo lively a red, that it ſeems at firſt to be more the effect of art that nature. The ſagowin is of the ſize of a ſquirrel, with the ſame coloured hair. It is a fierce animal, and hard to be tamed.

The bats, which are properly neither bird nor beaſt, are of a monſtrous ſize, being bigger bodied than a crow. They are great blood-ſuckers; for they will not only ſuck the blood of horſes, mules, and cattle, but men too, if they find them ſleeping, as many have found to their coſt. In ſome places many of the cattle have been killed by them. They build their neſts in holes and hollow trees. With regard to birds, they have a kind of a wild gooſe which differs from ours in having the feathers of the back black, intermixt with green; the bills are like thoſe of ducks, but are black, and turned at the end, and on the top there is a broad round black lump of fleſh, ſpeckled with white. The toucan is of the ſize of a wood-pigeon, and all the feathers, except on the breaſt, are as black as a crow, and there they are as yellow as ſaffron. The bill is as long as the whole body, and proportionably thick, yellow without, and red within, which makes a very monſtrous appearance. The kokoy is a bird ſomewhat like a crane, and as big as a ſtork; their bills are long, ſtrait, ſharp, and of a yelloviſh colour, inclining to green, and ſix fingers in length. The neck is fifteen fingers long, the body ten, and the tail ten. The neck and throat are white, and both ſides of the head black, mixt with aſh-colour. The feathers on the undermoſt part of the neck are white, long, thin, and fit for plumes. The wings and tail are of an aſh-colour, mixt with white feathers. Their legs are long, and covered half way with feathers. The fleſh is very good, and of an agreeable taſte. There is another kind of theſe birds, a little larger than a tame duck, that has black eyes, encloſed in a yellow circle, and the plumage is differently coloured.

There is a little bird no bigger than a joint of ones finger that ſings very much, and as often as you turn it, the feathers, like an opal, appear of a different colour, for which reaſon the Braſilian women wear it in their ears. In ſhort, the wild fowl are extremely numerous, and yet hardly one of them has an agreeable note; and therefore they are chiefly valued for the variety and beauty of their plumage. Nothing comes up to the beauty of the colibri, which is common throughout the torrid zone. The various kinds of parrots and aras, different in ſize, colour, and figure, are not to be numbered; but the moſt uncommon parrots are entirely yellow, with a little green at the extremity of their wings. There is one bird as large as a gooſe, whoſe plumage is not remarkable, but then the tops of its wings are armed with a ſpur, or very ſharp horn, half an inch long. It likewiſe has on its bill another ſmall flexible horn, of the length of the finger; they call it kahuitahu in the Braſilian tongue, in imitation of its note. The bird called trompetero by the Spaniards is ſoon tamed, but it is remarkable for nothing but the noiſe it makes, whence it is called the trumpet-bird. The conder is a famous bird which, ſome ſay, will carry off a child or a buck. However, it is pretty certain they would do miſchief to ſheep, if they were not driven away by the ſhepherds, for they are ſometimes ſeen hovering over them.

The gekko is a kind of a ſalamander, and is ſo called from its cry. It is about a foot long, with a ſkin of a ſea-green colour, ſpotted with red. The head is like that of a ſea-turtle, with a ſtrait mouth. The eyes are very large, ſtaring out of the head, and its teeth are exceeding ſharp. It has four legs, which have each five crooked claws, armed at the ends with nails, and its tail is encircled with white rings. It moves but ſlowly, and wherever it faſtens it is not eaſily removed. It is found among rotten trees and ruined places. The ſting is fatal, unleſs the wound be immediately burnt with a hot iron. There are a great many ſerpents with hard names, which are not deſcribed, and therefore we ſhall omit them. The rattle-ſnake is well known, and is ſo called from having a rattle at its tail. However, we ſhall deſcribe it elſewhere. The coral-ſnake is remarkable for the livelineſs and beauty of its colours; and the guallu is between twenty-five and thirty foot long, and as thick as a man's body. But that they will ſwallow a buck, horns and all, as ſome report, is altogether incredible. The bite is not venemous.

We ſhall ſpeak of the crocodile when we come to Egypt, which is the ſame that in theſe parts is called the alligator; or at leaſt there is no very remarkable difference. But the leguwan is a ſort of a land-crocodile, from three to five feet long. They are covered with ſcales, which are of a delicate green, with black and white ſpots. The mouth is full of black ſhort teeth, and the tongue is very thick. From the neck to the tail, all along the back, are ſharp ſmall teeth, of a greeniſh colour, which grow ſmaller and ſmaller towards the tail. It has four legs and feet, with five claws, armed with very ſhort nails. It can live two or three months without food, and the fleſh which is eaten is ſaid to be as good as that of fowls. There are ſeveral ſorts of lizards in Brazil, as well great as ſmall; ſome are green, and ſome are four feet long. There is a ſmall ſort, about the bigneſs of one's thumb, that is poiſonous. The bite of an inſect called centipes, or a hundred legs, is venemous. Their ſcorpions are five or ſix inches long, but their bite is not dangerous. Piſmires or ants are in prodigious ſwarms, and devour every thing that comes in their way. They have likewiſe flying piſmires, as long as one's finger, with triangular heads, and long ſmall horns, beſides ſeveral other kinds.

Brazil produces great variety of plants and trees; the moſt uſeful is the root manioc, or mandioc, for of this they make their bread. There are ſeveral ſorts of it, but they all contain a poiſonous juice, which muſt be ſqueezed out before it is uſed. They have likewiſe the ſenſitive plant, which ſhrinks when it is touched. Halebaſhes are a ſort of pompions, the rind of which, being dried, ſerve for cups, and the like. Ananas or pine-apples are now well known in theſe parts. They likewiſe have rice, Indian corn, potatoes, bananas, melons, pompions, water-melons, cucumbers, beans, figs, and many other vegetable productions brought from Europe. In ſhort, every part of Brazil is well ſtocked with variety of trees, inſomuch, that the firſt planters were forced by cutting to make a road through them, with incredible pains and charge. Brazil wood is very well known every where for its uſefulneſs in dying. The trunk of this tree is knotty, and two or three fathoms thick, and ſmells very agreeably. It is always ſtripped of its bark before it is ſold. The akaju or wild-apple is very refreſhing, and of great uſe to the inhabitants. They have ſeveral ſorts of palm-trees, but they yield no dates: yet ſome ſay they have the common date-trees; but to enumerate every particular of this kind would be endleſs: however, we cannot omit the lianes, a ſort of oſiers, which they make uſe of inſtead of ropes. They are of different kinds, and yet they all have the property of winding up round the trees and ſhrubs, and when they arrive at their branches, which are ſometimes very high, they ſhoot out threads or filaments, which, falling down to the earth in a perpendicular line, and taking root again, aſcend and deſcend alternately. Some of the filaments are carried by the wind to neighbouring trees, where they faſten, and form a confuſion of cordage, by extending every way, looking not unlike the tackling of a ſhip. The root ipecacuanha belongs to this claſs, and every ſort has ſome peculiar quality. Some have a ſtrong ſmell of garlic, and others are thicker than a man's arm; ſome choak the tree round which they cling, and make it die, and when the wood is rotted away, you may ſee a wreathed column made by the lianes, ſelf-ſupported, and pierced through and through, beyond the imitation of art.

The gums, roſins, and balſams, in ſhort, all the juices which flow upon inciſion from divers ſort of trees, as well as the different oils extracted from thence, are not to be numbered.

numbered. The oil drawn from the fruit of a palm tree, called unguravé, is as ſweet and as palatable as Florence oil. Some, like that of Androba, yield a fine light, without any ill ſmell. Some of the Indians, inſtead of oil, uſe gum copal, wrapped about with the leaves of the banana tree. The balſam of Capivi is now very well known for its medicinal uſes.

With regard to the religion of the Brazilians, we can ſay nothing, for they have no public aſſemblies on that account, and though they are called idolaters, we cannot find they have images of any pretended gods. They do not reckon their time by weeks, or months, or years, but by moons. They have no notion of writing, reading, or any thing like it. The huts which they live in are very low and mean, and covered with graſs, herbs, or leaves of trees; but they ſleep in hammocks made of cotton, like net work, which they either faſten between two trees, or to the ſides of their huts, at a diſtance from the ground, for fear of venomous beaſts. Some are twelve or fourteen feet long, and will contain four perſons at a time. Their houſhold furniture conſiſts in calibaſhes to drink out of, ſome of which will hold thirty quarts; they have knives made of ſtone or reeds, and baſkets made of palm leaves or reeds, or both. Their arms are only bows, arrows, and wooden clubs.

In their marriages they may take any relation except the mother's daughters and ſiſters. They uſe no manner of courtſhip, but only apply to the father or neareſt relation, and if he conſents, there needs no farther ceremony. They have as many wives as they pleaſe, who are employed in making hammocks, taking care of the garden, and planting roots. They live together in great harmony, there ſeeming to be no manner of jealouſy among them. This being the caſe, there can be little temptation to adultery on the man's part. As for the women, they may lie with who they will before they are married, without the leaſt blame. The men go to war, and employ themſelves in hunting and fiſhing; they make wooden ſwords, bows, arrows, and ornaments compoſed of feathers.

When an Indian is dead, they bury him in about twelve hours, in a grave made round like a tun, having firſt wrapped him in his cotton hammock, placing him almoſt upright, with his bracelets and other trinkets. The women, when their huſband is dead, make a terrible noiſe, which they repeat as often as they ſee their graves.

BRAZZA, a town and iſland on the coaſt of Dalmatia, in the gulph of Venice, oppoſite to Spalatto, and ſubject to the Venetians. Long. 28. 0. E. Lat. 43. 0. N.

BREBEUF (WILLIAM) a famous French poet, born in Normany, and the author of ſeveral poetical works, the beſt of which is his Lucan Traveſti, which paſſes for an ingenious ſatire on the great, and thoſe who flatter their vices. He died in 1661, aged forty-three.

BRECHIN, a parliament town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Angus, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Dundee, and forty-five north-eaſt of Edinburgh. Long. 2. 18. W. Lat. 56. 40. N.

BRECKNOCK, or BRECON, a town of Brecknockſhire, and capital of the county, with two markets, on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, and four fairs, on May 4, July 5, September 10, and November 17, for leather, hops, cattle, and all ſorts of commodities. It is called by the Welch Aber-Hondey, and is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Hondey and Uſk, over which there is a handſome ſtone bridge. It is an ancient place, containing three churches, one of which is collegiate, and is ſeated at the weſt end of the town. The houſes are well built. Here was formerly a ſtately caſtle, and a ſtrong wall, through which there were three gates, that are all demoliſhed. It is governed by two bailiffs, a recorder, fifteen aldermen, two chamberlains, a town-clerk, two conſtables, and two ſerjeants at mace, and ſends one member to parliament. It is well inhabited, which is in ſome meaſure owing to its being the town where the aſſizes are kept; and there is here a conſiderable woollen-manufactory. The markets are well ſupplied with cattle, corn, and proviſions. It is thirty-four miles north-weſt-by-weſt of Monmouth, eighteen north-weſt of Abergavenny, and one hundred and ſixty-three from London. Long. 3. 15. W. Lat. 52. 0. N.

BRECKNOCKSHIRE, is bounded by Radnorſhire on the north, Cardiganſhire and Caermarthenſhire on the weſt, Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire on the eaſt, and by Glamorganſhire and Monmouthſhire on the ſouth. It is thirty-five miles in length, thirty in breadth, and about an hundred in circumference. It is ſurrounded with hills, which render the air in the vallies pretty temperate. The ſoil on the hills is very ſtoney, but the ſtreams deſcending from thence into the vallies render them fruitful both in corn and graſs. The chief commodities here are corn, cattle, fiſh, and otter's fur, beſides manufactures of cloth and ſtockings. The principal rivers are the Uſk, the Wye, and the Yrvon. The chief towns are Brecknock, Bealt, and Hay.

Two miles to the eaſt of Brecknock is a large lake, called Brecknock Meer, and by the Welch Lhyn Savaddan; it is two miles in length, and nearly the ſame in breadth. It contains plenty of otters, tench, perch, and eels. The tradition of a town being ſwallowed up, and this lake appearing in its room, is a mere fable, nothing of that kind having ever happened in this iſland. The county ſends one member to parliament, and Brecknock another. It is in the dioceſe of Landaff, and contains ſixty-one pariſhes, and is divided into ſix hundreds.

BREDA, a town in Holland, the capital of Dutch Brabant. It is a large, populous, well-built city, regularly fortified after the modern way, and is one of the ſtrongeſt places on the Dutch frontiers. It is ſeated on the river Meck, in a marſhy country, which may be overflowed, and rendered inacceſſible to an army. It is four thouſand paces in circumference, and contains two thouſand two hundred houſes. It is not very well built, but has one handſome ſtreet. The town is of a triangular figure, and the ramparts are planted all round with elms. At every angle there is a gate built with brick. The curtains are flanked with fifteen baſtions, planted with cannon, and by fifteen ravelins. The great church is a noble ſtructure, remarkable for its fine ſpire, which is three hundred and ſixty-two feet high. The mauſolæum of Angelbert II. count of Naſſau, is a curious piece, adorned with ſeveral ſtatues and inſcriptions, ſuitable to the occaſion. In 1577 the garriſon delivered this city to the ſtates-general, but it was retaken in 1581 by Cloude de Barlaimont, aſſiſted by the baron de Freſin, who was priſoner therein. In 1590 prince Maurice took it again from the Spaniards, but Spinola became maſter of it in 1625, after a ſiege of ſix months. It was retaken by the prince of Orange, for the United Provinces, in 1637. There was a congreſs held here, and peace concluded, in 1667, between the Dutch and the Engliſh. It is twenty-three miles weſt of Bois-le-Duc, twenty north-eaſt of Bergen-op-Zoom, twenty-five north-eaſt of Antwerp, twenty-two ſouth-eaſt of Rotterdam, and ſixty ſouth of Amſterdam. Long. 4. 45. E. Lat. 51. 35. N.

BREDENBACH (MATTHIAS) a native of Kerpen, and principal of the college of Emeric, in the county of Cleves. He wrote a Commentary on St. Matthew, and on ninety-ſix of the Pſalms; and alſo ſeveral works againſt the Proteſtants. He died in 1559.

BREGENTZ, a town of Germany, and capital of a county of the ſame name, in the Tirol, and ſubject to the Houſe of Auſtria. It is ſeated on the lake Conſtance, on the frontiers of Suabia, ſeventy miles north-eaſt of Appenzel, and ſeventeen ſouth of Waldburg. Long. 9. 25. E. Lat. 47. 27. N.

BREHAR, one of the Scilly iſlands, lying almoſt directly weſt of the Land's-End, in Cornwall, about the diſtance of thirty miles. It lies between the iſles of Micarlo, Guel, Treſcaw, and Sampſon. It is the rougheſt and moſt mountainous of them all, and not many years ſince there were only two families in it, but now there are many more. There are a few poor houſes, called the Town of Brehar, and ſeveral barrows edged with ſtone, in which perſons of rank were buried in ancient times, beſides many monuments of the Druids, who were Pagan prieſts. Some are of opinion, that this with the reſt made but one iſland, which is the reaſon why ſo many antiquities are now found in moſt of them.

BREMEN, (the duchy of) a province of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony. It is ſeated between the rivers Weſer and the Elbe, the firſt of which ſeparates it from the duchy of Oldenburg, and the latter from that of Holſtein. It is bounded on the weſt by the weſtern part of Hadeland, and by Verden on the eaſt. It is about ſixty-ſix miles from north to ſouth, and forty-five from eaſt to weſt. It was at firſt an archbiſhoprick, but has been ſince ſeculariſed and given to Sweden, by the treaty of Weſtphalia, as a fief of the German empire, with the title of a duchy. This change did not affect the cities of Hamburgh and Bremen, theſe being hanſe towns; but the cathedrals in each place were given to Sweden, as having belonged to the archbiſhop. In 1720 this duchy was given to the electoral houſe of Hanover by the peace of the North, with the ſaid cathedrals, and the two cities are obliged to acknowledge the elector of Hanover as ſovereign, but with ſo many reſtrictions, that their privileges ſtill remain, as well as the rights belonging to imperial cities. The chapter in Bremen is entirely ſuppreſſed, but at Hamburg it is ſtill in a flouriſhing condition.

There are two ſorts of land in this duchy, the one is marſh land, which is very fruitful in dry years; the other is upland, which produces plentifully in rainy ſeaſons. The country lying along the Elbe is very agreeable in ſummer, but in winter it is overflowed in ſeveral places by the ſea-water, and then the inhabitants are forced to make uſe of long poles to leap over the ditches and other waters, when they go to viſit their neighbours. This country received a great deal of damage by the inundation on Chriſtmas-day, 1717, for not only thouſands of cattle periſhed therein, but ſeveral hundreds of men loſt their lives, and the country was ſo full of water, that there was but ſmall hopes it would ever return to its former ſtate. In ſhort, it coſt immenſe ſums and incredible labour to repair the dykes, that the waters had broke thro' and ſpoiled.

The ſoil is ſo fertile that it produces more than the inhabitants can conſume. They make great quantities of bricks and tiles, which they tranſport to Hamburgh, with other materials for buildings, for this town takes off all their ſuperfluities. Bremen is the capital city of the whole duchy.

BREMEN, a city of Germany, and capital of a duchy of the ſame name. It became an archbiſhop's ſee in 848, which continued till 1648, that is eight hundred years. But by the treaty of Weſtphalia it was ſeculariſed and given to Sweden, with the title of a duchy, and had a Swediſh governor till 1712, when the Danes became its maſters. In In 1715 it was ceded to the elector of Hanover, and confirmed in 1720, by the peace of the North But he poſſeſſes only the church of St. Peter and the cathedral, they being all that belonged to the archbiſhop; for which reaſon this city ſtill enjoys it rights and privileges.

The city of Bremen, which is well fortified, is become a place of great trade, and conſequently rich. The river Weſer divides it into the New and Old Towns. It has a fine territory, that extends ſix miles round it, in which is the port of Vegeſack, where the veſſels load and unload their merchandiſes. It is governed by four burgomaſters, and twenty-four ſenators, who are all Proteſtants; but the townſmen are mixt with Roman Catholics.

A violent ſtorm, which happened in the night between the 21ſt and 22d of September, 1739, put the city into a terrible fright; for the lightning fell on the magazine of gunpowder, and blew it up in ſuch a manner, that one ſtone was hardly left upon another. Beſides this, all the houſes were ſhaken and filled with fire and ſmoak. The city is divided into four quarters, to each of which belong a burgomaſter and ſix ſenators. The town is very well built, eſpecially towards the great market-place, which contains ſome magnificent houſes. In the midſt of this ſquare is the ſtatue of Rowland, with a drawn ſword in his hand. The principal curioſities are the water-works, conſiſting of eleven large mills, which convey the water to all the houſes in the town; the Stadthouſe, which is a very good old building; the Exchange, the great Tower, and the vault of the great church. The Proteſtants have a fine ſchool in this city, founded in 1579. The cuſtom-houſe is at the port above mentioned, four miles below the town. Goods are obliged to be brought up to the town in flat-bottomed veſſels. The commodities exported from Bremen are cotton, timber, wool, linen, leather, minerals, and fiſh, particularly ſalmon and lampreys It is twenty-three miles eaſt of Oldenburg, ninety weſt of Brunſwick, ſixty weſt-by-ſouth of Lunenburg, and four hundred and twenty-five north-weſt of Vienna. Long. 8. 45. E. Lat. 53. 30. N.

BREMEN-VEERD, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and duchy of Bremen. It is an open town, ſeated on the river Ooſt, and was formerly the place of reſidence of the archbiſhop. It is thirty-three miles north of Bremen. Long. 8. 35. E. Lat. 53. 58. N.

BREMGARTEN, a town of Swiſſerland. in the territory of Feyen-Aempter, between the cantons of Zurich and Bern. It is ſeated on the river Ruſs, over which there is a wooden bridge, which is a very important paſſage between the two cantons, to keep up the communication. Bremgarten conſiſts of two towns, the Upper, which is upon a hill, and the Lower, on the bank of the river. It is rich and well bnilt, and is three parts ſurrounded by the river. It drives a conſiderable trade in paper. The inhabitants once embraced the reformed religion, but were obliged to forſake it in 1532. They enjoy great privileges, being exempted from the government of the cantons, and have their own chief or avoyer, a great and ſmall council, but the cogniſance of criminal affairs belongs to Zurich. Below Bremgarten there is a convent of Benedictine monks, and above it a nunnery, which is ſurrounded by the river Ruſs. It is ten miles weſt of Zurich, eight ſouth of Baden, and fourteen north of Zug. Long. 8. 25. E. Lat. 47. 20. N.

BRENIUS (DANIEL) a diſciple of Epiſcopus, and a famous Arminian author. He wrote a Commentary on the Bible, and a work on the glorious Reign of Chriſt upon Earth.

BRENNE, a territory of France, in Touraine. It lies on the confines of Berry, between Blanc ſur la Creuſe and Chatillon ſur l'Indre. Its exact bounds are now hardly known; but the town of St. Michael le Brenne is the principal place.

BRENNUS, a celebrated captain of the Gauls, who, about three hundred and ninety-one years before the Chriſtian æra, entered Italy with a powerful army, made great conqueſts there, and beſieged Cluſium in Tuſcany. The inhabitants applying to the Romans for ſuccour, they ſent letters and ambaſſadors to Brennus, who received them courteouſly, and deſiſting from an attack he was then making on the walls, came to an immediate conference with them; but not coming to an agreement, he permitted the ambaſſadors to enter the city. There encouraging the inhabitants to make a ſally, they put themſelves at their head. The fight grew hot near the walls; and Quintus Ambuſtus, one of the ambaſſadors, having killed a Gaul of remarkable ſtature, was going to ſtrip him. Brennus ſeeing him, invoked the Gods to be witneſſes, that, contrary to the law of nations, he, who came as an ambaſſador, had committed acts of hoſtility, then drew off his men, and marched towards Rome; but, to ſhew his moderation, ſent an herald to demand the offender, and, in the mean time, marched leiſurely on. The Roman people, to whom the ſenate referred the affair, were ſo far from complying with this reaſonable requeſt, that they choſe theſe very ambaſſadors military tribunes. The Gauls, highly exaſperated, haſtened their march, without committing any act of hoſtility in the countries through which they paſſed; mean while the military tribunes took the field with an army not inferior in number to that of the Gauls. A battle was fought by the river Allia, eleven miles from Rome, and the Romans being entirely defeated, Brennus marched to Rome, which he entered without oppoſition, and took and pillaged that city, three hundred and ninety years before the Chriſtian æra. The Romans, however, defended the Capitol, and Brennus laid ſiege to it; however, at length Camillus coming to its relief, drove the Gauls not only out of Rome, but out of all Italy.

We ought not to confound this Brennus with another captain of the Gauls of the ſame name, who was killed, with a part of his troops, in attempting to plunder the temple of Apollo, at Delphos, about two hundred and ſeventy-eight years before Chriſt.

BRENT, a town of Devonſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, on May 13 and October 10, for horned cattle. It is but a ſmall place, and lies on the road from Exeter to Plymouth, being twenty-ſix miles ſouth-weſt from the former, and one hundred and ninety-eight weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 5. 7. W. Lat. 50. 30. N.

BRENTE, a river which has it ſource in the biſhoprick of Trent, and running through the Venetian territory, falls into the gulph of Venice, oppoſite to the city of Venice.

BRENTFORD, a town of Middleſex, in the great London road to the weſt. It is divided into Old and New Brentford, in which laſt are the church and market-houſe. It is a long place, well ſtocked with public houſes, and has a market for corn on Tueſdays, and two fairs, held on May 17, 18, and 19, and on September 12, 13, 14, and 15, for horſes, cattle, and hogs. It is ſeated on the river Thames, nine miles weſt of London. Long. 0. 7. W. Lat. 51. 26. N.

BRENTZEEN, or BRENTIUS, (JOHN) a famous Lutheran miniſter, born at Will, in Suabia, in 1499. He ſtudied at Heidleberg, where he acquired great reputation, and was at length made canon of Wirtemberg and ordained prieſt. By reading Luther's books, and converſing with that great reformer, he changed his ſentiments, and embraced the proteſtant religion, after which he was made profeſſor of divinity at Tubingen, and counſellor in ordinary to the duke of Wirtemberg He wrote a great number of works, and died on the 10th of September, 1570, aged ſeventy-two. He was the firſt who maintained that Jeſus Chriſt, ſince his aſcenſion, is omnipreſent. Thoſe who followed his ſentiments in this particular were called Ubiquitarians.

BREREWOOD (EDWARD) a learned mathematician and antiquary, born at Cheſter, in 1565. He was educated in grammar learning, at the free ſchool in that city; he afterwards ſtudied at Brazen-noſe college, Oxford, and having taken his degrees in arts, removed to St. Mary hall; in 1596, he became the firſt profeſſor of aſtronomy at Greſham college, London, where he lead a very private and retired courſe of life, and where he died of a fever, November 4, 1613, much lamented, for he was a very learned and excellent perſon. and was a great ſearcher into antiquity. He wrote ſeveral works; but none of them were publiſhed till after his death: theſe were, 1. Enquiries touching the Diverſity of Languages and Religion through the chief Parts of the World. 2. Elementa Logicæ in Gratiam ſtudioſæ Juventutis in Acad. Oxon. octavo. 3. A Treatiſe of the Sabbath, quarto. 4. The patriarchal Government of the ancient Church, quarto, &c.

BRESCIA, a city of Italy, and capital of Breſciano, in the ſtate of Venice, with a biſhop's ſee. It is pretty large, well fortified, and defended by a very conſiderable citadel, built on a rock. It is ſeated in a plain, at the foot of a mountain, on the little river Garza, and is about three miles in circumference; it is very populous, the inhabitants being about fifty thouſand, among whom are ſeveral noble and illuſtrious families; the ſtreets are fine, and very clean, being almoſt all watered by ſtreams of the river, and the houſes are well built; there are ſeveral public ſquares or market-places; the largeſt is ſurrounded with piazzas, and the town-houſe ſtands in the middle; the city has good walls, through which there are five gates, and an arſenal full of military ſtores. The palace, where public affairs are managed, is a magnificent ſtructure, built of ſtone reſembling marble, over-againſt which is a piazza five hundred paces long, filled with goldſmiths ſhops. They have ſeveral fine churches, particularly thoſe of St. Aſra, St. Peter, Olivet's, and that of the Dominicans; in this laſt they pretend to have a croſs, which they call oriflame, which Conſtantine the Great ſaw in the air; the colour is ſky-blue, with a reddiſh caſt. The church of St. Julia has very rich ornaments. Here are a great number of workmen in knives, ſwords, guns, &c. with which they carry on a great trade, as alſo in linen cloth, and other merchandizes. Breſcia is twenty-eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Bergamo, twenty-eight north-weſt of Cremona, forty-eight north of Parma, thirty-eight north-weſt of Mantua, and ninety-five weſt of Venice. Long. 10. 5. E. Lat. 45. 31. N.

BRESCIANO, a province of Italy, in the territory of Venice, bounded on the north by the Griſons and the biſhoprick of Trent: on the eaſt by the lake Garda, the Veroneſe, and the duchy of Mantua; on the ſouth by the duchy of Mantua and the Cremoneſe; and on the weſt by the Cremaſco, the Bergomaſco, and the Valtelina. It is watered by ſeveral ſmall rivers, which render it very fertile, and is full of towns and villages, of which Breſcia is the capital.

BRESLAW, a city of Germany, and the capital of Sileſia, is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Oder and Ola; this laſt runs through ſeveral of its ſtreets, and is of great uſe to thoſe whoſe buſineſs wants water. This city is very large, and all the houſes are built of ſtone, which render it one of the fineſt places in Germany; it is ſurrounded with ſtrong walls, fortified with good ramparts, ravelins, and advanced works. All the members of the magiſtracy are proteſtants, as well as the greateſt part of the citizens, and the reſt are Roman Catholics. The Oder forms two iſlands, both of which are contiguous to the city. The firſt is called Sand, wherein is the church of St. Mary, which was ſet on fire by lightning, on the 30th of January, 1730, by which the ſteeple was conſumed, but the body of the church was preſerved; the moſt remarkable thing in this iſland is the college of the regular canons of St. Auguſtine. The other iſland is called Thum, and contains the cathedral, in which there is a magnificent chapel, built by Frederick, biſhop of Breſlaw, in 1680, wherein he intended to be intombed. At a diſtance is the church of the Holy Croſs, a grand ſtructure, under which is the church of St. Bartholomew. The epiſcopal palace, the canons houſes, and other buildings belonging to the biſhop, are near the cathedral. In the city was a royal palace, which the Jeſuits got into their hands, and have built a church in its room; they alſo founded an univerſity, in 1702. The two principal proteſtant churches are St Elizabeth's and St. Mary Magdalen's, near each of which is a college, provided with a fine library. Their chief manufactures are thread and linen, of which they export vaſt quantity. It is one hundred and thirteen miles north-eaſt of Prague, and one hundred and ſixty-eight north of Vienna. Long. 17. 5. Lat. 51. 4. N.

BRESSE, a province of France, bounded on the north by Burgundy and the Franche Compté, on the eaſt by Savoy, on the ſouth by Viennois, on the weſt by the principality of Dombes and the Somme; it is forty miles from north to ſouth, and twenty-three from eaſt to weſt. It is fertile in corn and hemp, has fine paſtures, and ſeveral lakes with plenty of fiſh. It is divided into the Higher and Lower; the firſt is on the ſide of Bourges, and the ſecond towards St. Trivier and the river Sonne. The French got poſſeſſion of it in 1601. The principal places are Bourg en Breſſe, Montluel, Pont de Vaux, and Coligny.

BRESSELLO, a town of Italy, ſeated on the river Po, in the Modeneſe, twenty-eight miles north-north-weſt of Modena, and ten from Parma. Long. 10. 25. E. Lat. 44. 45. N.

BREST, a maritime town of France, in Lower Brittany, is ſeated on the declivity of a hill on the ſide of its port, which is the largeſt in the kingdom, and will hold five hundred ſhips at a time. There is an arſenal with ſea-ſtores, which was placed there on account of its nearneſs to the woods, mines of iron, and other things proper for the building of ſhips. It was entirely conſumed by fire, in 1744, which was an irreparable loſs to France. The entrance into the port is guarded by a ſtrong caſtle, ſeated on a rock, which cannot be attempted on the ſea ſide, becauſe it is craggy, and defended on the land ſide by a large ditch and other fortifications.

The ſtreets of Breſt are very narrow, ill contrived, few in number and have all a deſcent. A great quay ſurrounds this ſide of the port, which is above a mile in length, and two hundred paces broad; there are magazines on the quay, full of all foreign merchandizes. On the other ſide of the port, the fine church of Notre Dame is ſeated; and in a ſuburb, which is as big as half the city, there is a ſtrong tower, oppoſite the caſtle, at the entrance of the port; there is alſo a great quay on this ſide, bordered with large magazines, partly within the rock, which has been cut away to enlarge the place; theſe are extended almoſt as far as the bottom of the harbour, where there are two docks, very commodious for the building of large ſhips; the ſhops and houſes of the workmen are all round them; the rope-walks are ſeparated from the city by one of theſe docks. The entrance into the harbour is called the Gullet, and is a paſſage extremely difficult, on account of the ſunken rocks on both ſides of the ſhore; but there are experienced pilots, who carry ſhips in very ſafely. The Engliſh attempted to take poſſeſſion of this harbour in 1694, but were diſappointed. It is thirty miles ſouth-weſt of Morlaix, thirty north-weſt of Quimper, one hundred and twenty weſt of Kennes, and three hundred and twenty-three weſt of Paris. Lon. 4. 25. W. Lat 48. 23. N.

BRESTE (the palatinate of) is one of the provinces of Cujava, in Poland. It lies between the palatinates of Ploeſko, Rava, and Lencici-Wiadiſlaw. It is divided into four chatelanies, and Breſte is the capital of the whole.

BRESTE, or BRESSICI, the capital of the palatinate of Breſſici, and of Poleſia, in Poland, ſeated on the river Bog, eighty miles eaſt of Warſaw, and ſubject to Poland. It is a fortified town, and has a caſtle built upon a rock. Here is a famous ſynagogue, reſorted to by the Jews from all the countries in Europe. Long. 24. 0. E. Lat. 41. 35. N.

BRET (CARDIN LE) advocate-general to the parliament of Paris, and counſellor of ſtate, employed by the French court in many important negociations. The principal of his works is a learned Treatiſe on the Sovereignty of Kings. He died on the 24th of January, 1695, aged ninety-ſeven.

BRETAGNE, or BRITTANY, is one of the moſt conſiderable provinces of France, and is very well ſituated for trade, being encompaſſed on three ſides by the ſea, and on the eaſt ſide by Normandy, Maine, Anjou, and Poictou. It is about one thouſand five hundred miles in length from eaſt to weſt, but, as to breadth, the different points of land that jet into the ſea and the gulphs on its coaſts render it very unequal; however, from Nantes to St. Malo's, it is one hundred and twenty-three miles. There are a great many ports on the coaſt, and but few navigable rivers, except the Loire, which there ends its courſe, and the Vienne, which paſſes by Rennes. The rivers that riſe in this country are navigable no farther than the tide flows up, which is but a little way. The country in general is a mixture of plains and mountains; and Lower Brittany is croſſed by a chain of mountains called Mount Arré; ſome parts are covered with wood, and others are great heaths, or uncultivated land; the trees of the foreſt are chiefly beech, oak, and cheſnut. The air is temperate in all parts, but moiſt and foggy near the ſea. There are ſalt-marſhes in ſeveral places, where they make a great deal of ſalt. About Nantz they have wine, which is not fit for exportation, and therefore they make brandy of it, which is highly eſteemed. In the biſhoprick of Quimper, there is a lead-mine; and in the biſhoprick of Nantes, they have pit-coal, but it is not ſo good as the Engliſh.

This province is the Armorica of the ancients, which was conquered by Julius Cæſar; and in the middle of the fifth century, ſome of the Britons being driven out of their own country, ſince called England, came and ſettled in Armorica, which from them was called Britannia, or Bretagne, and the inhabitants, who were Romans, received them as friends. It was united to the crown of France, by Francis I. king of France, in 1532.

The trade and produce of Bretagne are very great, of which we ſhall give a diſtinct account. The biſhoprick of Rennes produces wheat, rye, barley, and Turky corn, but only for home conſumption; they have a great number of cows, from the milk of which they have good butter for exportation; ſewing-thread, of the flax growing at Dinant and Becherel, is exported to different countries in large quantities; the coarſe hemp cloth of Vitry is ſent to America and Spain, and is proper for ſmall ſails; the women and girls at Vitry knit thread ſtockings, ſocks, and gloves, which are exported to all parts; they carry on a conſiderable trade at Nantes, and ſend a great number of ſhips to America and the Weſt Indies, carrying all things neceſſary for the colonies; to Spain they ſend paper, linen cloth, ſilks, gold and ſilver toys, ſugar, iron ware, mercery goods, and earthen ware, and bring back money, iron, wool, ſheep-ſkins, oranges, and lemons; the ſame trade is carried on with Portugal.

Bretagne is divided into the Upper and Lower; the Upper comprehends the biſhopricks of Rennes, Nantes, Dol, and St Malo; and the Lower, Vannes. Leon, Quimper, and Treguier. They ſpeak French in the Upper, and Britiſh in the Lower, which is not unlike the Welſh.

BRETEUIL, a town of France, in Normandy, ſeated on the river Hon, fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Evreux, and fifty-five weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 1. E. Lat. 48. 59. N.

BRETEUIL (GABRIELA EMILIA DE) marchioneſs of Chaſtelet, a lady rendered illuſtrious by her wit and love of the ſciences, was born in 1706. She wrote, among other books, Commentaries on ſir Iſaac Newton's works, and died in 1749.

BRETON (CAPE) an iſland in North America, called by the French Iſle Royale, the chief place of which is Louiſburg. It is ſeparated from Nova Scotia by the narrow ſtreight of Canſo. It is one hundred and ſeventeen miles long, and ſeventy-five broad, and is full of lakes; it is a barren uncomfortable place, being covered with ſnow in winter, and ſubject to great fogs in the ſummer; however, it is of importance, as it in ſome meaſure commands the navigation to the river of St. Lawrence, and is uſeful to thoſe who go to fiſh for cod; it has ſeveral good harbours, and the fiſhery on the coaſt is very good. It was taken from the French in 1745, and reſtored to them again, by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748; and it was again taken by the Engliſh, on July 26, 1758, when the whole garriſon, conſiſting of five thouſand ſix hundred men, were made priſoners of war; there were eleven men of war in the harbour, which were either taken, ſunk, or deſtroyed. It is ſeated between forty-five and forty-ſeven degrees of latitude.

BREUGHEL (PETER) commonly called Old Breughel, was born at a village of the ſame name, near Breda, in the year 1565, and was the firſt pupil of Peter Cock, whoſe daughter he married. It was cuſtomary with him to dreſs like a countryman, in order to be more eaſily admitted into the company of country people, and be allowed to join in their frolics at their feaſts and marriages, by which means he became perfectly acquainted with their manners and geſtures, of which he made excellent uſe in his pictures. He travelled to France and Italy, and for a long time ſtudied landſcapes on the mountains of Tyrol. His humorous turn of mind diſplayed itſelf in all his pictures, which generally conſiſted of country dances, marriages, ſports, and diverſions; though he ſometimes performed pieces from the hiſtorical parts of the Holy Scriptures. At his return from Italy, he ſettled at Antwerp, and in his laſt illneſs cauſed his wife to gather together all his immodeſt pieces and burn them before his face. He died at Antwerp; but in what year cannot be aſcertained.

He had a ſon named Peter, who alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his paintings, and John, the ſubject of the following article.

BREUGHEL (JOHN) an eminent painter, commonly called Velvet Breughel, from his generally wearing velvet cloaths, was the ſon of Peter Breughel, and was alſo born at the village of Breughel, about the year 1575. He firſt applied himſelf to painting flowers and fruit, in which he excelled, and afterwards had great ſucceſs in drawing landſcapes, and views of the ſea, ſet off with ſmall figures. He lived long at Cologn, where he acquired a reputation that will laſt till the lateſt poſterity. He travelled to Italy, where his fame had got before him, and where his fine landſcapes, adorned with ſmall figures ſuperior to thoſe of his father, gave very great ſatisfaction. If a good judgment may be formed from the great number of pictures he left behind him, all highly finiſhed, he muſt have been exceeding induſtrious; beſides, Rubens employed him in the landſcape part of ſeveral of his ſmall pieces. He died in 1642, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age.

BREVINT (DANIEL) D. D. a learned divine of the ſeventeenth century, was born in the iſle of Jerſey, in the reign of king James I. He ſtudied logic and philoſophy in the proteſtant univerſity at Saumur, and afterwards was made a fellow of Jeſus college, Oxford, where he continued till he was ejected by the parliament viſitors, on which he retired to France, and became miniſter of a proteſtant congregation in Normandy; however, after the Reſtoration, he was made a prebend of Durham. He afterwards took his degree of doctor of divinity at Oxford, and, in 1681, was promoted to the deanery of Lincoln. He wrote, 1. The Depth and Myſtery of the Roman Maſs laid open and explained. 2. The Chriſtian Sacrament and Sacrifice; with ſome other pieces. He died May 5. 1695.

BREUL (JAMES DU) a Benedictine monk, born at Paris, in 1528. He wrote the Theatre of the Antiquities of Paris, and other works, and died in 1614, aged eighty-ſix.

BREWER (ANTHONY) a dramatic poet, who flouriſhed in the reign of Charles I. highly eſteemed by ſome of the wits at that time. Mr. Winſtanley, and after him Chetwood, has attributed to him a play called Lingua, or the Contention of the Tongue and the Five Senſes for Superiority, a comedy, acted at Cambridge, in 1606; but Mr. Langbane is of opinion, that neither that play, nor ſome others attributed to him, were of his writing. Mr. Chetwood, however, in ſpeaking of this comedy, mentions a circumſtance too curious to be omitted here. When this play was acted at Cambridge, he ſays, Oliver Cromwell performed the part of Tacitus, which he felt ſo warmly, that it firſt fired his ambition, and from the poſſeſſion of an imaginary crown, he ſtretched his views to a real one. The ſpeech with which he is ſaid to have been ſo affected is the following.

Roſes and bays, pack hence! this crown and robe
My brows and body circles and inveſts.
How gallantly it fits me! ſure the ſlave
Meaſur'd my head, that wrought this coronet.
They lie that ſay, complexions cannot change;
My blood's enobled, and I am transform'd
Unto the ſacred temper of a king.
Methinks, I hear my noble paraſites
Stiling me Cæſar, or great Alexander,
Licking my feet——

Mr. Langbane aſcribes to Brewer the two following plays: The Country Girl, a comedy, often acted with applauſe, printed in quarto, in 1647, which has been revived under the title of Country Innocence, or the Chambermaid turned Quaker; and The Love-ſick King, an Engliſh tragical Hiſtory, with the Life and Death of Carteſmunda, the fair Nun of Wincheſter, printed in quarto, in 1655; this play was likewiſe revived in 1680, and acted with the title of The Perjured Nun.

BREWOOD, a town in Staffordſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, and one fair, on September 19, for horſes and cattle. It is but a ſmall place, and the market is almoſt diſcontinued. It is ten miles ſouth ſouth-weſt of Stafford, eighteen weſt of Litchfield, and one hundred and thirty-one north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 5. W. Lat. 52. 43. N.

BREY, a town of Germany, in the territory of Liege, on the frontiers of Brabant, ſeated on a brook, twelve miles weſt of Maſeick, and thirteen miles north of Maeſtricht. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat. 51. 6. N.

BREZE (marſhal DE) acquired great reputation in the ſeventeenth century. His name was Urbin de Maillé Brezé; he married the cardinal de Richlieu's ſiſter, and though he behaved with haughtineſs to his brother-in-law, was raiſed to ſome very conſiderable poſts; and at the time of his death, which happened on the 13th of February, 1650, he was viceroy of Catalonia.

BREZE (ARMAND DE MAILLE) only ſon of the former, was born in 1619. He roſe in his youth to very great employments; for he commanded the French fleet in 1640, and gained a ſignal victory over the Spaniards; but in his twenty-ſeventh year, he was killed by a cannon-ball, on board his ſhip, near Orbitello, in the year 1646.

BRIANCON, a town of France, in Upper Dauphiny, capital of the Briançonnois. It is ſeated at the foot of a rock, on which the caſtle ſtands. It has a handſome church, two monaſteries and a nunnery. It is eighteen miles north-eaſt of Embrun, and thirty-eight weſt of Pignerol. Long. 6. 45. E. Lat. 44. 46. N.

BRIANCONNOIS, a territory of France, in Dauphiny, bounded by Grenoblois, Gapenzois, Ambrunois, Piedmont, and Savoy. It comprehends ſeveral valleys, which lie among the mountains of the Alps, and though it is extremely cold, yet it is fertile in corn and paſtures. The inhabitants have a great deal of wood, yet they chooſe to be in the ſtables with their cattle ſix months in the year, to keep themſelves warm. Briançon is the capital town.

BRIARD (JAMES DU) a learned doctor and vice-chancellor of the univerſity of Louvain, was eſteemed by Eraſmus and the learned of his time. He wrote a Treatiſe on Lotteries, and other works in Latin, and died in 1520.

BRIARE, a town of France, in the Gatinois, ſeated on the river Loire. It is remarkable for nothing but a long ſtreet, full of inns and farriers, it being on the great road to Lyons; but it is famous for the canal of Briare, which is thirty-three miles in length, and maintains a communication between the Loire and the Seine, by means of the Loing. It is thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Orleans, and eighty-eight ſouth of Paris. Long. 2. 45. E. Lat. 47. 40. N.

BRIAREUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Titan, Æther, or Cœlus, and Terra, a giant, who, according to Homer, was called Ægeon by men and Briareus by the Gods. He is repreſented as having fifty heads, breathing fire, and an hundred hands. He defended Jupiter, when Pallas, Juno, and Neptune, with the reſt of the Gods, attempted to dethrone him and bind him in chains; but afterwards conſpiring, with the reſt of his gigantic brethren, againſt Jupiter, that God flung him down, and then threw mount Ætna upon him, which, as often as he moves, caſts forth fire.

BRIDGEND,

BRIDGEND, a town of Glamorganſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, on November 17 and Holy Thurſday, for cattle, ſheep, and hogs. It is ſeated on the river Hogmore, which divides it into two parts, that are joined together by a ſtone bridge; and the market is conſiderable for corn, cattle, and proviſions. It is eight miles weſt of Cowbridge, forty-four ſouth-weſt of Monmouth, and one hundred and ſeventy-eight weſt of London. Long. 3. 50. W. Lat. 51. 32. N.

BRIDGE-Town, the capital of the iſland of Barbadoes, and the fineſt in all the Caribbee iſlands. It ſtands in the inmoſt part of Carliſle bay, which is large enough to contain five hundred ſhips. It is ſeated at the entrance of St. George's valley, which runs ſeveral miles into the country. The houſes, which are high, and of brick or ſtone, are about one thouſand two hundred, with glazed windows, and the ſtreets are broad. The wharfs and quays are very neat and convenient, and there are ſeveral forts, as James's fort, Willoughby's fort, Needham's fort, and a ſmall one on the eaſt ſide of the town, as well as a magazine, built of ſtone, where powder, and the ſtores of the iſland are kept. The church is large, and has a noble organ, a good ring of bells, and a clock. There are large taverns and eating-houſes, with a poſt-houſe, on account of a monthly packet boat, ſettled between this place and England. The militia of this town and St. Michael's precinct, conſiſt of one thouſand two hundred men, called the royal regiment of foot guards. It is the ſeat of the governor, council, aſſembly, and court of chancery. But the governor's houſe is about a mile north-eaſt of the town. There is a free-ſchool for poor boys, two hundred pounds a year for twenty poor widows, and ten pounds a year for the organiſt: theſe two laſt are a legacy by the widow Frezier; and colonel Codrington, formerly governor, left a large eſtate for the propagation of the Chriſtian religion among the negroes, and for maintaining profeſſors and ſcholars in divinity, phyſic, and ſurgery. In general the town is very rich, and the inhabitants polite, and there is no want of ingenious artificers of every kind. Long. 61. 0. W. Lat. 13. 0. N.

BRIDGET (St.) a princeſs of Sweden, in the fourteenth century, married Ulfon, by whom ſhe had eight children, all of whom are ſaid to have been happy. Her huſband becoming a monk of the order of Ciſtercians, ſhe ſettled at Rome, where ſhe founded the order of the Holy Saviour. She died at Rome, on the 13th of July, 1373. There is attributed to her a work, intitled Revelations, in eight books.

BRIDGNORTH, a town in Shropſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and four fairs; on Thurſday before Shrove-Tueſday, for horned cattle, horſes, ſheep, hops, cheeſe, wick-yarn, linen, and woollen cloth; on June 30 for the ſame, and great qnantities of ſheep's wool; on Auguſt the 2d for the ſame, and lamb's wool; and on October 29, for horned cattle, horſes, ſheep, ſalt, butter, and cheeſe. It is ſeated on the river Severn, which divides it into two parts; but they are united by a handſome ſtone bridge, and theſe are called the Upper and the Lower town. It is ſaid to be built by Ethelfleda, widow of Etheldred, king of the Mercians, about the year 675. Robert de Belizma, ſon of Robert de Montgommery, built the caſtle, and maintained it againſt king Henry I. by which means it was forfeited to the crown, and remained ſo till the reign of Richard III. who gave it to John Sutton, lord Dudley. This town has undergone ſeveral ſieges, and in the civil war it ſuffered very much, many fine buildings, and the whole town being almoſt deſtroyed by fire, when Sir Lewis Kirke defended the citadel for king Charles. There are now no other remains of the caſtle then a ſmall part of one of the towers, and a place yet called the caſtle, within the walls of the old one; within which, ſtands one of the churches, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen, which was made a free chapel, and exempted from epiſcopal juriſdiction. The other church is at the north end of the town, on the higheſt part of the hill, near to whoſe church-yard ſtood a college, which was deſtroyed by fire in the civil wars, together with the church juſt mentioned; which has been ſince rebuilt by the inhabitants. On the weſt bank of the river are the remains of an ancient and magnificent convent, under which are ſeveral remarkable vaults and caverns, running to a great length. Part of the Cow-gate ſtreet is a rock, riſing perpendicularly, in which are ſeveral houſes and tenements, that make a very agreeable, though groteſque, appearance. In many other places there are alſo caves and dwellings for families, in the rocks, and indeed the whole town has an appearance ſurpriſingly ſingular. It is governed by two bailiffs, who are elected yearly, out of the twenty-four aldermen, by a jury of fourteen, twelve of whom muſt agree in their choice. It has alſo forty-eight common council men, and, as other corporations, a recorder, town-clerk, and ſub-officers. It is fourteen miles north-weſt of Kidderminſter, twenty-ſix north-weſt of Birmingham, twenty-one ſouth-eaſt of Shrewſbury, and one hundred and forty north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 30. W. Lat. 52. 40. N.

BRIDGWATER, a town in Somerſetſhire, governed by a a mayor, a recorder, two bailiffs, two aldermen, and twenty-four common-council-men. It ſends two members to parliament; and has two markets, on Thurſdays and Saturdays; with four fairs, on the ſecond Thurſday in Lent, June 24, September 21, and December 28, for cattle and all ſorts of goods. It has a handſome church, and ſeveral large inns, with a bridge over the river Parret, near which ſhips of a hundred ton burthen may ride. It is twenty-four miles weſt-ſouth-weſt of Wells, thirty-ſix ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Briſtol, and one hundred and forty-three weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 2. 54. W. Lat. 51. 15. N.

BRIDLINGTON, a ſea-port town, in the Eaſt Riding of Yorkſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, on Monday before Whitſuntide, and October 21, for linen cloth and toys. It is ſeated on a creek of the ſea, near Flamborough-head, having a commodious quay for ſhips to take in their lading; it has a ſafe harbour for ſhips, and is a place of good trade. It is more generally known by the name of Burlington, as it gives title to an earl of that name. It is forty miles north-eaſt of York, thirty-ſix north of Kingſton upon Hull, and two hundred and eight north of London. Long. 0. 10 E. Lat. 54. 15. N.

BRIDPORT, a town in Dorſetſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and three fairs, on April 5, for bullocks and ſheep, and on April 10, for pedlars ware and cattle. It is in a low and dirty ſituation, between two rivers, which, at a little diſtance joining a ſmall ſtream, formerly made a convenient harbour; but it is now quite choaked up with ſand. It is a corporation, and is governed by two bailiffs, thirteen other burgeſſes, a recorder, town-clerk, and two ſerjeants at mace. The two bailiffs, and thoſe for the preceding year, and recorder are ſole juſtices of the peace within the borough. It ſends two members to parliament, who are choſen by the inhabitants who are houſekeepers. It is noted for making of ropes and cables for ſhipping, whence ariſes the proverb of a man that is hanged, that he is ſtabbed with a Bridport dagger. It is fourteen miles weſt of Dorcheſter, thirty-ſeven eaſt-by-north of Exeter, and one hundred and thirty-nine weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 3. 0. W. Lat. 50. 40. N.

BRIE (Germain de) a learned writer, of the ſixteenth century, was born at Auxerre, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his knowledge of the languages, and particularly of the Greek. He wrote ſeveral works in Latin, which are eſteemed, and died in 1538.

Brie Champenoise, a diſtrict in France, between the rivers Seine and Marne. It is fertile in corn, and all ſorts of fruits. The paſtures are very good, and the inhabitants make excellent cheeſe. The principal places are Meaux, Troſmes, Provins, Colomiers, Chateaux, Thierry, Montereau-Faut-Jonne, and Sezanne. Brie Pariſienne is in the Iſle of France, and the chief places are Lagni, Brie Count Robert, and Corboil.

Brie Comte Robert, a town of France, in Brie Pariſienne, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 2. 41. E. Lat. 48. 41. N.

BRIEG, a town of Germany, in Sileſia. It might have paſſed for a handſome place before the laſt ſiege; the caſtle, the college, and the arſenal being very great ornaments, and moſt of the houſes were well built. But the Pruſſians, who beſieged it in 1741, threw two thouſand one hundred and twenty-two bombs into it, and four thouſand ſeven hundred and fourteen cannon bullets, which reduced a great part of the town to aſhes, and quite ruined a wing of the caſtle. It was obliged to ſurrender, after ſuſtaining ſeven days continual fire. The Pruſſians, to whom this place was ceded by the peace, have augmented the fortifications, and built a new ſuburb. It ſtands upon the Oder, on the other ſide of which there are plenty of fallow deer, and large foreſts of beech and oak-trees. They have a yearly fair, at which they ſell above twelve thouſand horned cattle. Since 1728 they have begun to manufacture fine cloth. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Breſlaw, and fifteen north-eaſt of Oppellen. Long. 17. 35. E. Lat. 50. 40. N.

BRIENNE, a town of France, in Champagne, near the river Aube. The caſtle is alſo called Brienne, and is about a mile from the town. It is twenty-three miles directly north of Chalons.

Brienne (Gautier de) deſcended of an illuſtrious family, fruitful in great men, ſignalized himſelf, in 1188, by his courage at the defence of the city of Acre, againſt the Saracens. He was at length king of Sicily, and duke of Apulia, by his marriage with Mary Alberie, and died of a wound he received in defending her poſſeſſions, in 1205.

Brienne (Gautier de) ſurnamed the Great, and the ſon of the former, was count of Brienne and Japha. He went into the Holy Land, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage courage againſt the Saracens, but being taken priſoner, was put to death, about the year 1251.

BRIENNE (GAUTIER DE) the great grandſon of the former, was educated at the court of Robert the Good, king of Naples and Sicily. He rendered himſelf maſter of Florence, but being driven from thence, went into France, where, by his ſervices, he, in the year 1356, obtained the poſt of conſtable, but was killed the ſame year, at the battle of Poictiers.

BRIENNE (JOHN DE) of the ſame family, was king of Jeruſalem, in 1210, and emperor of Conſtantinople, in 1223. He ſignalized himſelf by his valour, but was equally remarkable for his avarice, which occaſioned the misfortunes of that empire. He died in 1237.

BRIENNE. See LOMENIE.

BRIESCIA, a palatinate, ſo called, in the duchy of Lithuania, in Poland. The name given to it by ſome is Poleſia. It is bounded on the north by Novogrode and Troki, on the weſt by thoſe of Bielſko and Lublin, on the ſouth by that of Chelm and Upper Volhinia, and on the eaſt by the territory of Rziczica. This province is of conſiderable extent from eaſt to weſt, and is watered by the rivers Bug and Pripeſe; it is full of woods and marſhes, and there are lakes that yield large quantities of fiſh, that are ſalted by the inhabitants, and ſent into the neighbouring provinces.

BRIET (PHILIP) a learned Jeſuit and geographer, born at Abbeville, in 1660. He wrote ſeveral geographical pieces, and other works which are eſteemed, and died in 1668.

BRIEU (St.) in Latin, Briocus, the diſciple of St. Germain, biſhop of Ireland, in the ſeventh century. He took refuge in Brittany, where he built a monaſtery, that became ſo celebrated, that a city was ſoon built about it, which was called by his name, and afterwards erected into a biſhopric.

BRIEUX (St.) a town of France, in Upper Brittany, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in a bottom, ſurrounded with mountains, which deprive it of a proſpect of the ſea, though it is not above a mile and a quarter from it, and there forms a ſmall port. The churches, ſtreets, and ſquares are tolerably handſome; but the town is without walls and ditches. The church of St. Michael is in the ſuburb of the ſame name, and is the largeſt in the place. The convent of the Cordeliers is well built, and the garden is ſpacious. The college, which is very near, is maintained by the town, for the inſtruction of youth. It is fifty miles north-weſt of Rennes, and two hundred and forty weſt of Paris. Long. 2. 58. W. Lat. 48. 33. N.

BRIGGS (HENRY) an eminent mathematician, in the ſixteenth century, was born at Warley Wood, in the pariſh of Halifax, in Yorkſhire, about the year 1556, and educated at St. John's college, in Cambridge, where he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of the mathematics. He was afterwards the firſt profeſſor of geometry, in Greſham-college, and in 1619, was made Savilian profeſſor of geometry, at Oxford. He was a man of great probity, eaſy of acceſs, free from arrogance, moroſeneſs, envy, ambition, and avarice; he ſet little value on riches; was contented with his own ſtation; and preferred a ſtudious retirement to all the ſplendid circumſtances of life. He wrote, 1. Logarithmorum Chilias Prima. 2. Arithmetica Logarithmica. 3. Trigonometria Britannica. 4. A ſmall Tract on the North-weſt Paſſage, and ſome other works. He died January 26, 1630.

BRIGGS (WILLIAM) an eminent phyſician, in the latter end of the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of Auguſtin Briggs, eſq four times member for the city of Norwich, where our author was born. He ſtudied at the univerſity of Cambridge, was a good linguiſt and philoſopher, and well verſed in moſt parts of learning. He wrote a work, intitled Ophthalmographia; and another, intitled Nova Viſionis Theora. He was phyſician in ordinary to king William III. and died September 4, 1704, aged ſixty-two years.

BRIGHTHELMSTONE, a ſmall ſea-port town of Suſſex, with a market on Thurſdays, and two fairs, on Holy Thurſday, and September 4, for pedlar's ware. It is a large ill built and very populous town, whoſe inhabitants are chiefly fiſhermen. It is ſeated near the ſea, and has a pretty good harbour. It is nine miles weſt-by-north of Newhaven, ſeven eaſt of New Shoram, and ſixty-one ſouth of London. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 50. 50. N.

BRIGNIOLES, a town of France, in Provence, remarkable for its prunes; is ſeated among mountains, in an agreeable country, three hundred and twenty-five miles from Paris. Long. 6. 15. E. Lat. 43. 24. N.

BRILL, a town of the United Provinces, and capital of the iſland Voorn; is ſeated on the mouth of the Meuſe, and forms a very good harbour, that will hold two hundred veſſels at a time. It is a handſome well peopled town, ſeated in a territory that produces good wheat, but the air is very indifferent. It was in this place that the confederates of the United Provinces laid the firſt foundation of their republic, which happened rather by chance than any premeditated deſign. For ſome being driven from the Low Countries by the duke of Alva, they ſought for refuge in England, where they equipped a fleet of about forty ſail, under the command of count Lumay, with which they ſcoured the ſea. On the complaint of the duke of Alva to queen Elizabeth, they were refuſed a retreat into the Engliſh ports; upon which they retired to Enkhuiſe, and took three ſhips of Antwerp, richly laden, and another of Biſcay. From thence they went to the iſland of Voorn, where Brill is ſeated, and attacking the town, became maſters of it. Then they pillaged the churches and convents all round, and broke the images: after which, they fortified the town, and made it the firſt aſſylum of their liberty. This gave an opportunity to the prince of Orange to execute his deſigns. It is fourteen miles ſouth-weſt of Rotterdam, and twelve ſouth of Delft. Long. 3. 56. E. Lat. 51. 53. N.

BRILL (MATTHEW and PAUL) two celebrated painters, natives of Antwerp. Matthew was born in 1550, he ſtudied at Rome, and was eminent for his performances in hiſtory and landſcapes, in the galleries of the Vatican. He was employed by pope Gregory XIII. and died in 1584.

Paul, who was born in 1554, followed his brother Matthew to Rome, and painted in conjunction with him. After his deceaſe, he brought himſelf into credit by his landſcapes; his lateſt are more pleaſant, more noble, and painted with a better guſto than his earlier productions. He was much in favour with pope Sixtus V. and his ſucceſſor Clement VIII. and painted the famous piece about ſixty feet long, in which St. Clement is caſt into the ſea, with an anchor about his neck. He died in 1626, at ſeventy-two years of age.

BRILLON (PETER JAMES) a celebrated advocate in the parliament of Paris, in which city he was born, on the 15th of January, 1671. He wrote ſeveral works, the principal of which is, The Dictionary of Arrets, or the Juriſprudence of the Parliaments of France; the beſt edition of this work is that of 1727, in ſix volumes, folio.

BRINDISI, an ancient celebrated town of Italy, in the Terra d'Otranto, and kingdom of Naples, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It has a caſtle built in the ſea, at the entrance of the port, which is extremely ſtrong, and is alſo defended by two forts. Its territory has whole foreſts of olive trees. It is thirty-three miles eaſt of Tarento, forty-five north-weſt of Otranto, and fifty-three ſouth-eaſt of Bari. Long. 18. 5. E. Lat. 40. 52. N.

BRINN, a ſtrong town of Bohemia, in Moravia. It is pretty large, and well built; the aſſembly of the ſtates is held alternately there and at Olmutz. The caſtle of Spilberg is on an eminence, out of the town, and is its principal defence. It was inveſted by the king of Pruſſia, in 1742, but he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. It is near the river Swart, twenty-four miles north-eaſt of Znaim, twenty-eight ſouth-weſt of Olmutz, and fifty north of Vienna. Long. 16. 20. E. Lat. 49. 14. N.

BRINVILLIERS (MARY MARGARET D'AUBRAY, marchioneſs of) famous for her horrid crimes, was the daughter of M. Dreux d'Aubray, lieutenant civil at Paris. She was of a middling ſtature, and of an advantageous perſon, that ſeemed to expreſs the characters of virtue, adorned with all the graces of her ſex. Deceived by this outſide, the marquiſs de Brinvilliers, the ſon of M. de Gobelin, preſident of the chamber of accounts, who was colonel of the regiment of Normandy, married her, and ſoon after introduced into his family a captain of horſe, who was a baſtard ſon of a nobleman, and took the name of St. Croix. The lady, charmed with this viſitor, ſoon obtained a ſeparation from her huſband, and had her fortune returned. She then lived in the moſt ſcandalous manner with her lover; but though her huſband made no public complaint of it, the lieutenant civil, enraged at his daughter's conduct, cauſed St. Croix to be arreſted in the marchioneſs's coach, and confined in the baſtile above a year. He there became acquainted with an Italian, named Exili, who was remarkably ſkilled in poiſons, and St. Croix, becoming his pupil, ſoon ſurpaſſed his maſter. On his being ſet at liberty, he took the Italian with him, and ſoon communicated all he knew to his miſtreſs.

The marchioneſs, enchanted with thoſe wonderful ſecrets, became reconciled to her father, in order to make him the victim, and St. Croix ſhared in her crimes, in hopes of obtaining a ſhare of his fortune. He compoſed poiſons, and the marchioneſs tried them on the ſick in the hoſpital of the Hotel Dieu. Under the pretence of aſſiſting them, ſhe gave them poiſoned biſcuits, and attentively watched the progreſs of the poiſon. She alſo, at her own houſe, poiſoned ſeveral other perſons with pigeon-pies, which occaſioned the death of ſome whom ſhe had no deſign to kill; and likewiſe made an attempt upon her chamber-maid, to whom ſhe gave a ſlice of ham, but ſhe recovered after a long illneſs. This poiſon appeared too weak for the lieutenant civil; ſhe therefore compoſed a ſtronger, and gave it her father in ſome ſoop ſhe prepared for him, at his country ſeat at Offement. Mr. d'Aubray was ſucceeded in his poſt by his eldeſt ſon, and into his ſervice the marchioneſs introduced one named Lachauſée, a domeſtic of St. Croix. The new lieutenant-civil going into the country in 1670, with his brother, a counſellor of the parliament, and ſix of his friends, they ate of a poiſoned pie. The lieutenant became conſumptive, and died two months after, and Lachauſée concealed his guilt with ſuch care, that though the counſellor did not ſurvive his brother ſix weeks, he left that monſter a hundred crowns.

The marchioneſs, who had now no other obſtacle but her huſband, poiſoned him in order to marry her lover; but St. Croix not chuſing to marry a woman as wicked as himſelf, gave him antidotes, and he lived in ſpite of his wife, to be a witneſs of her puniſhment. Mean while St. Croix fell a victim to his horrid art; for one day, while he was preparing poiſon for the deſtruction of others, the glaſs maſk he wore to ſecure himſelf from the poiſonous vapours, falling off, he was ſuffocated. No body had the leaſt ſuſpicion of him, but as no heir appeared, the commiſſary put his ſeal on his apartment, and afterwards, on examining his effects, there was found his ſtrong box, and a note to the following effect: "I humbly intreat thoſe into whoſe "hands this box ſhall fall, to do me the favour to give it "into the marchioneſs de Brinvilliers own hands, with "every thing it contains, but if ſhe be dead before me, to "burn it, and all within it, without opening or removing "any thing, &c. This is my laſt will, made at Paris, "May 22, 1672. St. Croix." The commiſſary laughed at this will, and cauſing the ſtrong box to be opened, it was found to contain ſeveral packets, filled with a moſt ſubtile kind of poiſon, a great number of love letters, and a promiſe of thirty thouſand livres from the marchioneſs.

The lady endeavoured, in vain, to obtain the iron cheſt, and entered a proteſt againſt the payment of the note, as being obtained by ſurpriſe, and then fled to Liege, in Weſtphalia. Had it not been for the folly of Lachauſée, the world would have been ignorant of her crimes. He had oppoſed the fixing of the ſeal, alledging, that he had ſerved St. Croix ſeven years, and that he owed him two hundred piſtoles, and a hundred crown pieces. The widow of the lieutenant civil had ſuſpected him, and now cauſed him to be ſeized; and being put to the torture, he confeſſed his crimes, declared that St. Croix had given him poiſon for the marchioneſs's brothers, and that ſhe knew of their being poiſoned, on which he was condemned to be broke alive on the wheel. This, with the marchioneſs's flight, rendered her ſuſpected, and the apothecary who furniſhed the drugs being taken up, depoſed, that the marchioneſs and St. Croix acted in concert, on which ſhe was ſentenced to be beheaded. An exempt, who was ſent to ſeize her, obtained the permiſſion of the council of Liege, but he had reaſon to fear that the people would not ſuffer the privilege of the ſacred aſylum to be violated, he therefore put on the diſguiſe of an abbé, and addreſſing the marchioneſs, ſhe accepted of him as her lover, and agreed to take a walk with him out of the city, but found company there which ſhe did not expect. The exempt having committed her to the care of eight archers, returned to the convent, and ſeized her papers, among which was an account of all her crimes. She was then taken back into France, and being tried, was ſentenced to be put to the torture, to induce her to confeſs, to make the amende honourable, to be beheaded, and afterwards burnt. The firſt part of the ſentence ſhe eſcaped by confeſſing her horrid crimes, and on the 16th of July, 1676, ſhe was beheaded, burnt entirely to aſhes, and thoſe thrown into the air.

BRIONNE, a town of France, in Normandy, ſeated on the river Rille. Long. 0. 51. E. Lat. 49. 51. N.

BRIOT (Nicholas) a native of Lorrain, and engraver of the mint to the king of France, in which kingdom he was the inventor, or at leaſt the propoſer, of coining money by a preſs, inſtead of the former manner of hammering. He was afterwards employed, both in England and Scotland, and a ſpecial commiſſion was appointed for making trial of his experience, ſkill, and induſtry, in the coinage of money at the Mint, dated at Weſtminſter June 13, 1631. Vertue ſays, that he ſaw in a private family a peach ſtone, on which was carved the head of king Charles, a full face, encompaſſed with a laurel, and, on the reverſe, St. George on horſeback, with the garter round it, and on this ſtone was Briot's cypher. The tradition of that family ſays, That the carver having been removed from the ſervice of the crown, and at laſt obtaining the place of a poor knight at Windſor, cut that curioſity to ſhew he was not ſuperannuated, nor incapable of his office, as he had been repreſented.

BRIOUDE, a town of France, in Lower Auvergne. There are two Brioudes, three quarters of a mile from each other, the one is called the Church Brioude, the other Old Brioude. The houſes are built after the antique manner, and are badly diſpoſed. The canons are all temporal lords and counts. It is in no dioceſe, but depends immediately on the pope. There are ſeveral convents; and, among the reſt, the church of St. Ferrol, which is highly celebrated. Near the Old Town is a ſtone bridge on the river Allier, which conſiſts of one arch; this is eſteemed a ſtupendous ſtructure, and is thought to be a work of the Romans. The inhabitants have no manufactures. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth of Iſſoire, twenty ſouth-eaſt of St. Flour, and two hundred and twenty-five ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 25. E. Lat. 45. 14. N.

BRIQUERAS a town in Piedmont, ſeated in the valley of Lucern, three miles from the town of that name, and four ſouth of Pignerol. It had a very ſtrong caſtle towards the latter end of the ſixteenth century, but when the French got footing in it, it was ruined, that is, before they delivered it up to the duke of Savoy in 1696. Long. 7. 24. E. Lat. 44. 41. N.

BRIQUEVILLE (Francis de) baron of Colombieres, an excellent captain in the ſixteenth century, deſcended from an ancient and noble family in Normandy. He ſignaliſed himſelf by his valour in defence of the party of the Calviniſts, and died fighting at the breach of St. Loo. in 1574, to ſacrifice his blood, as he ſaid, for the truths of the Goſpel.

BRISACH, a town of Germany, and capital of Briſgaw. It was twice in poſſeſſion of the French, but reſtored to the Houſe of Auſtria, in conſequence of treaties of peace. It was a very ſtrong place, but the fortifications have been demoliſhed. It is ſeated on the Rhine, where there is a bridge of boats, thirty-two miles ſouth of Straſburg. Long. 7. 49. E. Lat. 48. 5. N.

Brisach (New) a town of France, in Alſace, built by order of Lewis XIV. over againſt Old Briſach, and fortified by Vauban. It is a mile and a quarter from the Rhine, and thirty-two miles ſouth of Straſburg. Long. 7. 46. E. Lat. 48. 5. N.

BRISEIS, or Hippodamia, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Briſeis, and wife of Mynes, king of Lyrneſſa. After Achilles had taken that city, and killed her huſband, ſhe became his captive; that hero loved her tenderly, but Agamemnon taking her from him, ſhe became the accidental cauſe of numberleſs diſorders in the Grecian army. Achilles retired to his tent, and, till the death of Patroclus, refuſed to fight againſt the Trojans. The reſentment of this prince is finely painted in the Iliad.

BRISGAW, a territory of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, on the eaſtern banks of the Rhine, about fifty miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The principal places are Old Briſach, New Briſach, Freyburgh, Rhinmarck, and an iſland in the Rhine.

BRISSOT (Peter) one of the ableſt phyſicians of the ſixteenth century, was born at Fontenai le Comte, in Poitou. He ſtudied at Paris, and having taken his doctor's degree, bent his thoughts to the reforming of phyſic, by reſtoring the precepts of Hippocrates and Galen, and exploding the maxims of the Arabians: to this purpoſe he publicly explained Galen's works, inſtead of thoſe of Avicenna, Rhaſis, and Meſſue. He afterwards reſolved to travel to acquire the knowledge of plants, and going to Portugal, practiſed phyſic in the city of Ebora. His new method of bleeding in pleuriſies, on the ſide the pleuriſy was, raiſed a kind of civil war among the Portugueſe phyſicians; it was brought before the univerſity of Salamanca, who at laſt gave judgment, that the opinion aſcribed to Briſſot was the pure doctrine of Galen. The partizans of Denys, his opponent, appealed in 1529 to the emperor, to prevent the practice, as being attended with deſtructive conſequences; but Charles III. duke of Savoy, happening to die at this time of a pleuriſy, after having been bled on the oppoſite ſide, the proſecution dropped. He wrote an Apology for his Practice, but died before it was publiſhed, in 1552; but Anthony Luceus, his friend, printed it at Paris three years after. Renatus Moreau procured a new edition of it at Paris in 1622, and annexed to it a treatiſe, entitled, De Miſſione Sanguinis in Pleuritide, together with the Life of Briſſot.

BRISTOL, a city and ſea-port town, which ſtands partly in Glouceſterſhire, and partly in Somerſetſhire, but is independent on both, it being a county of itſelf. It is generally eſteemed the ſecond city in England, for trade, wealth, and number of inhabitants, and is ſeated on the rivers Avon and Frome. The former runs through the city, and has a large ſtone bridge built over it, conſiſting of four arches, with houſes built on it on each ſide. The quay or key is on the Frome, over which there is a draw-bridge for the conveniency of ſhips coming up to load and unload, which is very convenient. A little below this the Frome falls into the Avon. The ſtreets are numerous, thoſe in the city are built built very close, and those on the out parts are spacious. The goods are carried upon sledges, which renders the streets very slippery. The College Green, which is parted from the city, is a very agreeable elegant place, and being on high ground, overlooks the city; in it there is a stately high cross, which is a fine Gothic structure, with the effigies of several kings of England all round it.

The cathedral is seated here, which is a fine Gothic structure, besides eighteen parish churches, among which is St. Mary of Radcliff, which stands high, and makes a fine appearance. There are likewise several meeting-houses for Protestant dissenters. They have lately had a fine exchange built, in the room of the tolsel, where the merchants used to meet. Queen's square is a very handsome spacious place, and has the statue of king William on horseback in the middle. Besides those, there are hospitals, charity schools, woollen manufactures, glass-houses, &c. It is governed by a mayor, twelve aldermen, two sheriffs, and twenty-two common council-men, and sends two members to parliament. The hot well, a little distant from the city, is a place of great resort. The water is good in various diseases, particularly the diabetes, being a kind of natural lime water, but much more soft and pleasant. Not far from hence is a very cold bath, which is formed by water that gushes out of a rock in a great stream. In St. Vincent's rock, near the river Avon, transparent stones are found, harder than chrystal, and softer than diamonds, well known by the name of Bristol stones. There are hackney coaches to be had at Bristol on any occasion, but they do not stand in the streets to be hired, as in London. It has been said that the women who are born and brought up in this city are many of them homely and crooked, for which reason, any person that marries a citizen's daughter has his freedom, by a grant from queen Elizabeth; but, for my part, I have not perceived any great difference between this and other large towns in this respect; and as for the citizens being churlish and unpolite to strangers, it is a mere calumny. It is no wonder that merchants and tradesmen, immersed in business, should be intent in carrying it on, and not dedicate their time merely to pleasure and diversions, as too many do in other places, which perhaps some observing, have made this false conclusion. However, there is no reasonable entertainment wanting to unbend the mind, and give it a relish for the pleasurable part of life. They have a great fair on St. James's day, which is frequented by tradesmen from all parts of the kingdom. They have also another on January 25, for most sorts of goods. It has a market on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. The number of houses are reckoned at nine thousand, and the inhabitants at seventy thousand. It is a bishop's see, created since the dissolution of the monasteries. It is fifty-one miles south of Hereford, one hundred and five south of Shrewsbury, one hundred and forty-five south of Chester, seventy-five west-south-west of Banbury, nineteen north-by-east of Wells, seventy-eight north-east of Exeter, thirty-six south-south-west of Gloucester, sixty-two south-south-west of Worcester, sixty-eight west-by-south of Oxford, and one hundred and seventeen west of London. Long. 2. 40. W. Lat. 51. 27. N.

BRISTOL (NEW) a town of Pensylvania, the capital of the county of Bucks, and seated on Delaware river, twenty miles north of Philadelphia. Long. 75. 10. W. Lat. 40. 45 N.

BRITAIN (GREAT). See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, & WALES. We shall only observe here that the length of Great Britain, from Dunnet Head in Scotland, to Dartmouth in England, is five hundred and seventy measured miles, or four hundred and ninety geographical miles; and that from Harwich in England, to St. David's in Wales, is three hundred and six measured, or two hundred and sixty-six geographical miles, supposing they are computed in a direct line. But if we go as strait as we can along the road, it is three hundred and ninety-six measured miles, from New Haven in Sussex, to Berwick upon Tweed, which is the length of England only; and from Harwich in Essex, to the Land's End in Coornwall, three hundred and seventy-one. But if it be measured directly across, from Malden in Essex, to St. David's in Wales, it is not much above three hundred miles.

BRITAIN, (NEW) or LABRADOR, lies to the north of the river and gulph of St. Laurence. It has been said, that the natural inhabitants of America are all of a copper colour, and without beards; but the inhabitants of this country are an exception to this, though not properly, for it is very plain they come from Greenland, they having both the same customs, cloathing, and aspect, as will plainly appear by reading the first voyages to the Icy Seas. These people, who are called Eskimaux, are so covered, that you can hardly see any part of their faces, or the ends of their fingers. Their cloathing is a kind of shirt, made of bladders or the guts of fish, cut into long slips, and sewed together. They have a kind of cassock of bear-skin, or of some other wild beast, or even bird, and a capuchin of the same materials as their shirts, which covers their heads, from the top of which proceeds a lock of hair, which falls over their foreheads. The shirt reaches down to their loins, aud the cassock hangs down behind to their thighs, and before terminates in a point a little below the girdle. But in women it reaches down all round to the middle of the leg, and they keep it close with a girdle, to which little bones are tied by way of ornament. The men have breeches of skins, with the hair on the inside, which are covered without with ermine, or such like skins. They have also stockings of skins, with the hair inwards, and boots on them, with the hair in like manner, and then another pair of breeches and boots. Their arrows are pointed with the teeth of sea-cows, and iron when they can get it. In the summer time they lie in the open air night and day, but in the winter they lodge in caves all together, without distinction.

The eskimaux have a large beard, which reaches up to their eyes, insomuch, that you can hardly discover any of their features. They have a savage look, a wildness in their eyes, large strong teeth, hair generally black, but some flaxen, which is always in great disorder, and the whole external appearance is very brutal. With regard to their manner, they are fierce, unsociable, and untractable. Their shape, size, and make, are well enough, and their skins as white as ours, which Charlevoix attributes to their wearing cloaths. But it is a great mistake, for I have seen native Indian women in Virginia, who had been cloathed from their infancy, with skins exactly of the colour of red copper. These people are but few, and yet they ramble over the vast tract of land that lies between Canada, the River St. Laurence, and the North Sea. Some of them have been seen in Newfoundland, but they spend their summer in Labrador.

BRITANNICUS, the son of the emperor Claudius and Messalina, was excluded from the empire, on his father's marrying Agrippina, for that princess set her son Nero on the throne, who poisoned Britannicus, A. D. 55.

BRITANNICUS (JOHN) one of the best Italian critics of the fifteenth century, was born at Palazzola, near Brescia, in Italy, and assumed the name of Britannicus, from his ancestors being natives of Britain. He published, among other works, Notes on Perseus, Terence, Statius, Ovid, and Juvenal, and died in 1510.

BRITTANY, or BRETAGNE, a considerable province of France. See BRETAGNE.

BRIVES-LA-GALLARD, a town of France, in Lower Limosin. It stands in a fruitful plain, opposite an island formed by the river Coreze, over which there are two handsome bridges. It is thirty-seven miles east of Limoges, and two hundred and ninety south of Paris. Long. 1. 45. E. Lat. 45. 15. N.

BRIXEN (the Bishoprick of) is seated in the Tirol, near the frontiers of Friuli and Carinthia, towards the east. The bishop has a vote and seat in the diet of the empire, and furnishes his contignent when any tax is laid on Tirol. The principal places are Brixen, Sertzingen, Breuneck, and Lientz.

BRIXEN, the capital of the bishoprick of the same name, and where the bishop commonly resides, is seated on the river Eisache, at some distance from the mountain Brenner. It is surrounded with mountains, where there are plenty of vineyards, which yield good red wine. It is a populous town, and the houses are well built with piazzas, and are painted on the outside. The public buildings are very handsome, and there are several spacious squares. It is much frequented, on account of the mineral waters that are near it. Long. 11. 50. E. Lat. 46. 35. N.

BROCARDY (JAMES) an apocalyptic or prophetical author, and one of the enthusiasts of the sixteenth century, was born at Venise. He embraced the Protestant religion, discovered great zeal against popery, and published several books in Holland, in which he asserted, that the several events of the sixteenth century had been foretold by the prophets, and after having applied the Scriptures, as his fancy directed, to past transactions, he took the liberty to apply them to future occurrences, and prophesied, that by virtue of such and such passages, this or the other thing would happen to queen Elizabeth, to the prince of Orange, and to Philip II. He was living in 1594. Among his other works, he published a Commentary on the Revelations, and a mystical and prophetical Explication of Leviticus. The Catholic writers abused Brocardy as an impostor, and a promoter of wars and insurrections; but tho' he might have been the cause of disturbances, he does not appear to have been a knavish impostor. He is said to have had otherwise an excellent character, and to have sincerely believed what he taught. Being unable to answer the objections made against his system, he at last promised to meddle no more with prophecies.

BRODEAU (JOHN) in Latin Brodæus, a learned critic, and canon of Tours, the place of his birth. His chief works are, 1. A Commentary on the Anthologia. 2. Ten Books of Miſcellanies. 3. Notes on Oppian, Euripides, &c. He died in 1563, aged ſixty-three.

BROD, a town of Hungary, and county of Poſſega, in Sclavonia, ſeated on the river Save. It was once more conſiderable than at preſent. It is memorable for the victory over the Turks in 1688. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Poſſega, and twenty-eight eaſt of Gradiſca. Long. 18. 36. Lat. 45. 20. N.

BRODRA, a town of Aſia, in the empire of the great mogul. It ſtands in a large ſandy plain, on the little river Waſſet, and is well fortified after the old way, with pretty good walls and towers. It is inhabited by Banians and callico weavers. The country about it produces plenty of gum lack and indigo. It is fifty miles from Cambaya, and fifty-five from Amadabat. Long. 72. 30. E. Lat. 22. 10. N.

BROEKHUIZEN (JOHN) in Latin Janus Broukhuſius, a man of learning and a ſoldier, was born at Amſterdam, on the 20th of Nov. 1646. After being ſeveral years with an apothecary, he entered into the army, where he behaved with ſuch bravery, that he was raiſed to the rank of captain. He publiſhed ſeveral Latin pieces, among which are, 1. His Poems, in ſixteen books. 2. All the entire Latin Works of Actius Sincerus Sannazarius, of Naples, with notes. 3. Sextus Aurelius Propertius's four books of Elegies, with notes, &c. He died at Amſterdam, on the 15th of December, in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

BROKE, or BROOKE, (ſir ROBERT) an eminent lawyer, was the ſon of Thomas Brooke, of Claverly, in Shropſhire, where he was born, and was at length educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple, and became one of the greateſt lawyers of his time. In 1552 he was called to be ſerjeant at law, and in 1553, the firſt year of queen Mary, he was made lord chief juſtice of the common pleas, about which time he was knighted. He was not only eſteemed a great man in his profeſſion, but had likewiſe a good character for integrity and juſtice, both at the bar and bench. He wrote, 1. An Abſtract of the Year-Books till the time of Queen Mary. 2. Certain Caſes adjudged in the Time of Henry VIII. Edward VI. and Queen Mary. 3. Readings on the Statute of Limitations, made in the 3d Henry VIII. Sir Robert died in 1558.

BROME (ALEXANDER) a poet and attorney in the lord-mayor's court, in the reign of Charles II. was the author of a number of ſongs, madrigals, epigrams, and other little pieces of poetry. His ſongs were much ſung by the Cavaliers, and their tunes played by every fidler; but the loyalty and the tune appear to have been the chief recommendation of theſe compoſitions. His moſt conſiderable performance is a Tranſlation of Horace. He died in June, 1666, to the great regret of all his friends, who loſt a very agreeable companion.

BROMLEY, a town in Kent, with a market on Thurſdays, and two fairs, on February 3, and Auguſt 5, for horſes, bullocks, ſheep, and hogs. It is ſeated on the river Ravenſburn, five miles eaſt of Croydon, and nine ſouth-by-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 5. E. Lat. 51. 23. N.

BROMLEY (ABBOTS) a town in Staffordſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, and three fairs, on Thurſday before Midlent Sunday, May 22, and Auguſt 24, for horſes and horned cattle. It is a very poor town, ſeated in a barren ſpot of land, and its market is very mean. It is twelve miles eaſt of Stafford, twelve north of Litchfield, and one hundred and thirty north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 45. W. Lat. 52. 45. N.

BROMSGROVE, a town in Worceſterſhire, with a market on Tueſday, and two fairs, on June 24, and October 1, for linen, cloth, cheeſe, and horſes. It is a pretty good town, ſeated on the river Salwarp, being well inhabited by clothiers, and the market is large for corn, cattle, and all ſorts of proviſions. It is ten miles ſouth-weſt of Kidderminſter, twenty-four ſouth-weſt of Bridgenorth, eleven eaſt-north-eaſt of Worceſter, twenty-ſix ſouth-weſt of Coventry, and one hundred and ſixteen north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 5. W. Lat. 52. 26. N.

BROMYARD, a town of Herefordſhire, with a market on Mondays; and five fairs, on Thurſday before March 2, for horned cattle and horſes; on May 3. Whit-Monday, Thurſday before July 25, and Thurſday before October 29, for black cattle and ſheep. It is ſeated on a riſing ground, containing about two hundred houſes, and the market is good for cattle and corn. It is twelve miles weſt of Worceſter, and one hundred and twenty-five weſt-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 46. W. Lat. 52. 20. N.

BRON, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Milan, and in the Paveſan, where the Imperialiſts had the advantage over the French in 1703. It is ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Pavia. Long. 10. 0. E. Lat. 44. 50. N.

BRONCHORST (EVERARD) a celebrated civilian, was born at Daventer, and taught civil law at Wittemberg, Erfort, and Leyden. He wrote ſeveral works, and died in the laſt mentioned town in 1627, at ſeventy-three years of age. His father, who was named John Bronchorſt, was a learned mathematician, born at Nimeguen, and alſo wrote ſeveral works.

BRONTES, in fabulous hiſtory, one of the Cyclops, who worked at Vulcan's forge, and was thus named from his forging Jupiter's thunderbolts.

BRONTEUS, in Pagan mythology, one of the names which the Greeks gave to Jupiter, from the word Βροντὴ, which ſignifies thunder, whence the Latins called him thundering Jupiter. Some have alſo given the ſame name to Bacchus, on account of the noiſe and miſchief which attend drunkenneſs.

BRONTIUM, Βρονθεῖον, in Grecian antiquity, a place under the floor of the theatres, in which were brazen veſſels filled with ſtones and other materials, with which they imitated the noiſe of thunder.

BRONZINO (AGNOLO) an able Italian painter, excelled more particularly in portraits, and died in Florence about the year 1570.

BROOK (RALPH, or RAFE) eſq. York herald, and a ſkilful antiquary, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. This gentleman diſcovered many errors, in relation to pedigrees, in Camden's Britannia, which he offered to communicate to the author, but his offer was waved, and he was ſupercilioufly treated. Upon this, urged by perſonal reſentment, he ſedulouſly applied himſelf to a thorough examination of that celebrated work, and publiſhed a diſcovery of the errors which he found in the fourth edition of it. This book, in which Mr. Camden is treated with very little ceremony, or even common decency, was of great uſe to him in the fifth edition, publiſhed in 1600. Mr. Brook died on the 15th of October, 1625, aged ſeventy-three; and about a century after his deceaſe was publiſhed, in quarto, his ſecond Diſcovery of Errors, to which his head is prefixed.

BROSSARD (SEBASTIAN DE) a famous French muſician, who wrote, in French, a Muſical Dictionary, a Diſſertation on the new Method of writing Muſic, two books of Motets, a Collection of Airs, &c. He died in 1730, at about ſeventy years of rge.

BROSSE (JAMES) a famous ſoldier in the ſixteenth century, born in the dukedom of Bourbon. It is ſaid that he was thirty when he began to carry arms, but ſoon became ſkilful in the military art, and gained the eſteem of Francis of Lorrain, duke of Guiſe, who raiſed him to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He and his ſon were both killed at the battle of Dreux, in 1562.

BROSSIER (MARTHA) a pretended dæmoniac, who had like to have been the occaſion of great troubles in France, towards the end of the ſixteenth century. Her father, who was a weaver of Romorantin, found it more convenient to ramble about with his three daughters, one of whom knew how to make a thouſand contorſions, than to keep cloſe to his trade. He therefore went up and down the neighbouring towns, and ſhewed his daughter as one that was poſſeſſed, and ſtood in great need of the exorciſms of the church. An incredible multitude of people got together to ſee this ſpectacle, but the fraud being diſcovered in the country, they removed to Paris, and made choice of the church of St. Genevive for the ſcene of this comedy, when a great conteſt aroſe between the Capuchins and phyſicians, on the reality of the poſſeſſion. At laſt, there being room to apprehend that this girl might be inſtructed to make anſwers capable of exciting a ſedition, the king and parliament took the affair in hand, and, by a decree, at once caſt out the devil.

BROUAGE, a town of France, in Saintonge, with a harbour. It conſiſts of five or ſix ſtreets, which terminate in the great ſquare. It is famous for its ſalt works, which are the fineſt in the kingdom. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth of Rochelle, and two hundred and ſeventy ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 0. W. Lat. 45. 50. N.

BROUERSHAVEN, a port-town of the United Provinces, in the province of Zealand, and iſland of Schouen, ſeated on a bay of the ſea, on the north ſide of the iſland, nine miles ſouth-weſt of Helvoetſluys. Long. 3. 35. E. Lat. 51. 50. N.

BROUGH, a town of Weſtmoreland, with a market on Wedneſday, and one fair, on the Thurſday before Whitſunday, for horned cattle and ſheep. It is ſeated under Stanmore hill, and was formerly of great note, being a Roman fortreſs, but it is now ſo much decayed, that it is little better than a village. It is five miles north of Kirby-Steven, thirty-ſeven ſouth-eaſt of Carliſle, and two hundred and ſixty-one north-north-weſt of London. Long. 17. 50. E. Lat. 54. 40. N.

BROUGHTON (HUGH) an Engliſh divine of great learning. When a youth, he had an agreeable and promiſing aſpect, pect, and being travelling on foot on the northern road, was accoſted by the celebrated Bernard Gilpin, who aſked him whither he was going; he told him to Oxford, in order to be a ſcholar. Mr. Gilpin was ſo pleaſed with his appearance, and the quickneſs of his replies, that he took him with him to his own houſe, placed him in the ſchool which he had founded, ſuperintended his education, and at length ſent him to Chriſt's college, in Cambridge. He was particularly famous for Biblical learning, and his writings in that kind, particularly his Conſent of Times, ſhew him to have been an uncommon genius. He has, however, been very juſtly cenſured by the reverend Mr. Gilpin, for his ingratitude to his excellent patron, whom he endeavoured to ſupplant in the rectory of Houghton in the Spring. He wrote ſeveral other books, particularly a Commentary on the Apocalypſe, and the Prophet Daniel. He was warmly attached to the diſcipline of the church of England, and vigorouſly condemned that of the Preſbyterians. He died in 1612.

BROUNCKER, or BROUNKER, (WILLIAM) lord viſcount of Caſtle-Lyons, in Ireland, and the firſt preſident of the Royal Society, was the ſon of ſir William Brounker, knt. and born about the year 1620. He was diſtinguiſhed by his knowledge of the mathematics, and by the conſiderable poſts of honour and profit he enjoyed after the Reſtoration, for he had at the ſame time the office of chancellor to the queen, and the keeping of her great ſeal, that of one of the commiſſioners of the navy, and maſter of St. Catherine's hoſpital, near the Tower of London. He wrote, 1. Experiments of the recoiling of Guns. 2. An algebraical Paper upon the Squaring of the Hyperbola; and ſeveral Letters to Dr. Uſher, archbiſhop of Armagh. He died on the 5th of April, 1684, aged ſixty-four.

BROUSSON (CLAUDIUS) a famous Proteſtant advocate, born at Niſmes in 1647, pleaded at Toulouſe with reputation; but in 1683, receiving into his houſe the deputies of the reformed churches, where it was agreed to continue preaching, even tho' their churches ſhould be demoliſhed, he became apprehenſive of danger, retired to Niſmes, being afraid of being ſeized, he went to Geneva, from thence to Lauſanne. From this time he was inceſſantly travelling from city to city, and from province to province, and was ſometimes in France, and at others in Holland or in Germany, every where diſperſing writings by which he endeavoured to comfort and keep up his party; but being at laſt ſeized at Oleron, on the 19th of September, 1698, he was ſent to Montpellier, where he was inhumanly broke alive upon the wheel, on the 4th of November following. He wrote many works in favour of the Calviniſts.

BROUWER (ADRIAN) an eminent painter, born at Haerlem, in the year 1608. Frans Hals took him from begging in the ſtreets, and inſtructed him in the rudiments of painting; but, in return for this high obligation, Brouwer no ſooner found himſelf qualified to get a livelihood than he ran away from his maſter, went to France, and ſoon returning ſettled at Antwerp. His proper ſphere was works of humour, and he uſed to repreſent, in little pieces, his pot-companions, drinking, ſmoaking, gaming, fighting, &c which he performed with a pencil ſo free and tender, with ſo much of nature in his expreſſion, ſuch excellent drawing in all the parts, and good keeping in the whole, that none of his countrymen have ever been comparable to him on that ſubject. In his cups he was merry and facetious, and ſcorning to work while he had money in his pocket, he, by the help of wine and brandy, brought himſelf to the grave in the year 1638, at thirty years of age. He was ſo poor, that contributions were raiſed for laying him privately in the ground; but it is ſaid, that Rubens, who admired his genius, cauſed him to be ſoon after taken up, and gave his body a very handſome interment.

BROWER (CHRISTOPHER) a learned Jeſuit, born at Arnheim, obtained the eſteem of cardinal Baronius, and many other perſons of diſtinguiſhed learning. He publiſhed the Annals of Treves, an edition of Venantius Fortunatus, and other works, and died in 1617, aged fifty-eight.

BROWN (ROBERT) an Engliſh divine of the ſixteenth and beginning of the ſeventeeth centuries, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his being the founder of the ſect of the Browniſts, was nearly related to the lord treaſurer Cecil, and was the ſon of Anthony Brown, of Tolthorp, in Rutlandſhire, eſq. He was born at Northampton, and educated at Cambridge, and was afterwards a ſchool-maſter in Southwark. About the year 1580, he began to inveigh openly againſt the diſcipline and ceremonies of the church of England, and the next year preached theſe doctrines at Norwich, for which he was convened before Dr. Freak, biſhop of Norwich, and other eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, who committed him to the cuſtody of the ſheriff of Norwich, but he was ſoon after releaſed by the interpoſition of the lord treaſurer Burleigh. After this, he ſettled at Middleburgh, in Zealand, where he and his followers obtained leave of the ſtates to worſhip God their own way; but returning to England about the year 1585, and labouring to promote his ſect at Northampton, the biſhop of Peterborough ſent him a citation to come before him, which he refuſing to obey, he was excommunicated; when, it is ſaid, that he was ſo deeply affected with the ſolemnity of this cenſure, that he made his ſubmiſſion, moved for abſolution, and received it; and renouncing his principles of ſeparation, was, in the year 1590, preferred to the rectory of a church in Northamptonſhire; but others ſay, that he never formally recanted his errors, either by word or writing. He wrote a work intitled A Treatiſe of Reformation without tarrying for any Man, and other pieces. When he was above eighty years of age, he was committed to Northampton goal, where he ſoon after died, in 1630, after affirming that he had been committed to thirty-two priſons, in ſome of which he could not ſee his hand at noon day. His works are printed in a ſmall thin quarto.

BROWN (THOMAS) an humourous writer in the laſt century, was the ſon of a conſiderable farmer of Shiffnall, in Shropſhire. He received the firſt part of his education at Newport ſchool, in that county, where he attained a knowledge of the Latin, Greek, French, Italian, and Spaniſh languages; and from thence removed to Chriſt-church college, Oxford; but ſome little irregularities in his life would not ſuffer him to ſtay long at the univerſity; and without acquainting his father with his deſign, he, on the receipt of a ſum of money, intended for the promotion of his ſtudies, left Oxford and came to London, though his father intended to educate him for one of the learned profeſſions. His money being ſpent, and he ſlighted by his pretended friends, he wrote an humble epiſtle to his father for a ſupply, but with what ſucceſs we are not informed. However, he was ſoon after ſchool-maſter of Kingſton upon Thames; but being impatient under a recluſe life, he abandoned this employment, and returned to London, where he had no other recourſe, but writing for the bookſellers. His firſt piece was an Account of the Converſion of Mr. Bays, wrote by way of dialogue, which met with a very favourable reception, and made his company greatly coveted; but though it might have recommended him to the great as well as the ingenious, yet he was of a temper that would not admit of his chuſing his acquaintance by intereſt, and he ſlighted every opportunity of recommending himſelf to thoſe who might have advanced his fortune. He was of a careleſs, gay, and lazy temper, negligent in the choice of his companions, who were frequently the moſt mean and deſpicable, and though in other reſpects a good-natured man, would rather loſe his friend than his joke. He was particularly fond of ſcandal; and whenever he could find occaſion dealt it out liberally, and neither friend nor foe could eſcape, when he was ſeized with the humour of abuſe. His whole works, conſiſting of dialogues, eſſays, declamations, ſatires, letters from the dead to the living, tranſlations, &c. are printed in four volumes, duodecimo. In ſhort, Tom Brown died in the year 1704, and was interred in the cloiſter of Weſtminſter abbey, near the remains of Mrs. Behn.

BROWN (ULYSSES MAXIMILIAN) a celebrated general, of the eighteen century, count of the Holy Roman Empire, field-marſhal of the armies of their imperial majeſties, and knight of the golden fleece, was a ſon of Ulyſſes, baron Brown and Camus, colonel of a regiment of cuiraſſiers, in the emperor's ſervice, and of one of the moſt ancient and noble families in Ireland. He was born at Baſil, on the 24th of October, 1705, and having finiſhed his firſt ſtudies at Limerick, in Ireland, was, in 1715, ſent for into Hungary, by count George Brown, his uncle, member of the aulic council of war, and colonel of a regiment of infantry. He was preſent at the famous battle of Belgrade, in 1717, and the year following followed his uncle into Italy, who made him continue his ſtudies, in the Clementine college, at Rome, till the year 1721, when he was ſent to Prague, in order to learn the civil law. At the end of the year 1723, he became captain in his uncle's regiment, and in 1725, lieutenant-colonel; in 1730, he went into Corſica with a battalion of his regiment, and contributed greatly to the taking of Callanfara, where he received a conſiderable wound in his thigh; in 1732, the emperor made him chamberlain; and the ſame year, he came into England, to claim the rich inheritance of the lordſhip of Mountany, of which he was the only heir, by the death of his grandfather on the mother's ſide, James Fitzgerald, earl of Deſmond, in Ireland; but a war breaking out in Germany, obliged him to return thither before he had obtained it. He was raiſed to the rank of colonel in 1734, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much in the war of Italy, eſpecially at the battles of Parma and Guaſtalla, and in burning in the preſence of the French army, the bridge which the marſhal de Noailles had cauſed to be thrown over the Adige, that he was made general in 1736. The following year he favoured the retreat of the army, after the unhappy battle of Banjaluca in Boſnia, Boſnia, by an excellent manœuvre, and ſaved all the baggage. His admirable conduct upon this occaſion, was rewarded by his obtaining a ſecond regiment of infantry, vacant by the death of count Francis de Wallis. On the 4th of July, 1738, he likewiſe diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Cornea, in Hungary.

At his return to Vienna, in 1739, the emperor Charles VI. raiſed him to the rank of general-field-marſhal-lieutenant, and made him counſellor in the Aulic council of war. After the death of that prince, the king of Pruſſia entering Sileſia, count Brown, with a ſmall body of troops, diſputed the country with him inch by inch. He commanded the infantry of the right wing of the Auſtrian army, at the battle of Molwitz, and, though wounded, made an honourable retreat. In 1742 he went into Bohemia, and commanded the infantry at the engagement of Sahai, near Budweis, when prince Lobkowitz repulſed the French, commanded by marſhal Broglio. The following year, the queen of Hungary made him a privy-counſellor, at her coronation in Bohemia. He at length paſſed into Bavaria, where he commanded the van-guard of the Auſtrian army, ſeized Deckendorf, with a great quantity of baggage, and obliged the French to abandon the banks of the Danube, which the Auſtrian army paſſed in full ſecurity; and the ſame year, viz. in 1743, the queen of Hungary ſent him to Worms, in quality of her plenipotentiary to the king of England, where he put the laſt hand to the treaty of alliance between the courts of Vienna, London, and Turin. In 1744 he followed prince Lobkowitz into Italy, took the city of Veletri, on the 4th of Auguſt, in ſpite of the ſuperior numbers of the enemy, entered their camp, overthrew ſeveral regiments, and took many priſoners. The following year he was recalled into Bavaria, where he took the town of Wilſhofen, by aſſault, and received a dangerous ſhot in the thigh. The ſame year he was made general of the artillery, and in January, 1746, marched for Italy, at the head of a body of eighteen thouſand men. He then drove the Spaniards out of the Milaneſe, and having joined the forces under prince de Lichtenſtein, commanded the left wing of the Auſtrian army, at the battle of Placentia, on the 15th of June, 1746, and defeated the right wing of the enemy's forces, commanded by marſhal de Maillebois. After this victory, he commanded in chief the army againſt the Genoeſe, ſeized the paſs of Boſetta or Bochetta, though defended by above four thouſand men, and took the city of Genoa. Count Brown at length joined the king of Sardinia's troops, and took, in conjunction with him, Mont-Alban, and the county of Nice. On the 30th of November he paſſed the Var, in ſpite of the French troops, entered Provence, and took the iſles of St. Margaret and St. Honorat, and thought to have rendered himſelf maſter of a much greater part of Provence, when the revolution, which happened in Genoa, and marſhal de Belleiſle's advancing with his army, obliged him to make that fine retreat, which procured him the admiration and eſteem of all perſons ſkilled in war. He employed the reſt of the year 1747, in defending the ſtates of the houſe of Auſtria in Italy, and after the peace in 1748, he was ſent to Nice, to regulate there, in conjunction with the duke of Belliſle and the marquis de las Minas, the differences that had ariſen with reſpect to the execution of ſome of the articles of the definitive treaty of Aix la Chapelle.

The empreſs queen, to reward theſe ſignal ſervices, eſpecially his glorious campaigns in Italy, in 1749, made him governor of Tranſylvania, where he rendered himſelf generally admired for his probity and diſintereſtedneſs. In 1752 he obtained the government of the city of Prague, with the chief command of the troops in that kingdom; and in 1753 the king of Poland, elector of Saxony, honoured him with the collar of the order of the white eagle, and the next year he was declared field marſhal.

The king of Pruſſia entering Saxony in 1756, and attacking Bohemia, count Brown marched againſt him, repulſed that prince at the battle of Loboſitz, on the firſt of October, tho' he had only twenty-ſix thouſand eight hundred men, and the king of Pruſſia had at leaſt forty thouſand. Seven days after this battle he undertook the famous march into Saxony, to deliver the Saxon troops, ſhut up between Pirna and Konigſtein, an action worthy of the greateſt captains, ancient or modern. He at length obliged the Pruſſians to retire from Bohemia, for which he was rewarded, by being made a knight of the golden fleece. Soon after count Brown haſtily aſſembled an army in Bohemia, to oppoſe the king of Pruſſia, who had again penetrated into that kingdom, at the head of all his forces, and on the ſixth of May fought the famous battle of Prague, in which, while he was employed in giving his orders for maintaining the advantages he had gained over the Pruſſians, he was ſo dangerouſly wounded, that he was obliged to be carried to Prague, where he died of his wounds, on the 26th of June, 1757, at fifty-two years of age. There is reaſon to believe, that had he not been wounded, he would have gained the victory, as he had broke the Pruſſians, and the brave count Schwerin, one of their greateſt generals, was ſlain.

Count Brown was not only an eminent general, but an able negociator, and was well verſed in politics. He had married on the 25th of Auguſt, 1726, Maria Philippina, counteſs of Marthinitz, of an illuſtrious family in Bohemia, by whom he had two ſons; the eldeſt Philip George, born at Novara, in Italy, on the 2d of June, 1727, who is chamberlain to their imperial majeſties, and colonel-commandant of the regiment of Wallis; the youngeſt, Joſeph Maria Ulyſſes, born at Pavia, on the 17th of October, 1728, is alſo chamberlain of their imperial majeſties, knight of Malta, and colonel-commandant of his father's regiment.

BROWNE (GEORGE) the firſt archbiſhop that embraced and promoted the reformation in Ireland. He was originally an Auſtin friar, and becoming eminent for his learning and other good qualities, was made provincial of the Auſtin monks in England; but having read ſome of Luther's writings, he was wont, among other things, to inculcate into the people, that they ſhould make their applications ſolely to Chriſt, and not to the Virgin Mary or the ſaints. King Henry VIII. being informed of this, took him into his favour, and promoted him to the archbiſhoprick of Dublin, March 12, 1534-5, where, in ſpite of the oppoſition of the popiſh party, he afterwards cauſed the liturgy, compiled by order of Edward VI. to be read in the churches, and, by his zeal, activity, and excellent life, was of ſingular ſervice in promoting the Reformation. He died in 1556.

BROWNE (ſir THOMAS) an eminent phyſician and celebrated writer, was born at London, October 19, 1605, and having ſtudied at Wincheſter college, and afterwards at Oxford, travelled through France and Italy, and returning by the way of Holland, took his degree of doctor of phyſic at Leyden. In 1636, he ſettled at Norwich, and the year following was incorporated as doctor of phyſic at Oxford. His Religio Medici made a great noiſe, and being tranſlated into Latin, inſtantly ſpread throughout Europe, and gained him a prodigious reputation; it was then tranſlated into almoſt every language in Europe. This book has been heavily cenſured by ſome, as tending to infidelity, and even atheiſm; while others, with much more reaſon, have applauded the piety, as well as the parts and learning of the author. The Rev. Mr. Granger obſerves, that among other peculiarities in this book, he ſpeaks of the ultimate act of love as a folly beneath a philoſopher; and ſays, that he could be content that we might procreate, like trees, without conjunction; but after the writing of it, he deſcended from his philoſophic dignity, and married an agreeable woman. It was ſaid, that his reaſon for marrying was, becauſe he could diſcover no better method of procreation. His Treatiſe on Vulgar Errors was read with equal avidity; he alſo publiſhed Hydriotaphia, or a Diſcourſe of ſepulchral Urns lately found in Norfolk. His reputation in his profeſſion was equal to his fame for learning in other reſpects, and therefore the college of phyſicians were pleaſed to take him into their number as an honorary member; and king Charles II. coming to Norwich in his progreſs, in 1671, was pleaſed to knight him, with ſingular marks of favour and reſpect. He died on his birth-day, in 1682, leaving ſeveral manuſcripts behind him, which were publiſhed under the title of The poſthumous Works of the learned Sir Thomas Browne, Knt. M. D.

BROWNE (EDWARD) the ſon of the former, phyſician to king Charles II. and preſident of the Royal College at London. He was born in the year 1642, and ſtudied at Cambridge, and afterwards at Merton college, Oxford. He then travelled, and at his return publiſhed a brief Account of ſome Travels in Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria, Macedonia, Theſſaly, Auſtria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Friuli, &c. he alſo publiſhed an Account of ſeveral Travels through great Part of Germany; the Life of Themiſtocles; and the Life of Sertorius, &c. He died Auguſt 27, 1708, in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age.

BROWNRIG, or BROUNRIG, (RALPH) biſhop of Exeter, was born at Ipſwich in Suffolk, in the year 1592, and educated at Cambridge, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his facetious and inoffenſive wit and eloquence, and his great knowledge and ſkill in philoſophy, hiſtory, and poetry. His firſt preferments were the rectory of Barley, in Hertfordſhire, and a prebend of Ely, from which he was gradually raiſed to the ſee of Exeter, to which he was nominated in 1641; but the troubles which ſoon followed did not ſuffer him to enjoy that dignity; for he was deprived of his revenues by the parliament party, ſo that he was almoſt reduced to want. However, about a year before his deceaſe, he was invited to be a preacher at the Temple, in London. He died December 7, 1659.

BRUCKSHAL, a town of Germany, in the biſhoprick of Spires, on the river Satz, ſix miles ſouth-eaſt of Philipſ-burg, and ten north-eaſt of Doulac. Long. 8. 30. E. Lat. 49. 15. N.

BRUGES, a city of the Auſtrian Netherlands, capital of the territory of Bruges, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in a plain, eight miles from the ſea, and has a great number of canals, made for the benefit of trade, one of which leads to Ghent, another to Oſtend, another to Sluys, to Newport, to Furnes, to Ypres, and to Dunkirk, which you may reach in a day in the ſummer-time. All the waters about Bruges are without any current, but they may be changed in half an hour's time, by opening the ſluices, and letting the water run into the ſea. There are ſeveral bridges about the city, and that which was built in 1739 of free ſtone is very ſtately.

Bruges was in a very flouriſhing condition upwards of two hundred years ago, and every nation had a conſul herein, for the maintenance of their rights and privileges; but ſince the enlargement of Amſterdam and Antwerp, the trade is diminiſhed, and its inhabitants are not numerous enough for ſo large a place. However, there are many rich merchants, and a chamber for trade. There are ſeveral fine churches, in the firſt rank of which is the cathedral, whoſe rich ornaments and treaſure deſerve notice. The fineſt ſquare in the city is the great market, in which ſtand the halls, with public galleries, and a large court in the middle, and on one of its ſides a high ſteeple, ſupported only with four pillars. It is full of bells, with the moſt harmonious chimes in all the country. On the ſide of the great ſquare there is a ſtructure which ſerves for a public magazine to lay cloth in It is built on a canal, and ſupported by pillars in ſuch a manner, that ſmall veſſels can paſs under it, to croſs the city from the canal of Oſtend to that of Ghent.

The ſquare where the Wedneſday's market is kept is very fine, for it contains ſeveral walks between two rows of trees, and a new guard-houſe in the middle. The Burg is a large ſquare, in which is the town-houſe, built in the Gothic manner, and adorned with a variety of figures of the ancient counts and counteſſes of Flanders In the ſame ſquare there are ſeveral other public buildings. The church dedicated to the Virgin Mary is very fine, with a high ſteeple, which ſerves as a ſea mark for the ſhips that come to Oſtend; on the inſide are two tombs of copper gilt, of an extraordinary magnificence. Beſides the cathedral and two collegiate churches, there are five pariſh churches, fourteen chapels, and twelve convents, for men and women. There are a great many alms-houſes and hoſpitals, one of which is called the ſchool of Bogards, where there are about one hundred and eighty boys, ſome of which are brought up to learning, others to trades, according to their genius. Their habit is cloth, and half of them wear blue and half red, with a black bonnet. There is alſo a ſchool for poor girls, to the number of one hundred and twenty, clothed with red or blue. In ſhort, there is no place in the Low Countries where they take more care of widows and orphans.

It is remarkable that the knights of the golden fleece were inſtituted in this city in 1430, when the marriage of Philip the Good was celebrated with Elizabeth, princeſs of Portugal. The parts about the city, which belong to it, are called Franc of Bruges, and contain thirty-ſeven villages, and enjoy perfect liberty, according to the tenour of their freedom. The fortifications of Bruges are but trifling, inſomuch, that in time of war they always yield to the ſtrongeſt party. It is eight miles eaſt of Oſtend, twenty-four north eaſt of Ghent, and forty-ſix weſt of Antwerp. Long. 3. 5. E. Lat. 51. 11. N.

BRUGES (JOHN of) a celebrated Flemiſh painter, and the firſt who diſcovered the method of painting in oil. He found by many trials and chemical experiments, (to which laſt ſcience he alſo applied himſelf) that by grinding colours with linſeed, or nut oil, he could form them into a ſolid body that would reſiſt the water, and that had no need of the varniſh uſed in painting in water colours or in freſco. He preſented the firſt picture painted in this manner to Alphonſus I. king of Naples, who was much pleaſed with it. See EICK, and ANTHONY of MESSINA.

BRUGNETTO, a town of Italy, in the ſtate of Genoa, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated at the foot of the Appenines, thirty-ſix miles ſouth-eaſt of Genoa. Long 9. 45. E. Lat. 44. 15. N.

BRUIERE. See BRUYERE.

BRUMÆ, or BRUMLIA, in Roman antiquity, feſtivals celebrated twice a year in honour of Bacchus, called by the ancient Latins Brumus, the firſt obſerved on the 12th of the calends of March, the other on the 18th of the calends of September They were inſtituted by Romulus, who, during theſe feaſts, uſed to entertain the ſenate.

BRUMOY PETER) a learned Jeſuit, born at Rouen in 1688, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his youth by his talents for the belles lettres, and during his whole life was beloved for his probity, his virtue, and the goodneſs of his heart. He wrote many works, the moſt conſiderable of which is his Theatre of the Greeks, and died at Paris, on the 17th of April, 1742.

BRUN (ANTHONY LE) one of the plenipotentiaries of Spain, at the conferences of Munſter, was born at Dole in 1600, and was diſtinguiſhed not only by the perfections of his mind, and the preferments he enjoyed, but alſo by the nobility of his extraction, and his father's merit. It was to him in particular that the king of Spain owed the peace concluded with the Dutch at Munſter, excluſive of France. He was afterwards ſent ambaſſador to the Hague, created a baron, and a knight of the golden fleece. He wrote ſeveral ludicrous pieces againſt the French, and died in 1654.

BRUN (CHARLES LE) one of the greateſt geniuſſes for painting among the French, was firſt painter to Lewis XIV. director of the manufactures, &c. He was born in 1618, and diſcovered in his infancy ſo early an inclination for painting, that at three years of age he uſed to take coals, and deſign on the hearth, and ſides of the chimney, only by the light of the fire. At fourteen he drew the picture of his father, who was a ſculptor, and ſucceeded ſo well, that the portrait is ſtill conſidered as a very fine one; he afterwards went to Rome, when the eaſe with which he deſigned, and the correctneſs of his works, ſurpriſed the moſt famous painters and ſculptors of Italy. On his return to France he was loaded with extraordinary honours; he made deſigns for all the king's ſculptors, tapeſtry weavers, &c, and when he was painting the grand picture of Darius's family, from which was made one of the five pieces of tapeſtry of the hiſtory of Alexander, now in the grand apartment at Verſailles; the king uſed to ſpend near two hours every day at Fontainbleau to ſee him paint. His talent, except for landſcapes, was univerſal. He was not indeed admired for his colouring, nor for his ſkill in the diſtribution of his lights and ſhadows, but for a good guſto of deſign, an excellent choice of attitudes, an agreeable management of his draperies, a beautiful and juſt expreſſion, and a ſtrict obſervance of decorum; in fine, his compoſitions demand the attention and admiration of the niceſt judges. Lewis XIV. enobled him, and made him a preſent of his picture ſet with diamonds, and other princes and great men gave him proofs of their eſteem. He wrote two Treatiſes, one on Phyſiognomy, and the other on the different Characters of the Paſſions. He died at Paris, on the 12th of January, 1690, aged ſeventy-two.

BRUN DESMARETS (JOHN BAPTIST) an able writer of the eighteenth century, was born at Rouen, and was the ſon of a bookſeller in that city. He performed a part of his ſtudies in the monaſtery of Port Royal des Champs, and preſerved, during his whole life, a ſtrict connection with the perſons of that houſe, which involved him in their diſgrace, for his papers were then ſeized, and he ſhut up in the Baſtile, where he remained five years. He wrote a Collection of Voyages, under the name of Sieur de Moleon, in octavo, and ſeveral other works. He died at Orleans, in an advanced age, on the 19th of March, 1731.

BRUN (PETER LE) a learned prieſt of the Oratory, born at Brignoles, was the author of a great number of works, among the moſt eſteemed of which are, 1. A Critical Hiſtory of Superſtitious Practice. 2. A Literal, Hiſtorical, and Dogmatical Explication of the Ceremonies of the Maſs. 3. A Diſcourſe to prove that Plays are not allowable amongſt Chriſtians. He died on the 6th of January, 1729.

BRUNEHAUD, or BRUNICHILDE, the daughter of Athanagilde, king of the Viſigoths, in Spain, married Sigebert I. king of Auſtraſia, in 561, and was the mother of Childebert II. Ingonde, and Clodeſinde. St. Gregory the Great, and St. Germain of Paris, are laviſh of their praiſes of this princeſs, who probably at firſt appeared virtuous; but other writers draw a horrible picture of her, and repreſent her as a woman who was cruel, ambitious, avaricious, impudent, and capable of the greateſt crimes; for which, in 613 or 614, ſhe was condemned to an infamous death, in an aſſembly of the French, in which Clotaire II. declaimed againſt her wickedneſs, and charged her with the murder of ten kings. She was put to the rack three days together, then being placed upon a camel, was carried round the camp, after which ſhe was tied by the feet to the tail of a wild mare, who dragged her upon the ſtones; others ſay, that ſhe was torn in pieces by being tied to four horſes, and afterwards burnt. M. de Cordemoy, however, in his Hiſtory of France, endeavours to vindicate her with reſpect to moſt of the crimes imputed to her.

BRUNELESCHI (PHILIP) a celebrated architect, the reſtorer of ancient architecture at Florence, in 1294, gave the deſign, and built the dome of the ſuperb cathedral of Florence; Michael Angelo Buonaroti greatly admired this dome. It is one hundred and fifty fathoms high, without reckoning the turret, which riſes thirty-ſix fathoms above it, it, and to which there is an aſcent of five hundred and twenty ſteps.

BRUNFELSIUS (Otho) the firſt reſtorer of botany in Germany, was born at Mentz, and was firſt a Carthuſian monk, afterwards maſter of a ſchool at Straſburg, and at laſt practiſed phyſic at Bern in Switzerland. He wrote an Herbal in three volumes folio, and died Nov. 23, 1534.

BRUNI (Anthony) a famous Italian poet, born at Caſal-Nuovo, was counſellor and ſecretary of ſtate to the duke of Urbino, and a member of many academies in Italy. He died on the 24th of September, 1635, after having publiſhed ſeveral poetical works.

BRUNO the Great, archbiſhop of Cologne, and duke of Lorrain, was the ſon of the emperor Henry the Fowler, and the brother of the emperor Otho. He had a ſhare in all the important affairs of his time; he underſtood Greek and Latin, and invited men of learning to ſettle at Cologne. He died at Rheims in 965.

Bruno (St.) biſhop and apoſtle of Pruſſia, where he ſuffered martyrdom, on the 14th of February, 1008.

Bruno (St.) founder of the order of Carthuſians, was born at Cologne, and having made a great progreſs in the ſtudy of polite learning and the ſciences, was made canon of St. Cunibert of Cologne, and rector or prebendary of Rheims. It is ſaid that Raymond Diocre, canon of Paris, who it was believed had died in the odour of ſanctity, lifted up his head from the bier on which he was laid, while they were ſinging the office of the dead, and cried out with a loud voice, "I am accuſed, I am judged, I am condemned;" and that St. Bruno was ſo affected by this prodigy, that he ſettled with his companions in the frightful ſolitude of the Chartreuſe in Dauphiné, which gave name to the celebrated order founded by St. Bruno; but M. de Launai, and other learned men of the Romiſh perſuaſion, reject this ridiculous ſtory. However, Urban II. the friend and diſciple of St. Bruno, engaged him to return to Italy about the year 1086, and offered him the archbiſhoprick of Reggio; but St. Bruno refuſing to accept it, went and founded a monaſtery in Calabria, where he died, on the 6th of October, 1101. The Commentaries and Treatiſes attributed to him were written by Bruno de Signi.

Bruno de Signi, was born at Solaria, in the dioceſe of Aſt, whence he was called Bruno Aſtenſis, and at length became biſhop of Signi, on which account he was called Bruno Signienſis. His works were printed at Venice, in two vols. He died in 1125.

Bruno Herbipolensis, a learned biſhop of Wertzburg, was the ſon of Conrad II. duke of Carinthia, and uncle to the emperor Conrad. He wrote ſeveral works, and died on the 17th of May, 1045.

Bruno (Jordano) an atheiſtical writer, was born at Nolo, in the kingdom of Naples, and, about the year 1582, began to call in queſtion ſome of the tenets of the Romiſh church, which occaſioned his retiring to Geneva; but after two years ſtay there, he expreſſed his averſion to Calviniſm in ſuch a manner, that he was expelled the city. After having ſtaid ſome time at Lyons, Toulouſe, and Paris, he came to London, and continued two years in the houſe of Monſ. Caſtelneau, the French ambaſſador. He was very well received by queen Elizabeth, and the politer part of the court. His principal friends were ſir Philip Sidney and ſir Fulk Greville. At ſir Philip's requeſt he compoſed his Spaccio della beſtia Triumphante, which was printed in octavo, in 1584, and dedicated to that gentleman. This work, which has nothing but its impiety to recommend it, we are told in one of the Spectators, ſold at an auction in London for 30l. From England he went to Wittemberg, and from thence to Prague, where he printed ſome Tracts, in which he openly diſcovered his atheiſtical principles. After viſiting ſome other towns of Germany, he made a tour to Venice, when he was apprehended by order of the Inquiſition, tried, and declared guilty. Forty days were allowed him, in which time he promiſed to retract his errors; but at the expiration of that time he ſtill maintained them, and obtained a farther reſpite of forty days more; but it appearing at laſt that he impoſed upon the pope in order to prolong his life, ſentence was finally paſſed upon him, on the 9th of February, 1600. He made no offer to retract during the week that was afterwards allowed him for that purpoſe, and therefore ſuffered death on the 17th, by being burnt at the ſtake. Though he denied the being of a God, he had the credulity to believe the effects of magic and ſorcery. Several paſſages in his works ſhew, that he was not one of thoſe atheiſts, if there be any ſuch, who lead a good moral life.

BRUNSWICK, a city of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and capital of the duchy of the ſame name. It is compoſed of five towns, the Old Town, the New Town, the Hagen or Burg, the Old Wieck, and the Sac, which makes it a large place, but the houſes are almoſt all of wood. There are ſeveral churches, one of which is an ancient Gothic building, but the appearance of its antiquity ſeems to be abſorbed in the repairs it has undergone. Brunſwick is a fortified place, and would require a numerous army to beſiege, and not a few men to defend it. It is of a ſquare form, divided in the middle by the river Ocker, and is about two miles in circumference. The walls are lofty, and the fortifications of no mean note. The arſenal contains nothing very extraordinary, for there are only ſixty pieces of braſs cannon, with ſeveral cohorns and mortars, and ten pieces of large braſs battering cannon, of an enormous ſize. On the ramparts is a mortar-piece of braſs, ten feet ſix inches long, and nine feet two inches in diameter, weighing one thouſand eight hundred quintals, and has ninety-three quintals of iron in the carriages. It will carry a ball of ſeven hundred and thirty pound weight to the diſtance of thirty-three thouſand paces, and throw a bomb of a thouſand weight, but then it requires fifty-two pounds of gun-powder.

This city is the reſidence of the prince whom we ſtyle the duke of Brunſwick Wolfembuttle. He has theatrical and muſical entertainments, though his revenues are not very large, and has five regiments to keep garriſon. The inhabitants of this city and parts about it carry on a conſiderable trade with Bohemia, and the country abounds with very good hops, as alſo with turneps, with the ſeeds of which they make oil. Brunſwick mum is well known here in England, a ſmall ſort of which is their common drink. The religion here is the Lutheran, which they are very ſtrict in. The peaſants are ſober and laborious, but clowniſh and heavy; however, as they are robuſt and ſtrong, they make good ſoldiers. It is fifty five miles weſt of Magdeburgh, thirty eaſt of Hanover, and eighty-eight weſt-by-ſouth of Brandenburgh. Long. 10. 28. E. Lat. 52. 15. N.

Brunswick (the Duchy of). The duchy of Brunſwick Lunenburgh was erected in the year 1235, but the houſe being afterwards divided into ſeveral branches, it was broke into four ſeparate principalities, who are named from the capital of each. Theſe are Zell, Brunſwick, Calenburg, and Grubenhagen. The diviſion of the country is now ſubſiſting, for which reaſon the ducal houſe has four ſuffrages. In 1682 this country was raiſed to the electoral dignity, which is now poſſeſſed by the branch of the dukes of Hanover. Three principalities depend on this electoral branch, Zell, Calenberg, and Grubenhagen. The ducal branch has only the principality of Wolfembuttle.

BRUNTIS-Island, a parliament town, on the coaſt of Fife, in Scotland, eight miles north of Edinburgh. Long. 15. 38. Lat. 56. 3.

BRUNUS (Leonard). See Aretine Leonard.

BRUSCHIUS (Gaspar) was born at Egra, in Bohemia, the 19th of Auguſt, 1518. He wrote poetry with prodigious facility, and his Latin verſes are extremely flowing, eaſy, and natural. He publiſhed Latin poems on a great variety of ſubjects, the Hiſtory of the Biſhops and Biſhopricks of Germany, and other works. He was murdered in a wood, anno 1559.

BRUSSELS, the capital of Brabant, in the Auſtrian Netherlands, and generally the ſeat of the Auſtrian governor, is ſeated on the ſmall river Senne, which runs through it. It is a rich and handſome city; and among the public ſtructures, the ducal palace, where the governor reſides, the town-houſe, and the arſenal, are moſt ſuperb; and no city in Europe, except Naples and Genoa, makes a finer appearance at a diſtance; but, like them, when in the town, it is all up and down hill. It is encompaſſed with a double brick wall, and has ſeven gates; but being ſeven miles in compaſs, is too large to hold out a long ſiege. In Bruſſels are ſeven fine ſquares, or market-places; that of the great market is one of the moſt beautiful in the world. The town-houſe takes up one quarter of it, and has a very high ſteeple, on the top of which is a brazen ſtatue of St. Michael, fifteen feet high. In one of the apartments, which is handſomely adorned, the ſtates of Brabant meet. In three other rooms there is the hiſtory of the reſignation of Charles V. wrought in tapeſtry, which is ſo well done, that it may be miſtaken for painting. In the other parts of this ſquare, are the halls of the different trades. There are here ſeveral palaces of the nobility: that of Orange now belongs to the king of Pruſſia. The opera-houſe is built after the Italian manner, with rows of boxes, in which are chimneys. One is covered over with looking glaſs, ſo that they can ſit by the fire, drink a bottle, and ſee what is doing. There are twenty public fountains, adorned with ſtatues, at the corners of the moſt public ſtreets, and in the middle of the town-houſe is one with Neptune, and the tritons ſpouting out water, as well as the horſe from his noſtrils. The hoſpitals are well endowed, ſome of which are for the maintenance of ſtrangers for three days. There is alſo a foundling-hoſpital, and one for penitent courtezans.

Among the churches, that of St. Gudula is very magnificent.

ficent. It ſtands on the top of a hill, near the gate of Lovain, and is ſurrounded with iron baluſtrades. It is an old gothic ſtructure, with two large ſteeples at the eaſt end, and is finely adorned within. The Jeſuits have a fine church as well as a library. There are ſeveral monaſteries and nunneries, two of which laſt are Engliſh. The nunnery called the Beguinage is like a little town, being ſurrounded by a wall and ditch, and has little ſtreets, where each nun has an apartment. Six or ſeven hundred girls are educated here. In 1695 Bruſſels was bombarded by marſhal Villeroy, who demoliſhed four thouſand houſes, the ſtadt-houſe, and ſeveral churches. In 1708 it was beſieged again, by the elector of Bavaria; but the duke of Marlborough ſoon came to its aſſiſtance, and obliged him to raiſe the ſiege with precipitation. Marſhal Saxe, the French general, took it in 1746, but it was reſtored back by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle. It is much fallen from its former ſplendor, and all the trade which is carried on there is in lace, camblets, and tapeſtry, which they make in great perfection. It is twenty-three miles ſouth of Antwerp, twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Ghent, one hundred and fifty north-by-eaſt of Paris, and one hundred and ſixty-three eaſt of London. Long. 4. 8. E. Lat. 50. 51. N.

BRUSSELS, the quarter or diſtrict of Bruſſels, is one of the four parts of the duchy of Brabant. This quarter is bounded on the eaſt by that of Louvain, on the north by that of Antwerp, on the weſt by Flanders, and on the ſouth by Hainault. Bruſſels is the capital city of this quarter, and all Brabant.

BRUTON, a town of Somerſetſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, held on May 4, and September 19, for cattle. It is ſeated on the river Brew, and is a good place, and well inhabited. It is adorned with a very beautiful church, and has a free-ſchool, founded by Edward I. and the alms-houſe or hoſpital is ſo good, that it has the appearance of a college. The have a woollen manufactory of cloth and ſerges, and they are likewiſe noted for their malt. It is twenty-eight miles eaſt of Bridgewater, twenty-three ſouth-by-weſt of Bath, twenty-ſeven ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Briſtol, and one hundred and fifteen weſt of London. Long. 2. 30. W. Lat. 51. 15. N.

BRUTUS (LUCIUS JUNIUS) ſon of one of the ſiſters of Tarquin, was obliged to counterfeit the character of a natural, that he might not be thought capable of revenging the death of his father and brother, who had been murdered by that tyrant, and who would not have ſuffered him to live, had he diſcovered any wit or courage in him. Under this falſe appearance of ſtupidity, which gained him the ſurname of Brutus, he waited with impatience for an opportunity to expel Tarquin; which he found on Lucretia's killing herſelf, after the injury ſhe had received from the eldeſt ſon of the tyrant, and he made ſo good a uſe of this opportunity, that in a ſhort time the city of Rome was changed from a monarchy into a republic. This revolution happened in the 245th year of Rome, or the 509th year before the Chriſtian æra. Brutus was made conſul with Collatinus, the huſband of Lucretia; but did not long enjoy that dignity; for before the year of his conſulſhip was expired, having ſingled out Tarquin's ſon in battle, they charged with ſuch fury, that they ſlew each other. The Roman ladies, at his death, wore mourning for a year, on account of his having been the revenger of their honour. Some time before, his two ſons conſpiring to reſtore the Tarquins, he cauſed them to be put to death in his preſence.

BRUTUS (MARCUS JUNIUS) a celebrated Roman, the ſon of Junius Brutus and Servilia, the ſiſter of Cato, followed Pompey's party during the civil war, and after his death was beloved by Cæſar, who heaped favours upon him. But his love for his country, and the idea of liberty, deſcribed with ſuch pomp of language by the orators of Greece and Rome, made ſuch an impreſſion on his mind, that neither his obligations to Cæſar, nor the certainty of aggrandizing himſelf and family as much as he could wiſh under his new maſter, could counterbalance his deſire of reſtoring the republican government. He therefore, with ſeveral other Romans, conſpired againſt Cæſar, and their plot was ſo well conducted, that they aſſaſſinated him in full ſenate, on the 15th of March, forty-two years before the birth of Chriſt; when Cæſar obſerving Brutus among the conſpirators, cried, Tu quoque, mi Brute! The people, at firſt, applauded this action; but being artfully harangued by Mark Anthony, who ſhewed them Cæſar's bloody robe, and read his will, they ſuddenly, like the ſea agitated by a different wind, turned their reſentment againſt the murderers, who were conſtrained to ſeek their ſafety in flight: but without loſing their courage, they endeavoured to keep up their party in the provinces; but theſe great republicans, who were called the laſt of the Romans, being defeated by Octavius and Mark Anthony, who marched againſt them into Macedon, Brutus, at his own requeſt, was ſlain by his friend Strato.

Brutus was endowed with many excellent qualities, he was liberal and virtuous, an excellent orator, and great philoſopher. See CASSIUS.

BRUTUS (JOHN MICHAEL) a man of learning, and a polite writer, in the ſixteenth century. He was a native of Venice, and having ſtudied at Padua, ſpent great part of his life in travelling, and became hiſtoriographer to his imperial majeſty. He wrote, 1. A Hiſtory of Hungary. 2. A Hiſtory of Florence. 3. Notes on Horace, Cæſar, Cicero, &c. and other works. He was living in the year 1590.

BRUTUS (STEPHEN JUNIUS) the diſguiſed author of a political work, intitled Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos. See LANGUET.

BRUYERE (JOHN DE LA) a celebrated French writer, born in a village near Dourdan. He was recommended by M. Boſſuet to teach hiſtory to M. le Duc, at whoſe houſe he ſpent the reſt of his life, in quality of a man of learning, with a penſion of a thouſand crowns. He was diſtinguiſhed by his wit, delicacy, and judgment. His characters of Theophraſtus, tranſlated from the Greek, with the manners and characters of the age have been much admired. He was received into the French academy in 1693, and died on the 10th of May, 1696, aged fifty-ſeven.

BRUYS (PETER DE) a native of the mountains of Dauphiné, who taught that baptiſm is uſeleſs before the age of puberty, that the ſacrifice of the maſs is of no value, and that the prayers of the living can be of no ſervice to the dead. For theſe, and ſeveral other opinions of the ſame nature, he was inhumanly burnt alive, at St. Gilles, about the year 1126, at the ſolicitation of Peter de Clugny.

BRUYS (FRANCIS) a famous writer, born at Serrieres, a village of the Maconnois, on the 7th of February, 1708. He embraced the doctrines of Calvin, at the Hague, in 1728, but afterwards returned to the Romiſh church, and died at Dijon, in 1738. He wrote a great number of works, the principal of which are, A diſintereſted Critique on Literary Journals; and an Hiſtory of the Popes, in five volumes, quarto.

BRYANSBRIDGE, a town of Ireland, in the county of Clare, and province of Connaught, ſeated on the river Shannon, eight miles north of Limerick. Long. 8. 30. W. Lat. 52. 31. N.

BRYENNIUS (NICEPHORUS) a prince, diſtinguiſhed by his wit, courage, and probity; was born at Oreſtia, in Macedon, where his father, rebelling againſt the emperor Nicephorus Botoniates, he ſent againſt him Alexis Comnenes, who, having conquered this rebel, ordered his eyes to be put out; but being charmed with the perſon of Bryennius his eldeſt ſon, he married him to Anne Comnenes, his daughter, who was afterwards celebrated for her writings. When Alexis aſcended the throne, he gave Bryennius the title of Cæſar, but would not declare him his ſucceſſor though ſolicited to it by the empreſs Irene; and was therefore ſucceeded by his ſon Alexis, to whom Bryennius behaved with the utmoſt fidelity; but being ſent, about the year 1137, to beſiege Antioch, he fell ſick, and died at his return to Conſtantinople. This prince wrote the Hiſtory of Alexis Comnenes, which he compoſed at the requeſt of his mother-in-law the empreſs Irene.

BUC (GEORGE) a learned antiquarian, was born in Lincolnſhire, in the ſixteenth, and flouriſhed in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. In the reign of king James I. he was made one of the gentlemen of his majeſty's privy-chamber, and knighted: he was alſo conſtituted maſter of the revels. What he moſtly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by, was his writing, 1. The Hiſtory of the Reign of Richard III. in which he takes great pains to wipe off the bloody ſtains that have blotted his character, and repreſents the perſon and actions of that prince in a much leſs odious light than other hiſtorians have done. He alſo wrote, 2. A Treatiſe of the Art of Revels; and 3. a work intitled, The third Univerſitie of England.

BUCER (MARTIN) a proteſtant divine, born at Scheleſtadt, in the year 1491. He was a Dominican monk, and his wit and erudition procured him reſpect from the perſons of his own order. He ſoon, however, embraced the ſentiments of Luther, with whom he had ſeveral conferences, in 1521, and leaving the Dominicans, married a nun, and became miniſter at Straſburg, where he taught divinity for twenty years. At length, Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, invited him to England, where he taught divinity, and died at Cambridge, on the 27th of February, 1551, aged ſixty. He was a good preacher, writer, and teacher: he laboured with the utmoſt zeal and addreſs to compoſe the differences between the Lutherans and Zuinglians, and wrote ſeveral works, among which, are Commentaries on the Evangeliſts and Goſpels.

BUCHAN, a ſhire of Scotland, having the German Ocean on the north and eaſt, and the ſhire of Mar on the ſouth.

BUCHANAN (GEORGE) a man of great abilities, and one of the beſt Latin poets of his time, was born in the pariſh of of Killerne, in the ſhire of Lenox, in Scotland, in the year 1506. His father being dead, and his mother left with eight children, her brother ſent him to Paris for his education; but his uncle dying after he had been two years there, he, in 1523, returned home, and inliſted in the French troops which had landed in Scotland; but ſoon after, leaving the army on account of his bad ſtate of health, he ſtudied logic, under John Major, whom he followed to Paris, and having ſtaid there two years, was invited, in 1526, to teach grammar in the college of St. Barbe, which he did for two years and a half, and was then taken into the family of the earl of Caſſels, who, about the year 1534, carried him back into Scotland. Upon the earl's death, king James V. appointed him preceptor to his natural ſon James, afterwards the famous earl of Murray, regent of Scotland. About this time he wrote a ſatirical poem, intitled Somnium, in which were ſome ſarcaſms againſt the Franciſcan friars, which ſo highly exaſperated them, that they repreſented him as an atheiſt. Some time after, the king having diſcovered a conſpiracy againſt himſelf, in which he was perſuaded that ſome of the Franciſcans were concerned, commanded Buchanan to write a poem againſt that order. Our poet, unwilling to diſoblige either the king or the friars, wrote a few verſes capable of a double interpretation: but the king was diſpleaſed at their not being ſevere enough, and ordered him to write others more ſevere. This Buchanan performed, and ſoon preſented him his famous piece, intitled Franciſcanus. This raiſed him a multitude of enemies, and revived the accuſations of the monks againſt him, whoſe complaints being laid before the king by cardinal Beaton, his majeſty committed him to priſon. He however ſoon after made his eſcape, and fled to England, from whence he went to France, and taught three years in the new college at Bourdeaux; but left that city in 1543, on account of the peſtilence there, and was for ſome time entertained by Montagne, the celebrated author of the Eſſays. The following year he went to Paris, and taught the ſecond claſs in the college of Bourbon. In 1547 he went into Portugal, with Andrew Goveanus, who had received orders from the king, his maſter, to engage a number of men, capable of teaching philoſophy and polite literature, in the univerſity he had lately erected at Coimbra. Every thing went well while Goveanus lived, but he dying the following year, Buchanan was treated extremely ill; reproached with his poem on the Franciſcans; accuſed of eating meat in Lent; of having ſaid that St. Auguſtin was more favourable to the proteſtant doctrine of the euchariſt, than to that of the church of Rome; and, in ſhort, caſt into the Inquiſition, where he was confined a year and a half, and was not releaſed till he conſented to be better inſtructed in the doctrine of the church. For this purpoſe he was placed in a monaſtery, where he began his Paraphraſe of the Pſalms, in Latin verſe.

At length, having recovered his liberty, he came to England, but the confuſions in the reign of Edward VI. not allowing him the tranquillity he deſired, he paſſed over into France, where he publiſhed his tragedy of Jeptha, which he dedicated to Charles de Coſſé, marſhal of France. This dedication ſo highly pleaſed the marſhal, that he ſent for Buchanan into Piedmont, where he commanded, and made him preceptor to his ſon. He ſpent five years in that ſtation, and three years after in the ſtudy of the Scriptures, and of thoſe religious diſputes which then divided the Chriſtian world; but at proper intervals he applied himſelf to poetry, and undertook his great poem in five books upon the Sphere.

In 1563 he returned to Scotland, after an abſence of twenty-four years, and publicly declared himſelf of the reformed church. At length he was made principal of the college of St. Leonard, in the univerſity of St. Andrew's, where he reſided four years. Upon the misfortunes of queen Mary, he went over to the party of the earl of Murray, whom he attended to the conference at York in 1568, and, under his direction, he wrote his Detectio, which ſeverely reflects on her majeſty's character and conduct. He was alſo appointed by the council and aſſembly of the ſtates of the kingdom preceptor to the young king James VI.

The laſt twelve or thirteen years of his life were ſpent in writing the Hiſtory of Scotland in Latin, in which he has united the brevity and force of Salluſt, with the perſpicuity and elegance of Livy. At laſt, the infirmities of age obliging him to leave the court, he, in 1581, went to Edinburgh, where he died, on the 28th of September, 1582, at ſeventy-ſix years of age. The moſt valuable of his works are, his Tranſlation of the Pſalms, and his Hiſtory of Scotland. Elzevir printed a fine edition of his poetical works, in 1628, and all his other works are printed together in two volumes, folio.

BUCHANNESS, a cape or promontory of Scotland, which is the fartheſt point of Buchan, not far from Peterhead, and the moſt eaſtern of all Scotland. Long. 0. 30. E. Lat. 57. 28. N.

BUCHAU, a free imperial city, of the circle of Suabia, in Germany. There is a ſort of nunnery here of nine nuns, who are all of good family. They may all leave it, and marry when they pleaſe; but the abbeſs has not the ſame liberty. It is ſeated on the river Federſey, twenty-three miles ſouth-weſt of Ulm, and thirty-three ſouth-weſt of Tubingen. Long. 9. 37. E. Lat. 48. 5. N.

BUCHNER (Augustus) a good poet, and excellent humaniſt, was of a noble and ancient family, and born at Dreſden, in 1591. He was profeſſor of poetry and eloquence, in the academy of Wittemberg, and acquired ſuch reputation, that queen Chriſtina ſent for him into Sweden, but he refuſed the offers of that princeſs. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe de Exercitatione Styli. 2. Another de Commutatâ dicendi Ratione. 3. A Collection of Funeral Orations and Panegyrics. 4. Some Latin Poems: and 5. Notes on ſeveral ancient Authors. He died at Wittemberg, in 1661.

BUCHOLTZER (Abraham) a celebrated chronologiſt and proteſtant divine, was born at Schonaw, near Wittemberg, in 1529, became paſtor of ſeveral churches, and at laſt of that at Freyſtadt, in Sileſia, where he died, in 1584. His principal work is his Index Chronologicus, which is much eſteemed.

BUCHOREST, a pretty large town of Turky, in Europe, ſeated in the middle of Walachia, and the ordinary reſidence of a hoſpodar. The houſes are very mean and ill built, except a very few that belong to the principal perſons. In 1716, a party of Germans ſent from Tranſylvania, entered this town, and took the prince priſoner, with all his court, and carried them off. This expedition was the more eaſily performed, as ſeveral lords of the country had a ſecret intelligence with the governor of Tranſylvania. This prince had no other way to regain his liberty, but by giving up that part of Walachia which lies between Tranſylvania and the river Aluth, to the emperor of Germany, by the peace concluded at Paſſarowitz, in 1718. The Germans entered again into the capital of this principality, and levied exceſſive contributions. But affairs took another turn after the fatal battle of Crotzka, in 1737; for the emperor was obliged to reſtore this part of Walachia to the hoſpodar, in virtue of the treaty of Belgrade. It is forty miles ſouth-eaſt of Tarvis. Long. 26. 30. E. Lat. 44. 30. N.

BUCHORN, a ſmall free imperial town of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, ſeated on the lake of Conſtance, thirteen miles north-eaſt of Conſtance, and thirteen north-weſt of Lindaw. Long. 9. 20. E. Lat. 47. 41. N.

BUCKELDIUS (William) a native of Volder, rendered himſelf famous about the year 1416, by inventing the art of preſerving herrings, by ſprinkling them with ſalt, and barrelling them up. He died at Biervliet, in 1447, where the Dutch have raiſed him a monument to eternize his memory.

BUCKENHAM (New) a town of Norfolk, with a market on Saturdays, but no fairs. It is ſeated on a flat, and had once a caſtle, which is now demoliſhed. It is twelve miles north-eaſt of Thetford, thirty ſouth-weſt of Norwich, and ninety ſeven north-north-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 10. E. Lat. 52. 30. N.

BUCKINGHAM, the chief town in Buckinghamſhire, is ſeated on low ground, and is ſurrounded on all ſides but the north by the river Ouſe, over which there are three ſtone bridges. It had a caſtle which ſtood upon a mount, in the middle of the town, but that is ruined and gone long ſince. It contains about three hundred houſes, and is governed by a bailiff and twelve capital burgeſſes; ſends two members to parliament, and has a market on Saturdays. It has a free ſchool and a county goal, which laſt has been lately built. It has eight fairs, on Monday ſeven-night after Epiphany, March 7, May 6, Thurſday in Whitſun week, July 10, September 4, October 2, and November 8; all for cattle. It is ſixteen miles north-weſt of Ayleſbury, twenty-five eaſt-north-eaſt of Oxford, fifty-five weſt-ſouth-weſt of Cambridge, and ſixty north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 58. W. Lat. 51. 50. N.

Buckingham (George Villiers, duke of). See Villiers.

Buckingham (John Sheffield, duke of). See Sheffield.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, is bounded on the eaſt by Bedfordſhire, Hertfordſhire, and Middleſex; on the north by Northamptonſhire, on the weſt by Oxfordſhire, and on the ſouth by Berkſhire, from which it is ſeparated by the river Thames. It is forty two geographical, or forty-ſeven meaſured miles in length, and twenty-three or twenty-ſix in breadth of the ſame miles. It is in the dioceſe of London, contains one hundred and eighty-five pariſhes, and ſends fourteen members to parliament. According to an old computation, it has four hundred and forty-one thouſand acres of land, eighteen thouſand three hundred and ninety houſes, and one hundred and eleven thouſand, three hundred and ninety-four ſouls. The moſt remarkable towns are,

are, Buckingham, Oulney, Newport, Stoney Stratford, Winflow, Aylesbury, Ivingo, Wendover, Amersham, High Wickham, Beaconsfield, Marlow, and Colnbrook.

The rivers that water this county are the Thames, the Colne, the Isa, and the Ouse. The air is generally good, especially on Chiltern Hills. It produces very fine corn and cattle, and in the vale of Aylesbury the sheep are of an extraordinary size, with fine fleeces. The principal manufactures are paper and bone lace.

BUCKOR, a province of Asia, subject to the great mogul. It is seated on the river Indus, on the banks of which there are corn and cattle; but the west part, which is bounded by Segestan, in Persia, is a desert. The inhabitants are strong, robust, and apt to mutiny, for which reason the mogul has a garrison at the chief town, called Buckor, which is seated in an island made by the river Indus. They are all Mahommedans, and drive a great trade in cotton cloth, and other Indian commodities. The longitude of the town is 70. 5. E. Lat. 28. 10. N.

BUDA, the capital city of Hungary, is called Ofen by the inhabitants, and Buden by the Turks. It is large, well fortified, and has a castle that is almost impregnable. The houses are tolerably handsome, being most of them built with square stone. It was a much finer place before the Turks had it in their possession, but they being masters of it one hundred and thirty-five years, they have suffered the finest buildings to fall to decay. The lower city or Jews town, extends like suburbs from the upper city to the Danube. The upper town takes up all the declivity of a mountain, and is fortified with good walls, which have towers at certain distances. The castle, which is at the extremity of the hill, on the east side, and commands the greatest part of it, is surrounded with a very deep ditch, and defended by an old fashioned tower, with the addition of new fortifications. There is also a suburb, inclosed with hedges, after the Hungarian manner. The most sumptuous structures now are the carevanseras, the mosques, bridges, and baths. These last are the finest in Europe, for the magnificence of the building, and plenty of water. There are ponds of hot water that have a sort of fish, which, thrown into the Danube, die immediately, for they cannot bear cold water. Some of the springs are used for bathing and drinking, and others are so hot they cannot be used without a mixture of cold water. The Danube is about three quarters of a mile in breadth, and there is a bridge of boats between this city and Pest, consisting of sixty-three large pontoons. The Jews have a synagogue near the castle-gardens. The adjacent country is fruitful and pleasant, producing rich wines; though in some places they have a sulphureous flavour.

This city was the residence of the Hungarian monarchs till the Turks took it in 1526. Ferdinand, archduke of Austria, recovered it the next; but in 1529 the Turks became masters of it again. In 1684 the Christians laid siege to it, but they were obliged to raise it soon after, though they had an army of eighty thousand men. Two years after, the Turks lost it again, it being taken by assault in the sight of a very numerous army. The booty that the Christians found there was almost incredible, because the rich inhabitants had lodged their treasure in this city as a place of safety. However, part of these riches were lost in the fire, occasioned by the assault. This last siege cost the Christians a great deal of blood, because there were many in the camp who carried on a secret correspondence with the Turks. When the seraskier saw the city on fire, and found he could not relieve it, he beat his head against the ground for anger. In 1687 this city had like to have fallen into the hands of the Turks again, by treachery. After this, the Christians augmented the fortifications of this place, to which the pope contributed one hundred thousand crowns, for this is looked upon as the key of Christendom. It is seated on the Danube, one hundred and five miles south-east of Vienna, one hundred and sixty-three north-by-west of Belgrade, and five hundred and sixty-three north-west of Constantinople. Long. 19. 22. E. Lat. 47. 20. N.

BUDA (the beglerbeglic of) was one of the chief governments of the Turks in Europe. It included all the countries of Upper Hungary, between the rivers Teisse and Danube, and between Agria and Novigrad, all Lower Hungary, from Gran and Canisca, the eastern part of Sclavonia, and almost all Servia: but a good part of this government now belongs to the queen of Hungary.

BUDÆUS (WILLIAM) the most learned man in France, in the fifteenth century, was born at Paris, in 1467. Two remarkable circumstances of his studies were, that he began late, and had no master; but by his incessant application he overcame all difficulties. He published a Translation of some Pieces of Plutarch; Notes on the Pandects; a Treatise on the Coins and Measures of the Ancients, and other works, which are collected together, and printed in four volumes in folio. This great man, whom Erasmus calls the Prodigy of France, died at Paris, on the 23d of August, 1540.

BUDDÆUS (JOHN FRANCIS) a celebrated Lutheran divine, and one of the most learned men Germany has produced, was born in 1667, at Anclam, a town of Pomerania, where his father was a minister. He was at first Greek and Latin professor at Coburg; afterwards professor of morality and politics in the university of Hall, and at length, in 1705, professor of divinity at Jena, where he fixed, and where he died, after having acquired a very great reputation. His principal works are, 1. A large Historical German Dictionary. 2. Historia Ecclesiastica Veteris Testamenti, two volumes, quarto. 3. Elementa Philosophiæ practicæ, Instrumentalis & Theoreticæ, three volumes, octavo; which has had a great number of editions, because, in most of the universities of Germany, the professors take this work for the text of their lessons. 4. Selecta Juris Naturæ & Gentium. 5. Miscellanea Sacra, three volumes, quarto. 6. Isagoge Historico-Theologica ad Theologiam universam, singulasque ejus Partes, two volumes, quarto; which is much valued by the Lutherans: and 7. A Treatise on Atheism and Superstition.

BUDDESDALE, or BETTISDALE, a town of Suffolk, with a market on Wednesdays, and a fair on Holy Thursday, for cattle and toys. It is seated in a dale or valley, and its street takes in a good part of Ricking, all which together make up the town, for of itself it is but a hamlet, having a small chapel, and an endowed grammar-school, to which belong certain scholarships, assigned to Bennet or Corpus Christi college, in Cambridge, being the gift of Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper of the great seal. It is thirteen miles east-by-south of Thetford, nineteen north-east of St Edmund's Bury, twenty three north-north-west of Ipswich, and eighty-eight north-east of London. Long. 1. 8. E. Lat. 52. 25 N.

BUDGELL (EUSTACE) esq. an ingenious and polite writer, was the son of Gilbert Budgell, doctor of divinity, and was born at St. Thomas, near Exeter, about the year 1685. He was educated at Christ-church college, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, London; but instead of studying the law, for which his father intended him, he applied to polite literature, kept company with the genteelest persons in town, and particularly contracted a strict intimacy with the ingenious Mr. Addison, who was first cousin to his mother, and on his being made secretary to lord Wharton, lord lieutenant of Ireland, took him with him as one of the clerks of his office. Mr. Budgell, who was about twenty years of age, and had read the classics, and the works of the best English, French, and Italian authors, now became concerned with Sir Richard Steel and Mr. Addison in writing the Tatler, as he had, soon after, a share in writing the Spectators, where all the papers written by him are marked with an X; and when that work was completed, he had likewise a hand in the Guardian, where his performances are marked with an asterisk. He was afterwards made under secretary to Mr. Addison, chief secretary to the lords justices of Ireland, and deputy-clerk of the council. Soon after, he was chosen member of the Irish parliament, and in 1717, when Mr. Addison became principal secretary of state in England, he procured Mr. Budgell the place of accomptant and comptroller-general of the revenue in Ireland. But the next year, the duke of Bolton being appointed lord-lieutenant, Mr. Budgell wrote a lampoon against Mr. Webster, his secretary, in which his grace himself was not spared, and upon all occasions treated that gentleman with the utmost contempt. This imprudent step was the primary cause of his ruin; for the duke of Bolton, in support of his secretary, got him removed from the post of accomptant-general; upon which, returning to England, he, contrary to the advice of Mr. Addison, published his case in a pamphlet, intitled a Letter to the Lord * * *, from Eustace Budgell, esq. accomptant-general, &c. Mr. Addison had now resigned the seals, and was retired into the country for the sake of his health; Mr. Budgell had also lost several other powerful friends, who had been taken off by death; particularly the lord Halifax, and the earl of Sunderland; he, however, made several attempts to succeed at court, but was constantly kept down by the duke of Bolton. In the year 1720 he lost twenty thousand pounds by the South-Sea scheme, and afterwards spent five thousand pounds more in unsuccessful attempts to get into parliament. This completed his ruin. He at length employed himself in writing pamphlets against the ministry, and wrote many papers in the Craftsman. In 1733 he began a weekly pamphlet, called The Bee, which he continued for above an hundred numbers, printed in eight volumes, octavo. During the progress of this work, Dr. Tindal died, by whose will he had two thousand pounds left him, to the exclusion of the next heir; but soon after he was reduced to a very unhappy situation by law-suits. He however got himself himſelf called to the bar, but being unable to make any progreſs, he, in the year 1736, filled his pocket with ſtones, then, taking a boat at Someſet-ſtairs, ordered the waterman to ſhoot the bridge, and while the boat was going under, threw himſelf into the river. He had ſeveral days before been viſibly diſtracted in his mind. Upon his bureau was found a ſlip of paper, on which were theſe words,

What Cato did, and Addiſon approved,
Cannot be wrong.

Beſides the above works, he wrote a Tranſlation of Theophraſtus's Characters. He was never married; but left one natural daughter, who afterwards aſſumed his name, and became an actreſs at Drury-lane theatre.

BUDOA, a maritime town of Dalmatia, with a biſhop's ſee, ſubject to the Venetians. It is ſeated between the gulph of Cattaro and the city of Duſcigno, on the coaſt of Albany. It is an important fortreſs, where the Venetians always keep a ſtrong garriſon. In 1667 it ſuffered greatly by an earthquake; and in 1686 was beſieged by Soliman Baſha, of Scutari; but general Cornaro obliged him to raiſe the ſiege. It is twenty-eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Raguſa, and fifteen north-weſt of Antivari. Long. 19. 22. E. Lat. 42. 12. N.

BUDWEIS, a town of Germany, in Bohemia. It is a royal city, pretty large, and well built. It is ſurrounded with ſtrong walls, fortified with a good rampart, and might be made an important place. It was taken by the king of Pruſſia, in 1744, but he did not keep it very long. Long. 14. 19. E. Lat. 42. 15. N.

BUDZIAC TARTARY, lies on the rivers Neiſter, Bog, and Nieper, having Poland and Ruſſia on the north, Little Tartary on the eaſt, the Black Sea on the ſouth, and Beſſarabia on the weſt. The chief town is Oczakow. It is ſubject to Turky.

BUENOS AYRES, a town of South America, capital of the government of La Plata, with a biſhop's ſee. It ſtands on the ſouth ſide of the river Plata, in the country called Paraguay, and had its name Good Air, from the healthfulneſs of its ſituation. The town is large, and the ſtreets are ſtrait; there are about four thouſand houſes, but then they are but one ſtory high, on account of the earthquakes, to which this country is ſubject. It was founded in 1535, and afterwards abandoned; then in 1542, and then forſaken. In 1582 it was rebuilt, and has been peopled ever ſince. It has ſix churches, one of which is the cathedral, but they are very low and mean. The winters are very rainy, with high winds and frequent thunder ſtorms, and the ſummers are exceſſive hot, but the frequent cooling breezes are ſome alleviation. The river here is twenty miles in breadth, and is navigable one hundred and eighty miles above the town, that is, as far as the cataract. The territory about it is of vaſt extent, and is fertile in many ſorts of fruit. The paſture grounds are covered with vaſt numbers of black cattle, horſes, and mules. The inhabitants are Spaniards and Indians, the former of which live a lazy luxurious life, never troubling their heads about any improvements. The animals are the ſame as thoſe mentioned in Brazil, and the manners of the native Indians the ſame, except ſuch as do the drudgery of the Spaniards. The river, is of great advantage for the diſtribution of negroes to other parts of the country, but how far it runs up is uncertain; it is ſuppoſed to have its ſource in the mountains called the Andes. Long. 60. 5. W. Lat. 34. 55. S.

BUFFIER (CLAUDIUS) a laborious writer among the Jeſuits, was born in Poland, of French parents, on the 25th of May, 1661. He was educated at Rouen, and ſettled at Paris, where he died on the 17th of May, 1737. He wrote a conſiderable number of works, the moſt eſteemed of which are The Principles of Reaſoning, with Remarks on Logic, and a Courſe of Sciences, in folio.

BUG, a large river in Poland, which riſes in Little Poland, near Lemberg, and falls into the Viſtula, between Poctz and Warſaw.

BUGENHAGEN (JOHN) a famous Proteſtant divine, born at Wollin, on the 24th of June, 1485, was eſteemed one of the moſt learned men of his time. He at firſt oppoſed the ſentiments of Luther, but being afterwards convinced of his miſtake, married, and introduced the Reformation, according to the ſentiments of that reformer, into a great part of Germany. He was miniſter of Wirtemberg, where he died, on the 24th of April, 1558, aged ſeventy-three. He wrote a Commentary on the Epiſtles of St. Paul, and other works, in which he diſcovers great moderation and erudition.

BUGEY, a province of France, bounded on the eaſt by Savoy, on the weſt by Breſſe, on the ſouth by Dauphine, and on the north by the territory of Gex, and the Franche Compté. It is about forty miles long, and twenty-five broad; though it is a country full of hills and mountains, yet it is fertile in ſome places, and the rivers abound with trouts. Beſides, there are all ſorts of game, ſuch as red and grey partridges, pheaſants, wood-hens, birds of paſſage, hares, rabbits, deer, wild boars, bears, lynxes, and roebucks. The chief places are, Belley the capital, Seiſel, St. Rambert, Fort l'Ecluſe, and Chateau-Neuf.

BUGIA, a province or territory, in the kingdom of Algiers, in Africa. It is almoſt ſurrounded with mountains, and is divided into three parts, Benijubar, Auraz, and Labez. Theſe mountains are peopled with the moſt ancient Arabs, Moors, or Saracens, and moſt of theſe mountaineers have an indelible croſs on one hand, and ſeveral have one on their cheeks, which they ſay is a cuſtom derived from their anceſtors. The occaſion was this; when the Goths became maſters of the country, they exacted no contribution on the Chriſtians, or thoſe who were willing to paſs for ſuch. Wherefore, to ſtop the fury of the ſoldiers, they ſhewed at a diſtance this mark of Chriſtianity, which uſage has been retained by their poſterity. This province is very fertile in corn.

BUGIA, or, as it is called by the Africans, Bugeiah, is a maritime town of Africa, in the kingdom of Algiers, and is the capital of the territory of that name. It is ſeated on the declivity of a high mountain, and near a commodious bay between Gigery and Algiers. It is ſtrong and populous, and was formerly a kingdom under the dominion of the Arabs. It was built by the Romans, but when the Goths became maſters of Africa, they made it the capital of their empire. Abni, a Saracen king, drove them away in 762. Afterwards Joſeph, firſt king of Morocco, conquered this kingdom, and gave it to a prince of his family, who reigned there till the twelfth century. Then it was conquered by the king of Tenes, who gave it to one of his ſons, the race of whom remained till 1510, when it was taken by the king of Spain, by whom it was fortified. Next it was ſeized by the Algerines, after the defeat of Charles V. But Peraita, the governor, had his head cut off when he returned into Spain. It is ſeventy-five miles eaſt of Algiers. Long. 10. 0. E. Lat. 36. 34. N.

BUILTH, or BEALT, a town of South Wales, in Brecknockſhire, is pleaſantly ſeated on the river Wye, over which there is a wooden bridge, that leads into Radnorſhire. It is at preſent but a ſmall place, though it has a market on Mondays and Saturdays, and three fairs; on June 27, October 2, and December 6, for ſheep, horned cattle, and horſes. It is ten miles north of Brecknock, fifty-two weſt of Worceſter, and one hundred and ſeventy-one weſt-by-north of London. Long. 3. 10. W. Lat. 52. 8. N.

BULAC, a town of Egypt, ſeated on the eaſt ſhore of the river Nile, two miles weſt of Grand Cairo, which is the ſea-port town of that city, and is ſaid to contain about four thouſand families. On the north ſide of it is the Caliſch, whoſe banks are cut every year, to convey the water of the Nile, by a canal, to Grand Cairo. All the veſſels going up and down the river Nile make ſome ſtay here. Long. 32. 10. E. Lat. 30. 0. N.

BULGAR, a province of Aſia, in Ruſſian Tartary. bounded on the north by Caſan, on the eaſt by Baſkiria, on the ſouth by the kingdom of Aſtracan, and on the weſt by the river Wolga, or Volga. This country is very ill peopled, and the towns and places are but few.

BULGARIA, a ſmall province of Turky, in Europe, bounded on the north by Wallachia, on the eaſt by the Black Sea, on the ſouth by Romania and Macedonia, and on the weſt by Servia. It is very narrow, and yet three hundred and twenty-five miles in length, on the ſide of the Danube, from Servia till it falls into the Black Sea. The inhabitants are Chriſtians, but extremely ignorant, inſomuch that they ſeem to know nothing of Chriſtianity, but baptiſm and faſting. The chief advantage they have is the feeding of cattle. It is divided into four ſangiacates, Byden, Sardice, Nicopolis, and Siliſtria. The chief towns are of the ſame name, except Sardica, which is now called Sophia.

BULGARUS, one of the moſt celebrated lawyers in the twelfth century, was ſurnamed Bouche d'Or, (Golden Mouth) from his graceful manner of ſpeaking. He was one of the four profeſſors whom Frederic Barbaroſſa conſulted in 1158, in order to know how far the rights and prerogatives of the emperor in Italy were to extend, in which conſultation Bulgarus ſhewed ſuch great abilities, that the above-mentioned monarch made him a judge, which employment he executed with ſuch integrity, that his decrees ſerved as a rule or ſtandard in all affairs of a doubtful nature. He publiſhed ſome Gloſſes on the Civil Law, and an excellent Commentary on Regulas Juris.

BULL (JOHN) a celebrated muſician and doctor in that faculty, was deſcended from a family of that name in Somerſetſhire, and was born about the year 1563. He was greatly admired for his fine hand on the organ, as well as for his compoſitions. Upon the eſtabliſhment of Greſham college, he was choſen the firſt profeſſor of muſic there, through the recommendation of queen Elizabeth, in the year 1596. In 1601 his health being impaired, he went ſo travel, and continued abroad above a year, during which time probably happened the following remarkable ſtory related of him by Anthony Wood. Dr. Bull being in France, and hearing of a famous muſician belonging to a certain cathedral at St. Omer's, applied himſelf to him as a novice who wanted to learn, to ſee and admire his works. This muſician, after ſome diſcourſe had paſſed between them, conducted Dr. Bull to a veſtry or muſic-ſchool, joining to the cathedral, and ſhewed him a leſſon or ſong of fourteen parts, and then made a vaunting challenge to any perſon in the world to add one more part to them, ſuppoſing it to be ſo complete and full that it was impoſſible to add to it. Upon this Dr. Bull deſiring the uſe of ink and ruled paper, prayed the muſician to lock him up in the ſchool for two or three hours, which being done, not without great diſdain by the muſician, he in that time added four more parts, and the muſician being called in, after having viewed, tried, and retried them, at length burſt out into a great extaſy, and ſwore, that he that added thoſe parts muſt be either the Devil or Dr. Bull. On which the doctor making himſelf known, the muſician, with raptures of joy at ſeeing him, expreſſed his wonder and admiration. Dr. Bull was afterwards organiſt to king James I.

BULL (GEORGE) biſhop of St. David's, was born at Wells, in Somerſetſhire, March 25, 1634, and educated at Exeter college, in Oxford. The firſt benefice he enjoyed was that of St. Geo ge's, near Briſtol, whence he roſe ſucceſſively to be rector of Suddington in Glouceſterſhire, prebendary of Glouceſter, archdeacon of Llandaff, and, in 1705, he was advanced to the biſhoprick of St. David's. This dignity he enjoyed about four years, and dying February the 17th, 1709, was interred at Brecknock. During the uſurpation of Cromwell, he adhered ſteadily, though ſtill with great prudence, to the forms of the church of England, and in the reign of king James the Second preached very ſtrenuouſly againſt the errors of popery. He wrote, 1. A Defence of the Nicene Faith. 2. Apoſtolical Harmony. 3. Primitive Apoſtolical Tradition; and other works. This worthy prelate, who was diſtinguiſhed by his learning and piety, died on the 27th of September, 1709.

BULLEN, (ANNE) queen of England. See BOLEYN, (ANNE).

BULLEYN (WILLIAM) a learned phyſician and botaniſt, in the reigns of king Edward VI. queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth, was born in the former part of king Henry the Eighth's reign, and educated at Cambridge. He travelled over ſeveral parts of Germany, Scotland, and eſpecially England, and was well acquainted with the nature of the people, the produce of the ſoil, and particularly vegetables, which qualified him to deſcribe their virtues ſo well, and to employ them ſo ſucceſsfully as he did, in the reſtoration of health. He wrote a work, intitled, Bulleyn's Bulwarke of Defence againſt all Sicknes, Sorenes, and Woundes; The Government of Health; A Dialogue both pleaſaunte and pietiful, wherein is a goodlie Regiment againſt the Fever Peſtilence; and a Book of Simples. He died Jan. 7, 1576.

BULLIALDUS (ISMAEL) an eminent aſtronomer, was born at Laon, in the Iſle of France, on the 28th of September, 1605. He travelled in his youth for the ſake of improvement, and afterwards publiſhed ſeveral works, among which are, 1. De Natura Lucis. 2. Philolaus. 3. Aſtronomia Philolaica, Opus novum, in quo Motus Planetarum per novam et veram Hypotheſin demonſtrantur. 4. Aſtronomiæ Philolaicæ fundamenta clarius explicata & aſſerta adverſus Zothi Wardi impugnationem. He alſo wrote a piece or two upon Geometry and Arithmetic, and died at Paris, on the 25th of November, 1694.

BULLINGBROKE, or BOLINGBROKE, a town of Lincolnſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, but no fairs. It is ſeated at the ſpring-head of a river which falls into the Witham, and on low ground. It was formerly of note for its caſtle, but more for being the birth-place of Henry IV. ſurnamed Henry of Bullingbroke. It is now but an indifferent town, and the market is ſmall. It is twenty-two miles eaſt of Lincoln, thirty-ſix north-north-eaſt of Stamford, and one hundred and thirty-three north of London. Long. 0. 40. E. Lat. 53. 15 N.

BULLINGER (HENRY) one of the reformers of the church in the ſixteenth century, was born at Bremgarten, July 18, 1504, and ſent at twelve years old to Emmeric, in the duchy of Cleves, in order to ſtudy polite literature; but tho' his father was able to allow him an annual maintenance, he was obliged to ſupport himſelf for the three years he ſtaid there, by the alms he got by ſinging from door to door. He was with Zuinglius at the famous controverſy, which was held at Berne in 1528; the year following he was made miniſter to the Proteſtants of Bremgarten, and, in 1531, he retired to Zurich, and there filled the employment vacant by the death of Zuinglius, edifying the church as well by his ſermons as his writings, which were of the controverſial kind. He died on the 27th of Sept. 1575, aged ſeventy-one.

BULTEAU (LEWIS) a learned writer of the ſeventeenth century, born at Rouen in 1625. After having enjoyed the poſt of ſecretary to the French king during fourteen years, he was diſmiſſed to make room for his brother, who was put in his place, on which he ſpent the remainder of his life among the Benedictines. He wrote a great number of anonymous works, the principal of which are, 1. An Eſſay towards a monaſtic Hiſtory. 2. An Abridgment of the Hiſtory of the Order of St. Benedict, two volumes, quarto. 3. A Tranſlation of the Dialogues of St. Gregory the Great, with learned notes.

BUNEL (WILLIAM) profeſſor of phyſic in the univerſity of Toulouſe, about the beginning of the ſixteenth century. He wrote a work on the Method of being preſerved from the Plague, and the Medicines proper for the Cure of Peſtilential Diſeaſes.

BUNEL (PETER) a native of Toulouſe, was one of the moſt elegant writers of the Latin tongue in the ſixteenth century, but was ſtill more conſpicuous for the regularity of his manners. He did not ſeek either or riches for lucrative employments, but, contented with the bare neceſſaries of life, applied himſelf wholly to the improvement of his mind, and has left behind him ſome Latin Epiſtles, which are written with the utmoſt purity. He died at Turin in 1547, in the forty-ſeventh year of his age.

The magiſtrates of Toulouſe have a buſt of him in marble, placed in their town-houſe. The moſt correct edition of his Letters is that of Henry Stephens in 1581.

BUNGAY, a town in Suffolk, with a market on Thurſdays, and two fairs; on May 14, for horſes and lean cattle, and on September 25, for hogs and petty chapmen. It is ſeated on a ſpot well watered by the river Waveney, which ſeparates it from Norfolk. It had formerly a caſtle of great ſtrength, near the market-place, which overlooked a long ſpace of meadow ground towards Norfolk. It has two pariſh churches, one of which is a handſome ſtructure, and near it are the ruins of a famous nunnery, in the middle of the town. The market is very great for corn, which is brought out of Norfolk, and here is a grammar-ſchool, with ten ſcholarſhips for Emanuel college, in Cambridge. The women are employed in knitting worſted ſtockings. It is thirty miles north-by-eaſt of Ipſwich, forty eaſt-north-eaſt of St. Edmund's Bury, and one hundred and ſeven north-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 30. E. Lat. 52. 35. N.

BUNON, an excellent ſurgeon and dentiſt at Paris, was a native of Chalons, in Champagne, and died in the flower of his age, in 1746. He was the author of three very curious pieces; A Diſſertation on the Teeth of pregnant Women; An Eſſay on the Diſeaſes of the Teeth; and a Collection of Experiments, made by himſelf.

BUNTINGFORD, a town of Hertfordſhire, with a market on Mondays, and two fairs; on June 29, and November 30, for pedlar's ware. It is a good thoroughfare town, but ſmall, and is accounted only a large hamlet. It is ten miles north of Hertford, nine ſouth of Royſton, and thirty-one north of London. Long. 0. 6. W. Lat. 51. 55. N.

BUNTZEL, or BUNTZLAU, a town of Sileſia, in the duchy of Jauer. The greateſt part of the houſes are built with ſtone, and there were formerly rich mines in the neighbourhood. It is in the common road to Leipſick, and their trade is earthen ware, of which they make great quantities. Long. 15. 50. E. Lat. 51. 12. N.

BUNYAN (JOHN) author of the Pilgrim's Progreſs, was born at Elſtow, near Bedford, in the year 1628. He was the ſon of a tinker, and, in the early part of his life, was a great reprobate, and a ſoldier in the parliament army; but being at length deeply ſtruck with a ſenſe of his guilt, he laid aſide his profligate courſes, became remarkable for his ſobriety, and applied himſelf to obtain ſome degree of learning. About the year 1655 he was admitted a member of a Baptiſt congregation at Bedford, and was ſoon after choſen their preacher, but, in 1660, was taken up, and tried for preſuming to preach, and was cruelly ſentenced to perpetual baniſhment, and in the mean time committed to jail, where neceſſity obliged him to learn to make long-tagged thread laces for his ſupport, and to add to his diſtreſs, he had a wife and ſeveral children, among whom was a daughter who was blind. In this unjuſt and cruel confinement he was detained twelve years and a half, and during that time wrote many of his Tracts, but he was at length diſcharged, by the humane interpoſition of Dr. Barlow. When king James's declaration for liberty of conſcience was publiſhed, he was choſen paſtor of a congregation at Bedford. He at length died of the fever at London, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1688, aged ſixty. He alſo wrote an excellent allegory, called, The Holy War. His Pilgrim's Progreſs has been tranſlated into moſt European languages, and his works have been collected together, and printed in two volumes, folio.

BUPALUS, a celebrated ſculptor, and a native of Chios, was the ſon, grandſon, and great-grandſon of ſculptors, and had a brother, named Athenis, of the ſame profeſſion. They flouriſhed in the ſixtieth Olympiad, or five hundred and thirty-five years before the Chriſtian æra. All their ſtatues were of white Parian marble. Our ſculptors diverted themſelves in repreſenting Hipponax, a poet of a very diſagreeable figure, ugly, and ſo lean, that he was a mere ſkeleton: but Hipponax wrote ſo very ſharp a ſatire againſt them, that, if ſome authors may be credited, they hanged themſelves out of ſpite: but Pliny aſſerts, that they performed very excellent ſtatues after Hipponax had taken his revenge, particularly the Diana of Chios, who ſeemed to knit her brows on any one's entering the place where ſhe was, and to have a ſmiling and gracious air when they went out.

BURAGRAG, a river of Barbary, in the kingdom of Fez, which has it ſource on the confines of the province of Chaus, runs along the confines of Fez and Temeſna, and falls into the Atlantic Ocean at the town of Sallee.

BURANA (JOHN FRANCIS) a native of Verona, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. He ſtudied in the univerſity of Bologna, and read public lectures there on Ariſtotle's Logic. He afterwards applied himſelf to the practice of phyſic, and tranſlated ſome treatiſes of Ariſtotle and Averoes.

BURCH (CORNELIUS POELEN) a celebrated Flemiſh painter, was born at Utrecht in the year 1586, and was the diſciple of Blort. He went to Rome, and for ſome time ſtudied Raphael's works, but afterwards applied himſelf wholly to landſcapes, following Adam Elſheimer's manner; but at laſt, ſtudying nature, he formed a particular ſtyle, that was both faithful and agreeable, and following his genius, always drew ſmall figures. On his return to Holland, he worked with great aſſiduity, and the king of England having ſeen ſome of his pieces, invited him to his court, and allowed him a yearly penſion. On his return to Utrecht, he had more buſineſs than he could perform, his pictures being ſent for from all parts, and they are ſtill known and eſteemed all over Europe. He died in 1660, at ſeventy-four years of age.

BUREN, a town of Betaw, in Dutch Guelderland, with a caſtle. It gives the title of count to the prince of Naſſau Orange. It is ſeated ſixteen miles weſt of Nimeguen. Long. 5. 22. E. Lat. 52. 0. N.

BUREN, a town of Germany, in the biſhoprick of Paderborn, in Weſtphalia, with a caſtle. It is ſeated near the river Alme, five miles ſouth of Paderborn. Long. 8. 25. E. Lat. 51. 35. N.

BURFORD, a town in Oxfordſhire, with a market on Saturday, and two fairs; on July 5, for horſes, ſheep, cows, and ſmall wares, and on September 25, for cheeſe and toys. It is ſeated on an aſcent by the river Windruſh, and is a corporation, governed by two bailiffs and ſub-officers. It is noted for a cuſtom obſerved here of making a dragon, and carrying it up and down the ſtreets on Midſummer-eve; but the original of this cuſtom is very uncertain. This town lies near the Downs, which are much frequented at the time of the horſe-races, and is remarkable for the making of ſaddles. It is fifty-eight miles north-by-eaſt of Saliſbury, fifty-two eaſt-north-eaſt of Briſtol, and eighty-one weſt-by-north of London. Long. 1. 43. W. Lat. 51. 40. N.

BURGAW, (the burgraviate or marquiſate of) a territory of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, is ſeated near the Danube, between Augſburg and Ulm, and is fifty miles in length, and twenty in breadth. The principal towns are Guntzbourg, and BURGAW, a town of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, and marquiſate of the ſame name, with a caſtle. It belongs to the houſe of Auſtria, and is fifteen miles weſt of Augſburg, and eighteen eaſt of Ulm. Long. 10. 31. E. Lat. 48. 28. N.

BURGDORFF, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Bern. It is a handſome town, and pretty large, and is ſeated on an eminence. The palace or caſtle of the governor, who is called an avoyer, is at one end of the town, on a riſing ground on the ſide of a rock. One of the ſtreets was burnt down in 1706, but it is handſomely rebuilt, in a uniform manner. The river Emma is about a piſtol's ſhot from the town, and as it often changes its bed, it does a great deal of miſchief. It runs at the foot of a rock of a prodigious height, and there is a ſtone bridge over it. Near the town there is a ſulphureous ſpring, which ſupplies their baths with water, which is good againſt the palſy and diſorders of the nerves. It is ten miles north eaſt of Bern. Long. 7. 35. E. Lat. 47 6. N.

BURGH, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and three fairs; on May 12, for ſheep, horſes, and cattle of all ſorts, on Auguſt 16, for toys, and on October 2, for cattle and cloathing of all ſorts. It is ſeated in a marſh, and is but a ſmall place. It is twelve miles ſouth-eaſt of Boſton, and one hundred and thirty-ſeven north of London. Long. 0. 5. E. Lat. 53. 12. N.

BURGH-CASTLE, or BOROUGH-CASTLE, is ſeated on the edge of the county of Norfolk, three miles weſt of Yarmouth, where the rivers Yare and Waveny meet. There was formerly a delightful caſtle here, in which was a monaſtery, but there are no remains of it now, except the ruins of its walls, near which Roman coins are often dug up.

BURGOS, a city of Spain, the capital of Old Caſtile, with an archbiſhop's ſee, erected in 1574. It is ſurrounded with mountains, which render the air very cold nine months in the year, and the other three exceſſive hot. It is ſeated on the declivity of a hill, on the top of which there is a ſtrong caſtle, and the lower part of the town is watered by the river Alançon. The principal avenue to the city is by a handſome bridge over this river, which leads to a beautiful gate, adorned with the ſtatues of ſeveral kings of Spain. The town is large and populous, but the houſes are ill built, and the ſtreets are narrow and dirty, except ſome few, eſpecially that which leads to the cathedral. There are ſeveral ſquares, adorned with fountains and ſtatues. The great ſquare in the middle of the city is ſurrounded with fine houſes, with piazzas to each. The cathedral church is a maſter-piece of Gothic architecture, and one of the fineſt in all Spain. The church of the Auguſtines is remarkable for its beautiful and rich chapel of the Holy Crucifix. There are ſeveral fine convents and nunneries, one of which laſt contains one hundred and fifty nuns, who muſt all be of noble extraction. They have likewiſe a royal hoſpital, very richly endowed, and at this place they ſpeak the beſt Caſtilian that is, the pureſt Spaniſh of all Spain. It is ninety-five miles eaſt-by-ſouth of Leon, ſixty-five ſouth of Bilboa, and one hundred and eighteen north of Madrid. Long. 4. 7. W. Lat. 42. 20. N.

BURICK, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and duchy of Cleves, ſubject to the king of Pruſſia. It was taken by the French in 1672, who demoliſhed the fortifications. It is agreeably ſeated on the river Rhine, over-againſt Weſel, ſeventeen miles eaſt of Cleves, and thirty-ſeven north weſt of Cologn. Long. 6. 8. E. Lat. 51. 38. N.

BURIDAN (JOHN) a native of Bethune, in Artois, was one of the moſt celebrated philoſophers of the fourteenth century. He taught in the univerſity of Paris with prodigious reputation, and wrote Commentaries on Logic, Morality, and Ariſtotle's Metaphyſics. From him came the proverb of the Aſs of Buridan, ſo famous in the ſchools. Buridan ſuppoſed an hungry aſs fixed at an exactly equal diſtance between two buſhels of oats, or an aſs as much preſſed by thirſt as hunger, between a buſhel of oats and a pail of water, each of them acting equally on his ſenſes. Having made this ſuppoſition, he deſired to know what the aſs would do? If he was anſwered that he would remain immoveable, then he concluded he would die of hunger between two buſhels of oats, or of both hunger and thirſt, with both corn and water within his reach. This appeared abſurd, and brought the laughers on his ſide; but if it was replied, that the aſs would not be ſo ſtupid as to die of hunger or thirſt in ſuch a ſituation, Then (ſaid he) the aſs has free will, or it is poſſible that of two equal weights one ſhould out-weigh the other. Theſe two conſequences appeared equally abſurd, and thus Buridan, by this ſophiſm, perplexed the philoſophers, and his aſs became famous in the ſchools.

BURKITT (WILLIAM) a celebrated commentator on the New Teſtament, was born at Hitcham, in Northamptonſhire, on the 25th of July, 1650, and educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge. He preached twenty-one years at Milden in Suſſex, and in 1692 was preſented to the vicarage of Dedham, in Eſſex, where he continued till his death, which happened in October, 1703. He was remarkable for his piety and charity, and, beſides his Annotations, printed in one volume folio, he wrote a volume, intitled, The Poor Man's Help, and the Rich Man's Guide.

BURLAMAQUI, an able counſellor of ſtate, and celebrated profeſſor of law at Geneva in the preſent century, wrote an Eſſay on the Law of Nature, which is much eſteemed, and a good work on the Principles of Civil Law. This judicious author died a few years ago.

BURLINGTON. See BRIDLINGTON.

BURLINGTON (NEW) a town of North America, capital of New Jerſey, ſeated in an iſland of Delaware river, twenty miles north of Philadelphia. Ships of burthen come up to the keys, which renders it a town of very good trade; and here the courts of juſtice for the province are held. Long. 74. 10. W. Lat. 40. 40. N.

BURMAN (FRANCIS) a Proteſtant miniſter, and learned profeſſor of divinity at Utrecht, was born at Leyden, in 1628, and died on the 10th of November, 1679, after having having publiſhed a Courſe of Divinity, and ſeveral other works.

He is not to be confounded with Francis Burman, his ſon, or with Peter Burman, a laborious commentator on Phædrus, Lucan, and other prophane authors, who died in 1741.

BURNET (GILBERT) biſhop of Saliſbury, and an eminent writer in the reigns of William III. queen Anne, and the beginning of king George I. was born at Edinburgh, September 18, 1643. It is remarkable that he received the firſt rudiments of education from his father, and perfectly underſtood the Latin tongue at ten years of age, when being ſent to the college of Aberdeen, he was ſcarce fourteen when he commenced maſter of arts. At eighteen he was admitted a probationer, or expectant preacher, and ſoon after an offer of a good benefice was made him, which he declined. He at length came into England, and after ſix months ſtay at Oxford and Cambridge, returned to Scotland, and ſome time after he made a tour through Holland and France, and at Amſterdam, by the aſſiſtance of a Jewiſh rabbi, perfected himſelf in the Hebrew language, and likewiſe became acquainted with the leading men of the different perſuaſions tolerated there, Arminians, Lutherans, Baptiſts, Browniſts, Papiſts, and Unitarians, and uſed frequently to declare, that amongſt each of theſe he met with men of ſuch unfeigned piety and virtue, that he obtained a ſtrong and fixed principle of univerſal charity, and an invincible abhorrence of all ſeverities, on account of difference in religion. On his return to Scotland, he was admitted into holy orders by the biſhop of Edinburgh, in 1665, and preſented to the living of Saltoun, when he was the only clergyman in Scotland that made uſe of the prayers in the liturgy of the church of England. The behaviour of the Scotch biſhops ſeeming to him unbecoming their characters, he ſent them a memorial, in which he cenſured their conduct. In 1668 he was employed in negociating the ſcheme of accommodation between the epiſcopal and preſbyterian parties, and by his advice many of the latter were put into the vacant churches. In the following year he was made divinity profeſſor in the univerſity of Glaſgow, where he continued four years and a half, equally hated by the zealots of both parties. In 1672 he publiſhed A Vindication, &c. of the Church and State of Scotland, which ſo pleaſed the court, that he was offered a biſhoprick, and promiſed the next vacant archbiſhoprick, but did not accept of it, becauſe he ſaw the great deſign of the court was to advance popery. In 1673 he took another journey to London, when the king having heard him preach, nominated him one of his chaplains in ordinary. But the next year the duke of Lauderdale accuſing him as the cauſe of the miſcarriage of the meaſures taken by the court in Scotland, his name was ordered to be ſtruck out of the liſt of chaplains; when hearing that his enemies deſigned to get him impriſoned, he reſigned his profeſſor's chair at Glaſgow, and preaching in ſeveral churches in London, had been choſen miniſter of one, had not the electors been deterred from it by a meſſage in the king's name; but in 1675 he was choſen preacher of the Rolls chapel, and was ſoon after made lecturer of St. Clement's; but afterwards his behaviour at the lord Ruſſel's trial, and his attending that unhappy nobleman in priſon, and at his execution, occaſioned his being diſcharged, by the king's mandate, from his lectureſhip, and his preaching on the fifth of November, 1684, a ſermon at the Rolls chapel, ſeverely inveighing againſt the doctrines of popery, he was forbid to preach there any more.

After the death of king Charles he travelled through the ſouthern parts of France, Italy, and Swiſſerland, and then repairing to the Hague, was admitted to the confidence of the prince of Orange, whom he attended to England, and was advanced to the ſee of Saliſbury in 1689, and afterwards appointed preceptor to the duke of Glouceſter. He wrote, 1. The Hiſtory of the Reformation of the Church of England. 2. A modeſt and free Conference between a Conformiſt and Noncomformiſt. 3. His Travels. 4. Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton. 5. The Life of Sir Matthew Hale. 6. The Hiſtory of the Rights of Princes in diſpoſing of Eccleſiaſtical Benefices. 7. The Paſtoral Care. 8. An Expoſition of the Thirty nine Articles of the Church of England, and many other works. After his death, which happened March 17, 1714-15, was publiſhed his Hiſtory of his own Time, in two vols. folio.

BURNET (THOMAS) a very polite and learned author, in the latter end of the ſeventeenth century, was born in Scotland, and educated at Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr. John Tillotſon, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury. In 1685 he was maſter of the Charter-houſe, in London, after which he entered into holy orders. During the reign of king James II. he made a noble ſtand againſt the incroachments of that monarch, who would have impoſed one Andrew Popham, a Papiſt, as a penſioner upon the foundation of the Charter-houſe. He was afterwards chaplain and clerk of the cloſet to king William III. Beſides his Theory of the Earth, which gained him great reputation, he wrote, 2. Archæologiæ Philoſophicæ. 3. A Treatiſe de Fide & Officiis Chriſtianorum; and, 4, another De Statu Mortuorum & Reſurgentium. He died Sept. 27, 1715, and was interred in the vault of the Charter-houſe chapel.

BURNETTUS, or BRUNETTUS LATINUS, a Florentine, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing a work on the Origin and Nature of all Things, and ſome other pieces. He died at Florence, anno 1295.

BURNHAM, a town of Norfolk, with a market on Mondays and Saturdays, and two fairs; on March 15, for cheeſe, and on Auguſt 1, for horſes, &c. It is ſeated not far from the ſea, and the market is very good. It is twenty-five miles north-north eaſt of Lynn, thirty-ſeven weſt-north-weſt of Norwich, and one hundred and twenty-nine north-north-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 46. E. Lat. 53. 0. N.

BURNLEY, a town in Lancaſhire, with a market on Saturday, and five fairs; on March 6, Eaſter-eve, May 13, July 10, and October 11, all for horned cattle, horſes, and ſheep. The market is good for cattle and proviſions, and it is two hundred and nine miles north-north-weſt of London. Lon. 2. 5. W. Lat. 53. 40 N.

BURNTWOOD, a town in Eſſex, in the road to Colcheſter, with a market on Thurſday, and one fair; on July 18, for horſes and horned cattle. It is ſeated on a hill, and is a handſome well inhabited town, and the market is well ſerved with proviſions. It is ten miles weſt-ſouth-weſt of Chelmsford, thirty two weſt-ſouth-weſt of Colcheſter, and eighteen eaſt-north-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 25. E. Lat. 51. 38. N.

BURRATZ, or BURATZ, or, as it is in the Ruſſian Atlas, Buret, a fort on the river Angora, which runs into the lake Baikal, in the province of Irkutkſkoi, part of Ruſſian Tartary. Long. 111. 30. E. Lat. 53. 0. N.

In the parts between this and the lake live the Barattians, a Pagan people, who are rich in cattle, which are a ſort of bulls and cows, without horns, and with long hair. They all live in low cottages, made of wood and covered with earth, on the tops of which there is a hole left to let out the ſmoke, for the fires are made in the middle of their huts. Their houſes ſtand near each other on the ſide of a river, where they fix, without changing their habitations, like ſome other Tartars. Near the door they fix poles, on which ſome ſtick deer, others ſheep-ſkins, and others the hides of horſes. They are quite ignorant of huſbandry and gardening, but in ſpring and autumn they employ themſelves in hunting of ſtags, wild ſheep, and roe-bucks. Several hundreds go out on horſeback at a time, placing themſelves in a circle at ſome diſtance from each other. As the ring is contracted, they approach nearer, and by that means incloſe ſeveral hundreds of game at a time; and when they are got within a bow's ſhot, every one lets fly at once, inſomuch that very few eſcape, eſpecially as they have thirty arrows a-piece. Every one knows his own by the marks on the arrows. When they have done, they cut the fleſh from the bones, and dry it in the ſun, which ſerves them for proviſion till they go out again. There are few other beaſts but bears and wolves, except camels, which are very large, and are bought of them for travelling into China. They likewiſe ſell oxen for the ſame purpoſe, for which they receive in exchange all ſorts of commodities that they want. Both the men and women are robuſt, and tolerably handſome, conſidering the place where they live, they being a little like the Chineſe Tartars. In the winter they both wear long coats made of ſheep-ſkins, with a broad girdle tipped with iron, and have a ſort of caps which they can draw over their ears in cold weather. In the ſummer their coats are made of red cloth. They are a naſty ſort of people, for they never waſh themſelves nor pare their nails, which gives them a ſhocking aſpect. The virgins cauſe their hair to ſtand up an end in plaits, which make them look like the figure of Envy in paintings. The married women have two plaits, which hang down on each ſide of the head, adorned with figures. When any of them die, they are buried with all their finery, as well as their bows and arrows.

Their religion conſiſts in worſhipping dead bucks and ſheep, which are ſpitted on poles before their doors, until they are rotten or putrified. They only fall on their knees, claſp their hands, and bow down the head, without ſpeaking a ſingle ſyllable. When they take an oath, they go to a hill by the ſide of the lake Baikal, which they hold to be ſacred. Upon this they ſwear, and firmly believe a perjured perſon ſhall never come down alive.

BURROUGHES (JEREMIAH) an eminent diſſenting miniſter in the reign of Charles I. He was educated at Cambridge, but was obliged to quit that univerſity for noncomformity. He, for ſome time, ſheltered himſelf under the hoſpitable roof of the earl of Warwick, and afterwards retiring to Holland, was elected miniſter of an Engliſh congregation gregation at Rotterdam. About the beginning of the civil wars he returned to England, not to preach ſedition, but peace, for which he earneſtly prayed and laboured. He obtained two of the largeſt congregations in England, viz. Stepney and Cripplegate, London; but his inceſſant labours, and his grief for the diſtractions of the times, contributed to haſten his death, which happened on the 4th of November, 1646. He was a man of learning, candour, modeſty, and of an exemplary and irreproachable life. A conſiderable number of his practical writings have been printed, but ſome of them were not publiſhed till after his deceaſe.

BURRUS (AFRANIUS) was a perſon of merit, who flouriſhed in the firſt century. He was tutor to Nero, and had Seneca for his aſſiſtant; but that prince's perverſeneſs fruſtrated all their cares. Burrus was afterwards ſeveral times reduced to the ungrateful neceſſity of ſeeming to approve Nero's infamous actions, which he was not able to remedy. He died A. D. 62, not without a ſuſpicion of having been poiſoned.

BURSA, formerly called Pruſa, is a city of Aſia, the capital of Natolia, and formerly the metropolis of Bythinia. It is the largeſt and moſt magnificent town in all this country. It is ſeated at the foot of the firſt ſmall hills of Mount Olympus. On the other ſide of the city is a large fine plain, full of mulberry, nut, and cherry-trees. There are many ſmall ſtreams that deſcend from Mount Olympus, and one in which the water guſhes out, with a ſtream as big as a man's body, runs into a marble channel, and ſpreads itſelf all over the city, inſomuch that every houſe has its own fountain. It was ſurrounded with walls while it was in the hands of the Chriſtians, which are yet ſtanding, though partly in ruins, and are about ſix miles in compaſs. They were built out of the ruins of the ancient city, for there are a great many pillars and pieces of marble, mixt with ſtones. The part which is on a craggy rock, near the bazar or market-place, is called the caſtle or fortreſs. It is ſurrounded with a wall, diſtinct from that of the city, and has four gates.

There are two ſeraglios in this fortreſs, the one new, and the other old. This laſt is almoſt demoliſhed, and ſerves for nothing but to cleanſe corn and to make meal. The other is but a mean building, and yet it has its baths and ſtoves, is ornamented with gilded walls and floors, which are painted in compartments. Each room has its cloſet or cupboard to put proviſions in, after the manner of the Turks, who never encumber their houſes with tables, chairs, and beds, for they have only a little alcove in their rooms, covered with a carpet, whereon they ſit croſs-legged, and have cuſhions to lean upon. Theſe ſerve them for bedchambers. The moſques are very fine, generally covered with lead, as are likewiſe the caravanſeras or public inns, which are very commodious. On one ſide of the Jews ſtreet, on the left hand as you go to the baths, is a royal moſque, in the court whereof are the mauſolæa of ſome of the ſultans, placed in chapels ſtrongly built, and ſeparated from each other.

The bezeſtein is well built, full of warehouſes and ſhops, where all the goods and commodities of the Levant are to be found, beſides the manufactures of the city. The beſt workmen in Turky live at this place, and have ſkill enough to weave good tapeſtry. They make uſe of the ſilk which is produced near this place, as well as that of Turky, which is not ſo good. In general the city is neat, pleaſant, and well paved, eſpecially near the quarter of the bazar. But the ſituation is not ſo advantageous as it ſeems to be at the firſt ſight, for it is commanded by the hills on the ſide of Mount Olympus. The ſuburbs, which are vaſtly larger, finer, and better peopled than the city, are inhabited by Jews, Armenians, and Greeks. The plane-trees render them charmingly beautiful, and being mingled with houſes, whoſe terraces have a delightful view, yield a ſurpriſing landſcape. The officers are a baſha, an aga-janizary, and a mullah, or great cadi.

This city was taken by the ſultan Orchan in the year 1300, from the Chriſtian emperors of the Eaſt, who made it the ſeat of the empire, till Conſtantinople was taken. His tomb, and thoſe of his wife and children, are in a Greek church, covered like a moſque, but neither large nor beautiful. There are in Burſa ſeveral colleges of royal inſtitution, where ſcholars are maintained, and taught the Arabic tongue, and have the Alcoran explained gratis. The Armenians have one church, the Greeks three, and the Jews four ſynagogues. Theſe laſt come from Spain, and continue to talk good Spaniſh. With regard to the number of people in this city, there are above forty thouſand Turks, two thouſand Armenians, one thouſand ſix hundred Jews, and nine hundred Greeks. The caravans which travel from Aleppo to Smyrna, and moſt of thoſe which come from Perſia to Conſtantinople, paſs through this place, which is of great advantage to trade. Hence their bazars or market-places, which are well built, are full of merchants and and merchandiſe. Wine, butcher's meat, and other proviſions, are cheap and good. beſides which, the waters in the neighbourhood ſupply them plentifully with carp, trout, and barbel.

In the parts about Burſa the fields are covered with mulberry-trees and vineyards. Moſt of the mulberry-trees are low, and ſeem to be planted in nurſeries, and the large ones form a ſort of foreſts, divided by large thorn buſhes. On Mount Olympus are great numbers of fir-trees, beſides beeches, yoke-elms, aſpens, and hazles. Burſa is ſixty-five miles ſouth of Conſtantinople, and one hundred and ſixty ſouth-eaſt of Adrianople. BURTON (WILLIAM) a perſon diſtinguiſhed by his knowledge of heraldry, geneologies, and antiquities, was deſcended from an ancient family, ſeated at Lindley, in Leiceſterſhire, and at Falde, in Staffordſhire. He was born in 1575, and, after being educated at Oxford, became a member of the Inner Temper, and was made a barriſter; but ſoon after quitting the law, retired in order to enjoy a private country life, when he wrote a Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire, in folio, and ſeveral other works. He died on the 9th of April, 1645, aged ſeventy.

BURTON (ROBERT) better known by the name of Democrates Junior, was younger brother to the above gentleman. He compoſed a work, intitled, The Anatomy of Melancholy, a book which has been univerſally read and admired, and is eſteemed a very ingenious performance. It is generally free from the affected language and ridiculous metaphors, which diſgrace moſt of the books of his time. He was fond of aſtrology, and is ſaid to have foretold the time of his death. It is certain that the ſame thing was reported of him that was before ſaid of Cardan, that he died a voluntary death, that his prediction might prove true, but this is probably falſe. He died in January, 1639.

BURTON (HENRY) was born at Birdſall, in Yorkſhire, in the year 1579, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took the degree of maſter of arts. About the year 1625 he was preſented to the rectory of St. Matthew's, in Friday-ſtreet, London. But what rendered him moſt conſiderable, and cauſed him to be much taken notice of, was his ſevere proſecution in the Star-chamber, for having, on the 5th of November, 1636, preached, in his own church, two ſermons, publiſhed afterwards under the title of For God and the King, and for writing, during his confinement, An Epiſtle to his Majeſty, another to the Judges, and a Letter to the true-hearted Nobility; for which ſentence was paſſed that he ſhould be fined five thouſand pounds, deprived of his eccleſiaſtical benefice, degraded from his miniſterial function and degrees in the univerſity, be ſet on the pilory, and both his ears cut off there, confined to perpetual cloſe impriſonment in Lancaſter caſtle, debarred acceſs of his wife, or any other except the keeper, and denied the uſe of pen, ink, and paper. Accordingly, on the 30th of the ſame month, (viz. June 1637) he was ſet in the pillory in the Palace-yard, Weſtminſter, with Baſtwick and Prynne, where his ears were pared off ſo cloſe, that the temporal artery was cut, which made the blood ſtream in great abundance upon the ſcaffold. After which he was impriſoned in the common jail of Lancaſter caſtle; but great crowds reſorting to him there, and he finding means to have ſome of his papers diſperſed in London, he was removed, by an order of council, to Cornet caſtle, in the Iſle of Guernſey, where he remained a cloſe priſoner almoſt three years. However, his wife preſenting a petition to the houſe of commons, on the 7th of November, 1640, the houſe ordered that he ſhould be forthwith ſent for. Mr. Burton and Mr. Prynne landed at the ſame time at Dartmouth, on the 22d of November, where they were received and entertained by a prodigious conflux of people, and their charges not only borne with great magnificence, but liberal preſents given them. In this manner they were treated all the way upon the road, and were brought into Weſtminſter about two o'clock in the afternoon, and conducted into the city of London by above ten thouſand perſons, with boughs and flowers in their hands, the common people ſtrewing flowers and herbs in their way as they paſſed, with loud acclamations of joy. The parliament afterwards declared Mr. Burton's commitment and ſentence illegal, freed him from the fine of five thouſand pounds, reſtored him to his degrees in the univerſity, and his eccleſiaſtical benefice, and voted that he ſhould have ſix thouſand pounds as a recompence for his impriſonment, and the loſs of his ears; but this he never obtained. Mr. Burton wrote ſeveral other pieces, among which are, 1. A Cenſure of Simony. 2. The Baiting of the Pope's Bull. 3. A Trial of private Devotions, or a Dial for the Hours of Prayer. 4. Truth's Triumph over Trent, or the great Gulph between Sion and Babylon. 5. A Narration of his own Life, &c. He was buried Jan. 7, 1647-8

BURTON (WILLIAM) a perſon of diſtinguiſhed learning, was for ſome time uſher to Thomas Farnaby, a famous ſchoolmaſter in Kent, and was himſelf afterwards a ſchoolmaſter at Kingſton upon Thames. When he was at the univerſity he was patronized by the learned Mr. Allen, of Glouceſter-hall, who appointed him Greek lecturer there; and upon the death of that excellent perſon, he ſpoke his funeral oration, which was much applauded for its propriety and elegance. He wrote Annotations upon the firſt of Clement's Epiſtles, in Engliſh; and Hiſtories of the Greek and Perſian Tongues, in Latin; but his principal work is his learned Commentary on Antoninus's Itinerary. This gentleman died on the 28th of December, 1657.

BURTON (EZEKIAH) S. T. P. fellow of Magdalen college, in Cambridge, in the reign of king Charles II. and an eminent tutor there, was, for his ſingular merit, made chaplain to the lord keeper Bridgeman, in 1667, who, the ſame year, preſented him to a prebend of Norwich. In the beginning of 1668, a treaty was propoſed by the lord keeper for a comprehenſion of ſome of the diſſenters, and a toleration of others. Dr. Tillotſon, Dr. Stillingfleet, Dr. Burton, and the lord chief baron Hale, were very deſirous of an accommodation, and ready to do every thing to promote it. But this ſcheme met with ſuch powerful oppoſition, that the debates upon the terms of union were ſoon concluded. Dr. Burton, who was a man of great prudence, moderation, and ſweetneſs of temper, was ſnatched from the world, when he was capable of doing much good in it, and when his inceſſant labours, and exemplary piety, promiſed a great deal. He died in 1681, after which his friend Dr. Tillotſon publiſhed two volumes of his Diſcourſes.

BURTON (JOHN) D. D. a late worthy and learned divine, was born in 1696, at Wembworth, in Devonſhire, his father being rector of that pariſh. He was educated at Corpus Chriſti college, Oxford, where he made ſo rapid a progreſs, that Dr. Mather, the preſident, conferred on him the important office of tutor, while he was only bachelor of arts, and ſoon after he was appointed by the college to read the Greek lecture. His obliging converſation, affability, chearfulneſs, and eaſe, endeared him to thoſe of all ranks in the univerſity. In 1725, being then pro-proctor and maſter of the ſchools, he ſpoke a Latin oration before the determining bachelor, which is intitled Heli; or, an Inſtance of a Magiſtrate's erring through unſeaſonable Lenity; written and publiſhed with a view to encourage the ſalutary exerciſe of academical diſcipline; and afterwards treated the ſame ſubject ſtill more fully in four Latin Sermons, before the univerſity, and publiſhed them with appendixes. He alſo introduced into the ſchools, Locke, and other eminent modern philoſophers, as ſuitable companions to Ariſtotle; and printed a double ſeries of philoſophical queſtions, for the uſe of the younger ſtudents; from which Mr. Johnſon, of Magdalene college, Cambridge, took the hint of his larger work of the ſame kind, which has gone through ſeveral editions.

When the ſettling of Georgia was in agitation, the venerable Dr. Bray, juſtly dear to America, to England, and to religion, for his inſtitution of parochial libraries, Dr. Stephen Hales, Dr. Berriman, and other learned divines, entreated Mr. Burton's pious aſſiſtance in that undertaking. This he readily gave, by preaching before the ſociety in 1732, and publiſhing his Sermon, with an Appendix on the State of that Colony, and he afterwards publiſhed an Account of the Deſigns of the Aſſociates of the late Dr. Bray, with an Account of their Proceedings.

Having under his tuition ſome ingenious pupils from Eton ſchool, this occaſioned an epiſtolary and ſocial intercourſe between him and the maſters, and alſo with the provoſt and fellows of that college, who had ſuch an eſteem for him, that in 1732 they choſe him into a fellowſhip of their ſociety. About the ſame time, on the death of Dr. Edward Littleton, he was preſented by the ſame college to the vicarage of Maple-Derham, in Oxfordſhire. Here a melancholy ſcene, which too often appears in the manſions of the clergy, preſented itſelf to his view: a widow, with three infant daughters, without a home, without a fortune; from his compaſſion aroſe love, the conſequence of which was marriage: for Mrs. Littleton was handſome, elegant, accompliſhed, ingenious, and had great ſweetneſs of temper. As Mr. Burton was here ſituated in a pleaſant ſpot nothing now gave him more delight than repairing, enlarging, and adorning his houſe, embelliſhing his gardens, planting trees, clearing fields, making roads, and ſuch other improvements as he thought would benefit his ſucceſſors; and theſe expences were ſometimes too great for his income.

On the death of his wife, in 1748, Mr. Burton made no abatement in his care and generous concern for her daughters: but from that time reſided moſtly at Eton, giving himſelf up entirely to his friends and his ſtudies; with divine ſervice twice a day: but at every public meeting, on literary, or eccleſiaſtical affairs, at Oxford, Cambridge, or London (if his own college buſineſs permitted) he had as much pleaſure in being preſent, as others have in hunting or racing. In 1752 he took the degree of doctor of divinity, and afterwards publiſhed his Lectures on that occaſion. And indeed to his talents in divinity, Oxford, Eton, London, with his Latin, and his Engliſh Sermons, in two volumes, bear ample witneſs. In 1760 he exchanged his vicarage of Maple Derham for the rectory of Worpleſdon, in Surry. In his advanced age, finding his eyes begin to fail him, he collected and publiſhed, in one volume, all his ſcattered pieces, under the title of Opuſcula Miſcellanea, and ſoon after, being then in his ſeventy-ſixth year, an eryſipelous fever diſturbed his intellects, ſhattered his decaying frame, and of this he died, on the 11th of February, 1771.

BURTON, a town in Weſtmoreland, with a market on Tueſdays, but no fairs. It is ſeated in a valley near the great hill, called Farleton-knot Hill, and is indifferently well built; but the market is very ſmall. It is eleven miles north of Lancaſter, fifty-ſix ſouth of Carliſle, and two hundred and forty-five north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 35. W. Lat. 54. 10. N.

BURTON STATHER, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Mondays. It is ſeated on the eaſtern bank of the Trent, and is twenty-three miles north of Lincoln, thirty-two north-by-weſt of Newark upon Trent, and one hundred and forty nine north-by-weſt of London. Long 0. 30. W. Lat. 53 40. N.

BURTON UPON TRENT, a town in Staffordſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and four fairs; on April 5, for horned cattle and horſes; on Holy-Thurſday, for horned cattle; on July 16, for toys; and on October 29, conſiderable for horſes and horned cattle. This town conſiſts chiefly of one long ſtreet, which runs on the ſide of the river to the bridge, where the abbey ſtood. It is noted for its fine bridge over the Trent, which is five hundred and fifteen yards in length, and has thirty-ſeven arches, all built with free-ſtone. Here the river is navigable for barges, by which means they ſend their ale to London. But there are other places in Staffordſhire which have as good, if not better. It is eighteen miles eaſt of Stafford, and one hundred and twenty-three north-north-weſt from London. Long. 1. 36. W. Lat. 52. 48. N.

BURY, a town in Lancaſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and four fairs, on March 5, May 3, Thurſday but one after Whit-Sunday, and September 18, for horned cattle, horſes, and woollen cloth. It is a populous town, and carries on a large manufacture of bays, and is eight miles north of Manchester, eighteen north-eaſt of Warrington, and one hundred and ninety north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 22. W. Lat. 53. 36. N.

BURY St. EDMUND'S, a corporation town in Suffolk, with a great market on Wedneſdays. It is ſeated in a fine healthful air, near a ſmall river, running on the eaſt ſide of it, which becomes navigable as it advances towards Lynn. It was formerly famous for its abbey, which ſurpaſſed all others in England. It had three churches in its yard, two of which are yet ſtanding, and are handſome pariſh churches. The aſſizes for the county and the quarter-ſeſſions, for the liberty of St. Edmund's, are uſually kept here. Ogilby ſays it has a fine market-hill, a fine fair-ſtead, and a corn-croſs. It is governed by an alderman, a recorder, twelve capital burgeſſes, and twenty-four common council-men. It ſends two members to parliament. There is a very good grammar-ſchool for the bringing up of youth. The houſes are very well built, but the ſtreets are uneven. It is well furniſhed with all kinds of proviſions, particularly fiſh and wild fowl. It has only one fair for millinery goods, butter, and cheeſe, but it continues for a fortnight. It is fourteen miles eaſt of Newmarket, twenty-ſix weſt-north-weſt of Ipſwich, and ſeventy four north-north-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 36. E. Lat. 52. 20 N.

BURY (RICHARD DE). See AUNGERVYLE.

BUSBEC (AUGER GISLEN, lord of) a perſon illuſtrious on account of his embaſſies, was born at Commines, in the year 1522, and educated at the moſt famous univerſities, at Louvain, at Paris, at Venice, at Bologna, and at Padua. He was engaged in ſeveral important employments and negotiations, and was particularly twice ſent embaſſador by the king of the Romans to the emperor Soliman. He collected inſcriptions, bought manuſcripts, ſearched after rare plants, enquired into the nature of animals, and in his ſecond journey to Conſtantinople, carried with him a painter, that he might be able to communicate to the curious, the figures, at leaſt, of the plants and animals that were not well known in the Weſt. He wrote a Diſcourſe of the State of the Ottoman Empire, and a Relation of his two Journeys to Turky, and died October 28, 1592.

BUSBY (RICHARD) the moſt eminent ſchoolmaſter of his time, was born at Lutton, in Lincolnſhire, September 22, 1606, and educated firſt at Weſtminſter-ſchool, and afterwards at Chriſt-church. In 1639 he was admitted to the prebend prebend and rectory of Cudworth, in the church of Wells, and was appointed maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, December 13, 1640, in which laborious ſtation he continued above fifty-five years, and bred up the greateſt number of learned ſcholars that ever adorned any age or nation; but though a perſon of the greateſt ſweetneſs of manners, modeſty, and learning, he was extremely ſevere in his ſchool. After the Reſtoration, he was made a prebendary of Weſtminſter. He gave two hundred and fifty pounds towards repairing and beautifying Chriſt-church college and cathedral; and founded and endowed two lectures in the ſame college, one for the oriental languages, and another for the mathematics, with other benefactions. He compoſed ſeveral books for the uſe of his ſchool.

BUSIRIS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Egypt, was the ſon of Neptune and Lybia, but was killed by Hercules, for ſacrificing ſtrangers, and treating them with great cruelty. Some have thought that there were ſeveral Egyptian kings of this name; but Mr. Bale obſerves, that it is not certain that there ever was one. Melancthon, from his reſearches, thinks it probable that Buſiris was the Pharaoh who occaſioned the deſtruction of the new-born ſons of the Iſraelites.

BUSLEIDEN (JEROME) a native of Arlon, maſter of the requeſts, and counſellor to the ſovereign council of Malines, rendered himſelf famous by his wit, by his works, by the friendſhip he contracted with the learned, and by his embaſſies. He died at Bourdeaux, on the 26th of Auguſt, 1517, after having founded the college of three languages, in the univerſity of Louvain, which bears his name. Several verſes, ſpeeches, and epiſtles were found of his compoſing at Bruges, long after his death.

BUSTAMANTIN (JOHN) profeſſor of philoſophy and phyſic, in the univerſity of Alcala de Henares, the place of his birth. He wrote a book, in Latin, on the Reptiles mentioned in Scripture.

BUSTUARII, in Roman antiquity, gladiators who fought about the buſtum, or funeral pile of a perſon of diſtinction, that the blood which was ſpilt might ſerve as a ſacrifice to the infernal gods, and render them more propitious to the manes of the deceaſed. This cuſtom was introduced in the room of the more inhuman cuſtom of ſacrificing captives at the buſtum, or on the tombs of warriors.

BUTAS, a Greek poet, author of a work in elegiac verſe, in which he accounted for the ceremonies of the Heathens.

BUTEO (JOHN) a famous mathematician, of the ſixteenth century, was born in Charpei, near Valence, in Dauphiné, and became a monk of the order of St. Anthony. He applied himſelf with prodigious aſſiduity to the ſtudy of the mathematics; invented ſeveral inſtruments and engines, and wrote a great number of books, among which, is one on the Dimenſions of Noah's Ark; in which he ſhewed, that it might eaſily contain all the animals ſhut up in it, and the proviſions neceſſary for their ſubſiſtance, during the time of the flood. He died in the year 1560, in the abbey of St. Anthony.

BUTESHIRE, in Scotland, contains two iſlands, Bute and Arran, which lie in the Frith of Clyde; which, with Caithneſs, ſends one member to parliament alternately. Bute is fourteen miles long, and three broad, and at the north end is not above a mile diſtant from Argyleſhire. Arran is of an oval form, and is ſeventeen miles long and eleven broad. It lies to the ſouth of Bute, and is near five miles diſtant; and is ſituate between Cantire and Cunningham. This has been deſcribed already; as for Bute, it contains little remarkable beſides Rothſay, the capital town of the ſhire, the inhabitants whereof live by fiſhing and huſbandry. They ſpeak both the Erſe and Engliſh, and wore the Highland dreſs before the late act of parliament.

BUTLER (JAMES) earl, marquiſs, and duke of Ormond; one of the ableſt ſtateſmen and moſt accompliſhed courtiers of the age in which he flouriſhed, was the ſon of Thomas Butler, eſq. and was born October 19, 1610, in Newcaſtle-houſe, Clerkenwell, London. His grandfather, on the death of Thomas earl of Ormond, aſſuming that title, and his father being unfortunately drowned in Ireland, he obtained that title on the old earl's deceaſe, in 1632. Being made lieutenant general of the forces in Ireland, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and courage againſt the rebels in that kingdom, over whom he gained ſome conſiderable victories, on which account he was created marquiſs of Ormond; but was obliged, for want of money and freſh ſupplies of men, to agree to a ceſſation. He was ſoon after made lord-lieutenant of Ireland; but Cromwell landing at Dublin with a conſiderable body of forces, he was under the neceſſity of retiring to France, where he was reduced to great difficulties, and might have fallen into ſtill greater if the French nobility had not ſhewn him many civilities, inviting him to their houſes, and treating him with all poſſible kindneſs and reſpect. One of theſe invitations was attended with an adventure ſo extraordinary, that we cannot forbear to mention it. A French nobleman, of great quality, having invited him to his houſe at St. Germain en Laye, entertained him there for ſome time in a manner perfectly ſuitable to his own rank, and that of his gueſt. At his coming away, the marquiſs, in compliance with a very inconvenient Engliſh cuſtom, left with the maître d'hotel ten piſtoles, to be diſtributed among the ſervants. It was all the money he had, nor did he know how to get credit for more when he reached Paris. As he was upon the road, ruminating upon this melancholy circumſtance, and contriving how to raiſe a ſmall ſupply for preſent uſe, he was ſurpriſed at being informed by his ſervant, that the nobleman, at whoſe houſe he had been, was behind, driving furiouſly, as if he was deſirous to overtake him. The marquiſs had ſcarce left St. Germain, when the diſtribution of the money he had given cauſed a great diſturbance among the ſervants, who, exalting their own ſervices and attendance, complained of the maître d'hotel's partiality. The nobleman, hearing an unuſual noiſe in his family, enquired into the occaſion, and finding what it was, took the ten piſtoles himſelf, and cauſing horſes to be put to his chariot, made all the haſte that was poſſible after the marquiſs of Ormond. The marquiſs, upon notice of his approach, got off his horſe, as the other quitted his chariot, and advanced to embrace him with great affection and reſpect; but was ſtrangely ſurpriſed to find a coldneſs in the nobleman which forbad all embraces, till he had received ſatisfaction in a point which had given him great offence. He aſked the marquiſs, if he had reaſon to complain of any diſreſpect, or other defect, which he had met with in the too mean, but friendly entertainment which his houſe afforded? and being anſwered by the marquiſs, that his treatment had been full of civility; that he had never paſſed ſo many days more agreeably in his life; and could not but wonder why he ſhould ſuſpect the contrary. The nobleman then told him, that the leaving ten piſtoles to be diſtributed among the ſervants, was treating his houſe as an inn, and was the greateſt affront that could be offered to a man of quality; that he paid his own ſervants well, and had hired them to wait on his friends as well as himſelf; that he conſidered him as a ſtranger who might be unacquainted with the cuſtoms of France, and err through ſome practice deemed leſs diſhonourable in his own country, otherwiſe his reſentment ſhould have prevented any expoſtulation; but as the caſe ſtood, after having explained the nature of the affair, he muſt either redreſs the miſtake by receiving back the ten piſtoles, or give him the uſual ſatisfaction of men of honour for an avowed affront. The marquiſs acknowledged his error, took back his money, and returned to Paris with leſs anxiety about his ſubſiſtence. The marquiſs, after performing ſome ſervices for the king, his maſter, abroad, with infinite hazard to himſelf, came to England, to obtain an exact account of the ſtate of affairs in this kingdom, and returned ſafely, after running through almoſt incredible dangers. In ſhort, he engaged in ſeveral ſchemes for his majeſty's ſervice, and had as great a ſhare in the tranſactions which immediately preceded the king's return as any man about him, and as he had attended his majeſty during his long exile, he accompanied him alſo into England, where he was immediately ſworn of the privy council, made lord-ſteward of the houſhold, and ſoon after appointed lord-lieutenant of Somerſetſhire, high ſteward of Weſtminſter, Kingſton, and Briſtol; created baron of Lathony, and earl of Brecknock: before his majeſty's coronation, he was raiſed to the dignity of duke of Ormond, and in 1662 was declared lord-lieutenant of Ireland, when, by his vigilance, he diſappointed Blood's plot of ſeizing both his perſon and the caſtle of Dublin; and was ſome years after forced out of his coach in St. James's-ſtreet by the ſame villain, who, it is believed, intended to have hanged him at Tyburn, if he had not been happily reſcued. His grace died July 21, 1688, in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age.

BUTLER (THOMAS) earl of Oſſory, was born when his father was earl of Ormond and Oſſory, in the caſtle of Kilkenny, July 9, 1634. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a noble bravery, united to the greateſt gentleneſs and modeſty, which very early excited the jealouſy of Cromwell, who committed him to the Tower, where, falling ill of a fever, after being confined near eight months, he, with great difficulty, conſented to his diſcharge. He afterwards went over to Flanders, and on the Reſtoration attended the king to England, and from being appointed colonel of foot in Ireland, was raiſed to the rank of lieutenant general of the army in that kingdom. On the 14th of September, 1666, he was ſummoned by writ to the Engliſh houſe of lords, by the title of lord Butler, of Moore-park: but he had not ſat ſix weeks in the houſe of lords before he called the duke of Buckingham to an account, for ſaying, in the debate on the bill for prohibiting the importation of Iriſh cattle, that "none were againſt it but ſuch as had Iriſh eſtates, or Iriſh

" ſtandings." Care was however taken to prevent their meeting each other. In the year 1670, the duke of Buckingham being thought to be the author of the inſult offered his father, by colonel Blood; the earl coming by chance into the royal preſence, and ſeeing the duke of Buckingham ſtanding by the king, his colour roſe, and he addreſſed him in the following words: "My lord, I know that you are at "the bottom of this attempt of Blood's upon my father; "and therefore I give you fair warning: if my father "comes to a violent end, by ſword or piſtol; if he dies by "the hand of a ruffian; or by the more ſecret way of poiſon: "I ſhall not be at a loſs to know the firſt author of it; I "ſhall conſider you as the aſſaſſin; I ſhall treat you as ſuch; "and wherever I meet you, I ſhall piſtol you, though you "ſtood behind the king's chair: and I tell it you in his "majeſty's preſence, that you may be ſure I ſhall keep my "word." After this, he entered into the navy, and aroſe to the rank of rear admiral of the red; and in 1676, went over to Holland, and had, the year after, the command of the Britiſh ſubjects in the pay of the ſtates, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſo glorious a manner, eſpecially at the battle of Mons; and in contributing to the retreat of marſhal Luxemburg, that the ſtates of Holland, the governor of the Spaniſh Low Countries, and even his Catholic majeſty himſelf, wrote him a letter of thanks under their own hands. He was at laſt appointed governor of Tangier, in Barbary, but while he was preparing for the voyage, was ſeized with a malignant fever, of which he died, July 30, 1680, in the forty-ſixth year of his age.

BUTLER (JAMES) duke of Ormond, was born in Dublin-caſtle, on the 29th of April, 1665, and ſtudied at Chriſt-church college, Oxford. At ſeventeen years of age he married the daughter of the lord Hyde, afterwards earl of Rocheſter; in 1684 went to the ſiege of Luxemburg, and the following year was made lord of the bedchamber, and ſerved againſt the duke of Monmouth in the weſt. Having buried his firſt wife, he married the lady Mary Somerſet, daughter of the duke of Beaufort. He was ſoon after elected chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford, and inſtalled knight of the garter. He attended king James to Saliſbury, but on his majeſty's return, went over to the prince of Orange at Sherbourn-caſtle, entered Saliſbury with him; and went from thence with a body of the prince's troops to Oxford, and cauſed his declaration to be publicly read in that univerſity. After king William and queen Mary were proclaimed, he was made one of the lords of the bedchamber, and attending king William to Ireland, was at the battle of the Boyne. In 1693 he was at the battle of Landen, where being wounded, and his horſe ſhot under him, he was taken priſoner: a ſoldier was on the point of killing him, when one of the French king's guards, ſeeing a rich diamond ring on his finger, concluded him a perſon of diſtinction, and reſcued him from the danger; afterwards he was exchanged for the duke of Berwick. In 1695 his grace commanded the ſecond troop of guards, at the taking of Namur. In the reign of queen Anne he ſailed with admiral Rook, as commander of all her majeſty's land forces, and joined with him in the expeditions againſt Cadiz and Vigo. His grace was afterwards twice lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In January, 1711-12, he was nominated commander in chief of her majeſty's forces, and on the 23d of April, reviewing the troops in Flanders, his grace informed the officers, that her majeſty, hoping the negociation for a peace would prove ſucceſsful, had given him orders not to act offenſively againſt the enemy. The next day he ſent to deſire a conference with prince Eugene, and the deputies of the ſtate's general of the United Provinces, who attended the army, and informed them that he had received orders to publiſh a ſuſpenſion of arms for two months, between his army and the French, and to ſend a detachment to take poſſeſſion of Dunkirk. The allies, however, would not agree to the ſuſpenſion, and he marched off with the Britiſh troops, on which their army, commanded by the earl of Albemarle, was totally routed by marſhal Villars, and other advantages obtained by the enemy. This proceeding not only raiſed the reſentment of the allies, but of the Engliſh, who were ſhocked at beholding a war, in which the great duke of Marlborough had obtained a glorious ſeries of victories, thus concluded. But the duke it ſeems only obeyed his orders, and therefore, on his return to England, waited on the queen at Windſor, and met with a moſt gracious reception.

On the acceſſion of king George I. to the throne, his grace was diſmiſſed from all his employments, and ſoon after impeached by Mr. Secretary Stanhope of high treaſon, on which he privately withdrew to France. A bill was then brought into the houſe of commons to ſummon him to ſurrender, on pain of being attainted of high treaſon, which paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent. The duke neglecting to obey this ſummons, the houſe of lords ordered the earl-marſhal to eraſe his name out of the liſt; his arms were alſo eraſed, and his atchievements as knight of the garter were taken down from St. George's chapel at Windſor. The commons of Ireland alſo brought in a bill to attaint his grace, and ſet ten thouſand pounds on his head. Inventories were alſo taken of his perſonal eſtate, and both that and his real eſtate veſted in the crown.

His grace, while in France, took the title of colonel Commerford; and being invited to the court of Spain, he there received a penſion of two thouſand piſtoles, with which he retired to Avignon, where he enjoyed a calm retreat. His grace was, throughout the whole courſe of his life, remarkable for his hoſpitality and beneficence. His charity at Avignon extended to perſons of all religions, and of all countries, particularly to the Engliſh. He had there divine ſervice performed in his houſe, according to the liturgy of the church of England, twice every Sunday, and on every Wedneſday and Friday morning throughout the year. In October, 1745, he complained of a want of appetite, and grew too weak to walk, and died on the 16th of November following, in the eighty-firſt year of his age, after having ſuffered exile above thirty years. His body was embalmed, and brought, the May following, through France to England, lodged in the Jeruſalem chamber, and ſoon after interred in the vault of his anceſtors, in king Henry the Seventh's chapel.

BUTLER (JOSEPH) late biſhop of Durham, a prelate diſtinguiſhed by his piety and learning, was the youngeſt ſon of Mr. Thomas Butler, a reputable ſhopkeeper at Wantage, in Berkſhire, where he was born in the year 1692. His father, who was a Preſbyterian, obſerving that he had a ſtrong inclination to learning, after his being at a grammar ſchool, ſent him to an academy in Glouceſterſhire, in order to qualify him for a diſſenting miniſter; and while there, he wrote ſome remarks on Dr. Clarke's firſt Sermon, at Boyle's Lecture. Afterwards, reſolving to conform to the eſtabliſhed church, he ſtudied at Oriel college, where he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Mr. Edward Talbot, ſon of the biſhop of Durham, and brother to the lord Chancellor, who laid the foundation of his ſubſequent advancement. He was firſt appointed preacher at the Rolls, and rector of Haughton and Stanhope, two rich benefices in the biſhoprick of Durham. He quitted the Rolls in 1726, and, in 1733, was made chaplain to the lord Chancellor, who gave him a prebend in the church of Rocheſter. He was afterwards appointed clerk of the cloſet to queen Caroline, and nominated ſucceſſively to the biſhoprick of Briſtol, and deanry of St. Paul's. He was at length made clerk of the cloſet to the king, and, in 1750, was tranſlated to the ſee of Durham. He died at Bath, on the 16th of June, 1752. His deep learning, and comprehenſive mind, appear in his writings. Theſe are The Analogy of Religion, natural and revealed, to the Conſtitution and Courſe of Nature, octavo; and a volume of Sermons, preached at the Rolls chapel.

BUTLER (SAMUEL) the celebrated author of Hudibras, was born at Strenſham, in Worceſterſhire, in 1612, and educated at the free-ſchool of Worceſter, and afterwards at Cambridge. He was clerk to Mr. Jefferys, an eminent juſtice of the peace in his own county, when, at his leiſure hours, he applied himſelf to hiſtory, poetry, painting, and muſic: he was afterwards recommended to the counteſs of Kent, and wrote letters for the great Mr. Selden. He alſo ſerved ſir Samuel Luke, a gentleman of an ancient family in Bedfordſhire, and a famous commander under Oliver Cromwell, about which time he wrote his Hudibras. Mr. Granger obſerves, that Butler "ſtands without rival in burleſque poetry. His Hudibras," ſays he, "is, in its kind, "almoſt as great an effort of genius, as the Paradiſe Loſt "itſelf. It abounds with uncommon learning, new rhymes, "and original thoughts. Its images are truly and naturally "ridiculous. There are many ſtrokes of temporary ſatire, "and ſome characters and alluſions which cannot be diſcovered at this diſtance of time. The character of Hudibras is, with good reaſon, believed to have been intended for ſir Samuel Luke, and that of Whachum, but "with leſs probability for captain George Wharton." Mr. Butler was afterwards ſecretary to Richard earl of Carbury, lord-preſident of the principality of Wales, who appointed him ſteward of Ludlow-caſtle; but no one was a more generous friend to him than Charles lord Buckhurſt, earl of Dorſet. He died September 25, 1680.

BUTRINTO, the capital town of Albany, ſeated in a gulph of the ſame name, in the channel of Corfu, with a biſhop's ſee. It had a good port, but it is choaked up. It belongs to the Venetians, and is thirty miles ſouth eaſt of Chimera. Long. 20. 40. E. Lat. 39. 45. N.

BUTTON's BAY, is the north part of Hudſon's Bay, in North America, through which attempts have been made to diſcover a north-weſt paſſage to China. It is ſo called from ſir Thomas Button, who here loſt his ſhip, and came back in a ſloop built in the country. It lies between ſixty and ſixty-ſix degrees of north latitude.

BUTZAW, a town of Germany, in Lower Saxony, and in the biſhoprick of Schwerin. It had a caſtle, where the biſhops of Schwerin formerly reſided. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth-weſt of Roſtock, and thirty eaſt-north-eaſt of Schwerin. Long. 13. 12. E. Lat. 54. 50. N.

BUXTON (JEDEDIAH) one who, conſidering his education, muſt ever be conſidered as a prodigy with reſpect to his ſkill in numbers. His grandfather, John Buxton, was vicar of Elmton, in Derbyſhire, and his father, William Buxton, was ſchool-maſter of the ſame pariſh, where he was born in 1704; yet Jedediah's education was ſo much neglected, that he was never taught to write; and with reſpect to any other knowledge but that of numbers, ſeemed always as ignorant as a boy of ten years of age. How he came firſt to know the relative proportions of numbers, and their progreſſive denominations, he did not remember, but to this he applied the whole force of his mind, and upon this his attention was conſtantly fixed, ſo that he frequently took no cognizance of external objects, and when he did, it was only with reſpect to their numbers. If any ſpace of time was mentioned, he would ſoon after ſay it was ſo many minutes, and if any diſtance of way, he would aſſign the number of hair's breadths, without any queſtion being aſked, or any calculation expected by the company. When he once underſtood a queſtion, he began to work with amazing facility, after his own method, without the uſe of a pen, pencil, or chalk, or even underſtanding the common rules of arithmetic, as taught in the ſchools. A gentleman aſked him the following queſtion: Suppoſe a field 423 yards long, and 383 wide, what was the area? and in two minutes, by the gentleman's watch, he anſwered, 162,009 yards. He then aſked him how many acres the above field meaſured? and in eleven minutes he anſwered, 33 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches, 20 yards and a quarter juſt. The gentleman then obſerved, that allowing the diſtance between London and York to be 204 miles, he would know how many times a coach wheel turned round in that diſtance, allowing the wheel's circumference to be ſix yards? In thirteen minutes he anſwered 59,840 times. The next propoſition was, in a bin 346 inches long, 255 inches wide, and 94 inches deep, how many gallons liquid meaſure, and what corn would it hold? The anſwer was, 3,454,464 ſolid inches, or 1,768,568 half quarters of ſolid inches, making 12,249,872 gallons liquid meaſure, or 12,249 gallons, 3 quarts, and 24 and a half inches; or it will hold 191 quarters, 3 buſhels, 3 quarterns and a half quartern, and 34 inches and a half remainder. Again, ſuppoſe a canal was to be dug 426 feet long, 263 wide, and 2 feet and a half deep, how many cubical yards of earth are to be removed? After pauſing a quarter of an hour, he anſwered, 10,373 yards 24 feet. He would ſtride over a piece of land or a field, and tell you the contents of it almoſt as exact as if you had meaſured it by the chain. In this manner he meaſured the whole lordſhip of Elmton, of ſome thouſand acres, belonging to ſir John Rhodes, and brought him the contents, not only in acres, roods, and perches, but even in ſquare inches. After this, for his own amuſement, he reduced them into ſquare hairs breadths, computing 48 to each ſide of the inch. His memory was ſo great, that while reſolving a queſtion, he could leave off and reſume the operation again, where he left off, the next morning, or at a week, a month, or at ſeveral months, and proceed regularly till it was completed.

His memory would doubtleſs have been equally retentive, with reſpect to other objects, if he had attended to other objects with equal diligence; but his perpetual application to figures prevented the ſmalleſt acquiſition of any other knowledge. He was ſometimes aſked, on his return from church, whether he remembered the text, or any part of the ſermon, but it never appeared that he brought away one ſentence; his mind, upon a cloſer examination, being found to have been buſied, even during divine ſervice, in its favourite operation, either dividing ſome time, or ſome ſpace, into the ſmalleſt known parts, or reſolving ſome queſtion that had been given him, as a teſt of his abilities.

This extraordinary perſon living in laborious poverty, his life was uniform and obſcure. Time, with reſpect to him, changed nothing but his age, nor did the ſeaſons vary his employment, except that in winter he uſed a flail, and in ſummer a ling-hook. In the year 1754 he came to London, where he was introduced to the Royal Society, who, in order to prove his abilities, aſked him ſeveral queſtions in arithmetic, and he gave them ſuch ſatisfaction, that they diſmiſſed him with a handſome gratuity. In this viſit to the metropolis the only object of his curioſity, except figures, was his deſire to ſee the king and royal family, but they being juſt removed to Kenſington, Jedediah was diſappointed. During his reſidence in London he was taken to ſee King Richard III. performed at Drury-lane playhouſe, and it was expected either that the novelty and the ſplendor of the ſhew would have fixed him in aſtoniſhment, or kept his imagination in a continual hurry, or that his paſſions would, in ſome degree, have been touched by the power of action, if he had not perfectly underſtood the dialogue; but Jedediah's mind was employed in the play-houſe, juſt as it was employed in every other place. During the dance he fixed his attention upon the number of ſteps; he declared after a fine piece of muſic, that the innumerable ſounds produced by the inſtruments had perplexed him beyond meaſure, and he attended even to Mr. Garrick, only to count the words that he uttered, in which he ſaid he perfectly ſucceeded. Jedediah returned to the place of his birth, where, if his enjoyments were few, his wiſhes did not ſeem to be more. He applied to his labour, by which he ſubſiſted with chearfulneſs; he regretted nothing that he left behind him in London; and it continued to be his opinion, that a ſlice of ruſty bacon afforded the moſt delicious repaſt.

BUXTON WELLS, in Derbyſhire, famous for the ſalutary qualities of their waters. They are nine in number, and riſe near a village of the ſame name. Theſe waters are hot, ſulphureous, and ſaline, and yet have no ſtrong ſmell nor bad taſte. They are not purgative, and yet they open obſtructions, and create an appetite. They are of a proper heat to bathe in, and when thus uſed, are good for ſcorbutic rheumatiſms, and diſtempers of the nerves. There are convenient lodgings for thoſe that frequent theſe wells, where every one may be accommodated according to their quality. Theſe wells are thirty-two miles north-weſt of Derby, and one hundred and ſixty north-weſt of London. Long. 20. W. Lat. 33. 20. N.

BUXTORF (JOHN) a learned profeſſor of Hebrew at Baſil, who, in the ſeventeenth century, acquired the higheſt reputation for his knowledge of the Hebrew and Chaldee languages. He died of the plague at Baſil, in 1620, at ſixty-five years of age. His principal works are, 1. A ſmall but excellent Hebrew Grammar, the beſt edition of which is that of Leyden in 1701, reviſed by Leuſden. 2. A Treaſure of the Hebrew Grammar. 3. An Hebrew Concordance, and ſeveral Hebrew Lexicons. 4. Inſtitutio Epiſtolaris Hebraica. 5. De Abbreviaturis Hebræorum, &c.

BUXTORF (JOHN) the ſon of the former, and a learned profeſſor of the Oriental languages at Baſil, diſtinguiſhed himſelf, like his father, by his knowledge of the Hebrew language, and his rabbinical learning. His died at Baſil in 1648. His principal works are, 1. His Tranſlation of the More Nevochim, and the Cozri. 2. A Chaldee and Syriac Lexicon. 3. An Anticritic againſt Cappel. 4. A Treatiſe on the Hebrew Points and Accents, againſt the ſame Cappel, &c.

BUZANCOIS, a ſmall town of France, in Berry, on the confines of Tourain, ſeated on the river Indrun, twenty-three miles weſt of Iſoudun. Long. 1. 29. E. Lat. 46. 38. N.

BUZET, a ſmall town of France, in Languedoc, ſeated on the river Torne, in the dioceſe of Toulouſe. Long. 1. 45. E. Lat. 43. 47. N.

BYBLIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Miletus and Cyane, who falling in love with her brother Caunus, he, deteſting the thought of inceſt, fled from his country, and ſhe following him weeping, was, according to Ovid, turned, by the Naiades, into a fountain.

BYCHOW, a ſmall town of Poland, in Lithuania, and palatinate of Miſciſlaw, ſeated on the Nieper, thirty-three miles from Mohilow, and forty-two north-eaſt of Rohacſtow. Long. 30. 2. E. Lat. 53. 57. N.

BUNÆUS (ANTHONY) a learned Proteſtant divine, born at Utrecht, on the 6th of Auguſt, 1654, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. De Calceis Hebræorum, 2. Chriſtus Crucifixus. 3. Explicatio Hiſtoriæ Evangelicæ de Nativitate Chriſti. He died at Deventer, Nov. 8, 1698.

BYNG (GEORGE) lord viſcount Torrington, and rear-admiral of Great Britain, was born in the year 1663, and at the age of fifteen went a volunteer to ſea, with the king's warrant. But in 1681 he quitted the ſea ſervice, upon the invitation of general Kirk, governor of Tangier, ſerved as a cadet in the grenadiers of that garriſon, and arrived to the rank of lieutenant. However, in 1684, after the demolition of Tangier, he was appointed lieutenant of the Orford, from which time he conſtantly kept to the ſea ſerſervice. The next year he went lieutenant of his Majeſty's ſhip the Phœnix, to the Eaſt Indies, where engaging and boarding a Zinganian pirate, who maintained a deſperate fight, moſt of thoſe who entered with him were ſlain, himſelf greatly wounded, and the pirate ſinking, he was taken out of the ſea, with ſcarce any remains of life. After being ſeveral times advanced, he was, in 1702, raiſed to the command of the Naſſau, a third rate, and was at the taking and burning the French fleet at Vigo, and the next year he was made rear-admiral of the red. In 1704 he commanded manded the ſquadron that attacked, cannonaded, and took Gibraltar, and, in 1708, was made admiral of the blue, in 1711 admiral of the white, and in 1715 created a baronet. He performed the moſt important ſervices, with the moſt remarkable courage, fidelity, and ſucceſs. In the wars which raged ſo many years in the reigns of king William, queen Anne, and king George I. wars fruitful of naval combats and expeditions; there was ſcarce an action of any conſequence in which he did not bear a principal part, nor were there any dangers or difficulties ſo great, but he ſurmounted them by his exquiſite conduct, and a good fortune that never failed him. In the reign of queen Anne he prevented an invaſion in Scotland, and reſcued the city of Edinburgh from the threatened attack of a French ſquadron, which had many rebels and numerous forces on board; and in the reign of king George I. when new contentions were ſpringing up in Italy, and the diſcord of princes was on the point of embroiling Europe again in a war, he, with ſingular ſucceſs, interpoſed, and, with a Britiſh fleet, truſhed, at one blow, the laboured efforts of Spain to ſet up a power at ſea, and advanced the reputation of our arms in the Mediterranean to ſuch a pitch, that the Britiſh flag gave laws to the contending parties, and enabled us to ſettle the tranquility that had been diſturbed. For this laſt important ſervice king George I. wrote him a letter of thanks with his own hand, his Imperial majeſty did the ſame, and alſo ſent him his picture ſet with large diamonds, and at home he was made treaſurer of the navy, rear-admiral of Great Britain, one of his majeſty's privy council, and ſoon after, in 1721, was created a peer of Great Britain, by the title of viſcount Torrington, and baron Byng, of Southill, in Bedfordſhire; and, in 1725, he was made one of the knights of the Bath, upon the revival of that ancient and honourable order. His late majeſty, on his coming to the throne, made him firſt lord commiſſioner of the admiralty, in which high ſtation he died, at his houſe in the Admiralty, of an aſthma, in January, 1733, in the ſeventieth year of his age.

While he preſided in the admiralty, he laboured in improving the naval force of this kingdom, in procuring encouragement for ſailors, who, in him, loſt a true friend; and in promoting the eſtabliſhment of a corporation for the relief of the widows and children of commiſſion and warrant officers of the royal navy.

BYNG (the honourable GEORGE) eſq. the unhappy ſon of the former, was bred to the ſea, and roſe to the rank of admiral of the blue, and in that ſtation was ſent with a Britiſh fleet, in 1756, to the relief of Fort St. Philip, in the iſland of Minorca, which had for ſome time been beſieged by the French. He arrived off Minorca, and on the 20th of May, in the ſame year, engaged the French fleet, commanded by M. Galiſſoniere; but this engagement ending very little to the ſatisfaction of the Engliſh nation, and Minorca being ſoon after ſurrendered to the enemy, Mr. Byng was ſent for home, and tried by a court-martial, held on board the St. George, in Portſmouth harbour, which began on the 28th of December, 1756, and ended on the 27th of January following, when ſentence of death was paſſed upon him, for not doing his utmoſt to take, ſeize, and deſtroy the ſhips of the French king. The court unanimouſly agreeing that he fell under part of the twelfth article of the Act of the 22d of king George II. for amending the laws relating to the government of his majeſty's ſhips; but at the ſame time drew up an addreſs to the lords of the admiralty, praying them to recommend admiral Byng to his majeſty's clemency. But this addreſs not being attended with ſucceſs, he was ſhot on board his majeſty's ſhip the Monarque, in Portſmouth harbour, on the 14th of March, 1757.

BYROM (JOHN) an elegant writer and ingenious poet, was deſcended from a genteel family, and born at Manchеſter, in the year 1691. He had his education at Merchant-Taylor's ſchool, in London, and Trinity college, in Cambridge. His genius for poetry began to diſcover itſelf very early, and when he had attained to the twenty-third year of his age, he compoſed that beautiful paſtoral, beginning with, "My Time, O ye Muſes, was happily ſpent," which was printed in the eighth volume of the Spectator. He likewiſe wrote two humourous Letters upon Dreams, which were inſerted in the ſame volume. Being affected, it is ſaid, with an hereditary diſorder, he went to Montpellier, for the recovery of his health; and upon his return to England, fell deeply in love with his couſin, Miſs Elizabeth Byrom, whom he ſoon after married, againſt the conſent of her parents, who were ſo enraged at the match, that they refuſed to give their daughter the fortune they had intended her; ſo that Dr. Byrom (for ſo he was now called) was obliged to ſupport his family by teaching the art of writing ſhort hand, in which he excelled. Upon the death, however, of his elder brother, Mr. Edward Byrom, he ſucceeded to the family eſtate at Kerſal, and ſpent the remainder of his days in the full enjoyment of that conjugal felicity, for which he had a peculiar reliſh. He died at Manchеſter, September 26, 1763, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age. Beſides the pieces already mentioned, he wrote an excellent poem upon Enthuſiaſm, and another upon the Immortality of the Soul, together with ſome Epigrams.

BYZANTIUM, the ancient name of Conſtantinople, which ſee.

BZOVIUS (ABRAHAM) a native of Poland, and a Dominican friar, was one of the moſt celebrated writers of the ſeventeenth century, with reſpect to the aſtoniſhing number of pieces compoſed by him. On his coming to Rome, he was received with open arms by the pope, and had an apartment aſſigned him in the Vatican. His chief work is the Continuation of Baronius's Annals, in twelve volumes, in which he imitates Baronius to admiration, in making all things conſpire to the deſpotic power and glory of the papal ſee. He died in 1637, aged ſeventy.

C.

CAANA, or KAANA, a town in Upper Egypt, ſeated on the eaſtern banks of the river Nile, from whence they carry corn and pulſe for the ſupply of Mecca in Arabia. There are ſeveral monuments of antiquity yet remaining, adorned with hieroglyphics. It is three hundred and twenty miles ſouth of Cairo. Long. 32. 23. E. Lat. 24. 30. N.

CABADES, king of Perſia, loſt that crown in 497, for reſolving that all the women in his kingdom ſhould be common; but four years after was reſtored to the throne. He at firſt perſecuted the Chriſtians, but afterwards granted them toleration on account, it is ſaid, of the miracles performed by a certain biſhop. He made war againſt the emperor Anaſtatius, took Amida in 502, and at length concluded a peace with that emperor, and with Juſtin his ſucceſſor. Juſtinian, however, gained great advantages over Cabades, by the bravery and conduct of Beliſarius. Cabades died in 531, and was ſucceeded by Coſroës, his ſon.

CABALLO (EMANUEL) an illuſtrious Genoeſe, who, in 1513, immortalized his name by his bravery, by which he cauſed the French to raiſe the ſiege of Genoa, and obtained the glorious title of the Deliverer of his Country.

CABASILAS (NICHOLAS) a learned archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, lived in the fourteenth century, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing two Treatiſes againſt the Latins, an Expoſition of the Greek Liturgy, and other learned works.

CABASSUT (JOHN) a famous prieſt of the Oratory, born at Aix. He taught civil and canon law at Avignon, and died at Aix, on the 25th of September, 1685, aged eighty-one. His principal works are, 1. Juris canonici Theoria et Praxis, of which a new edition, in folio, has been publiſhed by Mr. Guibert, with notes. 2. Notitia Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ, Conciliorum, & Canonum, the beſt edition of which is that of 1670, in folio.

CABECA DE VIDE, a ſmall ſea-port town of Alentejo, in Portugal, with good walls and a ſtrong caſtle. It is thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Port-Allegro, and twenty north of Eſtremos. Long. 6. 43. W. Lat. 39. 0. N.

CABIRI, in pagan mythology, three great deities brought from Egypt into Samothracia and the Ægean iſles. Theſe were Oſiris, Iris, and Horus, who aſſumed the names of Axieros, Axiocherſa, and Axiocherſos, to which ſome add a fourth, called Caſmillus, or Camillus, who was the Egyptian Anubis. See OSIRIS, ISIS, &c.

CABIRIA, in Grecian antiquity, feſtivals in honour of the Cabiri, obſerved at Thebes, Lemnos, and Samothracia. All who were initiated into the myſteries of theſe gods, were thought to be ſecured from ſtorms at ſea, and all other dangers. The ceremony of initiation was performed by placing the candidates crowned with olive branches, and girded about the loins with a purple ribband, on a kind of throne, about which the prieſts and perſons before initiated danced.

CABOT (SEBASTIAN) the firſt diſcoverer of the continent of America, was the ſon of John Cabot, a Venetian. He was born at Briſtol, in 1477, and was taught by his father arithmetic, geometry, and coſmography. Before he was twenty years of age, he made ſeveral voyages. The firſt of any conſequence ſeems to have been made with his father, who had a commiſſion from Henry VII. for the diſcovery of a north-weſt paſſage to India. They ſailed in the ſpring of 1497, and proceeding to the north-weſt, diſcovered land, which, for that reaſon, they called Primaviſta, or Newfoundland. Another ſmaller iſland they named St. John, from its being diſcovered on the feaſt of St. John Baptiſt; after which they ſailed along the continent of America, as far as Cape Florida, and then returned to England with a good cargo, and three Indians on board. Stowe and Speed aſcribe theſe diſcoveries wholly to Sebaſtian, without mentioning his father. It is probable, that Sebaſtian, after his father's death, made ſeveral voyages to thoſe parts, as a map of his diſcoveries, drawn by himſelf, was hung up in the Privy Garden, at Whitehall. However, hiſtory gives but little account of his life for near twenty years, when he went to Spain, where he was made pilot-major and entruſted with reviewing all projects for diſcoveries, which were then very numerous. His great capacity, and approved integrity, induced many great merchants to treat with him about a voyage by the new-found ſtreights of Magellan to the Moluccas. He, therefore, ſailed in 1525, firſt to the Canaries, then to the Cape Verd iſlands, thence to St. Auguſtine and the iſland of Patos, when ſome of his people beginning to be mutinous, and refuſing to paſs through the ſtreights, he laid aſide the deſign of ſailing to the Moluccas, left ſome of the principal mutineers aſhore on a deſart iſland, and ſailing up the rivers of Plate and Paraguay, diſcovered and built forts in a large tract of fine country, that produced gold, ſilver, and other rich commodities. He thence diſpatched meſſengers to Spain for a ſupply of proviſions, ammunition, goods for trade, and a recruit of men; but his requeſt not being readily complied with, after ſtaying five years in America, he returned home, but met with a cold reception, the merchants being diſpleaſed at his not having purſued his voyage to the Moluccas, while his treatment of the mutineers had given umbrage at court.

Hence he returned to England, and being introduced to the duke of Somerſet, then lord protector, a new office was erected for him, and he was made governor of the myſtery and company of the merchant-adventurers for the diſcovery of regions, dominions, iſlands, and places unknown, and a penſion granted him by letters patent of 166l. 13s. 4d. per annum; and he was conſulted in all affairs relating to trade. In 1522, by his intereſt, the court fitted out ſome ſhips for the diſcovery of the northern parts of the world. This produced the firſt voyage the Engliſh made to Ruſſia, and the beginning of that commerce which has ever ſince been carried on between the two nations. The Ruſſia company was now founded by a charter granted by Philip and Mary, of which Sebaſtian was appointed governor for life. He is ſaid to be the firſt who took notice of the variation of the needle, and that publiſhed a map of the world. The exact time of his death is not known, but he lived to be above ſeventy years of age.

CABRA, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Tombut. It is a large town, but without walls, and is ſeated on the river Niger, about twelve miles from Tombut. The houſes are built in the ſhape of bells, and the walls are made with ſtakes or hurdles, plaiſtered with clay, and covered with reeds after the manner of thatch. This place is very much frequented by negroes, who come here by water to trade. The judge who decides controverſies is appointed by the king of Tombut. They have plenty of corn, cattle, milk, and butter; but ſalt is very ſcarce. The colour of the inhabitants is black, and their religion is a ſort of Mohammedaniſm. This town is very unhealthy, which is probably owing to its low ſituation. Long. 0. 50. E. Lat. 14. 21.

CABUL, the chief town of Cabuliſtan, is very large and populous, and drives a great trade, particularly in cattle. It lies in the road between Samarcand and Lahor, which is a very advantageous circumſtance, and is much frequented by the Tartars, Perſians, and Indians. The Uſbec Tartars, in particular, ſell every year, at this place, ſixty thouſand horſes; the Perſians bring cattle and ſheep, which renders proviſions very cheap. They have likewiſe wine, and plenty of all ſorts of eatables. This town is well fortified, has two ſtrong caſtles, beſides palaces and caravanſeras. Long. 68. 15. E. Lat. 33. 30. N.

CABULISTAN, a province of Aſia, in the empire of the mogul, but was ceded to Kouli Kan in 1739, who then governed Perſia. It is bounded on the north by Bucharia, on the eaſt by Caſchmire, on the weſt by Zabuliſtan and Candahar, and on the ſouth by Multan. It is two hundred and fifty miles in length, two hundred and forty in breadth, and the chief town is Cabul. This country in general is not very fruitful; but in the vales they have good paſture land. The roads are much infeſted with Affgans, which obliges the natives to have guards for the ſecurity of travellers. Theſe people live in the mountains on the ſide of Perſia, and are reckoned good ſoldiers. The religion of the Cabuliſtans is pagan; and their extraordinary time of devotion is the full moon in February, which continues for two days. At this time, they are cloathed in red, make their offerings, dance to the ſound of the trumpet, and make viſits to their friends in maſquerade dreſſes. They ſay, their god Cruſman killed a giant who was his enemy, and that he appeared like a little child; in memory of which, they cauſe a child to ſhoot at the figure of a giant. Thoſe of the ſame tribe make bonfires, and feaſt together in a jovial manner. The moral part of their religion conſiſts in charity; for which reaſon, they dig wells and build houſes for the accommodation of travellers.

They have plenty of proviſions, mines of iron, myrobolans, aromatic woods, and drugs of many kinds. They carry on a great trade with the neighbouring countries, by which means they are very rich, and are ſupplied with plenty of all things.

CACERES, a town of Spain, in the province of Eſtramadura, is ſeated on the river Saler, and is noted for the exceeding fine wool which the ſheep bear in the neighbourhood. Between this town and Brocos, there is a wood, where the allies defeated the rear guard of the duke of Berwick, on the 7th of April, 1706. It is twenty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Alcantara, and thirty-five ſouth-eaſt of Placentia. Long. 6 47. E. Lat. 39. 15. N.

CACHAO, the capital of a province of the ſame name, in the kingdom of Tonquin, in Aſia. It is ſeated on a riſing ground, in a plain, without ramparts, walls, or ditches, on the weſt ſide of the river Hoti. It contains about two thouſand houſes, which are generally low, with mud walls, and covered with thatch, and conſiſt only of two or three rooms on a ground-floor; the windows are only a ſquare hole, without glaſs, which are cloſed at night with a ſhutter. The firſt room is furniſhed with ſtools, benches, and chairs, as alſo a little altar, with two incenſe pans: here they ſometimes dreſs their victuals, but oftner in the ſtreet. The other rooms ſerve for lodgings. Some of theſe houſes are built with brick and tiled; and moſt of them have a court or backſide, in which is a vaulted building, ſhaped like an oven, about ſix feet high; it is compoſed of bricks from the top to the bottom, and daubed over with mud and clay. This is to preſerve their beſt effects from fires, which are frequent in this town, and are often ſo quick, that they have ſcarce time to remove their goods into theſe ovens. In the dry ſeaſon, the inhabitants are obliged to have a veſſel of water on the tops of their houſes, ready to quench the fire when it happens, beſides a long pole, with a bucket at the end, to dip into the ditches when there is occaſion. When the fire cannot be brought under, they have a method of cutting the ſtays which ſupport the thatch, and letting it fall down, that it may do as little miſchief as poſſible; and ſometimes they extinguiſh the fire by this means.

The principal ſtreets of the town are large, though ſome are narrow, and are paved with ſmall ſtones, but very poorly. In the dry ſeaſon, the ſtanding water ſtinks abominably; and in the wet, the ſtreets are exceeding dirty. The king of Tonquin reſides in this town, and has three palaces, two of which are built with wood, and defended with cannon planted in the neighbouring houſes. There are likewiſe ſtables for the king's horſes and elephants, with large ſquares, wherein the ſoldiers are reviewed. The third is the palace-royal, which is built with much more magnificence than the former two, though with the ſame materials. The walls that ſurround it are ſaid to be nine miles in circumference, ſix feet high, and five feet thick. There are ſeveral gates; but the largeſt is opened only for the king. Within the walls are large ponds, with boats, for his diverſion.

The Engliſh had the beſt houſe in the town for a factory, but it was abandoned long ſince. The Dutch had another near it, but that too is forſaken. The moſt remarkable thing in this place is a wooden ſtructure, erected on piles, or ſtakes, driven into the river, about ſeventeen feet high above the level of the water, and well connected together with beams laid acroſs. The deſign of it is to break the force of the current in the rainy ſeaſon, which would otherwiſe not only break down the dikes, and carry them away, but even, in proceſs of time, the houſes themſelves. When the water of the river is higheſt, it reaches within three feet of the top, which ſhews that its riſe is fourteen feet.

The inhabitants that apply themſelves to trade are civil and polite with regard to ſtrangers; but the higher ſort are proud, haughty, and ambitious; the ſoldiers inſolent; and the common people thieviſh; theſe, rather than miſs of their deſign, would make a way under ground to get into one of the factories. Polygamy is lawful; and they buy their wives of the father and mother. This cuſtom obliges many of the meaner ſort to live ſingle, becauſe they have not wherewithal to buy and maintain a wife; but theſe are not many; for there are ſuch plenty of women, that they are not only cheap, but very deſirous of having a huſband, though never ſo poor; however, in a time of ſcarcity, theſe wretches make no ſcruple of ſelling their wives and children too, to buy a little rice.

This cuſtom of ſelling their women has made way for another, that is of letting them out for hire; the young ones more particularly offer themſelves to foreigners of their own accord. Their prices are different, according to their degree and beauty; inſomuch that the common ſailors are able to purchaſe miſtreſſes, not excepting the laſcars, who are the pooreſt of them all. Theſe laſt, having no money, give them as much of their allowance as they can ſpare. People of the higheſt rank will offer their daughters to the merchants and officers, though their ſtay may not be above ſix months. The women are not afraid of being with child by a white man, becauſe, if it happens to be a daughter, they will hereafter be highly valued, their own complexion being very duſky, like the other Indians. This ſort of commerce is no diſgrace to the ladies; for, if they have but ſenſe to keep their money, they are ſoon provided with huſbands; and the parents are ſo well pleaſed with their daughters being pregnant by Europeans, that they often reward their temporary ſons-in-law for their trouble.

The Dutch were accuſtomed to leave money and effects in the hands of their miſtreſſes, who watching a favourable opportunity, improved them to great advantage; for, when trade was dead, they bought raw ſilk, and gave it to the poor ſilk weavers who had nothing to do, and by that means had ſilks and ſtuffs ready for their lovers at a very cheap rate. The longitude of Cachao is 105. 31. E. Lat. 22. 10. N.

CACORLA, a ſmall town of Spain, in Andaluſia, ſeated on the rivulet Vega, between two mountains, five miles from the ſource of the Guadalquivir. It was taken from the Moors in the thirteenth century. There is a good caſtle here, in which the governor reſides. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 37. 56. N.

CACUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Vulcan, and a notorious robber, thus called from κακὸς, bad or wicked. He ſettled on mount Aventine, and from thence infeſted all Italy with his depredations. Having ſtolen ſome oxen from Hercules, he dragged them backward to his cave, in order to prevent his being diſcovered by their track. Hercules, however, paſſing that way, heard the lowing of his cattle, broke open the doors, and ſeizing Cacus, beat out his brains with his club.

CADALOUS, biſhop of Parma, was elected pope in 1061, by the faction of the emperor Henry IV. againſt Alexander II. but at the council of Mantua, his election was declared void, and he died miſerably.

CADIZ, an iſland of Spain, in Andaluſia. This was anciently called Gades, and is but fifteen miles in length, and eight in breadth where broadeſt. Its figure is very irregular; and it is ſeparated to the eaſtward from the continent by a narrow canal, over which they have built a bridge. It helps to form a large bay, eight miles in length, and five in breadth, the entrance of which is upwards of two miles over. It is defended by two forts, which are ſeated on the two points of land called Puntal and Metagarda.

CADIZ, a city of Andaluſia, in Spain, ſeated on the weſtern part of the iſland juſt mentioned, and almoſt ſurrounded by the ſea. It is placed over-againſt Port St. Mary, from which it is diſtant ſeven or eight miles. It is pretty well fortified both by nature and art, having good walls with baſtions. On the ſouth ſides, it is inacceſſible by ſea, the banks are ſo high; and on the north there is a bank of ſand, which renders an approach that way very dangerous. On the land ſide, there are two ſtone baſtions; and on the weſt it is defended by fort St. Sebaſtian, which guards the entrance into the bay. The port towards the eaſt is very good, and veſſels may ride with ſafety. Here is the caſtle of St. Philip, built at the head of the port for its defence. The houſes are well built, and neat both within and without. The king's palace is not very magnificent, but it is well kept: and on one ſide of it, there is a large and handſome ſquare, with a fountain in the middle. It is an archbiſhop's ſee, and the cathedral church is very beautiful.

Cadiz was built by the Phœnicians, and was afterwards a long while in the hands of the Carthaginians. In the time of Auguſtus Cæſar, it had five hundred Roman knights and other citizens in proportion. The young women were ſent for to all public rejoicings, on account of their ſkill in muſic and the freeneſs of their diſpoſitions. At preſent it is a rich trading city, and has more plate than any town in Europe, in proportion to its magnitude. It is frequented and inhabited by merchants of all nations. The houſe-keepers are ſerved by Mooriſh ſlaves, who gain for them every day about ſeven-pence a-piece, by their labour, above what maintains them. The men and women are marked on the cheek or noſe, and go almoſt naked; and their wives have their ſkins painted with various colours. They are very thieviſh, and carry off whatever they lay their hands on. The port is the ſtation of the American fleet, and is always well furniſhed with other ſhips. There were formerly a great many Phœnician hician antiquities here, as the temple of Hercules, two brazen pillars, and two wonderful ſprings, but they are now intirely loſt. There was likewiſe a ſmall iſland in the bay, where the citizens had houſes of pleaſure, but it is now ſwallowed up.

In 1596, Cadiz was taken, pillaged, and burnt by the Engliſh; but in 1702, the Engliſh and Dutch attempted to become maſters of it without ſucceſs. It is two hundred and ſeventy miles ſouth-weſt of Madrid, ſixty-five ſouth-by-weſt of Seville, and forty-five north-weſt of Gibraltar. Long. 6. 46. W. Lat. 36. 25. N.

CADMUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Thebes, the ſon of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, and the brother of Phœnix, Cilix, and Europa. He carried into Greece the ſixteen ſimple letters of the Greek alphabet, and there built Thebes, in Bœotia. The poets ſay, that he left his native country in ſearch of his ſiſter Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away in the form of a bull; and that enquiring of the Delphic oracle for a ſettlement, he was anſwered, that he ſhould follow the direction of a cow, and build a city where ſhe lay down. Having arrived among the Phocenſes, he was met by a cow, who conducted him through Bœotia, to the place where Thebes was afterwards built; but as he was about to ſacrifice his guide to Pallas, he ſent two of his company to the fountain Dirce for water, when they being devoured by a ſerpent or dragon, he ſlew the monſter, and afterwards, by the advice of Pallas, ſowed his teeth, when there ſprung up a number of armed ſoldiers, who prepared to revenge the death of the ſerpent; but on his caſting a ſtone among them theſe upſtart warriors turned their weapons on each other with ſuch animoſity, that only five ſurvived the combat, and theſe aſſiſted Cadmus in founding his new city. Afterwards, to recompence his labours, the Gods gave him Harmonia, or Hermione, the daughter of Mars and Venus, and honoured his nuptials with preſents and peculiar marks of favour. But at length reſigning Thebes to Pentheus, Cadmus and Hermione went to govern the Eclellenſes; when at length growing old, they were transformed into ſerpents; or, as others ſay, ſent to the Elyſian fields, in a chariot drawn by ſerpents.

Some mythologiſts ſay, that Cadmus was a real prince, who went into Bœotia, a province of Greece, where he killed a cruel prince called Dragon, and afterwards ſowing diſſention amongſt his ſubjects, made himſelf maſter of the country, and gave the name of Thebes to the firſt city he built, to ſhew that his anceſtors were of Thebes, in Egypt. He then poliſhed and civilized the people, but diſtractions ariſing in his family, he went to Illyrium, where he died.

CADMUS of Miletum, a celebrated Greek hiſtorian, in the the time of Halyattes, king of Lydia, was, according to Pliny, the firſt of the Greeks who wrote hiſtory in proſe.

CADORE, a ſmall town of Italy, in the ſtate of Venice, and in a ſmall territory called from hence Cadorino, which is bounded by the biſhoprick of Brixen on the north, by Friuli on the eaſt, by the Belluneſe on the ſouth, and by the Trentin on the weſt. Long. 13. 45. E. Lat. 46. 25. N.

CADSAND, an iſland on the coaſt of Dutch Flanders, at the mouth of the Scheld, which gives the Dutch a command of that river. It is remarkable for the cheeſe made there.

CÆCILIUS. See METELLUS.

CÆLIUS AURELIANUS, or LUCIUS CÆLIUS ARIANUS, an ancient phyſician, born at Sicca, a town of Numidia, in Africa. He read over diligently the ancient phyſicians, and we are obliged to him for the knowledge of many dogmas which are not to be found but in his book, De celeribus & tardis Paſſionibus, the beſt edition of which is that publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1722. This work is highly valued, he being allowed to be admirable in the hiſtory and deſcription of diſeaſes. He wrote ſeveral other works, which are loſt. He is ſuppoſed to have lived before Galen.

CAEN, a city of France, and the capital of Lower Normany, is ſeated in a valley between two large meadows. Two ſuburbs are placed above the city, on two hills, which terminate the meadows. One one ſide are the Jeſuits houſe, the abbey of St. Stephen, and ſeveral towers and ſteeples belonging to ſeveral pariſhes, and on the other a long ſuburb, with ſeveral contiguous villages, which form a charming perſpective view, terminated by a fine country houſe, and woods at a diſtance. At the entrance into the meadow is a bulwark, on which is built a handſome ſummer-houſe. On the bulwark there are four rows of trees, which form two fine arbours. The meadows are bounded on one ſide by the river, on the other by the canal. Caen has twelve pariſhes, and courts of juſtice of all ſorts. Beſides the abbeys of St. Stephen and the Trinity, there are ſeven nunneries and eight monaſteries, comprehending the Jeſuits and the Fathers of the Oratory. The moſt remarkable public buildings are the caſtle, the biſhop's palace, which is in Rue Neuve, or New-ſtreet, the hotel called Grand Cheval, the exchequer, the new buildings of the univerſity, the town houſe, with four large towers, and the royal ſquare, which is large, regular, and has houſes on three ſides, with the ſtatue of Lewis XIV. in the middle, in a Roman habit, incompaſſed with an iron balluſtrade. William the Conqueror built the caſtle, and Henry I. his ſon, added the tower. The wall that ſurrounds the tower, and the four towers with which it is flanked, were the work of the Engliſh. The inhabitants of Caen are near forty thouſand. William the Conqueror was buried here. It is ſeated on the river Orne, ſixty-five miles weſt of Rouen, forty-five eaſt of Coutances, and one hundred and twenty-eight weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 27. W. Lat. 49. 11. N.

CÆNIS. See CENIS.

CAERFILLY, a town of Glamorganſhire, in South Wales, which has a market on Thurſdays, and ſix fairs, held on April 5, June 7, July 19, Auguſt 25, Oct. 9, and Thurſday before Chriſtmas, for horned cattle, horſes, ſheep, pigs, and yarn ſtockings. The Thurſday before Jan. 25, firſt Thurſday in March, and firſt Thurſday in May, are great markets. It is ſeated between the rivers Taff and Romney, in a mooriſh ground, and among the hills. It is thought that the walls, now in ruins, were built by the Romans, for Roman coins are often dug up here. It is five miles north of Landaff, and one hundred and fifty-nine weſt of London. Long. 14. 20. Lat. 51. 35.

CAERMARTHEN. See CARMARTHEN.

CAERNARVON. See CARNARVON.

CAERWITH, a town of Flintſhire, in North Wales, with a market on Tueſdays, and ſix fairs; on March 16, the laſt Tueſday in April, Trinity Thurſday, the firſt Tueſday after July 6, September 9, and November 10, all for cattle. It is ſeated on an aſcent, and though it is but a ſmall place, has a very good market for corn and proviſions. It is ſeventeen miles weſt-north-weſt of Cheſter, and two hundred and four north-weſt of London. Long. 14. 11. Lat. 53. 14.

CÆSALPINUS (ANDREAS) an eminent philoſopher and phyſician, born at Arezzo about the year 1159. After his being for a long time profeſſor at Piſa, he was made phyſician to pope Clement VIII. He ſeems to have had ſome idea of the circulation of the blood, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing ſeveral valuable works, particularly, 1. Κατοπτρον, ſive Speculum Artis medicæ Hippocraticum. 2. De Plantis. 3. De Metallicis. 4. Quæſtionum Medicarum. 5. De Medicamentorum Facultatibus. 6. Pranis Univerſæ Medicinæ, &c.

CÆSAR (CAIUS JULIUS) the firſt emperor of Rome, and one of the greateſt captains the world has produced, was the ſon of Lucius Cæſar and Aurelia, and was born at Rome, ninety-eight years before the Chriſtian æra. He pretended to be deſcended on his father's ſide from Æneas, and on his mother's from Ancus Martius, the fourth king of the Romans. Sylla fearing his ambitious temper, would have cauſed him to be put to death, but at the ſolicitations of his friends ſuffered him to live, at the ſame time ſaying, that he whoſe intereſt was ſo dear to them, would one day ruin the republic. Cæſar firſt bore arms in Aſia, under Thermus the Prætor, and at his return accuſed Dolabella of defrauding the republic. He afterwards ſet ſail for Rhodes, in order to ſtudy under Milo, and was taken by pirates, but having purchaſed his liberty, he attacked the ſame pirates, and having taken them, cauſed them all to be hanged. He at length aroſe to the poſts of military tribune, quæſtor, ædile, high prieſt, prieſt, and governor of Spain. It is ſaid, that having ſeen the picture of Alexander in the temple of Cadiz, he ſhed tears, ſaying, that he had yet done nothing remarkable, while at his age Alexander had conquered almoſt the whole world. At his return he was conſul with Bibulus, whom he depoſed for refuſing to agree to the Agrarian law. He ſubdued the Gauls, defeated the Germans, and conquered part of Britain. Julia his daughter, and the wife of Pompey dying, the good underſtanding which had ſubſiſted between him and Pompey was entirely deſtroyed; the one could not bear a maſter, nor the other an equal. To puniſh the ſenate, which, during his abſence, had, at the ſolicitation of Pompey, oppoſed all his demands, he entered Italy fifty one years before the birth of Chriſt; his enemies fled; Cæſar took poſſeſſion of ſome places; went into Spain; fought Pompey's army, commanded by Petreius Afraniſus and Varro, and defeated them. At his return to Rome, he aſſembled his army, and paſſed into Macedonia to attack Pompey; when the celebrated battle of Pharſalia, which was fought forty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra, decided the difference, and gave the victorious Cæſar the empire of the world. He purſued Pompey as far as Alexandria, where, being told that that great man had been killed, he ſhed tears. He at length defeated Ptolomy, and rendered himſelf maſter of Egypt; he then routed Pharnaces, the ſon of Mithridates, in Pontus; conquered Scipio and Juba in Africa, and Pompey's ſon in Spain.

Spain. Such a number of victories having fixed him on the throne, he triumphed four days together, was elected perpetual dictator, and declared emperor. A dignity which had hitherto been the conſtant object of his ambition. He now applied his whole attention to the regulation of the common-wealth: he reformed the Calendar by fixing the year to three hundred and ſixty-five days; numbered the citizens; reformed the luxury of the people, and regulated every thing with admirable prudence. He formed the deſign of erecting a magnificent temple to Mars; of filling up a lake; of abridging the laws; of eſtabliſhing public libraries; of draining the marſhes of Pontus; of opening new roads, &c. But death put a ſtop to all his projects. He was aſſaſſinated in full ſenate, by receiving twenty three ſtabs, forty-three years before Chriſt, and in the fifty-ſixth of his age.

As to Cæſar's perſon, he was tall, of a pale complexion, with an aquiline noſe, a long neck, an head well ſhaped, but bald on the fore part, on which account he conſtantly wore a laurel crown; and he was endowed with all the qualities requiſite to form a great man. When we take a general view of the many wars which he glorioufly finiſhed, it is impoſſible not to admire him; but when we reflect upon the prodigious multitude of men, whoſe poverty, ſlavery, or death he occaſioned, it is difficult not to be filled with abhorrence. His greateſt crime was, that in order to be revenged on his private enemies, which he raiſed againſt himſelf by his ambitious conduct, he oppreſſed his own country with thoſe very arms with which his ſuperiors had intruſted him, in order to ſubdue the enemies of his country. He was not leſs qualified for intrigues than for the field; nor had he leſs wit than courage. He was very learned, and ſo eloquent, that nothing but his eager deſire of being the firſt in the government of the ſtate, could prevent his diſputing the firſt rank amongſt the moſt famous orators. Two of his works are ſtill extant, viz. ſeven books of the War in Gaul, and three books of the Civil War; but the reſt, which were pretty numerous, are loſt.

CÆSAR, in the Roman hiſtory, a title which took its riſe from the ſurname of C. Julius Cæſar, which, by a decree of the ſenate, all the ſucceeding emperors were to bear; but under his ſucceſſor, the appellation of Auguſtus being in compliment to that prince appropriated to the emperors, the title of Cæſar was given to the ſecond perſon, or preſumptive heir of the empire, though it ſtill continued to be given to the firſt: hence aroſe the difference betwixt Cæſar, uſed ſimply, and with the addition of Imperator Auguſtus.

At length, Alexius Comnenus having given the title and dignity of Cæſar to Nicephorus Meliſſenus, and it being neceſſary to confer ſome higher dignity on his own brother Iſaacius, he created him Sebaſtocator, with the preſidency over Meliſſenus, and ordered that in all public acts, &c Iſaacius Sebaſtocator ſhould be named the ſecond, and Meliſſenus Cæſar the third.

CÆSAR (JULIUS) a learned civilian, in the end of the ſixteenth and beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries, was deſcended by the female line from the duke de Ceſarini, in Italy, and was born near Tottenham, in Middleſex, in the year 1557. He was educated at Oxford, and afterwards ſtudied in the univerſity of Paris, where, in the year 1581, he was created doctor of the civil law, and two years after was admitted to the ſame degree at Oxford, and alſo became doctor of the canon law. He was advanced to many honourable employments, and for the laſt twenty years of his life was maſter of the rolls. He was remarkable for his extenſive bounty and charity to all perſons of worth, ſo that he ſeemed to be the almoner-general of the nation. He died April 28, 1639, in the ſeventy-ninth year of his age.

CÆSARIANS, Cæſarienſes, in Roman antiquity, were officers belonging to the Roman emperors, who kept an account of their revenues, and in their name took poſſeſſion of what devolved to them, or were confiſcated for their uſe.

CÆSARIUS (JOHN) a phyſician and philoſopher, born at Juliers, lived in the ſixteenth century. He read lectures at Cologne, in which he ſpared no pains for the advancement of learning; but being ſuſpected of favouring Lutheraniſm, was baniſhed from thence, and retired to the houſe of the count of Nuwenar and Meurs, where he died in 1550, being above ninety years old.

CÆSTUS, in antiquity. See CESTUS.

CÆYX, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Thrace. He reſolved to go into Egypt to conſult the oracle, for what reaſon his brother, whoſe loſs he lamented, was turned into a ſparrow-hawk; but Alcyone, his wife, oppoſing his going with her tears and entreaties, he promiſed to return in two months, upon which ſhe conſented, and ſaw him depart. As the time drew near, ſhe watched for him on the ſea-ſhore, invoking the gods for his ſafe return; but at laſt ſaw his body floating on the waves, when caſting herſelf into them, both ſhe and her huſband's corpſe were turned into halcyons. Ovid, book X.

CAFFA, a town of Crim Tartary, on the ſhore of the Black Sea. It is a large place, ſeated on a hill, on the ſea ſhore, and is ſurrounded with ſtrong walls. It has two caſtles, one at each end, which advance a little into the ſea, and make the town appear at a diſtance like a half moon. The caſtle on the ſouth ſide is placed on an eminence, and commands the adjacent parts. It is very large, and is the ſeat of a baſha. The other is ſmall, but is well furniſhed with artillery. There are four thouſand houſes in Caffa, whereof three thouſand two hundred belong to the Mahommedan Turks and Tartars, and eight hundred to the Chriſtian Greeks and Armenians. The houſes are ſmall, and built with earth and clay. The bazars or market-places, the moſques, baths, and other public buildings are formed of the ſame materials. There are eight ruined churches, of ſtone, which were formerly built by the Genoeſe. Caffa was firſt founded by the Greeks, and in the time of the holy war became ſubject to the Genoeſe; but fell into the hands of Mahomet II. in 1574.

The ſoil about Caffa is dry and ſandy; the waters are not good, but the air is very wholeſome. There are few gardens, and leſs fruit, but they are ſupplied with it by the neighbouring villages. All other proviſions are very good, plentiful, and cheap. Both Turks and Tartars wear little caps, lined with ſheep ſkin. There is a greater trade carried on here that in any other part of the Black Sea. They deal much in caviar and ſalt-fiſh, which is brought from the ſea of Aſoph. Some of theſe fiſh are of an incredible weight. Caffa ſupplies Conſtantinople with corn, butter, and ſalt. It is one hundred and fifty miles north-by-eaſt of Conſtantinople, and four hundred and twenty-five from Moſcow. Long. 34. 15. E. Lat. 44 58. N.

CAFFRARIA, or the country of the Caphars. Many of the countries which go under this denomination are but very little known, nor yet are their bounds well determined by geographers. However, we ſhall take it in its largeſt extent, and then it will be bounded on the north by Abyſſinia, and part of Negroland; on the eaſt by the coaſt of Zanguebar, and the Indian Ocean; and on the weſt by part of Guinea, Congo, and the Weſtern Ocean. It is two thouſand ſeven hundred miles in length from north to ſouth, and one thouſand ſix hundred and twenty in breadth from eaſt to weſt. All the countries contained in Caffraria lie under the torrid zone, except that of the Hottentots. The air in general is exceeding hot, except in Monomotapa, which lies on the eaſtern coaſt; for this is rendered temperate by the mountains, and the nearneſs of the ſea, and yields abundance of grain, trees, and ſugar-canes, beſides lions, elephants, tigers, and other wild beaſts. A ridge of mountains runs through this country from the cape of Good Hope, almoſt as far as the Line. The chief rivers are the Bragaval, St. Laurence, the Kuama, and the Zebec. The chief lake is the Moravi or Zembre, which is five hundred miles from north to ſouth, and not above fifty or ſixty broad. The countries on the north of the Line are ſaid to be Mujak, Gingiro, and Alaba; but they are ſo little known, that their very names may be doubted; and therefore we ſhall not amuſe the reader with the names of their tribes, eſpecially as we can find no author that ſpeaks of them from his own knowledge.

However, we may venture to ſay that theſe parts are not well cultivated, and that towards the weſt and ſouth the country is very mountainous, and yet in ſome parts there is good paſture land, and plenty of cattle. With theſe, as well as hunting, fiſhing, and roots, the inhabitants ſeldom want proviſions. They are all Pagans, but the particulars of their worſhip are not known. There are however a few converts, made by the Portugueſe on the coaſts, without any amendment of their morals. But we muſt obſerve, that what has been ſaid, does not relate to the Hottentots, for they are a people we are pretty well acquainted with.

CAGLI, a ſmall but ancient epiſcopal city of Italy, in the duchy of Urbino. It is ſeated at the foot of the Appennines, twenty miles ſouth of Urbino, and eighteen eaſt of Citta di Caſtello. Long. 14. 12. E. Lat. 43. 30. N.

CAGLIARI, a city of Italy, and capital of the iſland of Sardinia, with an archbiſhop's ſee, and a good port; is ſeated on a hill that reaches as far as the gulph which has the ſame name. It has an univerſity, and is defended by a good caſtle. The inhabitants are about ſixty thouſand, among whom are the principal nobility and the viceroy. The allies took it in Auguſt, 1708. It is about two hundred miles north-weſt from Palermo, in Sicily, and as much ſouth-by-eaſt from Rome. Long. 9. 14. E. Lat. 39. 20. N.

CAGLIARI (BENEDETTO) an excellent painter, lived and ſtudied with his brother Paul Veroneſe, for whom he had a great affection, and frequently aſſiſted him and his nephew in finiſhing ſeveral of their compoſitions, eſpecially in painting architecture, in which he chiefly delighted. He practiſed for the moſt part in freſco, and ſome of his beſt pieces are in chiaro oſcuro. He was fond of poetry, and had a peculiar talent in ſatire. He died in 1598, at ſixty years of age.

CAGLIARI (PAUL) commonly called Paul Veroneſe. See VERONESE.

CAGNACCI (GUIDO CAULASSI) an Italian painter, ſurnamed Cagnacci from the deformity of his perſon. He was born at Caſtel Durante, and became the diſciple of Guido. He died at Vienna, at eighty years of age. His firſt pictures are moſt eſteemed.

CAHORS, a town in France, the capital of Quercy, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a ſteep rock, in a peninſula made by the river Lot, on the banks of which it ſtands. The entrance is by the ſuburb of St. Jordy, a long a quay, where nothing appears but rocks. You paſs the river over a ſtone bridge, from whence may be ſeen two other bridges, and ſeveral mills for different trades. At the firſt bridge the principal ſtreet begins, which is very narrow, and terminates in the market-place, where there is a hall for corn, and the town-houſe. The cathedral church, dedicated to St. Stephen, is near it, whoſe architecture is very ancient. It is joined to a large ſquare tower, near which is a ſquare, from whence a ſtreet proceeds that leads to the place where the citadel ſtood, ſome of the ruins of which are yet to be ſeen. The fortifications are very regular, and the peninſula is incloſed with thick walls, and ſurrounds the ſuburb de la Bar, which is as it were a ſecond city.

Next to the cathedral, the church of St. Bartholomew is the moſt conſiderable, and the Jeſuits college is worth ſeeing. It has an univerſity which was founded in 1332. The biſhop's palace is a handſome houſe, and the rampart affords an agreeable walk. The inhabitants are about eight thouſand, but they are poor, and the houſes mean. It is fifty miles north-weſt of Albi, ſixty-three north of Toulouſe, one hundred and two eaſt of Bourdeaux, and three hundred and twelve ſouth of Paris. Long. 1. 6. E. Lat. 44. 26. N.

CAJADO, or GAZADO (HERMIO) an ingenius Latin poet, born in Portugal, in the fifteenth century, who wrote eclogues, paſtorals, and epigrams, in pure and elegant Latin. His epigrams in particular are pointed, and very agreeable. He died in 1508.

CAJANABURGH, the capital of Cajania, in Sweden; is ſeated near the lake Ula, in the middle of this province. It had a caſtle which was looked upon as impregnable, but the Ruſſians took it in 1716. It is two hundred and fifty miles north-and-by-eaſt of Abo. Long. 27. 5. E. Lat. 63. 50. N.

CAJANIA, a province of Sweden, to the north of the gulph of Bothnia. It is forty Swediſh miles in length, twenty in breadth, and is commonly called Eaſt Bothnia. The ſoil is very fruitful; but the froſts coming on very ſoon, often hinder the grain from growing ripe. The inhabitants are great gainers by butter and pitch, which they ſell to foreigners. In 1742 the Ruſſians became maſters of a great part of this province, but it was reſtored in conſequence of a treaty which was concluded the year following.

CAJAZZO, a ſmall town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Terra di Lavora, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a hill, ſixteen miles north-eaſt of Naples. Long. 15. 12. E. Lat. 41. 10. N.

CAIENNE, or CAYENNE, a town, river, and iſland of America, about forty-five miles in circumference. The French ſettled here in 1635, and they being withdrawn, the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of it in 1654, and held it ten years. Then the French came again, but were driven away by the Dutch in 1676, who are now in poſſeſſion of it. It produces ſugar, tobacco, and Indian corn. Long. 53. 11. E. Lat. 4. 56. N.

CAJETAN (CARDINAL). See VIO.

CAIFUM, or CAIFONG, a city of Aſia, and capital of the province of Honang, or Ho-nan, in China. This is a rich, large, and populous place, ſeated in a fine country, in the middle of a large well cultivated plain, within two leagues and a half of the great river Hoang-ho. It has this inconveniency, that being ſeated in a bottom, the river is higher than the city. In the year 1642 this place was beſieged by the rebels, with an army of one hundred thouſand men, for ſix months together. The general who came to the aſſiſtance of the city, finding it impoſſible to relieve it, ordered the dikes of the river to be broke down, to overflow the country, which made ſo violent an inundation, that it deſtroyed three hundred thouſand inhabitants of the city, and demoliſhed the buildings. It has ſince been repaired, but wants much of its former ſplendor. Long. 113. 27. E. Lat. 35. 0. N.

CAILLY (the chevalier JOHN DE) a French poet, born at Orleans, alſo known by the name of d'Aceilly, diſtinguiſhed himſelf under the miniſtry of Colbert, by his epigrams, which are written in a ſimple and natural ſtyle, and contain the moſt delicate and refined thoughts. They were printed in 1714, with ſeveral other pieces.

CAIN, the eldeſt ſon of Adam and Eve, was the firſt huſbandman. He offered to God the fruits of the earth, at the ſame time that his brother Abel, who was a ſhepherd, offered up the firſtlings of his flock. God was well pleaſed with the offerings of Abel, but had no regard to thoſe of Cain; at which the latter was ſo highly exaſperated, that he murdered his brother. For this crime he was condemned to baniſhment, and a vagabond ſtate of life; however, he built a city in the land of Nod.

There is an old tradition concerning his death: which is, that being decrepit and blind, he ſat down among ſome very thick buſhes; Lamech, who was then hunting, having notice that ſomething ſtirred in that place, ran towards it, and thinking that a wild beaſt was lying there, let fly an arrow, and ſlew Cain. Some place this event about the year of the world 701, and others in 875.

CAIPHAS, high prieſt of the Jews, next after Simon, was of the ſect of the Sadducees. He condemned Jeſus Chriſt to death, and was afterwards deprived of his office by Vitellius. It is ſaid, that this diſgrace had ſuch an effect upon him, that he put an end to his life.

CAIRO, a city of Africa, in Egypt, of which it is the capital. It is commonly divided into the New and Old. Old Cairo is on the eaſtern ſide of the river Nile, and is now almoſt uninhabited. The New, which is properly Cairo, is ſeated in a ſandy plain, about two miles and a half from the old city. It ſtands on the weſtern ſide of the Nile, from which it is not three quarters of a mile diſtant. It is extended along the mountain on which the caſtle is built, for the ſake of which it was removed hither, as ſome pretend to be under its protection. However, the change is much for the worſe, as well with regard to air as water, and the pleaſantneſs of the proſpect. Bulack may be called the port of Cairo, for it ſtands on the banks of the Nile, about a mile and a half from it, and all the corn and other commodities are landed there before they are brought to the city. Some travellers have made Cairo of a moſt enormous magnitude, by taking in the old city Bulack, and the new; but the real circumference of it is not above ten miles, and yet it is extremely populous, for you will find a great number of wretched holes that are quite full of women and children.

The firſt thing that ſtrikes a traveller is the narrowneſs of the ſtreets, and the appearance of the houſes. Theſe are ſo daubed with mud on the outſide, that you would think they were built with nothing elſe. Beſides, as the ſtreets are unpaved, and always full of people, the walking in them is very inconvenient, eſpecially to ſtrangers. To remedy this there are a great number of aſſes, which always ſtand ready to be hired for a trifle, that is a penny a mile. The owners drive them along, and give notice to the crowd to make way. And here it may be obſerved, that the Chriſtians here, as well as in other parts of the Turkiſh dominions, are not permitted to ride upon horſes. The number of the inhabitants can only be gueſſed at; but we may conclude it muſt be very great, becauſe, in ſome years, the plague will carry off two hundred thouſand, without their being much miſſed. The houſes are from one to two or three ſtories high, and flat at the top, where they go to take the air, and often ſleep all night thereon. The better ſort of theſe have a court on the inſide like a college. The common run of houſes have very little room, and even among great people it is uſual for twenty or thirty to lie in the ſame hall. Some houſes will hold three hundred perſons, of both ſexes, among whom are twenty or thirty ſlaves, and thoſe of ordinary rank have generally three or four.

There is a canal called Halis, which runs along the city from one end to the other, with houſes on each ſide, which make a large ſtrait ſtreet. Beſides this, there are ſeveral lakes, which are called Birks in the language of the country. The principal of theſe, which is near the caſtle, is five hundred paces in diameter. The moſt elegant houſes in the city are built on its banks; but what is extraordinary, eight months in the year it contains water, and the other four it appears with a charming verdure. When there is water ſufficient, it is always full of gilded boats, barges, and barks, in which people of condition take their pleaſure at the entrance of the night, at which time there are curious fire-works, and variety of muſic.

We ſhall next take notice of the bagnios, or public baths, which the frequent ablutions preſcribed by the Mahommedan religion render neceſſary. There are ſome for men only, and ſome for women, and others for both. The men go to theſe laſt in the morning, and the women in the afternoon; and yet theſe are not ſufficient for ſuch a number of people; for which reaſon the Halis or canal is in a morning full of mean people, who either cannot pay for a bath or cannot get in for want of room. This cuſtom is very convenient for the women who are generally neglected by their huſbands, becauſe, as they are permitted to go to theſe places twice a week, they often make uſe of this liberty to ſerve their own private purpoſes. Whence it is thought there is as much intriguing here as in any part of the world. Beſides, if ſtrangers happen to come who are addicted to theſe pleaſures, there are particular ſtreets where the courtezans reſide, who are ready for every one at the rate of four parrahs, that is four pence; and yet with this ſmall reward they go very richly dreſt. Their ſhifts and drawers, as well as gowns, are all of ſilk, with ſilk ſaſhes about their middles, and a knife tucked in it, the ſheath of which is commonly ſilver. Theſe ladies of pleaſure, as well as other women, wear velvet caps, adorned with pearls, and their treſſes behind reach down to their heels. They have likewiſe jewels in their noſes, like the Arabian women and others in the Eaſt. They moſt commonly ſit at their doors barefaced, and ſolicit every paſſenger that paſſes by. But ſometimes they walk along the ſtreets, ſmoaking their pipes, which are four or five feet long.

New Cairo is ſurrounded with walls built with ſtone, on which are handſome battlements, and at the diſtnace of every hundred paces there are very fine towers, which have room for a great number of people. The walls were never very high, and yet they are in many places gone to ruin, which is not minded by the Turks. The baſha lives in the caſtle, which was built by Saladine ſeven hundred years ago. It ſtands in the middle of the famous mountain Moketan, which terminates in this place, after it had accompanied the Nile from Ethiopia hither. This caſtle is the only place of defence in Egypt, and yet the Turks take no notice of its falling, inſomuch, that in proceſs of time it will become nothing but a heap of rubbiſh. The principal part in it is a magnificent hall, environed with twelve columns of granite, of a prodigious height and thickneſs, which ſuſtain an open dome, under which Saladine diſtributed juſtice to his ſubjects. Round this dome there is an inſcription in relievo, which determines the date, and by whom it was built. From this place the whole city of Cairo may be ſeen, and above thirty miles along the Nile, with the fruitful plains that lie near it, as well as the moſques, pyramids, villages, and gardens, with which theſe fields are in ſome ſenſe covered. Theſe granite pillars were the work of antiquity, for they were got out of the ruins of Alexandria. There are likewiſe in the moſques and in the principal houſes, no leſs than forty thouſand more, beſides great magazines, where all kinds are to be had at very low rates. A janizary happened to find five in his garden, as large as thoſe in the caſtle, but could not find any machine of ſtrength ſufficient to move them, and therefore had them ſawed in pieces to make mill-ſtones. It is believed that there have been thirty or forty thouſand of theſe pillars brought from Alexandria, where there are yet many more to be had.

The gates of Cairo are three, which are very fine and magnificent.

The moſques of Cairo are very numerous, and were moſtly founded by the ancient kings of Egypt. The moſque of Aſhar is the moſt remarkable in all the city, both with regard to its domes and its minarets. Theſe are a kind of high turrets, from which the people are called to prayer five times a day, by men appointed for that purpoſe. There are about three hundred public moſques in all, ſome of which have ſix minarets. The moſque of Aſhar hath ſeveral buildings adjoining, which were once a famous univerſity, and fourteen thouſand ſcholars and ſtudents were maintained on the foundation; but has now not above one thouſand four hundred, and thoſe are only taught to read and write. All the moſques are built upon the ſame plan, and differ only in magnitude. The entrance is through the principal gate into a large ſquare, open on the top, but well paved. Round this are covered galleries, ſupported by pillars, under which they ſay their prayers, in the ſhade. At the end of the ſquare is ſometimes another, covered with a dome, but this is rare; beſides, it is but ſeldom entered into, becauſe it is generally the ſepulchre of the founder. On one ſide of the ſquare there are particular places with baſons of water, for the conveniency of performing the ablutions, ſo ſtrictly injoined by the Koran. The moſt remarkable part of the moſque, beſides the minaret, is the dome. This is often bold, well proportioned, and of an aſtoniſhing magnitude. The inſide ſtones are carved like lace, flowers, and melons. They are built ſo firm, and with ſuch art, that they will laſt ſix or ſeven hundred years. About the outward circumference there are large Arabic inſcriptions, in relievo, which may be read by thoſe who ſtand below, though they are ſometimes of a wonderful height.

The khanes or caravanſeras are numerous and large, with a court in the middle, like their houſes. Some are ſeveral ſtories high, and are always full of people and merchandiſe. The Nubians, the Abyſinians, and other African nations, which come to Cairo, have one to themſelves, where they always meet with lodging. It is the ſame with Aleppo, Conſtantinople, Damaſcus, and other trading cities. Here they are ſecure from inſults, and their effects are all ſafe that are depoſited therein. Beſides theſe, there is a bazar, or market, where all ſorts of goods are to be ſold. This is in a long broad ſtreet, and yet the crowd is ſo great, you can hardly paſs along. At the end of this ſtreet is another ſhort one, but pretty broad, with ſhops full of the beſt ſort of goods, and precious merchandiſe. At the end of this ſhort ſtreet there is a great khane, where all ſorts of white ſlaves are to be ſold. Farther than this is another khane, where a great number of blacks, of both ſexes, are expoſed to ſale. Not far from the beſt market-place is an hoſpital, and a moſque for mad people. They alſo receive and maintain ſick people into this hoſpital, but they are but poorly looked after.

Old Cairo has nothing remarkable but the granaries of Joſeph, which are nothing but a high wall, lately built, which includes a ſquare ſpot of ground, where they depoſit wheat, barley, and other grain, which is a tribute to the baſha, paid by the owners of land. This has no other covering but the heavens, and therefore the birds are always ſure to have their ſhare. There is likewiſe a tolerably handſome church, which is made uſe of by the Copts, who are Chriſtians, and the original inhabitants of Egypt. Joſeph's well is in the caſtle, and was made by king Mahammed, about ſix or ſeven hundred years ago. It is called Joſeph's well, becauſe they attribute every thing extraordinary to that remarkable perſon. It is cut in a rock, and is two hundred and eighty feet in depth. The water is drawn up to the top by means of oxen, placed on platforms, at proper diſtances, which turn about the machines that raiſe it. The deſcent is ſo ſloping, that though there are no ſteps, the oxen can deſcend and aſcend with eaſe.

The river Nile, to which not only Cairo, but all Egypt is ſo much indebted, is now known to have its riſe in Abyſinia. The increaſe of the Nile generally begins in May, and in June they commonly proclaim about the ſtreets how much it is riſen. Over againſt Old Cairo the baſha has a houſe, wherein the water enters to a column, which has lines at the diſtance of every inch, and marks at every two feet, as far as thirty. When the water riſes to twenty-two feet, it is thought to be of a ſufficient height, when it riſes much higher it does a great deal of miſchief. There is much pomp and ceremony uſed in letting the water into the canal, or hali, above mentioned. The baſha gives the firſt ſtroke towards the removal of the dike or dam. When the water has filled the canal and lakes in the city, and the numerous ciſterns that are in the moſques and private houſes, it is let into a vaſt plain to the north-eaſt; the extent of which is fifty miles. When the country is covered with water, it is no unpleaſant ſight to view the towns appearing like little iſlands, and the people paſſing and repaſſing in boats, and not ſeldom ſwimming from one place to another.

The inhabitants of Cairo are a mixture of Moors, Turks, Jews, Greeks, and Cophts, or Coptis. The only difference between the habit of the Moors and Coptis is their turbans, thoſe of the Moors being white, and of the Coptis white ſtriped with blue. The common people generally wear a long black looſe frock, ſown together all down before. The Jews wear a frock of the ſame faſhion, made of cloth, and their caps are like a high crowned hat, without brims, covered with the ſame cloth, but not ſo taper. The Jewiſh women's are not very unlike the men's, but more light and long. The Greeks are habited like the Turks, only their turbans differ.

Proviſions of all kinds are exceeding plenty, for twenty eggs may be bought for a parrah, or penny, and bread is ſix times as cheap as with us. They have almoſt all ſorts of fleſh and fiſh, and in particular have tame buffaloes, which are very uſeful animals. They bring goats into the ſtreets in great numbers, to ſell their milk. Their gardens are well ſtocked with fruit trees, of various kinds, as well as roots, herbs, melons, and cucumbers. The moſt common fleſh-meat is mutton. The goats are very beautiful, and have ears two feet in length, however, their fleſh is in no great eſteem. But we ſhall forbear to treat of the natural hiſtory, religion, cuſtoms, commerce, manufactures, pyramids, mummies, and other particulars, till we come to give a general deſcription of Egypt. Long. 32. 12. E. Lat. 30. 2. N.

CAIROAN, a city of Africa, in the kingdom of Tunis, ſeated in a ſandy barren ſoil, about five miles from the gulph of Capres. It has neither ſpring, well, nor river, for which reaſon they are obliged to keep water in ciſterns or tanks. It was founded by the Mahommedans, in 652, and had a famous univerſity, but hath now loſt its ſplendour. There is ſtill a very ſuperb moſque, and the tombs of the kings of Tunis. Long. 9. 12. E. Lat. 35. 40. N.

CAITHNESS, the moſt northern part of all Scotland, otherwiſe called the ſhire of Weik. It ſends one member to parliament alternately with the ſhire of Bute. It is bounded by the Ocean on the eaſt, on the ſouth and ſouth-weſt by Strathnover and Sutherland, from which it is partly divided by a range of hills, and partly by the river Hallewdale, and on the north from the Orkney iſlands, by Pentland land Frith. It is twenty-five miles in length, and twenty in breadth. There are a few ſmall woods, or rather coppices of birch-trees; and in the foreſt of Moravin and Berridale there are red deer, roe-bucks, cows, ſheep, goats, and wild fowl. There are lead, copper, and iron ores in ſeveral places; but grazing and fiſhing are the chief ſupport of the inhabitants. The whole coaſt, except the bays, conſiſts of high rocks and promontories. The inland country is mountainous, and the ſoil of that part which is low is moiſt and clayiſh, which cauſes the harveſt to be late. For want of coal they burn turf, of which they have plenty. Proviſions are ſaid to be cheap, which is no wonder, conſidering the ſcarcity of money. Here are ſome gentlemen's ſeats, with a few towns and villages. The preſbytery conſiſts of twelve pariſhes. The houſes are very poor, low, and mean, not only here, but in all the Highlands of Scotland. There is a great many ſmall rivers and rivulets, but none of any note. The rocks are much frequented by eagles, hawks, maws, herons, and fowls of various kinds. There is a particular ſort of fowl called ſnowfleets, which reſort to this country in February, by thouſands, and go away in April. They are of the ſize of a ſparrow, and are very fine eating. They have likewiſe plenty of moor fowls and plovers. The people in ſome places have made ſtairs in the rocks to go down to the ſea, where their boats lie; and when they have caught any fiſh, they dry them in huts, made on the tops of the rocks.

There are ſome old chapels, and about ſixty heaps of ſtones, ſuppoſed to be the relics of Heatheniſm. The principal towns are Weik and Thurſo. Near this laſt there is a ſalmon river, where they are in plenty all the year round.

CAIUS (AGRIPPA) the youngeſt ſon of Agrippa and Julia, the daughter of Auguſtus, was adopted by that emperor with Lucius Agrippa, his brother. At the age of fourteen or fifteen the Roman people offered them the conſulſhip; but Auguſtus allowed them only the quality of nominal conſuls, on account of their youth. They both died while young.

CAIUS, one of the eccleſiaſtical authors, flouriſhed at Rome, in the beginning of the third century, under the emperor Antoninus Caracalla, in 217. He had been the diſciple of St. Irenæus; and an anonymous author, cited by Photius, ſays poſitively, that Caius was a prieſt, and dwelt at Rome. Photius alſo adds, that he was ordained biſhop of the nations, that is, that he was to preach the faith in the countries of the infidels, without having any particular people or limited dioceſe. Caius had a famous diſpute at Rome againſt Proclus, or Proculus, one of the chiefs of the Montaniſts, and put it in writing, in the form of a dialogue; but both this and the other works of Caius are loſt.

CAIUS (St.) a native of Dalmatia, and the kinſman of the emperor Diocleſian, was elected biſhop of Rome in 276, and died thirteen years after. It is ſaid, that he ordained that the clerks ſhould paſs through the ſeven inferior orders of the church, before they were capable of being ordained biſhop.

CAIUS, or KAYE, (JOHN) phyſician to king Edward VI. queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth, was born at Norwich, in 1510, and educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of doctor of phyſic, and afterwards travelled into Italy, in order to perfect himſelf in his ſtudies, when he became Greek lecturer at Padua, and reader of phyſic in that univerſity. He ſearched a great number of libraries, and diſcovering the writings of ſeveral authors, which were almoſt deſtroyed, publiſhed them with his emendations. He alſo rendered himſelf famous by his own writings, eſpecially by his book on the antiquities of Cambridge; and more particularly by his improving the ancient hall of Gonvil into a new college, called Gonvil and Caius college, and giving a perpetual allowance for twenty-three ſtudents. He died in the year 1573, aged ſixty-three.

CALABER (QUINTUS) a name given to an anonymous poet, a native of Smyrna, whoſe Greek poem, intitled the Paralipomenes of Homer, was found by cardinal Beſſarion, in Calabria, on which account he gave it the name of Calaber. Voſſius conjectures that this poet lived under the emperor Anaſtaſius, about the year 490. The beſt edition of the Calaber is that of Rhodoman.

CALABRIA, a territory in the kingdom of Naples, which has fine paſtures, and abounds in honey, olives, ſilk, and manna. They likewiſe make a great deal of ſalt. It is divided into Calabria Citra and Calabria Ultra. Calabria Citra, or Superior, is one of the twelve provinces of the kingdom of Naples; and is bounded on the ſouth by Calabria Ultra, on the north by the Baſilicatia, on the weſt by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the eaſt by the gulph of Taranta. It is about fifty-three miles in length, and forty-ſeven in breadth. The principal towns are, Coſenza the capital, Roſſanno, Caſſano, Beſigniano, Strongoli, St. Marco, Martorano, Cariati, and Umbriatico. The two firſt are archbiſhop's ſees, and the reſt biſhop's ſees. Calabria Ultra, or Inferior, is likewiſe one of the twelve provinces of Naples, and has the Mediterranean Sea on the eaſt, weſt, and ſouth, and Calabria Citra on the north. It is about ſeventy-five miles in length, and its mean breadth may be twenty-four. Reggio is the capital city, and is an archbiſhop's ſee, as well as St. Severino. The following are biſhop's ſees; Cotrona, Iſola, Belcaſtro, Taverno, Nicaſtro, Squilace, Melito, Oppido, Girace, Bove, and Nicotera.

CALABROIS (MATTHIAS PRELI, ſurnamed) a celebrated painter, was born in 1643, in the territory of Taverna, in Calabria, and rendered himſelf greatly admired by his works, eſpecially by thoſe he performed in the cathedral church of St. John at Malta. He repreſented on the cieling the life of that apoſtle, which is a ſuperb piece, that brought him both honour and wealth, and he was given the commandery of Syracuſe, with a conſiderable penſion. His principal works are at Modena, Naples, and Malta. He died at Malta, in 1699.

CALAIS, a fortified town of France, in Lower Picardy, was formerly a village, and began to be fortified in 1228, at which time a caſtle was built. In 1347, Edward III. of England took it by famine. The Engliſh kept it till January 1558, when it was retaken by the duke of Guiſe. The ſituation of this place renders it more conſiderable than the number of its inhabitants, which are not above five thouſand, and it has but one pariſh, and four convents. Hither the packet boats come from England twice a week, in times of peace. The figure of this place is an oblong ſquare, and one of its longeſt ſides is towards the ſea. On the ſide of the country it is fortified with baſtions, and a half moon, beyond which are ditches fifty yards wide, which may be filled with water at pleaſure. The caſtle is as large as the town, and can only be entered by the bridge of St. Agatha. This likewiſe is ſurrounded with large deep ditches, full of ſea water. The church, the town-houſe, and the convents are the only places worth ſeeing. There is a canal which runs from it to St. Omers, Graveline, Dunkirk, Bruges, and Ypres. It is twenty-one miles ſouth-eaſt of Dover, twenty-five weſt of Dunkirk, fifty-five north of Abbeville, ninety ſouth-eaſt of London, and one hundred and fifty-two north of Paris. Long. 2. 6. E. Lat. 50. 58. N.

CALAIS and ZETHES, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſons of Boreas and Orythia. Theſe two brothers had wings, and diſtinguiſhed themſelves by going with the Argonauts in the voyage to Colchis, and in delivering Phineus, king of Paphlagonia or Bithynia, from the Harpies.

CALAMATA, a conſiderable town of Turky, in Europe, in the Morea. It is without walls, and had a caſtle, which was demoliſhed in 1685, when it was taken by the Venetians. The Turks have retaken it ſince, with all the Morea. It is ſeated on the river Spinarza, eight miles from the ſea. Long. 22. 15. E. Lat. 37. 8. N.

CALAMY (EDMUND) an eminent nonconformiſt divine, in the ſeventeenth century, was born in London, in February 1600, and educated in the univerſity of Cambridge; after which, Dr. Felton, biſhop of Ely, made him his chaplain, and gave him the vicarage of St. Mary's, in Swaffham-Prior, Cambridgeſhire, which he afterwards reſigned, on being choſen one of the lecturers in St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk; but when biſhop Wren's articles, and the reading of the Book of Sports came to be inſiſted on, he altered his conduct, apologized publicly for his former behaviour, and avoided conforming for the future; though he was preſented to the rectory of Rochford, in Eſſex, and afterwards was choſen miniſter of St. Mary, Aldermanbury. He oppoſed the murder of king Charles I. with conſtancy and courage, preached before the houſe of commons on the day they voted the return of king Charles II. and was one of the divines ſent to compliment the king in Holland on that occaſion. He was afterwards made one of his majeſty's chaplains in ordinary, and offered the biſhoprick of Coventry and Litchfield, which he refuſed. He was however committed to Newgate for preaching a ſermon after the paſſing of the act of uniformity, but was ſoon releaſed. He was concerned in writing the famous book againſt epiſcopy, called Smectymnuus: he alſo publiſhed ſeveral Sermons, and a few other pieces. He died October 29, 1666.

CALAMY (EDMUND) eldeſt ſon of the former, was born at St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk, about the year 1635, was educated at Cambridge, and preſented to the living of Moreton, in Eſſex, which he held till he was ejected by the act of uniformity; on which he went to London, and had a private meeting in his own houſe, till king Charles II. publiſhed his declaration of indulgence, when he ſet up a public meeting in Curriers-hall, near Cripplegate: but when the diſſenters were again perſecuted, he had recourſe to his former method; and though he was very aſſiduous in his duty, yet he eſcaped impriſonment, notwithſtanding warrants were frequently out againſt him; but he had the misfortune to fall under a crown-office proſecution, which put him to a great deal of trouble and expence. He diſtinguiſhed guiſhed himſelf by his moderation and charity, and died in May, 1685.

CALAMY (Dr. BENJAMIN) an eminent divine of the church of England, was a younger ſon of Mr. Edmund Calamy, miniſter of Aldermanbury, beforementioned. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1677 was choſen miniſter of St. Mary, Aldermanbury; and ſoon after appointed one of his majeſty's chaplains in ordinary. In 1680 he took his degree of doctor in divinity, and in 1683 preached his famous ſermon, which he afterwards publiſhed under the title of a Diſcourſe about a ſcrupulous Conſcience. The ſame year he was admitted to the vicarage of St Lawrence Jewry, with St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-ſtreet, annexed, and two years after was made a prebendary of St. Paul's. He was of ſo excellent a character, that the greateſt men of all ſects and parties amongſt us, readily joined in paying a juſt tribute of praiſe to his memory. He was courteous and affable in his behaviour, exemplary in his life, and one of the beſt preachers and writers of his time. He died in January, 1686. He publiſhed ſeveral Sermons, beſides that already mentioned; and a volume of his Poſthumous Sermons has been publiſhed by his brother.

CALAMY (JAMES) younger brother to the former, was educated at Cambridge, where, in 1676, he took the degree of maſter of arts. He was afterwards preſented to the rectory of Northill, in Bedfordſhire, where he continued till the year 1707, when he was preſented to that of Cheriton-biſhops, in Devonſhire, and had at the ſame time a prebend in the church of Exeter beſtowed on him. He was a man of great learning, but much greater modeſty. He died ſuddenly, December 14, 1714.

CALAMY (Dr. EDMUND) a very eminent divine among the nonconformiſts, was the ſon of Mr. Edmund Calamy, miniſter of Moreton, in Eſſex, and was born in London, April 5, 1671. After having learned the languages, and gone through a courſe of natural philoſophy and logic, at a private academy in England, he ſtudied philoſophy and civil law at the univerſity of Utrecht, and attended the lectures of the learned Grævius; he afterwards returned to England, and ſtudied ſome time at Oxford. He was ordained in London, June 22, 1694, and in 1703 was choſen paſtor of a large congregation in Weſtminſter. In 1709 he had the dignity of doctor of divinity conferred on him by the univerſities of Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glaſgow. He publiſhed, 1. Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his own Life and Time; which he afterwards abridged and improved into a much larger, and more valuable work. He alſo wrote, 2. A Vindication of his grandfather, and ſeveral other worthy perſons, againſt the Reflections thrown upon them by Mr. Archdeacon Echard, in his Hiſtory. 3. A Defence of Moderate Nonconformity, and ſeveral other works. He died June 3, 1732, in the ſixtieth year of his age.

CALANUS, an Indian philoſopher, who followed Alexander the Great in his expedition into the Indies. He lived eighty-three years without illneſs; but being at laſt tormented with the colic, he deſired Alexander to give orders for preparing his funeral pile. This requeſt that prince granted with reluctance, and, in order to do honour to his obſequies, cauſed his army to be ranged in order of battle, and to ſpread the richeſt perfumes on the pile, on which Calanus was placed in a magnificent habit. The philoſopher ſhewed no ſign of pain on being ſurrounded by the flames; and being aſked if he had nothing to ſay to Alexander, who would not be preſent at this terrible ſpectacle, he anſwered, "No; for I imagine I ſhall ſhortly ſee "him again at Babylon." Theſe words were conſidered as a prediction of Alexander's death, which really happened three months after at Babylon.

CALASIO (MARIUS DE) a learned Franciſcan friar, profeſſor of Hebrew, at Rome, was the author of an excellent Hebrew Concordance of the Bible, printed at Rome, in 1621, in four volumes, folio.

CALASIRIS, in antiquity, a linen tunic, fringed at the bottom, and worn by the Egyptians under a white woollen garment, which laſt they were obliged to pull off when they entered the temples, they being then allowed to appear only in linen habits.

CALATAJUD, a city of Spain, in the kingdom of Arragon, ſeated at the end of a valley, which is very fruitful in corn, wine, oil, and fruit, and at the confluence of the rivers Xalon and Xiloca. It is about a mile from the ancient Bilbilis, which was placed on a mountain, incompaſſed by the Xalon. Calatajud was built in the eighth century, by a Mooriſh king. It is thirty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Saragoſſa, and thirty-five ſouth of Taracona. Long. 2. 9. W. Lat. 41. 22 N.

CALATOR, in antiquity, a public officer, whoſe buſineſs it was to ſummon courts, ſynods, or other public aſſemblies.

CALATRAVA, a city of Spain, in Old Caſtile, and the chief place of the military order of the knights of Calatrava, inſtituted in 1158, by Don Sancho, king of Caſtile, who gave this city to the knights to guard it againſt the Moors. It is ſeated in a plain, abounding in grain, corn, game, and ſheep, near the river Guadiana, ten miles north-eaſt of Cividad Real, ſixteen north of Almagro, and fifty ſouth of Toledo. Long. 4. 20. W. Lat. 39. 8. N.

CALCAR, a town of Germany, in the lower circle of Weſtphalia, with a caſtle: it is very ſtrong, and belongs to the king of Pruſſia. It is ſeated near the Rhine, eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Cleves. Long. 5. 41. E. Lat. 51. 45. N.

CALCAR (JOHN DE) a celebrated painter, a native of Calcar, a town in the duchy of Cleves, was the diſciple of Titian, and perfected himſelf by ſtudying Raphael. Among other pieces he drew a nativity, repreſenting the angels around the infant Chriſt, and ſo ordered the diſpoſition of his picture, that the light all proceeds from the child. He died at Naples, in 1546, in the flower of his age. It was he who deſigned the anatomical figures of Veſal, and the portraits of the painters of Veſari.

CALCHAS, in fabulous hiſtory, a famous diviner, the ſon of Theſtor, followed the Grecian army to the ſiege of Troy, which he predicted would laſt ten years, and alſo foretold that the fleet detained in the port of Aulis, by contrary winds, would not be able to ſail till Agamemnon's daughter, Iphigenia, was ſacrificed to Diana. After the taking of Troy, he went to Calophon, where he died of grief, becauſe he could not diſcover what Mopſus, another diviner, had divined.

CALCINATO, a ſmall town of Italy, in the Breſciano, remarkable for the defeat of the Imperialiſts, by the French, commanded by the duke of Vendoſme, in 1706. It is thirty-eight miles weſt of the lake di Garda. Long. 9. 55. E. Lat. 45. 33. N.

CALCUTTA. See WILLIAM (FORT).

CALDERINA (BETTINA) a learned Bologneſe lady, in the fourteenth century, was the daughter of John André, a famous civilian. She early applied herſelf to the ſtudy of the law, and marrying John de St. George, profeſſor of law, at Padua, gave public lectures on that ſubject, whenever her huſband was indiſpoſed, with ſuch applauſe, as drew to that univerſity a great number of auditors, who were charmed with her learning and merit.

CALDERINUS (DOMITIUS) a very haughty critic, born at Calderia, near Verona. He read lectures upon polite literature at Rome, with great reputation, towards the end of the fifteenth century. Several of his Commentaries upon the ancients are extant, and he was the firſt who ventured to write upon the moſt difficult poets. He died very young, in the year 1477.

CALDERON DE LA BARCA (DOM PEDRO) a celebrated comic poet, of Spain, in the ſeventeenth century, was knight of the order of St. Jago, and ſerved with honour in the army. At length he became prieſt, and was made canon of Toledo. Philip IV. king of Spain, took great pleaſure in being preſent at his comedies. Calderon paſſes for the beſt comic poet after Lopez de Vega. His Comedies were printed at Madrid, in 1689, in three volumes, quarto, and his other Poems have been publiſhed in ſix volumes, quarto. He alſo wrote The Hiſtory of our Lady of Almudena. Villaroes wrote his life, and prefixed it to the firſt volume of his Comedies.

CALDERWOOD (DAVID) a famous divine, of the church of Scotland, and a very eminent writer in behalf of the Preſbyterians, in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He vigorouſly oppoſed the reſolution king James I. had taken to bring the church of Scotland to a conformity with that of England, for which he was impriſoned, but was ſoon after diſcharged, on his promiſing to go into voluntary baniſhment; on which he went to Holland, where, in the year 1623, he publiſhed his famous book, intitled Altare Damaſcenum. The great reputation of this work put one Mr. Patrick Scot upon a very ſtrange undertaking; for our author being afflicted, in the year 1624, with a long fit of ſickneſs, and nothing being heard of him for ſome time; Scot took it for granted that he was dead, and thereupon wrote a Recantation in his name, as if, before his deceaſe, he had changed his ſentiments; but this impoſture was ſoon detected. Mr. Calderwood alſo wrote a Hiſtory of the Church of Scotland.

CALDWALL, or CHALDWELL (Dr. RICHARD) an eminent phyſician, of the ſixteenth century, was born in Staffordſhire, and educated at Oxford. He wrote ſeveral tracts relating to his profeſſion, and, in conjunction with lord Lumley, founded a lecture upon ſurgery in the College of Phyſicians. He died in the year 1585.

CALEB, one of the deputies ſent by the Iſraelites to take a view of the land of Canaan. He made a good report of the country, and by this means revived the ſpirits of the dejected people; on which account, he and Joſhua were the only perſons, who, after their leaving Egypt, ſettled in the land of Canaan. Caleb had, for his ſhare, the mountains and the city of Hebron, from which he drove three kings. Othoniel, niel, his nephew, having taken the city of Debir, Caleb gave him his daughter Achſaph in marriage, and died aged an hundred and fourteen.

CALENBERG, a caſtle of Germany, in the duchy of Brunſwick and principality of Calenberg. It is ſeated on the river Leine, and is fifteen miles ſouth of Hanover. It is ſubject to the duke of Brunſwick Lunenburg, elector of Hanover, and king of Great Britain. Long. 9. 43. E. Lat. 52. 20. N.

CALENBERG, a principality of Lower Saxony, and one of the three parts of the duchy of Brunſwick, is bounded on the north by the duchy of Verden, on the eaſt by the principality of Zell, on the ſouth by the principalities of Wolfenbuttle and Grubenhagen, and on the weſt by Weſtphalia. It belongs to the elector of Hanover.

CALENDARIO (PHILIP) a great ſculptor and architect, in the middle of the fourteenth century, raiſed thoſe magnificent porticos, ſupported by marble columns, which encompaſs St. Mark's ſquare at Venice, and executed many other pieces of ſculpture, which procured him the eſteem of the public, and the favour of the doge of Venice.

CALENTIUS (ELISIUS) a Latin poet of the ſixteenth century, born in the kingdom of Naples. Pontanus and Sanazar greatly commend his elegies and his poem on the Battle of the Rats and Frogs.

CALENUS (OLENUS) the moſt famous diviner of his time, among the Etrurians. The Romans digging the foundation of a temple which Tarquin reſolved to erect to Jupiter, on Mount Tarpeius, diſcovered the head of a man deep in the ground, and none of the Roman diviners being able to explain the omen, directed Tarquin to apply to the prophets of Etruria. He ſent a deputation to them, when Calenus, knowing that the prodigy portended great happineſs, and that the city of Rome, which they were then building, would be the head of Italy, endeavoured to deprive the Romans of this benefit; but the ſon of Calenus letting Tarquin's embaſſadors know his deſign, they turned the anſwer of this diviner to their advantage; by which means, ſays this fabulous ſtory, the Romans had the empire of Italy, which would otherwiſe have paſſed to the Etrurians.

CALEPIN (AMBROSE) an Auguſtin monk, a native of Calipio, a town in Italy, from whence he took his name, rendered himſelf famous by his Dictionary, which was augmented by Paſſerat, and by his other works. He died in 1510.

CALFHILL, CALFILL, CALFIELD, CAWFIELD, or CHALFHILL (JAMES) a learned divine, born in Shropſhire, in the year 1530. He received part of his education at Eton ſchool, from whence he was ſent to Cambridge, in 1545, and two years after removed to Oxford. He had ſeveral preferments in the church, and in 1562, being canon of Chriſt-church, Oxon, he was proctor of the clergy of London, and the chapter of Oxford, in the convocation that made the Thirty-nine Articles. After this, he was ſeveral times collated to different livings, and was at laſt nominated by queen Elizabeth to the biſhopric of Worceſter, but died before his conſecration, in Auguſt, 1570. He wrote Progne, a tragedy, in Latin, ſeveral Latin poems, and a few other pieces.

CALI, a town of South America, in the Papayan, near the South Sea, on the weſt bank of the river Cauca, and ſubject to the Spaniards. The ordinary reſidence of the governor of the province is at this place, which is about thirty miles north of the town called Papayan. Long. 73. 5. W. Lat. 3. 15. N.

CALICUT, a kingdom of India, on this ſide the Ganges, upon the coaſt of Malabar, is about ſixty-three miles long, and as much broad. This country has many woods, rivers, and marſhes. Theſe parts are populous, but not fruitful in corn, for they import abundance of rice from Canara. It is low and ſandy along the ſea-coaſt, and there is a great number of cocoa-trees. The higher grounds produce pepper and cardamoms, which are extremely good. They have likewiſe timber for building, white and yellow ſanders for dying, caſſia lignea, or white cinnamon, caſſia fiſtula, nux vomica, and cocculus Indiæ berries. There are ſeveral ſorts of game in the woods, for pleaſure and uſe, as well as parrots and monkies. There is a particular ſort of tree which yields nuts, from the kernels of which, when dried, they expreſs a very clear oil; this tree alſo yields jaggery, a ſort of ſugar; and from a wound in the bark they draw toddy, a ſort of palm wine. There are likewiſe ſeveral ſorts of medicinal drugs, and their mountains produce iron and ſteel. They have alſo plenty of fiſh.

The ſamorin, or king of Calicut, was once maſter of all the coaſt of Malabar, but at his death he left it by will among four of his nephews. He who governs Calicut has a palace built of ſtone, and there is ſome reſemblance of grandeur to be ſeen about his court. He carries on a conſiderable trade, which makes his people richer than their neighbours. They had ſeveral ſtrange cuſtoms in former times, ſome of which are ſtill kept up, particularly the ſamorin's wife muſt be firſt enjoyed by the nambourg, or chief prieſt, who may have her three nights if he pleaſes. The nobles permit other prieſts to take the ſame liberty, but the lower people cannot have that honour. The women may marry twelve huſbands if they pleaſe, as Hamilton affirms; but Van Caerden ſays only ſeven. Each huſband has her ten days, by turns, or more, as they agree among themſelves, and provides her all things neceſſary during that time. When ſhe proves with child, ſhe nominates the father, who, after the child is weaned, takes care of its education. But theſe children never inherit the father's eſtate, for that goes to the father's ſiſter's children.

They have no pens, ink, nor paper, but write on flags that grow by the ſides of the rivers in marſhes, with the point of a bodkin. The letters are in ſome ſenſe engraved by this means, and the flags are ſo tough, they will laſt a great number of years. They are generally about eighteen inches long, and one and a half broad, with holes at each end to put a ſtring through. Some have miſtaken them for palm leaves. This was the firſt land which the Portugueſe diſcovered in 1498.

CALICUT, a town of Aſia, in a kingdom of the ſame name, on the coaſt of Malabar. It contains a great number of very mean low houſes, each of which has a garden. The Engliſh had a factory here, but it is removed to Tilicherry. It is ſeated on the ſea-ſhore. Long. 76. 4. E. Lat. 11. 21. N.

CALIFORNIA, a large peninſula of North America, lying on the South Sea. It was viſited by ſir Francis Drake in 1578, who called it New Albion, and took poſſeſſion of it in the name of queen Elizabeth. In ſummer the heats are very violent along the coaſts, for it ſeldom rains during that ſeaſon; but up the country the air is more temperate. In winter the rains are exceſſive, and when they are over, there is a great dew every morning. It is very healthy, for ſtrangers, who have been there for five years together, and never had any ſickneſs. It abounds with wide extended plains, pleaſant vallies, and excellent paſtures, full of fine ſprings; the rivers and rivulets are beſet with willows, reeds, and wild vines. In ſhort, California is a very fruitful country, and there are ſeveral trees and fruits peculiar to it. They have fourteen ſorts of grain, which the inhabitants feed upon, and they make bread of the roots of trees and plants. Some of the trees, it is ſaid by the Jeſuits, bear fruit thrice a year. They have two kinds of four-footed animals, peculiar to the country; one of which is about the ſize of a calf of two years old, with a head like a ſtag, and horns like a ram; their hair is long, and the hoofs like oxen. The other are a kind of ſheep, ſome white and others black, but they differ from the European in ſeveral reſpects. The other animals are like thoſe of Mexico. The inland country, eſpecially northward, is very populous; the inhabitants live in a ſort of arbours, made of the boughs of trees, in ſummer, and in winter creep into caves dug in the earth. The men go quite naked, only they have a piece of linen about their heads, and have ornaments made of ſhells, mixed with little round berries, about their necks and arms. Their weapons are bows, arrows, and javelins, which they always carry in their hands, for they are often at war with each other. The women wear a ſort of apron, made of platted reeds; they cover their ſhoulders with the ſkins of beaſts, and wear a ſort of net-work on their heads. They have alſo necklaces and bracelets like the men. They make theſe ornaments of a kind of graſs, as alſo bags for different uſes, and fiſhing-nets: with this graſs they alſo make cups, plates, diſhes, and ſometimes umbrellas for women. They appear to have no form of government, and very little religion. They are of a red copper colour, with courſe black hair, and no beards, like the reſt of the native Americans.

CALIGNON (SOFFREY DE) a French gentleman of great merit, was born at St. Jean's, near Voirou, in Dauphiny, and became ſecretary to M. de Leſdiguires, a miniſter of the reformed religion, and afterwards chancellor of Navarre. Henry IV. had a particular eſteem for him, and employed him in the moſt important affairs, and it was Calignon who drew up the edict at Nantes. He wrote a ſatire, intitled, Le mepris des Dames; and he is believed to be the author of L'Hiſtoire des choſes plus remarkables advenues en France, ès Années 1587, 1588, & 1589, par S. C. He died at Paris in September, 1606, at ſixty-ſix years of age.

CALIGULA (CAIUS CÆSAR) the fourth Roman emperor, ſucceeded Tiberius A. D. 37. He was the ſon of Germanicus and Agrippina, and degenerated in ſo monſtrous a manner, that the reign of his predeceſſor was regretted; which made Seneca ſay, that in him Nature had ſhewn all the evil ſhe was capable of producing. The corruption of his mind diſcovered itſelf very early, for before he was old enough to wear the toga virilis, he was ſurpriſed in the fact of committing inceſt with one of his ſiſters. He even debauched them all, and lived in public commerce with one of them. He carried his impiety to the greateſt lengths, and had the folly to cauſe himſelf to be adored as a god, affecting in turn to repreſent all the gods and goddeſſes, carrying ſometimes a trident like Neptune, at others a caduceus like Mercury, and at others a lyre like Apollo; and, in ſhort, he ſometimes dreſſed himſelf like Venus, with a myrtle crown. He bragged that he had lain with Diana, and often placed himſelf between the ſtatues of Caſtor and Pollux, and received the adoration of all comers. In ſhort, he had a temple erected to him, in which the choiceſt animals were ſacrificed to him; but though he pretended to deſpiſe the gods, he uſed to ſhut his eyes and cover his head at the leaſt thunder and lightning; and if it happened to thunder very much, he leaped out of bed and crept under it. To the above impieties he added the moſt inhuman cruelties. He put to death a great number of perſons, and even his neareſt relations, upon the moſt trifling pretences. He oppreſſed the people, by loading them with heavy taxes, and rendered himſelf ridiculous and deſpicable, by his follies and extravagances. He reſolved to build a bridge over the ſea, and expended immenſe ſums on this abſurd project. His folly was not leſs with reſpect to the manner in which he treated his horſe. He invited him to ſummer, had him ſerved with gilt barley, and had wine preſented to him in veſſels of gold. He built for him a ſtable of marble, in which was an ivory manger, had him covered with purple, and adorned him with a collar of pearls; to this horſe he alſo gave an houſe, with domeſtics and furniture, that he might magnificently entertain thoſe whom he ſhould deſire to ſup with him: he ſwore by the life and fortune of this animal, made him a prieſt, and promiſed to make him conſul, which he would perhaps have performed, had he not been killed ſoon after by Caſſius Chæreas, captain of his guards, with other conſpirators, in the year 41, and the twenty-ninth of his age, after a reign of near four years.

CALISTA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, and one of the nymphs of Diana, who, being beloved by Jupiter, that god aſſumed the form of the goddeſs of Chaſtity, by which means he debauched her; but her diſgrace being revealed, as ſhe was bathing with her patroneſs, the incenſed deity not only diſgraced her, but turned her and the ſon, with which ſhe was pregnant, into bears, when Jupiter, in compaſſion to her ſufferings, took them up into the heavens, and made them the conſtellations Urſa Major and Urſa Minor.

CALIXTUS (George) a learned Lutheran divine, born at Madelbuy, in Holſtein, on the 14th of December, 1586, was profeſſor of divinity at Helmſtadt, in 1614, and died on the 18th of March, 1656. He wrote in Latin, a Treatiſe againſt the Celebacy of the Clergy, and other works.

CALLAHORA, an epiſcopal city of Spain, in Old Caſtile. It is ſeated in a very fruitful ſoil, on the declivity of a hill, which extends to the banks of the river Ebro. It is ſeventy miles eaſt of Burgos, and ſeventy-five north-by-eaſt of Siguença. Long. 2. 7. W. Lat. 42. 14. N.

CALLAO, a ſtrong town of South America, in Peru, and the port of Lima, from which it is diſtant about five miles. The town is built on a low flat point of land on the ſea-ſhore. It is fortified, but the fortifications were much out of repair before the earthquake, in 1756. The level of the town is not above nine or ten feet above the level of high-water mark; but the tide does not commonly riſe or fall above five feet. The ſtreets are drawn in a line, but are full of duſt, which is very troubleſome. In a ſquare near the ſea-ſide are the governor's houſe, the viceroy's palace, the pariſh church, and a battery of three pieces of cannon. On the north ſide are the warehouſes for the merchandiſe brought from Chili, Mexico, and other parts of Peru. The other churches are built with reeds, and covered with timber or clay, but they look tolerably neat. There are five monaſteries and an hoſpital, though the number of families do not exceed four hundred.

The trade of Callao is conſiderable. From Chili they bring cordage, leather, tallow, dried fiſh, and corn. From Chiloe, cedar-planks, woollen manufactures, and carpets. From Peru, ſugars, wines, brandy, maſts cordage, timber for ſhipping, cacoa, tobacco, and molaſſes. From Mexico, pitch, tar, woods for dying, ſulphur, balſam of Peru, both white and brown, as well as commodities from China. At the port of Callao the watering is eaſy, but the wood is a mile or two diſtant.

Earthquakes are very frequent in theſe parts, which have done vaſt miſchief to Lima and Callao. Long. 76. 15. W. Lat. 12. 29. S.

CALLA-Susung, a town of Aſia, and capital of the iſland of Bouton. It is about a mile from the ſea, on the top of a ſmall hill, in a very agreeable plain, ſurrounded with cocoa-trees. Without the trees is a ſtrong ſtone wall, quite round the town, which is clean, neat, and pleaſant. Their houſes are built on poſts, from fourteen to twenty feet, according to the intended largeneſs of the ſtructure. There are ſeveral partitions or rooms, all on one floor, for they build no higher, and there is a ladder or ſtairs to go up out of the ſtreets: the roof is large, and covered with palmeto leaves, and there is a clear paſſage like a piazza under the houſes. The inhabitants are ſmall, and well ſhaped, with ſtrait bodies and little heads. They have oval faces, flat foreheads, ſmall black eyes, ſhort low noſes, red thin lips, pretty large mouths, black teeth, and black ſtrait hair. The colour of their ſkin is tawny, but the women are of a brighter yellow than the other Indians. They wear their thumb nails very long, and in general are very lazy, but proud, though they are civil enough to ſtrangers. The men wear little turbans, fringed or laced at the ends, and frocks and breeches, but neither ſtockings nor ſhoes. The women have nothing on their heads; but their hair is tied in a knot behind. They wear two garments, a ſort of frock, and a little petticoat, but nothing at all on their legs or feet. They are very free and familiar with ſtrangers, and offer themſelves to be pagallies, that is, female platonic friends, but they ſeldom ſtop there, as many ſailors have found to their coſt, for they have often been poiſoned; but whether by the huſband or wife is hard to ſay. When the ſailor has fixed on a pegally, he eats, drinks, and ſleeps at her houſe.

The religion which is generally profeſſed here, is the Mahommedan, for which reaſon the Engliſh have dignified the chief man in the iſland with the title of ſultan. He has a ſilk turban laced with narrow gold lace on the ſides, and broad lace at the end, which hang down one ſide of the head. He has ſky-coloured ſilk breeches, and a piece of red ſilk thrown acroſs his ſhoulders, which leaves his back and his waiſt bare. His legs and feet are quite naked. The ſoldiers are all naked. Long. 123. 45. E. Lat. 5. 0. S.

CALLICRATES, an ancient ſculptor, who engraved ſome of Homer's verſes on a grain of millet; made an ivory chariot that might be concealed under the wing of a fly, and an ant of ivory, in which all the members were diſtinct; but Ælian juſtly blames him for exerting his genius and talents in things ſo uſeleſs, and at the ſame time ſo difficult.

CALLICRATIDAS, a Spartan general, took Methymne, and beſieged Conon, the Athenian general, in Mytelene: the Athenians however haſted to his aſſiſtance, and defeated Callicratidas in a ſea-fight, who was drowned the year after, in the four hundred and fifth year before Chriſt.

CALLIERES (Francis de) a native of Torigni, was deſcended from a noble family, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his knowledge and his talents for negotiations. He wrote two excellent works, a Treatiſe on the Manner of Negotiating with ſovereign Princes; and another, intitled The Science of the World, and the Knowledge uſeful in the Conduct of Life, &c. He was received into the French academy in 1689, and died on the 15th of May, 1717. He ought not to be confounded with John de Callieres, his father, the author of the Life of the Duke de Joyeuſe Capucin, and of that of Marſhal James de Matignon.

CALLIMACHUS, a celebrated architect, painter, and ſculptor, born at Corinth, having ſeen by accident a veſſel, about which a plant called acanthe had raiſed its leaves, conceived the idea of forming the Corinthian capital. The ancients aſſure us, that Callimachus worked in marble with wonderful delicacy. He lived about five hundred and forty years before the birth of Chriſt.

Callimachus, a celebrated Athenian captain, was choſen general in a council of war, before the battle of Marathon, four hundred and ninety years before the Chriſtian æra. After that battle againſt the Perſians, he was found ſtanding on his feet, though pierced all over with arrows.

Callimachus, a celebrated Greek poet, a native of Cyrene, in Lybia, flouriſhed under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Ptolemy Evergetes, kings of Egypt, about two hundred and eighty years before Chriſt; and being the ſon of Battus, is called by Ovid, Battiades. He paſſed, according to Quintilian, for the prince of the Greek elegiac poets. His ſtyle is elegant, delicate, and nervous. He wrote a great number of ſmall poems, of which we have only ſome hymns and epigrams remaining. Catullus has cloſely imitated him, and tranſlated into Latin verſe his ſmall poem on the Locks of Berenice. Callimachus was alſo a good grammarian, and a learned critic. There is an edition of Callimachus's remains, by Meſſ. le Fevre, quarto, and another in two volumes, octavo, cum Notis variorum, preſertim Ezechielis Spanhemii, Grævii, & Bentleii, Lugd. Bat. 1697, which is very ſcarce.

CALLINICUS, a native of Heliopolis, in Syria, in the year 670 invented the wild fire which Conſtantine Pogonatus ſucceſsfully employed in burning the fleet of the Saracens.

CALLIOPE, in the pagan mythology, the muſe who preſides over eloquence and heroic poetry. She was thus called from the ſweetneſs of her voice, and was reckoned the firſt of the nine ſiſters.

This goddeſs was repreſented by the ancients as a young and and beautiful virgin, crowned with flowers, and holding in her hand the Odyſſey, the Iliad, and the Æneid.

CALLIRHOE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of the river Achelous, and wife of that Alcmeon who killed his mother Eryphile. She was married to him when he had another wife living, to whom he had given a famous gold necklace. Callirhoe having at laſt heard of this fine necklace, declared that ſhe would not lie any more with him, if he did not make her a preſent of it. Upon which, Alcmeon going to Phegeus, his other wife's father, and telling him that the oracle had declared, that he would never be cured of his frenzy, if he did not offer the necklace in the temple of Delphi, Phegeus gave it him; but being ſoon after informed that it was deſigned for Callirhoe, he commanded his two ſons to murder Alcmeon, which they did accordingly. Jupiter enjoying Callirhoe, ſhe, in order to revenge her huſband, begged that her children by Alcmeon, who were ſtill very young, might become in a moment full grown men. Her petition was granted; and immediately her two ſons, at her deſire, ſet out, and meeting on the road the two murderers, who were going to offer the necklace at Delphi, killed them, and afterwards going to Phegeus, killed him and his ſpouſe. After this, Callirhoe dedicated the necklace to Apollo.

CALLISTEA, Καλλιστεῖα, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival in which the women preſented themſelves in Juno's temple, and the faireſt obtained the prize.

There was another of theſe contentions at the feſtival of Ceres Eleuſinia, among the Parrhaſians.

Among the Eleans we find a feſtival almoſt of the ſame nature, in which the handſomeſt man was preſented with a complete ſuit of armour, which he conſecrated to Minerva, to whoſe temple he walked in proceſſion, adorned with ribbons, crowned with a garland of myrtle, and accompanied by his friends.

CALLISTHENES, of Olynthus, a famous philoſopher and hiſtorian, was the diſciple and relation of Ariſtotle. He followed Alexander in his conqueſts, but being accuſed of conſpiring againſt that prince, was put to death. His works are loſt.

CALLISTRATUS, an excellent Athenian orator, was baniſhed for having obtained too great an authority in the government. Demoſthenes was ſo ſtruck with the force of his eloquence, and the glory it procured him, that he abandoned Plato, and reſolved from thence forward to apply himſelf to oratory.

CALLISTUS, or CALLIXTUS, pope. See CALLIXTUS.

CALLISTUS (JOHANNES ANDRONICUS) one of the learned Greeks who brought learning into the weſt of Europe. He is ſaid to have been born at Theſſalonica, and to have ſettled at Conſtantinople, where he acquired a high reputation for his learning. When that city was taken by the Turks, in 1453, he fled with many others into Italy, and taught the Greek language, firſt at Rome, and afterwards at Florence, where he had a vaſt concourſe of diſciples. He afterwards went to France, but died ſoon after. There are ſome Greek manuſcripts of his ſtill in being, particularly one in the king of France's library, intitled, a Monody upon the Miſeries of Conſtantinople. There are alſo ſome philoſophical and moral pieces in manuſcript aſcribed to him.

CALLIXTUS, or CALIXTUS I. ſucceeded pope Zephyrin, in 219, and died on the 14th of October, 224. He was ſucceeded by Urbin I.

CALLIXTUS, or CALIXTUS II. was archbiſhop of Vienna in 1083, and was choſen pope in 1119. He confined the antipope Gregory, and held the firſt general council of Lateran, in 1123. He died on the 13th of December, 1124, and was ſucceeded by Honorius II.

CALLIXTUS, or CALIXTUS III. a native of Xativa, in Spain, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning and merit. He was elected pope on the 8th of April, 1455, and died on the 6th of Auguſt, 1458. He was ſucceeded by Pius II.

CALLOO, a fort in the Low Countries, in the territory of Waes, on the Scheld. Near this fort the Dutch were defeated by the Spaniards, in 1638. It is five miles weſt of Antwerp. Long. 4. 10. E. Lat. 51. 15. N.

CALLOT (JAMES) a celebrated engraver, born at Nancy, in 1593. In his youth he travelled to Rome to learn deſigning and engraving, and from thence went to Florence, where the grand duke took him into his ſervice. After the death of that prince, Callot returned to his native country, when he was received very favourably by Henry, duke of Lorrain, who ſettled a conſiderable penſion upon him. His reputation being ſoon ſpread over all Europe, the infanta of the Netherlands drew him to Bruſſels, where he engraved the ſiege of Breda. Lewis XIII. made him deſign the ſiege of Rochelle, and that of the Iſle of Rhé. At his return to Lorrain he continued to labour with ſuch application, that a great number of prints came out of his hand, which were the admiration of all good judges. The French king having taken Nancy in 1631, made Callot the propoſal of preſenting that new conqueſt, as he had already done the taking of Rochelle; but Callot begged to be excuſed, and ſome courtiers reſolving to oblige him to do it, he anſwered, that he would ſooner cut off his thumb than do any thing againſt the honour of his prince and country. This excuſe the king accepted, and ſaid that the duke of Lorrain was happy in having ſuch faithful and affectionate ſubjects. He at length offered him a penſion of a thouſand crowns to leave the place of his birth, and to ſerve him; but Callot let him know that he could not leave his native country. He died at Nancy, on the 28th of March, 1635, aged forty-two.

Almoſt all his pictures were performed by etching.

CALLY, a learned Carteſian philoſopher, who was profeſſor of eloquence and philoſophy at Caen. The moſt remarkable of his works is, a Treatiſe on the Agreement of Philoſophy with Divinity, in relation to Tranſubſtantiation: this work, which made a great noiſe, he publiſhed in 1700.

CALMAR, a ſtrong town of Sweden, in the province of Smaland, with a harbour and a ſtrong caſtle, as alſo a fort, built upon a rock, at a ſmall diſtance from the harbour. It is well peopled, and is divided into the old and new town. Of the former there remains only a church, and a few houſes. New Calmar ſtands about a muſquet ſhot from the other. The ſtreets are wide, ſtrait, and well-built. It is ſeated near the Baltic Sea, and has a biſhop and a college. It is one hundred and twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Copenhagen, and one hundred and fifty ſouth-weſt of Stockholm. Long. 16. 15. E. Lat. 56. 48. N.

CALMET (AUGUSTIN) a Benedictine monk, who was one of the moſt learned and laborious writers of the eighteenth century, was born at Meſnil le Horgne, a village in the dioceſe of Toul, in France, on the 26th of February, 1672, and took the habit of the Benedictines in 1688. Among the many works he publiſhed, are, 1. A literal Expoſition, in French, of all the Books of the Old Teſtament, in nine volumes, folio. 2. An hiſtorical, critical, chronological, geographical, and literal Dictionary of the Bible; the beſt edition of which is that printed at Paris, in four volumes, folio, wherein the whole is thrown into one alphabet. 3. A civil and eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Lorrain, three volumes, folio. 4. A Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, and of the Jews, in two volumes, folio, and ſeven volumes, duodecimo. 5. An univerſal ſacred and profane Hiſtory, in ſeveral volumes, quarto, &c. He died at the abby of Senones, on the 9th of July, 1757.

CALMUCKS, a people of Aſia, in Great Tartary. They are divided into ſeveral hords, which have each a khan of their own. The principal is one who reſides at Sarmakand, who pretends he is deſcended from Timurbec. The Calmucks have no fixed habitatation, but live in tents, and are always removing from one place to another, taking with them their wives and children, their camels, herds, and flocks, and all ſorts of fowls.

In a deep valley near Zartzon, which is ſeated on the Volga, there is an encampment of theſe people, who are in friendſhip with the Ruſſians. They are armed with bows and arrows, and feed on the fleſh of horſes, camels, and other animals, even when the beaſt dies of the foulеſt diſtemper. They throw their dead in the fields to be devoured by dogs. They worſhip an image, which is generally a bit of wood, a palm in length. They make the upper part ſomewhat like a human face, and cloath it in rags. But their chief deity is Delli Lama. They have a ſtrong propenſity to rob and murder, but the Ruſſians keep them pretty well under.

CALNE, a town in Wiltſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, and two fairs, on May 6, for horſes, horned cattle, ſheep, and cheeſe; and on Auguſt 2, for toys. It is ſeated on a river of the ſame name, on a ſtony ground. However, it has a handſome church, and ſends two members to parliament, who are choſen by thoſe who have a right of commonage, or as ſome ſay by the burgeſſes only. Its chief trade is in cloth. It is remarkable for a convocation of the clergy in 977; while they were diſputing about the marriage of the monks and prieſts, the houſe they were in fell down, and only St. Dunſtan the preſident eſcaped unhurt, which was looked upon as a miracle. It is twenty-ſeven miles eaſt of Briſtol, thirteen weſt of Marlborough, and eighty-eight weſt of London. Long. 1. 59. W. Lat. 51. 30. N.

CALPHURNIA, daughter of Calpurnius Piſa, and the fourth wife of Julius Cæſar, was endowed with many eminent qualities; her beauty was accompanied with great wiſdom, extraordinary eloquence, and a boundleſs generoſity. In the night which preceded the day in which her huſband was aſſaſſinated, ſhe dreamt that he was ſtabbed in her arms. Terrified at this dream, ſhe haſted to him, and with her prayers and tears endeavoured to prevail upon him not to go to the ſenate; but they were incapable of making him change his reſolution. After his death ſhe ſpent the reſt of her life at the houſe of Mark Anthony, lamenting her huſband, and neglecting no opportunity to revenge his murder.

CALPRENEDE (Gautier de Costes, ſeignior de la) a gentleman of Perigord, known by his Romances of Silvander and Cleopatra, &c. He died in 1663.

CALPURNIUS, a Latin poet, born in Sicily in the third century. We have ſeven of his Eclogues, which are greatly inferior to thoſe of Virgil, and ought not to be put into the hands of youth, for fear of ſpoiling their taſte.

CALSERY, a town of Aſia, in the dominions of the mogul, ſeated on the river Jamba, near the ſource of Gemena. Long. 79. 25. E. Lat. 30. 20. N.

CALVART (Denis) a celebrated painter, was born at Antwerp in 1552, and had for his maſters Proſpero Fontana, and Lorenzo Sabbatini. He acquired, by his talents, the admiration of Italy, and opened a ſchool at Bologna, which became celebrated, and from which proceeded Guido, Albani, and other great maſters. Calvart was well ſkilled in architecture, perſpective, and anatomy, which he conſidered as neceſſary to a painter, and taught them to his pupils. His principal works are at Bologna, Rome, and Reggio. He died at Bologna in 1619.

CALVERT (George) afterwards lord Baltimore, was born at Kipling in Yorkſhire, about the year 1582, and educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and afterwards travelled. At his return in king James the Firſt's reign, he was made ſecretary to Robert Cecil, one of the chief ſecretaries of ſtate: he was afterwards knighted, and in 1618 appointed one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate. But after he had enjoyed that poſt about five years, he willingly reſigned it, freely owning to his majeſty that he was become a Roman Catholic, ſo that he muſt either be wanting to his truſt, or violate his conſcience in diſcharging his office. This ingenuous confeſſion ſo affected king James, that he continued him privy counſellor all his reign, and the ſame year created him baron of Baltimore, in the kingdom of Ireland. He had before obtained a patent for him and his heirs, for the province of Avelon, in Newfoundland, but that being expoſed to the inſults of the French, he abandoned it, and obtained from king Charles I. a patent to him and his heirs, to be abſolute lord and proprietor of Maryland, on the north of Virginia, of which his family are ſtill proprietors. He died in London, April 15, 1632. He wrote, 1. A Latin Poem on the Death of Sir Henry Unton. 2. Speeches in Parliament. 3. Various Letters of State. 4. The Anſwer of Tom Tell Truth. 5. The Practice of Princes; and, 6. The Lamentation of the Kirk.

CALVI (Lazaro) a famous Genoeſe painter, who lived in the ſixteenth century.

Calvi, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Terra di Lavoro, with a biſhop's ſee. It is eight miles north of Capua. Long. 14. 50. E. Lat. 41. 13 N.

Calvi, or Calvesi, a town in the iſland of Corſica, ſeated on a craggy mountain, on a gulph of the ſame name, with a good fort and a harbour. It is thirty-three miles weſt of Baſtia. Long. 9. 7. E. Lat. 42. 30. N.

CALVIN (John) one of the chief reformers in the ſixteenth century, was born at Noyon, in Picardy, July 10, 1509. As he was deſigned for the church, his friends procured him very early a living in the cathedral of Noyon, and afterwards the rectory of Pont l'Evêque; but after he had gone through a courſe of polite literature, he ſtudied the law at Bourges, and alſo applied himſelf to the Greek tongue. After this he went to Paris, where he wrote a Commentary upon Seneca's Treatiſe de Clementia, and made himſelf known to thoſe who had ſecretly admitted the reformation; but the perſecution beginning in France, he went to Baſil, where he ſtudied Hebrew, and publiſhed his Chriſtian Inſtitution, which he dedicated to Francis I. He then returned to France, and having ſettled his private affairs, propoſed to retire to Straſburg or Baſil, but going to paſs through Geneva, was obliged to ſtay there, for the conſiſtory and magiſtrates of that city made choice of him, with the people's conſent, as well to preach as to be a profeſſor of divinity, both which employments he therefore took upon him. The next year, viz. 1537, he made all the people ſolemnly ſwear to a body of doctrines; but finding that religion had not yet had any great influence on the morals of the people, he, aſſiſted by other miniſters, declared, that ſince all their admonitions and warnings had proved unſucceſsful, they could not celebrate the holy ſacrament, as long as theſe diſorders reigned; he alſo declared, that he could not ſubmit to ſome regulations made by the ſynod of Berne. Upon which the Syndics having ſummoned the people, it was ordered that Calvin and two other miniſters ſhould leave the city within two days. Upon this Calvin retired to Straſburg, where he eſtabliſhed a French church, of which he was the firſt miniſter, and was alſo choſen profeſſor of divinity there. Two years after he was choſen to aſſiſt at the diet, appointed by the emperor to meet at Worms and at Ratiſbon, in order to appeaſe the troubles occaſioned by the difference of religion. He went with Bucer, and entered into a conference with Melancthon. The people of Geneva now intreated him to return to them; he conſented, and arrived at Geneva, September 13, 1541. He began with eſtabliſhing a form of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, and a conſiſtorical juriſdiction, with the power of inflicting all kinds of canonical puniſhments. This was greatly diſliked by many perſons, who imagined that the papal tyranny would ſoon be revived. Calvin, however, aſſerted on all occaſions the rights of his conſiſtory, with inflexible ſtrictneſs. He cauſed Michael Servetus to be burnt at the ſtake for writing againſt the doctrine of the Trinity, and on this occaſion publiſhed a treatiſe to prove, that worſt of popiſh doctrines, the lawfulneſs of putting heretics to death. But though the rigour of his proceedings ſometimes occaſioned great tumults in the city, yet nothing could ſhake his ſteadineſs and inflexibility. Amongſt all the diſturbances of the commonwealth, he took care of the foreign churches in England, France, Germany, and in Poland, and did more by his pen than his preſence, ſending his advice and inſtructions by letter, and writing a great number of books. This great reformer died on the 27th of May, 1564, aged fifty-five. His works were printed together at Amſterdam in 1671, in nine volumes, folio. The principal of which are, his Inſtitutions in Latin, the beſt edition of which is that of Robert Stephens in 1553, in folio, and his Commentaries on the Holy Scriptures.

Calvin is univerſally allowed to have had great talents, an excellent genius, and profound learning. His ſtyle is grave and polite, and his morals were exemplary, for he was pious, ſober, chaſte, laborious, and diſintereſted.

CALVISIUS (Seth) a celebrated chonologer in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, was born in a village called Gorſchleben, in Thuringia, Feb. 21, 1556. His parents being in very low circumſtances, he maintained himſelf chiefly by ſinging from door to door, and by this means ſaved money enough to maintain himſelf in the univerſity of Helmſtadt, where he lived a year, and the year following removing to Leipſic, he was, in 1582, appointed chanter, and ſome years after was choſen governor of a choir of muſic in that city. Mean while he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of hiſtory, chronology, and aſtronomy. He wrote ſeveral excellent Treatiſes upon Muſic, a great work on Chronology, and other works. He died at Leipſic, Nov. 23, 1615.

CALVO Gualres (Francis de) a famous captain, born at Barcelona in 1627. After having conquered the Moors, he went into France, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour, and aroſe to the rank of lieutenant-general. He died in 1690.

CALVUS (Cornelius Licinius) a celebrated Roman orator, was the friend of Catullus, and flouriſhed ſixty-four years before the Chriſtian æra. Catullus, Ovid, and Horace ſpeak of him.

CALYPSO, in fabulous hiſtory, a goddeſs, who was the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or, as others ſay, of Atlas. She was queen of the iſland of Ogygia, which from her was called the iſland of Calypſo. According to Homer, Ulyſſes ſuffered ſhipwreck on her coaſt, and ſtaid with her ſeveral years.

CAM, a river that riſes in Hertfordſhire, and running north-eaſt by Cambridge, afterwards continues its courſe northward to the iſle of Ely, where it falls into the Ouſe.

CAMALDOLI (Ambrose de) in Latin Ambroſius Camaldulenſis, ſo called from his being abbot-general of the order of Camaldoli, was one of the moſt learned men of the fifteenth century. He entered into the order of Camaldoli at the age of fourteen, and was made general of it in 1431. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal for the authority of the ſee of Rome, tranſlated a great many books out of Greek into Latin, and compoſed, 1. A Chronicle of the Abbey of Mount Caſſino. 2. An Hiſtory of his own Actions whilſt he was general of the Order of Camaldoli. 3. The Lives of ſome Saints, ſome Orations, and other works.

CAMARANA, an iſland in the Arabic Gulph, or the Red Sea. The inhabitants are little and black, and are Mahommedans. It is the beſt iſland in the gulph, and here they fiſh for white coral and pearl oyſters. Lat. 15.

CAMBAIA, or Cambay, a city of Aſia, in the province of Guzurat. It is ſeated at the bottom of the gulph of Cambay, on a ſmall river made by the overflowing of the Indus, and was formerly a populous place, but it is not now half inhabited, ſince the trade was removed to Surat. There are brick walls about the town, with towers of the ſame. Theſe are high, and likewiſe built with brick, hardened in the ſun. There are many fine gardens, both within and without the town, which abound with orange trees. There are piazzas in the middle of the town, with ſhops full of rich ſtuffs, perfumes, and ſpices. The caſtle, which is large, is the ſeat of the governor of the great mogul, for it was taken taken by him in the ſixteenth century; before which it was the capital of a kingdom of the ſame name.

It is now ſubordinate to Surat, to whoſe wealth and grandeur it greatly contributes. The great city Amadabat, which is about one hundred and fifty miles diſtant, ſends almoſt all its merchandizes to this place, to be exported by ſea. The produce and manufactures of Cambay are inferior to few towns in India. It abounds in grain, cattle, cotton, and ſilk. There are fine cornelians and agates found in the rivers: of the cornelians they make rings and ſeals, and of the agates they make cups, ſpoons, and handles for ſwords, daggers, and knives. The inhabitants are the beſt embroiderers in all India, and perhaps in the world, and are chiefly Banians. As theſe think is unlawful to take away the life of any creature, they are extremely peſtered with monkeys, who come into their houſes, and throw things at people as they paſs by. Long. 72. 15. E. Lat. 22. 30. N.

CAMBDEN. See CAMDEN.

CAMBERT, a French muſician in the ſeventeenth century, was at firſt admired for the manner in which he touched the organ, and became ſuperintendant of the muſic to Anne of Auſtria, the queen mother. The abbé Perrin aſſociated him in the privilege he obtained of his majeſty, of ſetting up an opera in 1669. Cambert ſet to muſic two paſtorals, the one intitled Pomona, and the other Ariadne, which were the firſt operas given in France. He alſo wrote a piece called the Pains and Pleaſures of Love. Theſe pieces pleaſed the public, yet, in 1672, Lully obtaining the privilege of the opera, and his reputation riſing above that of Cambert, the latter was obliged to come to England, where he became ſuperintendant of the muſic to king Charles II. and died here in 1677.

CAMBIASI (LUCAS) an able painter and ſculptor, was born at Moneglia, in the ſtate of Genoa, in 1527. He was taught by his father, who ſuffered him to be only half dreſſed, in order to oblige him to ſtay at home, and mind his buſineſs. Cambiaſi diſcovered ſuch an extraordinary genius, that he was employed at ſeventeen years of age in ſeveral public works. On his becoming a widower, he fell in love with his ſiſter-in-law, and was deſirous of marrying her. For this purpoſe he preſented two pictures and a petition to pope Gregory XIII. to obtain a diſpenſation, but was refuſed. Some time after Philip III. king of Spain, deſired to have him at his court. Cambiaſi immediately repaired thither, in hopes of obtaining a recommendation from the king to the pope; but being informed that his majeſty was diſpleaſed at his requeſt, he was ſo ſtruck, that he fell into a kind of delirium, which threw him into a diſeaſe, of which he died ſoon after, at the Eſcurial, in 1587, at fifty-eight years of age. He left a great number of deſigns, and many pictures, from which it appeared that he excelled in foreſhortening, but that his works had neither ſufficient grace nor lightneſs. He was, however, prodigious quick, and performed more work by his own hands than ſeveral painters together could perform in the ſame time.

CAMBODIA, or CAMBOYA, a kingdom of Aſia, in the Eaſt Indies, bounded on the north by the kingdom of Laos, on the eaſt by the kingdom of Cochinchina and Chiapa, on the ſouth and weſt by the gulph and kingdom of Siam. The weſt part is mountainous and deſert, but the midland lies low, and has the river Mecon running through the whole length from north to ſouth. It begins to ſwell every year, about the firſt of June, and riſes ten or twelve feet, and in July and Auguſt overflows the neighbouring lands. It riſes in the ſouth-weſt part of China, runs through the kingdom of Laos, and before it comes to the town of Cambodia, divides into two branches, and deſcends into the ſea with two mouths. We have but little knowledge of the inland parts of this country, but the firſt ſea-port town to be met with is Cupangſoap. This affords elephant's teeth, ſticklack, and camboge, or gambouge. The next is Pontemeaſs, which has a deep narrow river, that in the rainy ſeaſon has a communication with the Mecon or Mekon, which drew the foreign trade to this town, becauſe the Mekon runs down from Cambodia with a continual ſtream, near three hundred miles, which rendered the navigation up it very difficult. This continued till 1717, when the Siam fleet deſtroyed it.

Cambodia, the capital, conſiſts of one large ſtreet, built on a high ground, to protect it from the inundation of the river. The inhabitants are of a light-brown complexion, and very well ſhaped, with long hair and thin beards. The women are handſome, and very laviſh of their favours, as they are in all theſe parts. The men wear a long gown, but nothing on their heads or feet. The women have a waiſtcoat which ſits cloſe to their bodies and arms, with a petticoat that reaches down to their ancles. Both ſexes dreſs their hair. Their religion or manner of worſhip is the ſame as at Siam, but their prieſts are not much reſpected, they having no income to maintain them. Long. of the town 104. 15. E. Lat. 12. 40. N.

CAMBRAY, an archiepiſcopal city, the capital of the Cambreſis, in the Low Countries, ſeated on the Scheld. It is defended by good fortifications, and has a fort on the ſide of the river, and as the land is low on that ſide, they can lay the adjacent parts under water, by means of ſluices. Its ditches are large and deep, and thoſe of the citadel are cut into a rock. Clodion became maſter of Cambray in 445. The Danes burnt it afterwards; ſince which time it became a free imperial city. It has been the ſubject of conteſt between the emperors, the kings of France, and the earls of Flanders. Francis I. let it remain neutral during the war with Charles V. but this laſt took poſſeſſion of it in 1543. After this it was given to John of Montluc by Henry III. of France, whom he created prince of Cambray: but Montluc loſt it in 1593, which broke his heart, it being then taken by the Spaniards. It continued a long while under the dominion of the Houſe of Auſtria, that is, till 1677, when the king of France became maſter of it, in whoſe hands it has continued ever ſince.

The buildings of Cambray are tolerably handſome, and the ſtreets fine and ſpacious. The place or ſquare for arms is of an extraordinary largeneſs, and capable of receiving the whole garriſon in order of battle. The cathedral, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is one of the fineſt in Europe. The body of the church is very large, and there are rich chapels, the pillars of which are adorned with marble tombs, that are of exquiſite workmanſhip, and add greatly to the beauty of the place. There are two galleries, one of which is of copper, finely wrought. The door of the choir is of the ſame metal, and well carved. The chapel of Notre Dame, which is in the ſame cathedral, is very magnificent, and contains (as they are pleaſed to tell you) a picture of the Viſitation, done by St. Luke, enriched with precious ſtones, and accompanied with crowns and other votive donations. The tabernacle of this chapel is ſilver, and conſtantly illuminated with twenty lamps of great value.

The ſteeple of this church is very high, and built in the form of a pyramid, and from its top you have a fine view of the city, which is one of the fineſt and moſt agreeable in the Low Countries. There are nine pariſhes, four abbeys, and ſeveral convents for both ſexes. The town-houſe is very magnificent, and ſeated in a fine point of view, near the ſquare where the great market is kept. The citadel is very advantageouſly ſituated on high ground, and commands the whole city. In ſhort, Cambray is one of the moſt opulent and commercial cities in the Low Countries, and makes every year a great number of pieces of cambrick, with which the inhabitants drive a great trade. It is twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Arras, fifteen ſouth-eaſt of Doway, eighteen ſouth-weſt of Valenciennes, thirty ſouth-weſt of Mons, forty north-eaſt of Amiens, and one hundred and three north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 20. E. Lat. 50. 11. N.

CAMBRESIS, a province of France, in the Low Countries, about twenty-five miles in length, is bounded on the north and eaſt by Hainault, on the ſouth by Picardy, and on the weſt by Artois. The country is very fruitful and well peopled. The inhabitants are laborious, and have good capacities. Their trade conſiſts in corn, ſheep, wool, and cambricks. Cambray is the capital.

CAMBRIDGE, the principal town in Cambridgeſhire, and an univerſity, is ſeated on the river Cam, and has a market on Saturdays. It is a large town, having fourteen pariſh churches, beſides twelve colleges, and four halls. Beyond the bridge there are the ruins of a caſtle, built by William the Conqueror, which was once a ſtately building. The gate-houſe is ſtill ſtanding, and ſerves for the county goal. The town is very ancient, it being mentioned by the earlieſt hiſtorians; and it ſuffered much by the Danes, as did the whole kingdom of the Eaſt Angles. Before the baron's wars it was deſtroyed by fire and ſword, by Roger de Montgomery, in order to be revenged on William Rufus, and the univerſity was abandoned; but Henry I. to encourage its re-eſtabliſhment, beſtowed ſeveral privileges upon it. It was often plundered in the baron's wars by the outlaws from the Iſle of Ely, till Henry III. ſecured it by a deep ditch on the eaſt ſide, which ſtill goes by the name of the king's ditch. The rebels Wat Tyler and Jack Straw burnt the univerſity records in the reign of Richard II. The Jews ſettled there ſoon after the Norman conqueſt, and continued ſeveral generations. The ſituation of Cambridge is low, which renders it dirty.

The halls and colleges together have four hundred and ſix fellowſhips, and ſix hundred and ſixty-two ſcholarſhips, with two hundred and thirty-ſix exhibitions. The univerſity is governed by a chancellor, who is always ſome nobleman, and may be changed every three years. The high ſteward is choſen by the ſenate, and holds his place by ſtatute from the univerſity. The vice-chancellor is always the head of ſome college or hall, and is choſen yearly, on the 3d of November, by the univerſity, the heads of colleges, naming two perſons. Two proctors are choſen every year, according to the cycles of the colleges and halls. There are alſo two taxers, who, with the proctors, regulate weights and meaſures, as clerks of the market; and the proctors inſpect the behaviour of the ſcholars, who ought not to be out after nine o'clock at night.

The library was augmented by thirty thouſand volumes of the biſhop of Ely, which were bought and made a preſent of by George I. upon which his ſtatue was erected in the ſenate hall of King's college, at the expence of the then lord Townſhend. In 1724 his late majeſty eſtabliſhed a profeſſor of modern hiſtory and modern languages. Dr. Woodward, by legacy, eſtabliſhed a profeſſorſhip of natural philoſophy; and Dr. Adderbroke, in 1728, left four thouſand pounds towards building an hoſpital for poor ſick people. Likewiſe a fellowſhip was lately founded at Magdalen college, appropriated to the gentlemen of Norfolk, called the traveling Norfolk fellowſhip. King's college chapel is a very magnificent ſtructure, three hundred and four feet long, ſeventy-three broad, and ninety-four high to the battlements, without a pillar to ſupport it. Its choir was adorned by Henry VIII. with exquiſite carved work, and the intire buiding, roof and all, is of free-ſtone. Near the town hall is a new ſhire houſe, which was built at the expence of the corporation. The town is governed by a mayor, a high ſteward, a recorder, thirteen aldermen, twenty-four common council-men, and a town-clerk. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth of Ely; forty-ſix ſouth of King's-Lynn; fifty eaſt of Northampton; ſeventy-two eaſt-north-eaſt of Oxford, and fifty-two north-by-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 7. E. Lat. 52. 15. N.

Cambridge has a market on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, and one fair, held on the 24th of June, for horſes, wood, and earthen-ware.

CAMBRIDGE (NEW) a town of North America, in New England. It ſtands on the north branch of Charles river, about ſeven miles north-weſt of Boſton. It has two colleges, built of brick, called Havard-college, and Stoughton-hall. There is a public library, containing four thouſand good books, in the ſeveral faculties. Havard-college has a preſident, five fellows, and a treaſurer. They had a new charter from William III. which empowered them to confer the degree of doctor as well as maſter of arts, which they had before. Long. 70. 7. W. Lat. 42. 0. N.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE, is one of the four counties inhabited by the Iceni, or Ikeni, to which the preſent names of ſome towns here bear ſome analogy, as Ikenſworth, Ikenthorp, Ikborough, &c. But the conſular way, called Ikenild-ſtreet, that is, the ſtreet of the Ikeni, is evidently derived from the Roman name of theſe parts. It is bounded on the north by Lincolnſhire; on the eaſt by Norfolk and Suffolk; on the ſouth by Eſſex and Hertfordſhire; and on the weſt by Huntingdon and Bedfordſhire. It is in length about thirty-five miles, in breadth twenty, and in circumference one hundred and thirty, containing ſeventeen hundreds, eight market towns, viz. Cambridge, Ely, Caxton, Royſton, Linton, Merche, Wiſbich, and Soham. It ſends ſix members to parliament, two for the county, two for the town of Cambridge, and two for the univerſity. The ſoil is either very good, or very indifferent, and yet in general it is plentiful, convenient for ſporting, and the air is tolerably healthful, ſince the draining of the fens. It is famous for its plenty of eels, for hare-hunting, and for horſe-races, near Newmarket. The fens produce plenty of fiſh, and there are ſome medicinal plants peculiar to this county. Saffron is planted here as well as about Saffron-Walden, in Eſſex. Not far from Cambridge are the hills called Gog-Magog hills, which were fortified by the Danes, with three intrenchments, part of which are yet to be ſeen. There are one hundred and ſixty-three pariſhes in this county, ſix rivers, ſeven bridges, five parks, five hundred and ſeventy thouſand acres of land, ſeventeen thouſand three hundred and fifty houſes, and one hundred and forty thouſand inhabitants; at leaſt, this is the computation made ſome years ago.

CAMBYSES, the ſon of Cyrus, aſcended the throne of Perſia after the death of his father, when Amaſis, the tributary king of Egypt, endeavouring to render himſelf independent of the Perſian crown, Cambyſes invaded Egypt; but Amaſis dying, he gave battle to his ſon Pſamenitus, and entirely defeated him. That prince flying to Memphis, his capital, was taken priſoner, and the city ſurrendered, on which not only the Egyptians ſubmitted to Cambyſes, but Libya, Cyreniaca, and other diſtant countries, ſought his protection. But the Ethiopians, and the inhabitants of that part of Africa, where ſtood the temple of Jupiter Ammon, refuſing to ſubmit, he invaded both at the ſame time. The army he ſent againſt the Ammonians was deſtroyed by a tempeſt, which raiſed the ſands in ſuch a manner, that his troops were ſuffocated. In Ethiopia he ſucceeded but little better, the greateſt part of his troops was deſtroyed by famine, and reduced to the neceſſity of eating human fleſh. With the ſmall remains of his army he returned to Thebes, where he plundered the temples of that opulent city, of all their valuable moveables, and demoliſhed thoſe beautiful ſtructures.

Cambyſes became ſo jealous of his brother Smerdis, who had accompanied him in this war, that he ſent him into Perſia, and there cauſed him to be murdered. His ſiſter Meroe, whom he had married, ſuffered the ſame fate, for making ſome reflections on this act of cruelty. This prince had little ſenſibility of the laws of humanity, but ſubſtituted pride and cruelty in their place; he even cauſed many of his great officers to be buried alive. He one day aſked Prexaſpes what the people ſaid of him? That miniſter replied, they admired many of his good qualities, but wiſhed that he had not ſuch an inclination for wine. "That is," returned Cambyſes, "they imagine that wine deprives me "of my ſenſes, but you ſhall judge of that immediately." Having drank more than uſual, he ordered his cupbearer, who was ſon to Prexaſpes, to ſtand at the further end of the room, and taking a bow and arrow, declared he aimed at his heart; after he had ſhot him, he ordered the young lord to be opened, and his heart to be brought to him; the arrow having pierced it, he ſhewed it to his father, and aſked him if he had not a ſteady hand? The unhappy parent replied, with the flattery ſtill paid to Perſian kings; "Apollo "himſelf could not have ſhot better."

In the eighth year of the reign of Cambyſes, an impoſtor, reſembling his brother Smerdis, who had been put to death, impoſing on the people, uſurped the crown. Cambyſes, who was then abſent, reſolved to march againſt the uſurper, but, as he was mounting his horſe, his ſword ſlipping out of its ſcabbard, gave him a wound in the thigh, of which he died, about the five hundred and twenty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra. This Cambyſes is ſuppoſed to be the Ahaſuerus mentioned in the Scriptures.

He ought not to be confounded with Cambyſes, his grandfather, who was the father of Cyrus, and the huſband of Mandana, the daughter of Aſtyages, king of the Medes.

CAMDEN (WILLIAM) one of the moſt learned antiquaries, and impartial hiſtorians that the laſt age has produced; was born at London, May 2, 1551, and received the firſt part of his education at Chriſt's hoſpital, erected the year after his birth, by Edward VI. he was afterwards ſent to St. Paul's ſchool, from whence he was removed to the univerſity of Oxford, in 1566, and in 1575 was made ſecond maſter of Weſtminſter ſchool. He now wrote his Britannia, which was rendered more and more complete in future editions, from the new lights he received from others, and by taking journeys into different parts of the kingdom. This work was firſt publiſhed in octavo, in 1586, and is now improved to two volumes in folio. The valuable additions to that work by Dr. Gibſon, late biſhop of London, are worthy of the great pains and induſtry of the author. In 1593 he was made head maſter of the ſame ſchool; and afterwards was appointed clarencieux king at arms. He founded a profeſſorſhip of hiſtory, at Oxford, and beſides his Britannia, he alſo wrote, in Latin, The Annals of England and Ireland, from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign to the year 1589: the Annals of King James I. and a Greek Grammar, which has gone through above a hundred editions. He died November 9, 1623, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a monument is erected to his memory.

CAMELFORD, a town in Cornwal, with a market on Fridays, and four fairs, held on the Friday after March 10, May 26, July 17, and September 6, for cattle, &c. ſeated on the river Camel. It ſcarce contains fifty houſes, and is in the pariſh of Lancolas, a mile off. However, it is governed by a mayor and eight aldermen, who, with ten freemen, elect two members to ſerve in parliament. It is famous for a battle fought there by the Britons and Saxons; and is twenty-four miles north-north-weſt of Plymouth; and two hundred and twenty-eight weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 5. 4. W. Lat. 50. 40. N.

CAMERARIUS (JOACHIM) one of the moſt learned writers of his time, was born April 12, 1500, at Bamberg, a city of Franconia, and obtained great reputation by writing an almoſt infinite number of books. He tranſlated into Latin, Herodotus, Demoſthenes, Xenophon, Euclid, Homer, Theocritus, Sophocles, Lucian, Theodoret, Nicephorus, &c. He publiſhed a Catalogue of the Biſhops of the principal Sees; Greek Epiſtles; Accounts of his Journeys, in Latin verſe; a Commentary on Plautus; the Lives of Helius Eobanus Heſſus, and Philip Melancthon, &c. He died April 17, 1574, aged ſeventy-four.

CAMERARIUS (JOACHIM) the ſon of the former, and a learned phyſician, born at Nuremberg, on the 6th of November, 1534. After having performed his ſtudies in Germany, he went into Italy, where he obtained the eſteem of the the learned. At his return, ſeveral princes ſtrove to have him with them; but he preferred his books, and the ſtudy of chemiſtry and botany to that of their health. He wrote an Hortus Medicus, and ſeveral other works, and died on the 11th of October, 1598.

There have been ſeveral other learned men of the ſame family.

CAMERINO, a town of Italy, in the pope's dominions, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a mountain, near the Appennines and by the river Chiento; twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Spoleto, and forty ſouth-weſt of Ancona. Long. 13. 7. E. Lat. 43. 5. N.

CAMERON (John) one of the moſt famous divines among the proteſtants of France, in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Glaſgow, in Scotland, where he taught the Greek tongue, and having read lectures upon that language for about a year, travelled, and became profeſſor at ſeveral univerſities, and miniſter at Bourdeaux. He publiſhed, 1. Theological Lectures: 2. Icon Johannis Cameronis; and ſome miſcellaneous pieces. He died in 1625, when about ſixty years old.

CAMILLA, queen of the Volſci, and the daughter of Metabeus and Caſmilla, was conſecrated to Diana. She went to the ſuccour of Turnus and the Latins againſt Æneas, when ſhe ſignalized herſelf by her valour, but was killed by the treachery of Aruntius.

CAMILLUS (Marcus Furius) one of the greateſt men of ancient Rome, and the firſt who rendered the family of Furius very famous. He triumphed four times, was five times dictator, ſix times military tribune, and once cenſor. During his conſulſhip, he found means to oblige all the ſingle men of Rome to marry the widows of thoſe who had been killed in the war. On ſeeing the ruins of the city of Veii, which he demoliſhed three hundred and ninety-ſix years before the Chriſtian æra, he prayed, that if the proſperity of Rome was to be balanced by ſome misfortune, he alone, and not his country might ſuffer it. Lucius Apuleius, one of the tribunes, having reſolved to make him give an account of the ſpoils he had diſtributed among the ſoldiers in that war, he prevented his condemnation by a voluntary exile; but was nevertheleſs ſentenced to pay a large fine. During his exile, the Capitol was beſieged by the Gauls, on which the Romans created him dictator; when Camillus was ſo far from ſeeking to revenge his baniſhment, that he marched to the defence of his country, and drove the Gauls out of Italy. By this victory, and a great number of other noble exploits, he juſtly obtained the name of the Second Romulus, and that of the Reſtorer of his Country. He refuſed the ſovereignty which was offered him by a powerful party, and died in the eighty-firſt year of his age, three hundred and ſixty-five years before the Chriſtian æra. The Romans honoured him by erecting an equeſtrian ſtatue of him, in the market-place of Rome.

Camillus, his ſon, was conſul and dictator.

CAMINHA, a ſtrong town of Portugal, in the province of Entre Duero è Minho, with the title of a duchy. It is ſurrounded with the river Minho on one ſide, and with Little Coiro on the other, and is incloſed with walls that have baſtions. It has a garriſon as well in time of peace as war. It is ten miles north of Viana. Long. 9. 15. W. Lat. 41. 52. N.

CAMMIN, a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Saxony, ſeated at the eaſtern mouth of the river Oder. It embraced the Reformation in the year 1534, and was ceded to the elector of Brandenburg, at the treaty of Oſnabrug. It is near the Baltic Sea. Long. 15. 12. E. Lat. 54. 4. N.

CAMOENS (Louis de) a very famous Portugueſe poet, born at Liſbon, about the year 1526. He ſtudied in the univerſity of Coimbra, and afterwards returned to Liſbon, where he made himſelf known by ſome verſes in a love ſtrain, which won him the favour of ſome ladies of the firſt quality: but his amorous complexion, like that of Ovid, occaſioned his being baniſhed the court; when growing weary of an inactive life, he went to Ceuta, in Africa, where a war was carrying on between the Portugueſe and Moors; he there ſignalized himſelf by his bravery, and ſhewed that he could entwine the laurels of Mars with thoſe of the Muſes. He now obtained leave to return to court, but raiſing the jealouſy of ſeveral perſons, he baniſhed himſelf to India, where he again diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery. He at laſt however returned to Liſbon, where he obtained a yearly penſion from king Sebaſtian of four thouſand reals: but his majeſty being killed in battle, his penſion was ſtopped, and our poet ſpent ten years in extreme miſery, with ſcarce a bed to lie on, and died in an hoſpital, in 1579. He wrote many beautiful poems; but the moſt celebrated of all his works is his Luſiad; the ſubject of which is the conqueſt of the Eaſt Indies by the Portugueſe. This poem contains great beauties; though the author has not followed the rules to be obſerved in an epic poem; the Portugueſe call him the Virgil of Portugal. He excelled in deſcription and perſonification. Thus, in his fifth canto, he has perſonized a dangerous promontory, in a manner that has been much admired. It is deſcribed as a coloſſal figure of a man of a moſt tremendous appearance, who is ſuppoſed to addreſs himſelf in a voice like thunder, to the adventurers, and to foretel the diſaſters that were to befall any future fleet that ſhould ſail that way. But Mr. Dryden juſtly cenſures him for his introducing Chriſt and Bacchus into the ſame adventure in his fable.

CAMPAGNIA di Roma, a province of Italy, bounded on the weſt by the river Tiber and the ſea; on the ſouth and eaſt by the ſea, Terra di Lavora, and Farther Abruzzo; and on the north by Sabina. The land is pretty good, but it produces nothing for want of tilling; for the impoſts are ſo heavy, that the huſbandmen are diſcouraged, and let it lie fallow. The water is wholeſome, but the air is unhealthy. The pope has a vicar here. Rome is the capital. The other towns are Frivoli, Oſtia, Freſcati, Segni, Paleſtrino, Terracina, Velitri, Anagnia, and Albano, which are all biſhop's ſees.

CAMPANELLA (Thomas) a famous Italian philoſopher, born at Stilo, in Calabria, September 5, 1568. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his early proficiency in learning, for at the age of thirteen he was a perfect maſter of the ancient orators and poets. His peculiar inclination was to philoſophy, to which he at laſt confined his whole time and ſtudy, and in order to arrive at truth, he ſhook off the yoke of authority; by which means the novelty of ſome of his opinions expoſed him to many inconveniences, for he was thrown into priſon at Naples, and was not ſet at liberty till after he had ſuffered great torments. But at length, going into France, he received favours from cardinal de Richelieu, and ſtaid there till his death, which happened in 1639, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age. He wrote, 1. Prodromus Philoſophiæ inſtaurandæ. 2. Apologia pro Galileo. 3. Realis Philoſophiæ Epilogiſticæ. 4. Atheiſmus triumphatus; ſeu contra Antichriſtianiſmum, and many other works.

CAMPANI (Matthew) a celebrated Italian artiſt, born in the dioceſe of Spoletto, in the ſeventeenth century, was well ſkilled in mechanics and natural philoſophy. He was the inventor of mute pendulums, thus called from their motion being attended with no noiſe. He added to theſe, that lantern, which has been ſince known by the name of the magic lantern, by means of which, without caſting the eye on the dial, where nothing could be obſerved during the night, the hour appeared, neatly painted on a cloth. He alſo invented a double pendulum, by means of which he corrected that inequality of vibrations which Mr. Huggins had already, in part, remedied, by the cycloid figure. Campani invented alſo pendulums that might be ſuſpended in ſuch a manner, that notwithſtanding the motions of the ſhip, their vibrations would receive no alteration. Theſe pendulums he ſhut up in cryſtal boxes, in order to prevent the entrance of the air, and imagined that they might be of uſe to find out the longitude in long voyages at ſea. He was the author of ſeveral other inventions, and was a curate in the city of Rome, where he was diſtinguiſhed for his ſingular modeſty.

Joſeph Campani, his younger brother, was alſo an able mechanic, and executed his brother's inventions with great addreſs. They were both living in 1678.

CAMPANIA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, with a biſhop's ſee. It is eighteen miles eaſt of Salerno, and fifteen ſouth-weſt of Conza. Long. 15. 30. E. Lat. 41. 40. N.

CAMPANUS (John Anthony) one of the moſt famous prelates in Italy, in the fifteenth century; was the ſon of a countrywoman, who, falling in labour whilſt ſhe was at work in the fields, was delivered of him under a laurel, near Capua. He was deſigned for a ſhepherd; but diſcovering a great genius, was placed as a ſervant to a curate, who taught him a little Latin, and by his conſtant application he made great progreſs in his ſtudies. He afterwards arrived to ſuch reputation as to gain the favour of ſeveral popes, and to obtain very conſiderable benefices. He wrote ſome moral treatiſes and orations; the Life of Pope Pius II. Eight Books of Elegies and Epigrams; Nine Books of Letters, and ſome Sermons. He died at Sienna, July 15, 1477, in the fiftieth year of his age.

CAMPBEL, or Cambelton, a port and parliament town of Scotland, ſeated on the eaſt coaſt of Cantire, in the ſhire of Argyle, ten miles weſt of the Iſle of Arran. Long. 5. 12. W. Lat. 55. 33. N.

CAMPBELL (Archibald) earl and marquis of Argyle, was the ſon of Archibald, earl of Argyle, by the lady Anne Douglas, daughter of William, earl of Morton. He was born in the year 1598, and educated in the profeſſion of the proteſtant religion, according to the ſtricteſt rules of the church of Scotland, as it was eſtabliſhed immediately after the Reformation. He all along acted the part of a patriot, and and of a good ſubject, though he could not come into all the meaſures of the king's miniſters; he particularly oppoſed Laud's ſcheme for changing the conſtitution of the church; however, in 1641, he was created marquis: he exerted himſelf in defence of king Charles I. and oppoſed Cromwell on his entering Scotland; and on king Charles II. being crowned at Scoon, in 1650-1, ſet the crown upon his head, and was the firſt nobleman that did homage, and ſwore allegiance to him. Yet upon the Reſtoration, coming to London to congratulate his majeſty upon his return, he was ſent to the Tower without being allowed to ſee the king, and afterwards carried down to Scotland. The earl of Middleton, his moſt inveterate enemy, was appointed lord high commiſſioner, in order to try him. In ſhort, he was condemned for high treaſon, and though the warrant for his execution was never ſigned, was beheaded at the Croſs of Edinburgh, May 25, 1660, he behaving on the ſcaffold with the intrepidity of an hero. His laſt words were, "I deſire you, gentlemen, and all that hear me, to take no-"tice and remember, That now, when I am entering on "eternity, and am to appear before my judge, and as I "deſire ſalvation, and expect eternal happineſs from him, "I am free from any acceſſion, by knowledge, contriving, "counſel, or any other way, to his late majeſty's death; "and I pray the Lord to preſerve his majeſty, the preſent "king, and to pour his beſt bleſſings upon his perſon and "government, and the Lord give him good and faithful "counſellors." He wrote, Marquis of Argyl his Inſtructions to a Son; and Defences againſt the grand Indictment of High Treaſon.

CAMPBELL (ARCHIBALD) earl of Argyle, ſon to the former, and one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed patriots of the age in which he lived, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his loyalty to king Charles I. and though he afterwards ſubmitted to live peaceably, he never owned either Oliver's or Richard's government. At the Reſtoration, he attended the court in behalf of his father, and having by the aſſiſtance of the earl of Berkſhire, convinced the earl of Clarendon of the baſeneſs of thoſe calumnies that were thrown upon him, communicated his ſucceſs by letter to the lord Duffis: but this letter being intercepted, it was exhibited in the parliament of Scotland as a libel againſt their proceedings. He went to Scotland to vindicate himſelf, was committed to priſon, and condemned to loſe his head. The court of England was filled with aſtoniſhment, and the king not only cauſed him to be ſet at liberty, but reſtored him to his title and eſtate, and had him ſworn a privy counſellor. He was alſo made a commiſſioner of the treaſury; but the duke of York being ſent into Scotland, and getting ſeveral acts paſſed, and among the reſt, one for eſtabliſhing a teſt, by which all who were in employment, or ſhould be ſo, were obliged to take an oath not to attempt any change in the conſtitution of church or ſtate, the earl, after having ſteadily oppoſed it in parliament, on being ſummoned to take this oath as a privy-counſellor, drew up a ſhort explanation, which he ſent to the duke for his approbation, and having received it, gave it as his ſenſe of the oath, November 3, 1681, when he took and ſigned it as privy-counſellor: but ſoon after, offering the ſame explanation when he was to take the oath again as a commiſſioner of the treaſury, it was refuſed him; a complaint of his explanation was ſent to the king; the earl was ordered to ſurrender himſelf priſoner to the caſtle of Edinburgh; his proſecution was carried on with the moſt indecent fury, and, to the eternal reproach of all who had any concern in that moſt infamous mockery of juſtice, he was found guilty of high treaſon; however, he had the happineſs to make his eſcape into England, and from thence into Holland, where he continued during the remaining part of that reign. But thinking himſelf at liberty before the coronation of James II. to exert himſelf in order to recover the conſtitution by force of arms, he concerted meaſures with the duke of Monmouth, and went into Scotland to aſſemble his friends; but not meeting with the ſucceſs he expected, he was taken priſoner, and being carried to Edinburgh, was beheaded upon his former ſentence, June 30, 1685. He ſhewed great conſtancy and courage under his misfortunes: on the day of his death he ate his dinner very chearfully; and, according to his cuſtom, ſlept after it a quarter of an hour or more, very ſoundly. At the place of execution he made a ſhort grave and religious ſpeech; and, after ſolemnly declaring that he forgave all his enemies, ſubmitted to death with great firmneſs, having, according to Mr. Crawford, compoſed his own epitaph a few hours before, which ſhews that however great his lordſhip's abilities were, he had little genius for poetry. It runs thus.

Know, paſſenger, that ſhall have ſo much time
To view my grave, and aſk what was my crime?
No ſtain of error, no black vices brand,
No ſecret guilt e'er made me fly the land;
Love to my country, truth, condemn'd to die,
Forc'd my old hands forgotten arms to try.
On my deſign, though Providence has frown'd,
Yet God at laſt will ſurely raiſe his own.
Another hand with more ſucceſsful ſpeed,
Shall raiſe the remnant, bruiſe the ſerpent's head.

CAMPBELL (ARCHIBALD) duke of Argyle. After the unhappy death of his father, he was called lord Lorne, and with that title went to Holland, whence he returned in 1688, with the prince of Orange, and was admitted into the convention as earl of Argyle, notwithſtanding his father's attainder was not reverſed; but in the claim of rights it was juſtly declared to be a reproach to the nation. On the ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland being debated in that aſſembly, he was remarkably active in excluding king James, and in procuring the ſovereign power to be inveſted in the prince and princeſs of Orange; which being carried by a conſiderable majority, his lordſhip and two others were deputed from the eſtates of barons and boroughs, to offer the throne to their highneſſes, in the name of that convention, and to adminiſter the coronation oath to their majeſties. Upon their obtaining the crown, his lordſhip was ſworn of the privy-council; two years after he was made one of the lords of the treaſury; and afterwards colonel of the Scots guards, and an extraordinary lord of the ſeſſion. He carried over to Flanders a regiment, conſiſting chiefly of officers and ſoldiers of his own name and family, for the ſervice of king William, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves during all that prince's wars; for which, and his many other ſervices, his majeſty was pleaſed, in the year 1701, to create him duke of Argyle, marquiſs of Kyntyre and Lorne, earl of Campbell and Cowel, &c. His grace married Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir Lionel Talmaſh, by whom he had iſſue two ſons and one daughter, viz. John, duke of Argyle and Greenwich, and Archibald, earl of Hay, and lady Anne. He died in 1703.

CAMPBELL (JOHN) duke of Argyle and Greenwich, was the ſon of the former, and was born on the 10th of October, 1680, and on the very day when his grandfather ſuffered at Edinburgh, fell out of a window three pair of ſtairs high, without receiving any hurt. At the age of fifteen he had made a conſiderable progreſs in claſſical learning. His father then perceived and encouraged his military diſpoſition, and introduced him to king William, who, in the year 1694, gave him the command of a regiment. In this ſituation he remained till the death of his father, in 1703, when becoming duke of Argyle, he was ſoon after ſworn of queen Anne's privy-council, made captain of the Scotch horſe guards, and appointed one of the extraordinary lords of ſeſſions. In 1704, her majeſty reviving the Scottiſh order of the thiſtle, his grace was inſtalled one of the knights of that order, and was ſoon after appointed high-commiſſioner to the Scotch parliament, where, being of great ſervice in promoting the intended union, he was on his return created a peer of England, by the titles of baron of Chatham and earl of Greenwich, and in 1710 was made knight of the garter.

His grace firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his military capacity at the battle of Oudenard, where he commanded as brigadier-general with all the bravery of youth, and the conduct of a veteran officer. He was preſent under the duke of Marlborough at the ſiege of Ghent, and took poſſeſſion of the town. He had alſo a conſiderable ſhare in the victory obtained over the French at the battle of Malplaquet, by diſlodging them from the wood of Sart, and gaining a poſt of great conſequence. In this ſharp engagement, ſeveral muſket balls paſſed through the duke's cloaths, hat, and peruke. Soon after this hot action, he was ſent to take the command in Spain, and after the reduction of port Mahon, he returned to England.

His grace having now a ſeat in the houſe of lords, he cenſured the meaſures of the miniſtry with ſuch freedom, that all his places were diſpoſed of to other noblemen: but at the acceſſion of George I. he recovered his influence, and at the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715, was made commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in North Britain. In this ſtation he drove the pretender out of Scotland, and having entirely diſperſed the rebels, arrived at London on the 6th of March, 1716. He was now in high favour, but to the ſurprize of people of all ranks, he was in a few months diveſted of all his employments, and from this period to the year 1718, he ſignalized himſelf in a civil capacity, by his uncorrupted patriotiſm and manly eloquence, ſo as to obtain from Mr. Pope one of the fineſt compliments that ever was given:

Argyle the ſtate's whole thunder born to wield,
And ſhake alike the ſenate and the field!

In the beginning of the year 1719 he was again admitted into favour, appointed lord-ſteward of the houſhold, and in the April following was created duke of Greenwich. He continued in the adminiſtration during all the remaining part of that reign; and after his late majeſty's acceſſion till April 1740, when he delivered a ſpeech with ſuch warmth, that the miniſtry being highly offended, he was again diſpoſſeſſed of his places, to which, however, on the change of the miniſtry, he was ſoon reſtored; but not approving of the meaſures of the new miniſtry more than thoſe of the old, he gave up all his poſts for the laſt time, and never after engaged in affairs of ſtate. He now enjoyed privacy and retirement, and died of a parelytic diſorder, on the 4th of October, 1743.

To the memory of his grace, a very noble monument was erected in Weſtminſter-abbey, executed by the ingenious Roubilliac. The ſtatue of the duke is repreſented ſitting. On one ſide of the baſe, is Pallas; and on the other, Eloquence. The former looking ſorrowfully up at the figure of the duke, and the other diſplaying the public loſs at his death. Above, by the ſide of the duke, is the figure of Hiſtory, with one hand holding a book, and with the other writing on a pyramid of moſt beautiful variegated marble, the name and titles of the hero, in large gold letters. His actions are ſuppoſed to be contained in the book ſhe holds in her other hand, on the cover of which, in letters of gold, are inſcribed the date of his grace's death, and the years of his life. Above, on the pyramid, is the following epitaph, in gold letters, ſaid to be written by Paul Whitehead, eſq.

Britain, behold, if patriot worth be dear,
A ſhrine that claims thy tributary tear:
Silent that tongue admiring ſenates heard;
Nerveleſs that arm oppoſing legions fear'd:
Nor leſs, O Campbell! thine the pow'r to pleaſe,
And give to grandeur all the grace of eaſe.
Long from thy life let kindred heroes trace
Arts which ennoble ſtill the nobleſt race.
Others may owe their future fame to me,
I borrow immortality from thee.

CAMPDEN, a town of Glouceſterſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays, and four fairs, on Aſh-Wedneſday, April 23, July 25, and November 3, for horſes, cows, ſheep, linen cloth, and ſtockings. It is a poor town, containing about two hundred houſes, and is governed by two bailiffs, twelve upper and twelve inferior burgeſſes, and has a manufacture of ſtockings. It is twenty-two miles ſouth-eaſt by eaſt of Worceſter, twenty-eight north-eaſt of Glouceſter, thirty ſouth-weſt of Coventry, and eighty-ſeven north-weſt by weſt of London. Long. 1. 50. E. Lat. 52. 5. N.

CAMPDEN (WILLIAM). See CAMDEN.

CAMPEACHY, a town of South America, ſeated on the weſt coaſt of the province of Jucatan, on the eaſt coaſt of the bay of Campeachy, defended by a good wall, and ſtrong forts; but it is neither ſo rich nor ſo trading a town as it formerly was, it having been the port for the ſale of log-wood, the place where it was cut being about thirty miles diſtant. It was taken by the Engliſh in 1596, by the Buccaniers in 1678, and by the Flibuſters of St. Domingo in 1685, who ſet it on fire, and blew up the citadel. The animals, birds and vegetables, are the ſame as thoſe in other parts of America. Long. 93. 7. W. Lat. 19. 20. N.

CAMPEN, a ſtrong town of the Low Countries, in the province of Overyſſel, with a citadel and an harbour that is almoſt choaked up with ſand. The adjacent country, by means of ſluices, may be laid under water. The ſuburbs are inhabited by fiſhermen. The town is important, and tolerably handſome. The town-houſe is worth obſerving. It has two churches, and is ſurrounded with high walls, on which are ſtone towers and broad ditches. It was taken from the Spaniards in 1578, by the Dutch, and came into the hands of the French in 1672, but was reſtored again the year following. It is ſeated on the river Yſſel, near the Zuiderzee, twenty miles north-weſt of Deventer, and forty north-eaſt of Amſterdam. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat. 52. 38. N.

CAMPIAN (EDMUND) a Jeſuit who may juſtly be ſaid to have ſuffered martyrdom for his religion in England, was born at London, on the 25th of January, 1540, and educated in Chriſt's hoſpital. He was pitched upon while at ſchool to make an oration before queen Mary, at her acceſſion to the throne; and in 1553 was elected ſcholar of St. John's college, Oxford. In 1566, when queen Elizabeth was at that univerſity, he made an oration before her, and alſo kept an act in St. Mary's church, with great applauſe from that learned queen. In 1668 he went to Ireland, where he wrote a hiſtory of that country; but being then diſcovered to have embraced the popiſh religion, and to labour for proſelytes, he was ſeized and confined for ſome time: but ſoon after eſcaped into England. In 1551 he went into the Netherlands, and ſettled in the Engliſh college of Jeſuits of Douay, where he openly renounced the proteſtant religion. From thence he went to Rome, where, in 1573, he was admitted into the ſociety of Jeſuits, and afterwards ſent by the general of the order into Germany, and while at Vienna compoſed a tragedy called Nectar and Ambroſia, which was acted before the emperor with great applauſe. Soon after he ſettled at Prague, where he taught rhetoric and philoſophy, about ſix years, in a Jeſuits college. At length, being called to Rome, he was ſent by pope Gregory XIII. to England, where he diligently employed himſelf in propagating his religion, by his converſation and his writings. In ſhort, by his activity, he fell under the cognizance of Walſingham, and was ſeized in diſguiſe at the houſe of a gentleman in Berkſhire, from whence he was conveyed in great proceſſion to the tower of London, with a paper faſtened to his hat, on which was written, "Edmund Campian, a moſt notorious Jeſuit." Afterwards, being found guilty of high treaſon in adhering to the biſhop of Rome, the queen's enemy, and in coming to England to diſturb the peace and quiet of the realm, he was hanged and quartered, with other Romiſh prieſts, at Tyburn, on the firſt of December, 1581.

He was allowed by all parties to be a moſt extraordinary man: he being an elegant orator, a ſkilful diſputant, and a good-natured well-behaved man. The manuſcript of his Hiſtory of Ireland was found in the Cotton library, and publiſhed at Dublin, in 1633, by ſir James Ware. He alſo wrote, 1. Rationes decem oblati Certaminis in Cauſa Fidei, redditæ Academicis Angliæ. 2. Chronologia univerſalis, a very learned work. 3. Nine Articles directed to the Lords of the Privy-Council, in 1581. 4. Narratio de Divortio Henrici VIII. &c.

CAMPIDOGLIO (MICHAEL ANGELO). See PACE.

CAMPION, a town of Tartary, and in the kingdom of Tanguth. It was formerly remarkable for being a place which the caravans paſſed through in the road from Bokaria to China. It is ſituated in longitude 104. 53. E. Lat. 40. 25. N.

CAMPISTRON (JOHN GALBERT) a French poet, and ſecretary to the duke of Vendome, was born at Toulouſe, in 1656. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the republic of letters, was received into the French academy in 1701, and died of an apoplexy at Toulouſe, on the 11th of May, 1723. He wrote ſeven tragedies, a comedy, and three operas. His ſtyle is negligent, and his thoughts not very happily expreſſed.

CAMPO MAJOR, a town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo. It is a frontier place, and is well fortified with a wall and baſtions, built with free-ſtone. It ſtands in a good air, and is reckoned a place of pleaſure. It was built out of the ruins of the ancient Budua, and there is an old church which nearly retains its name, being called Noſſa Senhora da Betoua. It is eight miles north of Elvas, twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Port Allegro, and one hundred eaſt of Liſbon. Long. 7. 24. W. Lat. 38. 50. N.

CAMPS (FRANCIS DE) abbot of Notre Dame, at Sigi, was born at Amiens, in 1643, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his knowledge of medals, and by writing an Hiſtory of France, and ſeveral other works. He died at Paris, in 1723, aged eighty-two.

CAMUL, a city of Aſia, ſeated on the eaſtern extremity of the kingdom of Cialis, on the frontiers of Tangut, in Tartary. Long. 98. 5 E. Lat. 37. 15. N.

CANADA, or the province of Quebec, is an extenſive country in North America, bounded on the north-eaſt by the gulph of St. Lawrence and St. John's river; on the ſouth-weſt by lands inhabited by the Indians, which are frequently included in this province; on the ſouthward by the provinces of Nova Scotia, New England, and New York; and on the north-weſtward by lands claimed by the Indians; extending about five hundred miles in length from the north-eaſt to the ſouth-weſt, and upwards of two hundred miles in breadth. The French, under the name of Canada, comprehended a much larger territory, taking into their claim great part of the New England provinces, and of thoſe of Nova Scotia and New York, and extending it northward to Hudſon's bay; to the weſt as far as the Pacific ocean; and to the ſouthward to the gulph of Mexico. The climate is cold, and the winters long and very ſevere, eſpecially in the north parts of the province. The rivers are ſoon frozen up, and the ice is frequently ſix feet thick. Yet the ſoil is in general very good, and in many parts both pleaſant and fertile, producing moſt kinds of Engliſh grain and vegetables in great abundance, with many plants not known among us, and there are vaſt foreſts of tall trees, as oaks, pines, cedars of ſeveral kinds, wild vines, and animals peculiar to North America, particularly the beaver. The ſummers of Canada are exceeding pleaſant, and, we are told, have ſo happy an effect upon the ſoil, that the farmer uſually reaps his corn in ſixteen weeks from the time of ſowing the ſeed. The meadow grounds, which are well watered, yield excellent graſs, and breed vaſt quantities of large and ſmall cattle. It affords very fine timber, and the mountains abound with coals. It is remarkable for its rivers, the principal of which is that of St. Lawrence, and for its lakes, which are of a prodigious ſize. Great Britain conquered this country from France in the laſt war, and was ſecured in the poſſeſſion of it by the late treaty of peace, by which the popiſh inhabitants were juſtly allowed liberty of conſcience, and a popiſh biſhop.

The principal towns of Canada are Quebec, Montreal, Les Trois Riveres, and Taduſack.

CANANOR, a territory of the kingdom of Canara, on the weſtern coaſt of the peninſula, in the Eaſt Indies, on this ſide the Ganges. It abounds with elephants, buffaloes, camels, lions, tygers, wolves, black cattle, ſheep, antilopes, civet cats, apes, peacocks, parrots, large partridges, and bats. There is a mine of ſtone which has the ſame virtue as Terra Sigillata; as alſo choice fruits, great plenty of cocoa-trees, and their ponds abound with fiſh and lizards. It has a tower of the ſame name, where the Dutch have a fort, which they took from the Portugueſe in 1663. However, their trade is but ſmall. At the bottom of the bay there is another town, governed by a Mahometan rajah, independent of the Dutch, who can bring twenty thouſand men into the field. Cananor is populous, and chiefly inhabited by Mahometan merchants. The commodities are pepper, cardamoms, myrobolans, ginger, tamarinds, hyacinths, granates, rubies, ambergris, and ſapphires. Long. 78. 10. E. Lat. 10. 0. N.

CANARA, a kingdom of Aſia, on the weſtern coaſt of the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, about one hundred and eighty miles in length. The inhabitants profeſs the Pagan religion. Their manner of worſhip is like that of Calicut. They go naked, only they juſt cover their private parts. They live entirely on vegetables, like the other Gentoos. The prieſts live like hermits, and carry a moſt obſcene image about their necks, which barren women kiſs very devoutly, thinking it makes them fruitful. This country is governed by a queen, who keeps her court at Baydor, two days journey from the ſea. The people are very civil, for ſtrangers may paſs through the country unmoleſted. The Engliſh are permitted to ride on oxen, or buffaloes; but none but officers of ſtate are allowed the uſe of elephants, horſes, or mules. On the frontiers of Malabar, they have forts built of earth, to prevent the incurſions of thoſe people. The ſea coaſt was plundered by the Moſchate Arabians, in 1695, who, after burning Barcelour and Mangalour, carried off a great booty. The low ground produce crops twice a year, and in the higher land and mountains there are carwar pepper, ſandal wood, iron, ſteel, and many wild elephants.

CANARIA, or the GRAND CANARY, an iſland in the Atlantic Ocean, about one hundred and eighty miles from the coaſt of Africa. It is about one hundred miles in circumference, and thirty-three in diameter. It is a fruitful iſland, and famous for the wine that bears its name. It alſo abounds with apples, melons, oranges, citrons, pomegranates, figs, olives, peaches, and plantanes. The fir, dragon and palm trees are the moſt common. The towns are, Canary the capital, Gualdera, and Geria.

CANARY ISLANDS, theſe are ſituated in the Atlantic ocean, over againſt the empire of Morocco, in Africa. They were formerly called the Fortunate Iſlands, on account of the temperate healthy air, and excellent fruits. The land is very fruitful, for both wheat and barley produce one hundred and thirty for one. The cattle thrive very well, and the woods are full of all ſorts of game. The Canary ſinging birds are well known all over Europe. There are here ſugar-canes in great abundance; but the Spaniards firſt planted vines here, from whence we have the wine called Canary, or Sack.

Theſe iſlands were not entirely unknown to the ancients, but they were a long while forgot, till John de Betencourt diſcovered them, in 1402. It is ſaid they were firſt inhabited by the Phenicians, or Carthaginians, but on no certain foundation, nor could the inhabitants themſelves tell from whence they were derived; on the contrary, they did not know there was any other country in the world. Their language, manners, and cuſtoms, had no reſemblance to thoſe of their neighbours. However, they were like the people on the coaſt of Barbary in complexion. They had no iron. After the diſcovery, the Spaniards ſoon got poſſeſſion of them all, under whoſe dominions they are to this day, except Madera, which belongs to the Portugueſe. The inhabitants are chiefly Spaniards, though there are ſome of the firſt people remaining, whom they call Guanches, who are ſomewhat civilized by their intercourſe with the Spaniards. They are a hardy, active, bold people, and live on the mountains. Their chief food is goat's milk. Their complexion is tawny, and their noſes flat. The Spaniſh veſſels, when they ſail for the Weſt Indies, always rendevous at theſe iſlands, going and coming. Their number is twelve. 1. Alegranza, 2. Canaria, 3. Ferro, 4. Fuerteventura, 5. Gomera, 6. Gratioſa, 7. Lancerotta, 8 Madera, 9. Palma, 10. Rocca, 11. Salvages, 12. Teneriff. Longitude from 12. to 21. W. Lat. from 27. 30. to 29. 30. N.

CANARY, or CIVIDAD DE PALMAS, is the capital of the iſland of Canaria, with an indifferent caſtle, and a biſhop's ſee. It has alſo a court of inquiſition, and the ſupreme council of the reſt of the Canary Iſlands: as alſo four convents, two for men, and two for women. The town is about three miles in compaſs, and contains twelve thouſand inhabitants. The houſes are only one ſtory high, and flat at the top; but they are well built. The cathedral is a handſome ſtructure. Long. 15. 20. W. Lat. 28. 4. N.

CANDAHAR, a province of Perſia, bounded on the north by the province of Balk; on the eaſt by that of Cabul; on the ſouth by Buchor and Sableſtan; and on the weſt by Sageſtan. There has been bloody wars between the Indians and Perſians, to determine who ſhould poſſeſs this province; but in 1650 it fell to the Perſians. The inhabitants are known by the name of Aghuans, or Affghans, who have often endeavoured to throw off the yoke. But in 1737 they were ſeverely puniſhed for ſuch an attempt.

CANDAHAR, the capital town of the above province, is ſeated on a mountain, and being a place of great trade, has a conſiderable fortreſs. Huſſein Khan, the ſon of Meriweis, cauſing himſelf to be acknowledged ſhah of this province, ſeized on this city; and the Perſians, before they could regain it, were obliged to beſiege it in form. The caravans that travel from Perſia, and the parts about the Caſpian ſea to the Eaſt Indies, chooſe to paſs through this place, becauſe there is no danger of being robbed on this road: beſides, proviſions are very reaſonable. The religion is Mahommedaniſm, but there are many Banians and Guebres. Long. 67. 5. E. Lat. 33. 0. N.

CANDAULES, the laſt king of Lydia, of the family of the Heraclides, was ſo proud of the beauty of his wife, that he had the folly to let Giges, his favourite, ſee her naked, while ſhe was bathing. The queen, enraged at this action, which, according to the opinion of the Lydians, rendered her infamous, perſuaded Giges to murder Candaules, after which ſhe married him, about ſeven hundred and ſixteen years before the birth of Chriſt. In him began the race of the Mermnades, which laſted till the defeat of Crœſus.

CANDIA, a conſiderable iſland in the Mediterranean ſea, formerly called Crete, is generally reckoned to be in Europe. It is about two hundred miles long, and fifty broad. The inhabitants, both Turks and Greeks, are tall, vigorous, and robuſt. They have no robbers, murderers, thieves, nor beggars. The Turks are moſtly renegadoes, or the ſons of ſuch; and theſe inſult the Chriſtians more than the true Turks. They will make a great noiſe when they ſee them eat ſwine's fleſh, or drink wine, and yet will do both in private themſelves. The Greeks wear a red leather cap, a pair of blue callico drawers, and a gown. In the town they have red Turky leather pumps; but in the country they have buſkins. The Greek women are in ſome places very pretty, but in general they are ordinary. They are well ſhaped, but their dreſs does not ſhow it. It conſiſts of an upper coat of reddiſh cloth, full of plaits, and hung about the ſhoulders. Their boſom is left quite bare. Under this coat they have nothing but a ſhift. Their head dreſs is a white veil, which falls very becomingly on their ſhoulders. Few or none of the Turkiſh women appear in the ſtreets; when they do, their face and body is muffled in a cloth veſt. The Jewiſh women are tolerably handſome, and the blacks very ugly.

The Greeks are very familiar; for men, women, and children, of almoſt all ages, will follow ſtrangers, and examine their cloaths, linen, and hats, out of mere curioſity. The towns-men live well, for the poultry, pigeons, beeves, ſheep, and hogs, are very numerous. They have likewiſe great plenty of turtle doves, red partridges, woodcocks, wheatears, and hares; but no rabbits. Their butchers meat is excellent, except in winter, when the feed is bad. The iſland has not half people enough to cultivate the land, and yet they have more corn than they can conſume; and they can ſupply ſtrangers with oil, wine, ſilk, honey, wax, cheeſe, and laudanum. Their wheat is excellent, but they know not how to make good bread. They have ſeveral ſorts of exquiſite wine, perhaps the beſt in the world. The Turks cannot forbear drinking this tempting liquor, and when they get a caſk of it in the night, they generally make clear work. The Greeks are often drinking ſmall draughts of it night and day. The wool of Candia is coarſe, but the ſilk is exceeding good, if they knew how to manage it. The honey is excellent, and ſmells of thyme, with which this country abounds. The wax and laudanum are not deſpicable, and the cheeſe from the mountains of Sphacia is much in requeſt. Two thirds of this iſland is mountainous, dry, unpleaſant, and more fit for goats than human creatures. The air is very healthy, unleſs the ſouth wind blows, and then it is ſuffocating. The water is excellent.

White marble is ſo common, that they build their houſes with it in the villages; but then it is rough and unhewn, and joined together with mud inſtead of mortar. Theſe houſes houſes are nothing but a ground floor, conſiſting of two or three rooms, with holes inſtead of windows, in each of which they place ſtone pitchers, of a foot and a half diameter, and wrought into the roof. This is flat and boarded, then covered with earth ſpread upon faggots.

Impaling is a puniſhment for great crimes, which is done by thruſting a ſtake up the criminal's body, till is comes out at the neck or breaſt; then they are tied to poſts fixed up in the highway, and ſo left. Another puniſhment is to draw the criminal up, by means of a pulley, to a conſiderable height, and then letting him fall on fleſh hooks, where he hangs till he dies.

The horſes are fiery, little animals, with fine cheſts and long tails, but they are very gaunt bellied. It is amazing to ſee how nimbly they will climb up the rocks, and how ſure-footed they are in coming down ſteep deſcents; but the rider muſt let them have their heads. On theſe, perſons of a higher rank go a hunting, for they never hunt on foot. The dogs of Candia are a kind of a baſtard greyhound, and are all ſtrange miſhapen creatures. One would think they were generated between a wolf and a fox. They have no other dogs in all the country. They are made uſe of to catch hares and pigs, which they will do without any company, and bring them to their maſters.

Candia is divided into four territories, Canea, Retimo, Candia, and Setia. Candia is the chief town in the iſland, Canea the next, and Retimo the next to that. Gortyna was a famous city, but it is now in ruins. The viceroy reſides at Candia, and commands the baſha of Canea as well as of Retimo. The Venetians purchaſed Candia in 1204, and were in poſſeſſion of Canea till 1645, when the Turks took it with eighty ſhips, and as many gallies, in ten days time.

We cannot well leave this iſland without taking notice of two remarkable things which have been mentioned by hiſtorians; the firſt is mount Ida, which has nothing very remarkable but its name. It covers almoſt the middle of the iſland, and is nothing but a heap of craggy rocks, without the leaſt ſhadow of a landſcape or delightful grotto; nor is there a bubbling ſpring or purling brook to be ſeen about it. There are a few pitiful horſes, ſome ſheep, and ſtarveling goats, that are forced to browze on the prickly ſhrub called tragacantha, or goats-thorn. Whoever goes to the top of it, will find nothing but bottomleſs quagmires, and deep abyſſes filled with ſnow. There is indeed a proſpect of the ſea, but that will not compenſate the trouble of the journey.

The Labyrinth of Candia is a ſubterranean paſſage, in the manner of a ſtreet, which by a thouſand intricacies and windings pervades the inſide of a little hill, at the foot of mount Ida. The entrance is ſeven or eight paces broad, but ſo low, that there is no going in without ſtooping. At firſt you arrive at a ruſtic gently ſloping cavern, and a little beyond that there is nothing but turnings and crooked by-ways. The principal alley is twelve thouſand paces in length, and terminates in two large beautiful apartments, where ſtrangers reſt themſelves with pleaſure. Thoſe that miſs this path are bewildered among a thouſand turnings and meanders, where it would be very difficult to find the way out again. There are ſeveral names, dates, and inſcriptions on its ſides. There is not the leaſt drop of water in this cavern, it being every where extremely dry. There are a great many other caverns in this iſland, particularly about mount Ida.

CANDIA, the capital city of the iſland of the ſame name, in the Mediterranean Sea, under the dominion of the Turks. It is nothing nigh ſo conſiderable as it was when in the hands of the Venetians, a great part of it now being little better than a heap of rubbiſh. It was built upon the ruins of the ancient Heraclea, and is the Candace of the Saracens. The walls are yet pretty good, and well terraſſed, which was the work of the Venetians, for the Turks have hardly repaired the breaches of the laſt ſiege. The Greeks in this town are about eight hundred, that pay the capitation tax. The Jews are one thouſand in all, and the Turks about eleven thouſand. In the year 1669, the town was ſurrendered to the Turks by capitulation, after a three years ſiege. The Venetians endeavoured to retake it in 1692, but without effect. It is the ſee of an archbiſhop of the Greek church, who is metropolitan of the whole iſland. The country about Candia conſiſts of ſpacious fruitful plains, which produce all ſorts of grain; but wheat muſt not be exported without the viceroy's leave. Long. 25. 7. E. Lat. 35. 20. N.

CANDIDATES, in the Roman common-wealth, were obliged to wear a white gown during the two years of their ſoliciting for a place. This garment, according to Plutarch, they wore without any other cloaths, that they might the more eaſily ſhew to the people the ſcars of thoſe wounds they had received in fighting for the common-wealth; and alſo that the people might not ſuſpect that they concealed money for purchaſing votes.

CANDIDATI MILITES, in Roman antiquity, an order of ſoldiers who ſerved as the emperor's body guards, to defend him in battle. They were the talleſt and ſtrongeſt of the whole army, and were called Candidati from their being cloathed in white.

CANDISH. See CAVENDISH.

CANDY (kingdom of) in the iſland of Ceylon, in the Eaſt Indies, is one of the three parts of that iſland. It is bounded on the north by the territory of Wanny, and is ſurrounded on the other ſides by the lands occupied by the Dutch, except a ſmall part towards the eaſt, where it extends as far as the coaſts. This kingdom may take up about one quarter of the iſland, and is ſurrounded on all ſides by high mountains, covered with thick foreſts, through which the paths are very narrow and difficult, and which the king of Candy cauſes to be very carefully guarded, as well to prevent the eſcape of his ſubjects, as to hinder the entrance of ſtrangers, whence it was formerly but very little known. However, ſince captain Knox was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt, and was detained priſoner twenty-one years, we are ſomewhat better acquainted with it. He ſays the inland parts are very full of hills, from whence proceed rivulets well ſtocked with fiſh. The inhabitants make a dextrous uſe of theſe to water not only the vallies and the plains, but the hills alſo, by which means they are rendered very fertile in rice, pulſe, hemp, &c. He ſays this kingdom is divided into ſeveral provinces, and theſe again into counties, of which he gives nothing but the names. There are the ruins of ſeveral large towns, which were demoliſhed in the civil wars. The principal river is Maralagonga, and the principal mountain Adam's Pike, ſo called by the Engliſh. The king governs in an arbitrary manner, and his ſubjects are idolaters. Candy was the capital of this kingdom, and is ſeated about the middle of it, but it has been ruined by the Portugueſe, and is now of little account. The houſes that are remaining are very low, and badly furniſhed. Long. 81. 30. E. Lat. 7. 35. N.

CANEA, a conſiderable town of the iſland of Candia, in the Mediterranean Sea, ſubject to the Turks, and the reſidence of a baſha. It contains about one thouſand five hundred Turks, two thouſand Greeks, fifty Jews, and a few French merchants, with a conſul. The body of the town is in a pretty good condition, the walls are faced with ſtone, and well terraſſed; it is defended by a deep ditch, and there is but one gate towards the land. The houſes, as every where elſe in the Levant, are very ordinary; for the beſt are but two ſtories high, of which the ground-floor ſerves for a parlour, warehouſe, cellar, and ſtable. The walls are brick-work, and the corners free-ſtone. The ſtairs into the upper rooms are a wooden ladder. They are terraſſed on the top, but without brick or plaiſter; the terraſs being made of deal boards, ſupported by oak joiſts, laid two or three feet aſunder, and covered with earth tempered with mortar, and then paved with flint ſtones and pebbles. It is made a little ſloping, for the rain to run off. In fine weather they walk, and in great heats they lie on theſe terraſſes. There is likewiſe another terraſs, or rather a little open room on the ſame floor that divides the two ſtories, on which they ſet flower pots, which are of great benefit to health.

The port of Canea would be pretty good if it were carefully looked after. There are ſtill the ruins of an arſenal built by the Venetians. This port is defended by a ſmall fortreſs, where there is a light-houſe; beyond this is a handſome moſque, with a low round dome. The front conſiſts of ſeveral arches, bearing as many ſmall domes of the ſame profile as the great one. The houſe of the French capuchins ſtands by this moſque, and their chapel is a room ill built and worſe furniſhed.

The country about Canea is charming, between the town and the firſt mountains; ſo is likewiſe all the way between the town and the gulph of la Suda; for there are nothing but foreſts of tall olive trees, diverſified with pleaſant fields, vineyards, flower gardens, and purling ſtreams, ſhaded with myrtle and laurel. The chief revenue of this town conſiſts of olive oil. Long. 24. 15. E. Lat. 35. 28. N.

CANENS, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Picus, king of the Lauretans, whoſe huſband being turned by Circe into a wood-pecker, lamented him till ſhe diſſoved into air.

CANEPHORÆ, Κανηφόροι, in Grecian antiquity, virgins who when they became marriageable, preſented baſkets filled with little curioſities to Diana, to gain leave to depart out of her train, and change their ſtate of life.

CANEPHORIA, in Grecian antiquity, a ceremony uſed at a feaſt celebrated by the Athenian virgins on the eve of their marriage day; in which the maid, conducted by her father and mother, went to the temple of Minerva, carrying with her a baſket full of preſents, to engage the goddeſs to render the marriage ſtate happy; or, according to others, to make her ſome reparation for abandoning her party.

CANEPHORIA, is alſo the name of a feſtival of Bacchus, celebrated particularly by the Athenians; when the young virgins gins carried golden baſkets filled with fruit, which were covered to conceal the myſtery from thoſe who were not initiated into the ceremonies of that God.

CANETO, a ſmall town of Italy, in the duchy of Mantua, ſeated on the river Oglio. It was ſeveral times taken and retaken in queen Anne's wars. It is twenty miles weſt of Mantua, and eighteen eaſt of Cremona. Long. 10. 45. E. Lat. 45. 0. N.

CANGE (CHARLES DU FRESNE ſieur DU) one of the moſt learned writers of his time, was born at Amiens, Dec. 18, 1610, and ſtudied at the Jeſuits college in that city, and afterwards applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the law at Orleans. He gained great reputation by his works, among which are, 1. The Hiſtory of the Empire of Conſtantinople under the French emperors. 2. John Cinnamus's ſix Books of the Hiſtory of the Affairs of John and Manuel Comnenus, in Greek and Latin, with hiſtorical and philological notes. 3. Gloſſarium ad Scriptores mediæ & infimæ Latinitatis.

CANINIUS (ANGELO) one of the moſt learned grammarians in the ſixteenth century, was born at Anghiari, a city of Tuſcany, called in Latin Anglara, whence he derived the ſurname of Anglarienſis. He taught the oriental languages at Venice, Padua Boulogne, Rome, and in Spain, and alſo read lectures at Paris. He wrote a Treatiſe of Helleniſm, a Greek Grammar, a Latin Tranſlation of Simplicius's Commentary upon Epictetus's Manual, and many other works. He died in the year 1557.

CANISIUS (PETER) a learned provincial of the Jeſuits, born at Nimeguen, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the council of Trent, and wrote, among ſeveral other works, Summa Doctrinæ Chriſtianæ. He died in 1597, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

CANISIUS (HENRY) a native of Nimeguen, and one the moſt learned men of his time, was the nephew of the former. He was profeſſor of canon law at Ingolſtadt, and wrote a great number of books, the principal of which are, 1. Summa Juris Canonici. 2. Antiquæ Lectiones, in ſeven volumes, quarto, and reprinted in four volumes folio; this is a very valuable work. He died in 1609.

CANITZ (the baron DE) a celebrated German poet, of an illuſtrious family, in Brandenburgh, flouriſhed in the laſt century, and greatly improved the German poetry. He attempted ſeveral kinds of poetry with ſucceſs; but ſeems to have excelled in ſatire; and nothing can appear more natural, nor more eaſy, than his verſe; his poems are not however very numerous.

CANO. See CANUS.

CANO, a kingdom of Nigritia, in Africa, ſeated under the tropic of Cancer. The inhabitants, who are herdſmen and tillers of the ground, live in villages. It produces abundance of corn, rice, and cotton; but is not without deſerts and mountains. Theſe laſt are woody; and near them are many good ſprings of water; the woods produce many wild citrons and lemons, which are well taſted. In the middle of this country is a town of the ſame name, with walls and houſes made of clay; the inhabitants are addicted to merchandiſe, and are rich and civil. The king was formerly very powerful, but was conquered by the king of Tombut, and became his tributary; but whether this be the caſe now, or not, we cannot ſay. The town is ſeated in 16. 18. eaſt longitude, and 21. 5. north latitude.

CANOBIA, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Milan, ſeated on the weſtern bank of the lake Maggiore, between the towns Palanza and Locarno. It is thirty miles weſt of Como. Long. 8. 47. E. Lat. 45. 55 N.

CANOPUS, in pagan mythology, one of the deities of the ancient Egyptians, and, according to ſome, the God of Water. It is ſaid, that the Chaldæans, who worſhipped fire, carried their fancied deity through other countries to try its power, in order that, if it obtained the victory over the other gods, it might be acknowledged as the true object of worſhip; and it having eaſily ſubdued the gods of wood, ſtone, braſs, ſilver, and gold, its prieſts declared, that all gods did it homage. This the prieſts of Canopus hearing, and finding that the Chaldæans had brought their god to contend with Canopus, they took a large earthen veſſel, in which they bored ſeveral holes, which they afterwards ſtopped with wax, and having filled the veſſel with water, painted it of ſeveral colours, and fitting the head of an idol to it, brought it out, in order to contend with the Chaldæan deity. The Chaldæans accordingly kindled their fire all around it; but the heat having melted the wax, the water guſhed out through the holes, and extinguiſhed the fire; and thus Canopus conquered the god of the Chaldæans.

The abbe la Pluche takes this imaginary deity to have been originally no more than a veſſel uſed by the Egyptians to exhibit to the people the depth of the overflowing of the Nile; and obſerves, that it probably had as many pints as the depth of the water had fathoms or cubits, and adds, that they ſometimes put upon the vaſe the figure of a man's head as a ſymbol of induſtry or huſbandry; at others, the head of a young woman, to mark the ſtate of the Nile under the ſign Virgo; and at others, the head of a dog, to ſignify the ſtate of that river at the time of the riſing of the dog-ſtar.

CANSO, a port-town of Nova Scotia, in North America, ſeated on a narrow ſtreight, which ſeparates Acadia from Cape Breton. Near this is a fine fiſhery for cod. Long. 62. 10. W. Lat. 46. 0. N.

CANTACUZENUS (JOHANNES) a celebrated hiſtorian, and emperor of Conſtantinople, where he was born, of a noble family. He was bred to letters and to arms, and admitted to the higheſt offices of the ſtate. The emperor Andronicus loaded him with wealth and honour, made him generaliſſimo of his forces, and was deſirous of having him join him in the government; but this he refuſed. Andronicus dying in 1341, left to Cantacuzenus the care of the empire till his ſon, John Paleologus, who was then but nine years of age, ſhould be fit to take it upon himſelf. This truſt he faithfully diſcharged, till the empreſs and patriarch of Conſtantinople, forming a party againſt him, declared him a traitor; on which many of the nobility and the army beſought him to aſcend the throne; and accordingly he was crowned on the 21ſt of May, 1342. This was followed by a civil war, which laſted five years, when John was admitted a partner with him in the empire, and their union was confirmed by his giving him his daughter in marriage; but ſuſpicions and enmities ſoon ariſing, the war broke out again, and continued till John took Conſtantinople, in 1355. A few days after, Cantacuzenus unwilling to continue the effuſion of blood, abdicated his ſhare of the empire, and retiring to a monaſtery, took the habit of a monk, and the name of Joaſaphus. His wife alſo retired to a nunnery, and changed her name of Irene for that of Eugenia. In this retirement he lived till the year 1411, when he was upwards of an hundred years of age. Here he wrote a Hiſtory of his own Times, a Latin tranſlation of which, from the Greek manuſcript, was publiſhed by Pontanus at Ingolſtadt, in 1603; and a ſplendid edition was printed at Paris, in 1645, in three volumes folio, of the original Greek, and Pontanus's Latin verſion. He alſo wrote an Apology for the Chriſtian Religion againſt that of Mahomet, under the name of Chriſtodulus.

CANTARINI (SIMON) a famous painter, called the Peſareſe, from his being born at Peſaro, was the diſciple and imitator of Guido. He died at Verona, in 1648.

CANTAZARO, an epiſcopal city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the territory of Calabria Ulterior. It is the reſidence of the governor of the province, and is ſeated near the ſea, eighteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Nicaſtro. Long. 17. 0. E. Lat. 38. 59. N.

CANTEMIR (ANTIOCHUS) eſteemed the founder of the Ruſſian poetry, was the youngeſt ſon of prince Cantemir, and was born at Conſtantinople. He was but two years old when his father, who had loſt his fortune, was obliged to take refuge in Muſcovy with all his family. Antiochus was brought up under the direction of Demetrius his father, who himſelf took care to cultivate his good diſpoſitions, and and the ſucceſs anſwered his moſt flattering hopes. His father, when dying, beſought the czar to nominate that ſon to ſucceed to his eſtates who ſhould render himſelf moſt capable of ſerving the ſtate by his application to the arts and ſciences, adding, that he believed Antiochus would be the perſon. Under the moſt ingenious profeſſors, whom the czar had invited to Peterſburgh, he learned mathematics, phyſic, hiſtory, moral philoſophy, and polite literature, without neglecting the ſtudy of the Holy Scriptures, to which he had a great inclination. Scarce had he finiſhed his academic courſe, when he printed A Concordance to the Pſalms in the Ruſſian language, and was elected member of the Academy. The affairs of ſtate, in which he was ſoon after engaged, did not make him quit his literary purſuits. In order to make himſelf uſeful to his fellow-citizens, he compoſed his ſatires, to ridicule certain prejudices which had got footing among them. He compoſed eight of theſe, filled with happy thoughts, much pleaſantry, and ſolid inſtructions. When but twenty-three years of age, he was nominated miniſter at the court of Great Britain, and his dexterity in the management of public affairs was as much admired as his taſte for the ſciences. He had the ſame reputation in France, where he went in 1738, in quality of miniſter plenipotentiary, and ſoon after was inveſted with the character of ambaſſador extraordinary. The wiſe and prudent manner in which he conducted himſelf during the different revolutions which happened in Ruſſia during his abſence, gained him the confidence and eſteem of three ſucceſſive princes; and in the midſt of a multitude of embaraſſments, into which he was thrown, he did not neglect his ſtudies. He died of a dropſy, at Paris, in 1744, at forty-four years of age, regretted by the court, as an able miniſter; by his country, as a zealous citizen; by the republic of letters, as an illuſtrious member; and by thoſe who were acquainted with him, as a faithful friend. Beſides, ſides, the pieces already mentioned, he wrote, 1. Some Fables and Odes. 2 A Tranſlation of Horace's Epiſtles into Ruſſian verſe. 3. A Proſe Tranſlation of Fontenelle's Plurality of Worlds; and, 4. Algarotti's Dialogues on Sight. The abbé Guaſco has written his Life in French, and tranſlated his Satires into that language.

CANTERBURY, the capital city of the county of Kent, is thought to be the ſame that was called Durovernum by the Romans, from three Roman roads meeting at this place, and from the many Roman coins dug up, in and about the city. In the time of the Saxon heptarchy it was the capital city of Kent, and the ſeat of its kings. It was greatly ſhattered in the time of the Saxon and Daniſh wars, and ſeveral times almoſt entirely deſtroyed by fire, and yet it was rebuilt with greater beauty than before. It had many privileges granted by ſeveral kings, and Henry VI. ordained its government to be by a mayor, a recorder, twelve aldermen, a ſheriff, twenty-four common-councilmen, a mace and ſword bearer, and four ſerjeants at mace; and it has fourteen pariſh churches, beſides the cathedral; with two markets on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, and a fair on the 29th of Sept. for toys.

What added to the wealth and grandeur of the city was Thomas Becket's ſhrine, which was viſited by devout perſons from all parts, not only of England, but of Europe. It was made an archiepiſcopal ſee by pope Gregory I. who removed it from London; and it has ſince received many benefactions from ſeveral of the archbiſhops.

The principal church in Canterbury is the cathedral, which is very magnificent. In the times of popery it had thirty-ſeven altars, which are now reduced to one communion table. The font is a curious piece of workmanſhip, and was built by Dr. Warner, biſhop of Rocheſter. The Martyrdom, a place ſo called, is at the foot of the ſtairs that go up out of the nave into the choir. It has its name from the murder of Thomas Becket. Here are ſeveral monuments and burial inſcriptions of kings, queens, and great perſons. Near the cathedral is a church for foreign Proteſtants, which is now uſed by the French refugees. This cathedral has been ſeveral times burnt, ſince it was firſt conſecrated, and the laſt time was in 1174, after which it was not quite finiſhed till the reign of Henry V. The ſhrine of Thomas Becket was very rich in gold and precious ſtones, which Henry VIII. ſeized for his own uſe, at the diſſolution of the monaſteries.

The church is very large, and built in the form of a double or archiepicopal croſs. The entrance is through a handſome gate on the weſt ſide, where the front is flanked with two pretty high towers, one of which has a ſpire. The nave is ſeventy-five paces long, ſupported by fourteen large pillars, ſeven on each ſide, which leave but a narrow paſſage to the right and left. From thence we go into the firſt choir up fifteen ſteps, and from thence up fourteen more into another choir, in the form of a ſemicircle, which terminates the ſtructure. In this laſt Thomas Becket was buried. As theſe two choirs are raiſed above the nave, there is under them a large ſubterranean chapel, which has ſerved for the burying place of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction. On the ſide of the firſt choir, to the left as you enter, the church advances outward, and forms a large ſpace or body, which ſerved formerly for the chapter, but is now the part where they preach. In the room of the monks Henry VIII. appointed a dean, an archdeacon, twelve prebendaries, and ſix preachers.

This city is not very large, for it and the ſuburbs are but a mile long, and it is about three in circumference. The form is almoſt round, and the walls are very antique. Likewiſe the houſes are not very extraordinary, and moſt of the ſtreets are narrow. The Walloons who ſettled here firſt with the French refugees have a conſiderable ſilk manufacture. Auſtin, by ſome called the Engliſh apoſtle, was the firſt archbiſhop. The reſidence of the archbiſhop is not here, but at Lambeth, near London, and at Croydon, in Surry.

The city is ſeated in a good air, in a fruitful pleaſant country, and the neighbouring wood ſupplies it with fuel, though coals are in uſe, which are brought from Newcaſtle. It is ſeated on the river Stower, in which there are good trout. With regard to the antiquities of Canterbury, there are many remains of Roman buildings, which ſhew that it was a conſiderable place in the time of the ancient Romans. It is walled round, and has many towers at due intervals, with a deep ditch underneath, and a great rampart of earth within it; but the original ground plot is ſpoiled by churches being built in the middle of the ſtreets. To the ſouth is an old obſcure gate, called Worth-gate, which is under the caſtle, and partly walled up. This is entirely a Roman work, the ſemicircular arch being of Roman brick, and beautifully turned: the piers are of ſtone, and three Roman feet thick. The caſtle was built in the reign of William the Conqueror, and its extending beyond this gate was the occaſion of its being blocked up. This caſtle is much in the ſame form as that of Rocheſter. A little farther within the walls is a high mount, called Dungeon-hill, the top of which is as high as the caſtle, and has a fine proſpect over the city and country. Next to this is Riding gate, through which the Roman road called Watling-ſtreet runs, and paſſes over Barham Downs to Dover. Next to this is another gate, oppoſite to what is called St. Ethelbert's tower, which is the way to the ancient port of Rutupium. Here is a famous monaſtery of St. Auguſtine, two gates of which remain next the city, and are both very ſtately. This monaſtery took up a great compaſs of ground, and was encircled with a very high wall. Canterbury is twenty ſeven miles ſouth-eaſt by eaſt of Rocheſter, fifteen north-eaſt by eaſt of Dover, and fifty-ſeven ſouth-eaſt by eaſt of London. Long. 0. 50. E. Lat. 51. 16. N.

CANTERUS (WILLIAM) an eminent linguiſt and philologer, was born at Utrecht, on the 4th of July, 1542. He ſtudied at Louvain and Paris, and gave ſurprizing proofs of his progreſs in Greek and Latin literature. He afterwards viſited the ſeveral univerſities of Germany and Italy, and died at Louvain, on the 18th of May, 1575, in the thirty-third year of his age. He underſtood ſix languages, beſides that of his native country; and notwithſtanding his dying ſo young, wrote ſeveral philological and critical works, among which are, Notæ, Scholia, Emendationes, & Explicationes in Euripidem, Sophoclem, Æſchylum, Ciceronem, Propertium, Auſonium, &c. and many tranſlations of Greek authors.

CANTIN (CAPE) a promontory of Africa, in the Atlantic Ocean, on the coaſt of Morocco. Long. 10. 2. W. Lat. 33. 9. N.

CANTIRE, a peninſula in Scotland, ſtretching into the Iriſh Sea, and weſt of the iſle of Arran.

CANTON, a city of China, in the province of Quangtong, is one of the moſt trading and populous cities in the whole empire. It is ſeated on the banks of the river Taho, which is deep enough for veſſels to come up to the city. It is very large, and conſiſts of three different towns, which are ſeparated by high walls, and together are in the form of a ſquare. The ſtreets are long, ſtrait, narrow, and paved with hewn ſtones. The houſes are nothing but a ground-floor, with mud walls, intermixt with ſome ornaments of brick work, and covered with tiles. The ſtreets are full of ſhops, which have a very neat appearance, and ſome of the markets are covered over as they are in other parts of Aſia. The yamen or palaces of the mandarins take up a great deal of ground, and are handſomely adorned. The idol temples ſurrounded with the houſes of the bonzes are remarkable; as is the hall of Confucius, and the academy where the learned meet. There is here and there a triumphal arch, and at the end of each ſtreet a barrier, which is ſhut up every night ſoon after the gates. Yet with all their precautions there was a fire in the ſuburbs, where the buildings are very ſlight, in 1744, which would have deſtroyed the greateſt part of the city, if commodore Anſon's ſailors had not put a ſtop to it. It had conſumed a hundred ſhops and eleven ſtreets, full of warehouſes, and one merchant was thought to loſe two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. The inhabitants of a higher rank are carried about in chairs, but the common people walk on foot, bare-footed, and generally bare headed. There are no carts or other carriages for goods, but all ſorts of merchandiſe are carried from place to place by porters: artificers and tradeſmen of all ſorts are very numerous, which may well be ſuppoſed, if the city, as ſome affirm, contains a million of ſouls. The inhabitants of this city, as well as other parts of China, value themſelves on their ceremonious behaviour, and calmneſs of temper; which would not be amiſs if they were joined to ſincerity, benevolence, and reſolution. But their affected compoſure of mind is only a cloak for timidity, diſſimulation, and diſhoneſty. Inſomuch, that thoſe who have beſt judged of their conduct, have obſerved that their magiſtrates are corrupt, their people thieviſh, and their tribunals venial, and abounding with artifice. Long. 112. 30. E. Lat. 23. 35. N.

CANTON, or QUANGTONG, a province of China in Aſia, and one of the moſt conſiderable in the ſouthern part of that empire. It is bounded on the north-eaſt by Fokien, on the north by Kiangſi, on the weſt by Quangſi, and the kingdom of Tongking; and on the ſouth by the ſea. It is divided into ten territories, and contains ten cities of the firſt rank, and eighty-four of the ſecond and third, beſides forts and garriſons. This province is diverſified with hills and vallies, and the ſoil is ſo fruitful, that it bears two crops of corn in a year. It has almoſt every commodity that may contribute to the pleaſures of life; as gold, jewels, ſilk, pearls, tin, quickſilver, ſugar, braſs, iron, ſteel, ſalt-petre, ebony, and ſeveral ſorts of odoriferous wood; there is alſo plenty of all ſorts of fruit, as pomegranates, pears, plums, cheſnuts, peaches, bananas, plantanes, pine-apples, oranges and lemons of all ſorts, beſides others we have no name for in Europe. One ſort of lemons is near the ſize of one's head, and when diſtilled yields a very agreeable water. On the coaſt they have great plenty of fiſh, and turtles or tortoiſes of a very extraordinary ſize. They have variety of birds, and poultry both tame and wild. They hatch the duck eggs in ovens, as they do hen eggs in Egypt. Theſe ducks go down to the ſea-ſhore in the day time, and return home at night.

They have iron wood, which is very cloſe, compact, and extremely hard and heavy; as alſo roſe-wood, which ſerves to make chairs, tables, and other houſhold goods. The mountains are covered with a kind of oſiers, whoſe branches creep on the ground, and grow very long. Theſe ſerve to make mats, hurdles, baſkets, ropes and cables for ſhips. The inhabitants are not good at invention, but they will imitate the pattern that is put into their hands with a great deal of ingenuity.

CARNULEIUS, tribune of the Roman people, obtained the eſteem of the plebeians by his oppoſition to the nobles. He was the author of a ſedition about four hundred and forty-five years before the Chriſtian æra, and obtained for the plebeians the privilege of marrying into the families of the patricians.

CANUS (Melchior) a learned Dominican monk, born at Tarançon, in the dioceſe of Toledo in Spain, was the diſciple and ſucceſſor of Francis Victoria, in the divinity chair at Salamanca. He was preſent at the council of Trent, and in 1552 was made biſhop of the Canaries, but reſigned his biſhoprick, and was made provincial of Caſtile. He wrote ſeveral works which are eſteemed, and died at Toledo, in 1560.

Canus, or Cano (Sebastian) a famous mariner, a native of Guetaria in Spain, was the firſt who ſailed round the world. He embarked with Magellan, who died in the voyage, and returned to Seville on the 8th of September, 1522, after a voyage of three years and one month.

CANUTE, the firſt Daniſh king of England, was the ſecond ſon of Sueno, king of Denmark. This prince, after having been ſeveral times defeated by Edmund Ironſide, at laſt gained ſuch advantage over him, that he conſented to divide the kingdom with him, and Edmund dying a few months after, Canute, notwithſtanding Edmund left two ſons, became king of all England. He began his reign with ſeveral acts of cruelty, cauſing thoſe to be put to death whom he imagined moſt likely to diſpute his poſſeſſion of the crown, and his former wife dying, he confirmed himſelf on the throne by marrying Emma, the widow of king Ethelred. As he was alſo king of Denmark, he, in 1019, went into that kingdom to repreſs the incurſions of the Swedes, and in 1028 ſubdued Norway, and added it to his crown. Thus being poſſeſſed of three kingdoms, he ſeemed to have fully ſatisfied his ambitious views, and therefore, in 1031, going to Rome, preſented great gifts to St. Peter, profeſſed a deep repentance, and acted as if he thought of bribing heaven to overlook his cruelties, by giving a ſhare of his ſpoils to the church and the poor. At his return to England, he applied himſelf to the adminiſtration of juſtice, enacted excellent laws, and ſought to gain the love of his ſubjects. It is ſaid, that to reprove the extravagant flattery of ſome of his courtiers, who extolled him as ſomething more than human, and told him that the land and ſea owned his dominion, he ſeated himſelf in a chair on the ſea-ſhore, dreſſed in his royal robes, and as the tide began to riſe and approach to him, cried with an air of majeſty: "Thou ſea, which belongeſt to me, and thou land which "art mine, know that no one has unpuniſhed reſiſted my "commands; I charge thee therefore to come no farther "upon my land, nor to wet the feet of thy ſovereign lord;" when the ſea approaching, and wetting his feet and his robe, he aroſe, ſaying, "How frivolous is the power of a mo-"narch! none deſerves to be ſo called but he whom the "heavens, the earth, and ſeas obey:" and from that time, it is ſaid, he would never wear a crown. He died at Shaftſbury, in 1036, in the eighteenth year of his reign, and was interred in the old monaſtery at Wincheſter. He left his dominions to his three ſons, Harold, Canute, and Sweno, the firſt ſucceeding him in England, the ſecond in Denmark, and the laſt in Norway.

Canute II. or Hardi-Canute, the ſon of Canute I. and Emma, ſucceeded his half-brother Harold, in 1040, being at the ſame time king of Denmark. He began his reign by ſhewing his averſion to his predeceſſor, whoſe body he ordered to be dug up and thrown into a ditch, but by a ſecond order it was caſt into the Thames. Under the pretence of maintaining his fleet, he oppreſſed the people with the moſt heavy and burdenſome taxes; and was ſo enraged at two of his collectors being killed at Worceſter, that he ordered that city to be plundered and burnt. He was intemperate in his diet, and uſed to ſit at table four times a day, with all the variety of diſhes the ſeaſon could afford; but while he was thus employed in celebrating a Daniſh wedding, he dropped down ſpeechleſs when he was drinking, and thus dying, after a reign of two years, was buried at Wincheſter with his father. By his death a period was put to the tyranny of the Danes, who, for above two hundred years after their firſt invaſion, had ravaged England. He was ſucceeded by his half-brother Edward the Confeſſor, the ſon of king Ethelred and Emma.

There have been ſeveral other kings of Denmark of the ſame name.

CAORLO, a ſmall iſland in the gulph of Venice, which has a town of the ſame name, with a biſhop's ſee. Long. 13. 2. E. Lat. 46. 5. N.

CAPACIO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, with a biſhop's ſee. It is near three miles from the ſea, and twenty-two from Salerno. Long. 15. 18. E. Lat. 40. 40. N.

CAPANEUS, a celebrated captain, who being killed in firſt attempting to ſcale the walls of Thebes, the poets feigned that he had made war on Jupiter, and was ſtruck down by a thunderbolt.

CAPE Breton. See Breton.

Cape-Coast-Castle, the principal fort and ſettlement of the Engliſh, on the Gold coaſt of Guinea, in Africa. This caſtle was firſt built by the Portugueſe, in 1610, who called it Cabo Corſo. In a few years they were diſpoſſeſſed by the Dutch, who enlarged and beautified it. It was afterwards taken by the Engliſh, who rendered it ſtill more ſtrong and agreeable. The parade is twenty feet perpendicular above the ſurface of the rock on which it is built, and forms a quadrangle, open towards the ſea, where there is a platform with thirteen pieces of cannon. The other three ſides are incloſed with buildings, containing many neat handſome apartments and offices, and on the back ſide is a chapel.

The gardens of Cape Coaſt are very large and pleaſant, planted with regular walks. They have all the fruits of the torrid zone, ſuch as lemons, oranges, limes, citrons, guavas, papaws, plantanes, bananas, cocoa nuts, tamarinds, pine-apples, Indian cabbages, and many fruits and herbs from Europe. On the top of a hill, three quarters of a mile from the caſtle, there is a little round tower, called Phipps's tower, which mounts ſeven guns; and at the ſame diſtance, eaſt-by-north, is another Engliſh fort, which formerly belonged to the king of Denmark. It ſtands on a hill, which is inacceſſible on all ſides but one, and there are twenty-one pieces of cannon, which they make uſe of for ſalutations, but the fort itſelf is ruinous. The caſtle itſelf mounts fifty pieces of cannon.

The Negroe town by the ſide of the caſtle is well enough, conſidering the mean low buildings of which it conſiſts. There are converts to Chriſtianity among the inhabitants, who are pretty much civilized, and affect the European compliments, I mean the cabuſhiers or better ſort of them. Some authors talk of their cloathing, but the richeſt of them wear nothing but a cloth wrapt round their middle, and the meaneſt have hardly wherewithal to hide their nakedneſs. Even the governor's miſtreſs, when I was there, had nothing but a wrapper, being quite naked from the waiſt upwards, only her hair, or rather wool, was finely adorned with pieces of gold. I could learn nothing of their religion, for when I aſked one of their principal men where he thought he ſhould go after he was dead; he anſwered, "Me "go there," pointing to the ſky: I then demanded how he knew it, he replied, "Me no ſavee, white man tell me ſo." However, they have their fetiſh days once a week, which is a day of reſt, but different perſons keep a different day. I could diſcover no kind of worſhip that they had, but as I was roving in the neighbourhood of the coaſt, I ſaw on the top of a hill ſeveral heads, and other things made of clay, here and there, which I imagine were their idols. The people at this place are very dexterous fiſhermen, and will ſend out an hundred canoes at a time, which generally come home freighted. Fiſh ſeems to be a principal part of their ſubſiſtence, for I was entertained with little elſe at one of their houſes. The women are employed in grinding their Indian corn, which is done by manual labour in the open ſtreet. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 4. 40. N.

Cape of Good Hope, the moſt ſouthern promontory of Africa. It was diſcovered by the Portugueſe in 1493, and was at firſt called the Cape of Torment, on account of the terrible tempeſts that are frequent at this place. But it was afterwards changed to the preſent name. The natural inhabitants of the country adjoining to the Cape are called Hottentots, which is the name they give themſelves. Some authors have puzzled themſelves about the origin of theſe people, but to very little purpoſe; for as they are ignorant of letters, it cannot be ſuppoſed that they themſelves can give much light into this affair. Nor will their language afford us any help, for there is no analogy between that and any other that we know, but on the contrary it is a compoſition of the ſtrangeſt ſounds that ever were uttered by any people. Some have compared it to the noiſe of turkey-cocks, the chattering of magpies, and the hooting of owls; inſomuch, that thoſe who have reſided among them many years, have never been able to learn it entirely, with the utmoſt ſtudy and application. One reaſon is, that the pronunciation depends upon ſuch colliſions or claſhings of the tongue againſt the palate, and upon ſuch vibrations and inflections of that member, as a ſtranger is not able to imitate. With regard to the temper of the Hottentots, they are the lazieſt people under the heavens, and a monſtrous averſeneſs to thought and action runs through every one of their nations; inſomuch, that they ſeem to place their whole happineſs in indolence and ſloth; for if they are not rouzed by any preſent appetite or neceſſity, they are as deaf to employment as a log. In reſpect of diet they are a very filthy people. They eat the guts of beaſts after they are waſhed, but not before, as ſome have aſſerted. They boil them in the blood of the beaſt when they can; otherwiſe they broil them. But they are ſo naſty while they do this, that it will turn the ſtomach of any European. When meat is ſet before them, they devour it with aſtoniſhing greedineſs and diſpatch. Yet notwithſtanding this, if they continue to obſerve their own cuſtoms, and don't debauch themſelves with ſtrong liquors, they live to a great age. From their infancy they ſmear themſelves with butter and ſheep's fat, mixed with ſoot, to make themſelves black, they being naturally of an olive complexion. Their cloaths are ſheep ſkins, which they faſten about their neck like cloaks, and dawb them in the ſame manner, unleſs they are poor and cannot afford it, and yet they abominate the fat of fiſh. Some think this anointing is a preſervative againſt the effects of the ſun's heat. They have a very offenſive ſmell, and their hair looks like black wool, clotted together.

They have flat noſes and thick lips, eſpecially the uppermoſt. Their ſtature is from five to ſix feet high, but their women are a great deal leſs. Their heads are large, and their eyes in proportion. Their teeth are as white as ivory, their hair woolly, and as black as jet. The men have large broad feet, the women ſmall, and more delicate; and both men and women let their nails grow without ever paring them. Their limbs and bodies are always ſtrait, without any care being taken of them in their childhood. The women, after eight days, lug the children about on their backs, till they are able to crawl about themſelves. The women have an excreſcence, or flap, which covers the private parts of all, and in ſome hangs down very long. They are not aſhamed of it, but will let any man examine it for a pipe of tobacco, or a dram of brandy. Some travellers have ſuppoſed that the women where they are circumciſed have ſuch a flap; but this is contrary to experience, for in thoſe parts of Guinea where this cuſtom prevails, they have no ſuch excreſcence; for if there was, the marks of ſuch a large amputation muſt remain, and muſt neceſſarily be ſeen, becauſe all the girls go ſtark naked till a certain age. But perhaps too much has been ſaid on this ſubject, and yet ſuch a remarkable deviation of nature could not well be paſſed over in ſilence. For the ſame reaſon a cuſtom of theirs muſt not be omitted, which is the depriving every male of one of his teſticles; and this is religiouſly obſerved among all the Hottentot nations, when the boy is about eight or nine years of age. It is performed with a great deal of ceremony, and ſome expence, for they make a feaſt on this occaſion, and the remainder of the day is ſpent in ſmoaking, ſinging, and dancing. The ground of this cuſtom is altogether unknown, and this is no wonder, becauſe the Hottentots themſelves alledge no reaſon but a cuſtom which has prevailed among them through all generations. The males till they are eighteen converſe only with the women, and at that age they are received into the company of the men, with a great deal of odd ceremony.

We ſhall now proceed to the cuſtoms of this extraordinary people; and in the firſt place ſhall give an account of their government, for every nation has a chief, called Konquer, who commands the army, conducts the negotiations of peace, and preſides in the councils. His apparel is the fineſt tyger or cat ſkins that can be got; and ſince the Dutch came, he wears a braſs crown at the head of his army, on every ſolemn occaſion. The Dutch preſent one to every nation in their alliance. His immediate buſineſs is only to govern the kraal or village wherein he reſides. When there is a council of the captains of the ſeveral kraals, he ſits in the middle. He has no revenue, but his perſon is had in reverence. His dignity is hereditary, but before his admittance he is obliged to ſwear he will not change their cuſtoms. At this time he is obliged to feaſt the captains of the kraals with a fat ox and a couple of ſheep. The captains wives are preſent, but are not admitted to eat with the men, but are forced to be contented with broth only. The next day the chief's wife treats the women in the ſame manner, and then it is the mens turn to feed upon broth. The captain of a kraal adminiſters juſtice, and in time of war has, under the chief of the nation, the command of the troops furniſhed by his kraal. He is admitted to his government in the ſame manner, and with the ſame feaſt as the chief. He is judge in caſes of murder, thefts, and other crimes, committed within his juriſdiction. State criminals are tried by the chief, aſſiſted by the captains of villages. Theſe the Dutch have diſtinguiſhed by giving them a cane with a braſs head. In public councils, affairs are determined by a majority of voices. However, their authority is but little regarded, for when they quarrel and fight, the captain knows he cannot quiet them, and therefore pretends not to hear what they are doing, unleſs there happens to be murder committed.

In every kraal they have a ſort of doctor, who pretends to great ſkill in herbs and plants, but he chiefly confines himſelf to manual operations. They keep their remedies very ſecret, for they deal in nothing but noſtrums. However, the old women run away with a great deal of the practice, chiefly among their own ſex. Next to the doctor is the prieſt, if he may be ſo called, whoſe buſineſs is to direct the offerings and the ceremonies of marriage and burying. He likewiſe deprives the boys of a teſticle, and ſews up the wound with the nerve of a beaſt. Neither he nor the doctor have any ſalary, or perquiſite; unleſs a feaſt or merry-making is ſuch. A calf or a lamb is an extraordinary reward.

With regard to religion, the Hottentots have been reputed atheiſts; but thoſe who have lived among them ſay, they believe in a God, and ſay he is a good man, who does nobody any hurt, and that he dwells far above the moon. But they never worſhip him, nor pay him any act of devotion. Some of them ſay their firſt parent ſinned, and that God curſed all their poſterity with hardneſs of heart, but this notion is plainly of European original. They worſhip the moon with invocations, dancings, and noiſes, and call her Gounja. They believe ſhe has the diſpoſal of the weather, and invoke her for ſuch as they want. Their aſſemblies for this purpoſe are always at the full and change of the moon. The Hottentots likewiſe adore an inſect, which is of the ſize of a child's little finger. The back is green, the belly ſpeckled with white and red; it has two horns on its head, and only two wings. When it comes to a kraal, the inhabitants aſſemble about it in tranſports of devotion. They ſing and dance round it while it ſtays in the higheſt raptures. They throw the powder of an herb towards it, and cover the tops of their huts, and the whole area of the kraal with the ſame powder. They likewiſe kill two fat ſheep, as a thank-offering for this high honour. If this inſect lights upon a Hottentot, they look upon him as a man without guilt, and reverence him ever after; and the fatteſt ox belonging to the kraal is immediately killed on the occaſion. The ſaint has the entrails, and the cawl twiſted like a rope, and powdered with the herb buchu, is put like a collar about his neck.

Beſides this, they conſecrate rivers, mountains, fields, and woods, to the memory of their ſaints and great men, and when they paſs by any ſuch place, they enumerate the virtues of the deceaſed, and beg protection for them and their cattle. Add to this, that they talk of an evil being which afflicts them with all kinds of evils, and him they worſhip out of fear; but none of them pretend they have ever ſeen him. Theſe tenets they never could be perſuaded to forſake; for which reaſon no Hottentot ever died a Chriſtian; and the moſt accompliſhed miſſionaries have always laboured in vain. They have other ceremonies which they uſe at public rejoicings, on particular occaſions, which would be endleſs to deſcribe, and therefore we ſhall only ſay, that they are worthy of the Hottentots.

When a Hottentot man wants to marry any woman, he applies to the father, or if he be dead to the neareſt relation, and ſeldom meets with a denial. When the wedding is going to be performed, the bridegroom has two or three fat oxen killed, with the fat of which the men and women daub themſelves all over, and then powder themſelves laviſhly with buchu, and the women likewiſe paint their chins and cheeks with red chalk, which make them look frightfully. This done, the men ſquat themſelves down in a ring, and the bridegroom in the middle. The women do the ſame at ſome diſtance, with the bride in the centre. Then the prieſt ſprinkles firſt one and then the other with his urine, till his whole ſtock is exhauſted. While this is doing, the cleanly decent couple endeavour to rub it into their bodies with their long nails; then the prieſt wiſhes them much happineſs, and a ſon before the end of the year, which concludes the ceremony. Theſe marriage rites are certainly the naſtieſt and the moſt unworthy of human creatures that ever were practiſed. They are not confined to any number of wives, though they ſeldom take above three; either party may obtain a divorce by ſhewing a ſufficient cauſe to the men of the kraal where they live, and it is ſaid they puniſh adultery with death. A widow is obliged to cut off the joint of a finger every time ſhe marries again.

When a couple are married, they build themſelves a hut. When this is done, the wife has the care of ſeeking and dreſſing the family proviſions; while the man devotes himſelf to eating, drinking, ſmoaking, idling, and ſleeping ever after, unleſs he goes a-hunting, or fiſhing if he lives near the ſea. He likewiſe eaſes the woman a little in the care of the cattle. They have their ſeparate apartments, for they never lie a night together, and always ſhow a great indifference; for if there be twenty men and their wives in one hut, it is impoſſible to tell who and who are together. The woman carries her young child on her back, and gives it the nipple to ſuck over her ſhoulder. If ſhe have ſeveral children, they all follow her wherever ſhe goes, if they can walk about. She is continually ſmoaking herſelf, and teaches them to ſmoak as ſoon as poſſible.

The apparel of the Hottentots, as already obſerved, is a beaſt's ſkin thrown over their ſhoulders, and to adorn their heads, they load it with ſoot and fat, which, growing hard, looks like a cap of black mortar, and there is no hair to be ſeen; over this, in cold ſeaſons, they wear caps of wild cat or lamb ſkin, tied on with two ſtrings. About the man's neck there hangs a little greaſy bag, in which he carries his knife, if he has one, his pipe, tobacco, and other trifles. They have generally three ivory rings on their left arms, to which they tie a bag with their proviſions when they travel. They likewiſe carry two ſticks in their right hand, one of which is pointed for a dart. In their left they have a ſmall ſtick, to which the tail of a beaſt is faſtened; this ſerves them for a handkerchief. The fore part of the bodies, both of men and women, is always bare, except their private parts, which are covered with a ſquare piece of a ſkin of a wild beaſt, with the hair-ſide outwards. It is faſtened by two ſtrings tied round their waiſt. Beſides this, from the hips downward they are quite naked. But when they paſs rocks or ſtoney places they wear ſandals, cut out of the raw hide of an oxe or elephant. The women wear caps made of the ſkin of a wild beaſt all the year; they are made like a ſugar-loaf. In other things they dreſs like the men, only they have two mantles, one over another, and they cover their backſide with a piece of ſkin tied round their waiſts. The girls and women alſo wear ſlips of ſheep or calves ſkin about their legs, ſometimes to the number of an hundred. Theſe rings are not made of ſheep's guts, as has generally been aſſerted. It has likewiſe been ſaid too that the men wear them as well as the women, but this is another miſtake. However, it is true enough that they eat theſe rings when other proviſions are wanted. Since the Europeans have ſettled amongſt them, they wear braſs buttons and bits of looking-glaſs in their hair, and braſs ear rings in their ears. They have likewiſe introduced braſs and glaſs beads for necklaces and bracelets, ſometimes to the number of half a dozen; they chooſe the ſmalleſt they can meet with for their necks and arms, and the large ones are tied about their waiſt.

The victuals of the Hottentots are the fleſh and entrails of cattle, and of certain wild beaſts. They ſeldom kill their cattle, unleſs for a feaſt, or when they have nothing elſe to eat. Thoſe that die naturally are as much eſteemed as any. Their general diet is fruits, roots, and milk; but ſometimes they have veniſon, and ſometimes fiſh. They reckon the guts and other entrails of cattle the greateſt delicacy. They have no ſet times for meals, but eat at any time of the day or night, when they have an appetite. They eat no ſwine's fleſh, nor fiſh without ſcales. The men abſtain from hares and rabbits; the women from blood, and the fleſh of the mole. They are all extremely fond of tobacco, and will do almoſt any thing to obtain it. They will never ſerve an Eupean, unleſs tobacco be a part of their wages. They have a ſort of wild hemp called dacha, which they ſmoak as tobacco, but it affects their imagination, diſturbs their brain, and often throws them into downright madneſs; when they will rave, ſtare, and perform a thouſand extravagant actions. They have a root called kanna, of whoſe virtues they have an extravagant opinion, and they will run twenty miles of an errand for a ſmall bit of it. It has intoxicating qualities, and throws them into the higheſt extacies of joy The Dutch have taught them to be fond of ſpirituous liquors, and as arrack is the cheapeſt, they are often drunk with it.

The huts of their kraals or villages are ranged in a circle. Some conſiſt of about twenty huts, and ſome are ſo large as to contain three, four, or five hundred ſouls. The cattle are lodged in the middle, which ſometimes amount to ſeveral thouſands. The huts are cloſe to each other, and reſemble ovens. They are built with ſticks and mats, in an oval form, the longeſt diameter of which is fourteen feet, and the ſhorteſt ten. Thoſe of the rich have double coverings of mats, or rather mats within, and ſkins on the outſide, which always keep out the rain and ſun. They have no windows, and the paſſage into them is only three feet high, and in windy weather they have a ſkin which is faſtened to the top of it, and falling down, ſhuts it up. The cieling or top of the huts is ſo low, it will not admit them to ſtand upright in them, which obliges them to ſquat down on the ground. They contain a family of about ten or twelve perſons. The furniture is two or three pots for cookery, a pot or two for drinking, and earthen veſſels for milk and butter, mantles, bows and arrows, darts and ſticks. The beds are holes dug on each ſide, which they ſleep in; and every one has a particular hole. In the middle there is a hole to make a fire in. They have no other bed cloaths but their mantles, which they call croſſes. Every hut has a dog or two, which they turn out every night to guard the cattle, and are very uſeful on that account. He is of a very generous nature, though horrid ugly to look at. His ſnout is long, his ears erect, his tail long and ſmall, and drags on the ground. His hair, which is long, points every way, and greatly contributes to his diſagreeable appearance.

The occupations among the Hottentots are, butchers, ſkinners, taylors, ſmiths, workers in ivory, makers of mats, ropes, and pots. The ſame perſon is generally ſkinner and taylor: and all his buſineſs as taylor is to make mantles or croſſes, at which time he uſes the bone of a fiſh for an awl, and the ſinews of beaſts for thread. The workers in ivory make handſome rings of an elephant's tooth for the arms. The mat-makers are generally women, who gather reed flags, and bulruſhes, for their work. The rope makers uſe the ſame materials to make ropes of an inch diameter, and four yards in length, which are very ſtrong. Every family make their own pots too of common mould, with ants eggs to bind it together; and when they have blended them into a kind of dough, they raiſe them with their hands as a pye is made in theſe parts. When they are baked, they are as black as jet. The ſmiths melt their iron from the oar, and beat it into weapons with ſtones, which is all the uſe they make of that metal.

The Hottentots are not without their muſic; but their inſtrument is a poor one, which they call gom-gom, and is like the bladder and ſtring which we call a ſtrum-ſtrum. But they play upon it with their mouths, by means of ſlit quills put upon the ſtring; and the notes are owing, like thoſe of a jew's-harp, to the various modulations of the breath. Inſtead of a bladder, they have a cocoa-nut ſhell, with the mouth downward; and when they play, they move it backwards and forwards with the left hand, to vary the ſound. When three or four play on them together, the ſound is well enough. They have likewiſe ſomething like a kettle-drum, made with a ſheep-ſkin over an earthen pot. Theſe women only play upon with their fingers. The ſinging conſiſts chiefly in the various repetition of the monoſyllable ho, ho, and two or three ditties after their way.

Every man among them is a huntſman and a ſoldier, making uſe of the ſame weapons for both. In war they make uſe of oxen, as they do of elephants in other places; they being trained up for that purpoſe, and by ſtamping, kicking, and goring, they make dreadful havock among the enemy. Thoſe that gain the victory make ſuch a dreadful yelling, roaring, and ſcreaming, that it is ſhocking to hear them. The occaſion of war is commonly the ſtealing of cattle, carrying off the wives, or burning of graſs. This laſt is generally accidental. However, one battle generally decides the war.

The Hottentot doctors, for colics and pains of the ſtomach, uſe cupping with an ox's horn. When it is fixed on, and has remained for ſome time, they take it off, and ſcarify the part with a knife. Then they fix the horn on again, and let it remain till it is full of blood, which is generally in two hours time. If the pain flies to another part, they rub it well with hot fat. If that fail of giving eaſe, they cup it. In ſome caſes, they let blood with a ſtrap and knife. The ſtrap is tied about the arm, to raiſe the vein. In head achs, they ſhave the head with a knife well ſharpened. They likewiſe ſhave the head in furrows, upon the death of a near relation, when they are not able to make the uſual ſacrifices. They purge with a few drops of the juice of aloes, in warm broth.

When a Hottentot, through ſickneſs, is ready to expire, their relations and friends make a terrible howling; and when he is actually dead, there is ſuch a ſcreaming, crying, howling, yelling, roaring, and clapping of hands, that they may be heard ſeveral miles off. Then they tie him neck and heels together, and ſeek for a hole to bury him in; which is a cleft in a rock, or a hole in the ground made by a wild beaſt. They are attended by all the kraal to the grave, both men and women, crying Bo, bo, bo! in very mournful accents, wringing their hands. They fill the grave with the mould of ant-hills, great ſtones, and pieces of wood. Then they return back to the hut of the deceaſed, and renew their lamentations in the ſame manner.

When a Hottentot man is ſuperanuated, he is obliged to make over his cattle to his eldeſt ſon, who erects a hut in ſome ſolitary place, and with the conſent of the kraal, which is never denied, the poor old creature is removed thereto. Then they feaſt with an ox, or two or three ſheep, and bid him adieu for ever. The ſuperanuated women are ſerved in the ſame manner. There are many ſtrange and contradictory relations concerning theſe people, which have generally been received as authentic; but we have rejected every thing that is not well founded, without ſtaying to confute every falſe opinion, becauſe it would have rendered this article too long.

With regard to the Dutch, the place where the firſt colony ſettled is the moſt remarkable. In this there are high mountains, fruitful vallies, and a great many brooks and rivers. Even on the flat tops of the mountains, there are fields enamelled with flowers, which, with the ſtreams that fall down from them into the vallies, afford a charming landſcape. Here and there are little groves of trees, proper for building, and other uſes. The plains are covered with flowers, fruit-trees, aromatic herbs, and medicinal plants. Beſides theſe, the ſinging of birds, and the murmuring of brooks render it a delightful abode. In the Table valley the town is ſeated, and has a good fortreſs, with a fine garden belonging to the company. The town contains above two hundred handſome houſes, built of ſtone, with large ſtreets, regularly formed, and gardens behind them. However, moſt of the houſes are but one or two ſtories high, and covered with thatch, on account of the high winds which are here very predominant. On each ſide of the ſtreet there are pent-houſes, to ſhelter the paſſengers from rain. The church is ſpacious, and very ſtrongly built with free-ſtone; but the body of the church is thatch'd. The church yard is of vaſt extent, and incompaſſed with a brick wall.

The hoſpital is a very convenient building, where there is lodging for two hundred perſons. It receives the ſick perſons from the ſhips, who are generally pretty numerous, and are well taken care of. They have another building called the lodge, which ſerves for the company's ſlaves. One ſide of it is for the men, and the other for the women. There is a large hall to dine in, and a priſon to confine thoſe that get drunk, or otherwiſe miſbehave.

There are alſo very handſome ſtables belonging to the company, which will hold ſeveral hundred horſes. The fort is large, ſtrong, and very commodious. About the town there are fine gardens, agreeable vineyards, and fruitful fields, particularly on the ſide of the Salt river. The governor has a fine country-houſe on the north-weſt ſide of the fort.

The Tyger Mountains are twenty-four miles in compaſs, and are the moſt fruitful about the Cape. A great many country-houſes are built thereon, with gardens, vineyards, orchards, &c. But they would be in great want of water to preſerve their fertility, if it was not for a great black cloud which bedews them plentifully every night. Beſides, they have innumerable flocks and herds of ſheep and cattle continually grazing upon them. The Koe-Berg, or Mountain of Cows, is barren. The Blaewe Berg, or Blew Mountain, wants water, and has but few cattle, though deer and elephants are in plenty. In the Groene Kloof, or Green Valley, there are excellent paſtures, and numerous flocks of ſheep. The ſouthern parts are quite full of high mountains. The Steen Bergen, or Stone Mountains, yield excellent ſtone, as good as marble. There is alſo a quarry of red ſtone, as fine as marble, which is tranſported into Holland. Beſides theſe, there are the Bergen Van Noorwegen, the Norway Mountains, the Tafel Berg, or Table Mountain, the Leewen Berg, or Lion Mountain, and the Wind Berg, or the Duivel's Berg, the Wind Mountain, or the Devil's Mountain, on which there are many aromatic herbs, and in the middle of the laſt there are abundance of fine trees; as alſo a ſilver mine, but it will not anſwer the expence of working it.

The moſt barren parts afford mines, which exhale ſulphureous and nitrous vapours, and it is obſervable that dry half-periſhed herbs are an indication of mines, as well as a ſhining ſoil; gold and cinnabar are often found in the ſame mine. Mines of iron have been diſcovered by the Hottentots themſelves, and there are mines of ſilver and copper, but none of tin or lead. All the waters that deſcend from the tops of the mountains are fine and clear, eſpecially if their channels are gravelly or ſtoney. But thoſe that proceed from the ſides of the mountains, and have not a gravelly bed, are reddiſh. Some ſtreams are black, which colour they have from the earth through which they run. Some waters are ſweet, others brackiſh, and ſome turn into ſalt. The brackiſh are very wholeſome, as phyſic, for they work downwards, and promote perſpiration. There are hot baths in the colony of Waven, ninety miles from the Cape, which perform wonderful cures.

The ſtormy winds of the Cape are known all over Europe, of which there are two principal, which ſucceed each other every ſix months. One is from the ſouth-eaſt, and the other from the north-weſt, and are called monſoons. The ſummer monſoon begins in September, when the ſun enters Libra, and then the ſouth-eaſt wind blows, and the ſhips that lie in the road are in ſafety; that is in Soldane Bay, or at the Iſle of Daſten. Theſe ſtorms are not leſs violent on the continent. When people ſtir out of doors at this time they are blinded, or overwhelmed with a cloud of duſt and ſand, every thing is turned topſy-turvy in the colonies. At this time the Table Valley is almoſt rendered deſolate with violent whirlwinds. The other monſoon begins in March, when the ſun enters Aries, and makes their winter, or rather the wet ſeaſon. Now the ſhips muſt anchor in the Table Bay. The fogs which are frequent at the Cape at this time render navigation dangerous, and the inhabitants cannot walk out in ſafety. The ſummer monſoon is dry and wholeſome, but if the wind ceaſes for a day or two, they are almoſt ſuffocated with heat, and annoyed with bad ſmells from corrupted vegetables, which produce pains of the head. Beſides, the air is darkened with ſwarms of flies, gnats, and other inſects. But as ſoon as the wind blows again, the air becomes ſerene, and all the incommodities are removed. In the wet ſeaſon the air is darkened with clouds, and becomes unhealthy, in the ſame manner as on the coaſt of Guinea, and all the ſouthern parts of Africa. Longitude of the Cape, 20. 10. E. CAPE VERD, a remarkable Cape on the weſt coaſt of Africa, diſcovered by the Portugueſe in 1420. It is bounded on each ſide by the rivers Gambia and Senegal; in which ſeveral petty kingdoms are contained, of which we ſhall give ſome account. The firſt is Barrah, on the north ſide of the river Gambia, the king of which is tributary to the king of Barſally. Here are two Engliſh factories, one at Gillifree, over-againſt James Fort, and the other at Colar, up a river of the ſame name, which runs into the Gambia. Charles Iſland in this territory is about a muſquet-ſhot from the ſhore. It had a fort formerly, but it is now gone to ruin. James Iſland is oppoſite to Gillifree, from which a ſpit of land and rocks extends a good way to the north-north-weſt, upon which ſeveral ſhips have run a-ground. Beyond Barrah, which extends ſixty miles up the river, there are the kingdoms of Badibu, Sanjally, Barſally, and Yani. Theſe are all but ſmall territories, though dignified with the name of kingdoms. The towns or rather villages that have any thing remarkable, will be mentioned in their order. Long. 18. 10. W. Lat. 14. 46. N.

The inhabitants of theſe countries are blacks, and diſtinguiſhed by the names of Mundingoes, Jolloifs, Pholeys, and Floops. Of theſe the moſt numerous are the Mundingoes. The Portugueſe ſettled here ſoon after they diſcovered theſe parts, and by cohabiting with the Mundingoes, they are now almoſt as black. Theſe have a prieſt yearly ſent over from St. Jago, who chriſtens and marries, which keeps up the name of Chriſtianity among them, and makes them think as well of themſelves as if they were actually white. See FOLEYS, SENEGAL, and GAMBIA.

It is the cuſtom here for every man to take as many wives as he pleaſes, and there are ſome that have no leſs than an hundred, which he may turn off at pleaſure. Thoſe that he finds lying with other men, he ſells for ſlaves. This does not hinder them, or the girls from taking what liberty they pleaſe, for if they are met with alone, they are always very free of their favours. Even the Portugueſe women will make no ſcruple to live with a white man, without the ceremony of marriage. When the man takes home a wife, he makes a feaſt, to which all may come that will, and then they play and dance for three or four days ſucceſſively. The bride is brought home on men's ſhoulders, with a veil over her face, which ſhe keeps on till ſhe has been in bed with her huſband. While the conſummation is going forward, they dance, ſing, beat drums, and fire muſquets. If the woman has had a child or two before hand it is taken no notice of.

The common behaviour of the men is civil enough, and their manner of ſalutation is by ſhaking hands. They wear ſwords ſlung over their right ſhoulders, or carry ſpears about three yards long: but all of them wear knives ſlung by their ſides, and are very dextrous at uſing any ſort of weapon they carry. The women have very eaſy labours, and are generally about again the next day. They dip the new-born child in water three or four times the firſt day, and then rub it over with palm oil. Neither boys nor girls are allowed a clout to cover their nakedneſs till they are nine years old. They name the child when a month old, and circumciſe many of the boys at twelve or fourteen years of age, a little before the rainy ſeaſon comes on. The head man of a town is called Tobaubo Manſa, and by the Portugueſe, Alcade. His province is to ſet the people to work, he being a ſort of governor. The men work the corn-ground, and the women the rice-ground. When the harveſt is ready to be got in, the Alcade divides the crop equally amongſt them.

When a negro dies, all his friends and acquaintance come and howl over him for a day or two, and then they bury him in the ſame room where he died, or very near it. Four months in the year the climate is very unhealthy to ſtrangers, but the natives in general are pretty healthy. Yet they have dangerous diſeaſes among them, as fevers, the ſmall-pox, king's-evil, Guinea worms, which breed between the ſkin and the fleſh, and a ſwelling in the legs, which is often as thick as their middle. What religion theſe negroes are, is very hard to ſay, for they have very little devotion, but a great deal of ſuperſtition, for they believe moſt people that die are killed by witchcraft; but then they take a ſort of ſcreech-owls, which make a horrid noiſe in the night, to be all witches.

As to the animals in the ſavannahs, there are plenty of deer, wild hogs, buffaloes, geeſe, ducks, quails, doves, and partridges. Theſe laſt have double ſpurs on their legs. In the rivers and lakes there are plenty of crocodiles, whoſe eggs the natives are very fond of. However, this is no wonder, for they will eat almoſt any thing; for inſtance, large ſnakes, guanas, monkeys, pelicans, bald eagles, crocodiles, and ſea-horſes. Long. of Cape Verd 18. 10. W. Lat. 14. 46. N.

CAPE VERD (Iſlands of). Theſe are a collection of iſlands ſeated in the Atlantic ocean, about four hundred miles from Cape Verd, in between twenty-two and twenty-five degrees of longitude, and between fourteen and eighteen degrees of latitude. They are placed in a ſemi-circle, and were diſcovered by the Portugueſe in 1440. The principal are ten, namely, St. Anthony, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, St. Nicholas, the Iſle of Salt, Bonaviſta, the Iſle of May, St. Jago, Fuego, and Brava. St. Jago is the capital of all theſe iſlands, and belongs to the Portugueſe.

There are many other remarkable capes, which we ſhall inſert under their proper names.

CAPEL (ARTHUR) lord Capel, of Hadham, was the ſon of ſir Henry Capel, knight. At his firſt appearance in the world he became very famous for his piety, his hoſpitality to his neighbours, and his great charity to the poor, which ſo endeared him to the people, that he was choſen one of the knights for Hertfordſhire, in the parliament which met at Weſtminſter, April 13, 1640, and on the 16th of the ſame month, he delivered a petition from the freeholders of Hertfordſhire, complaining of ſhip-money, projects, monopolies, the ſtar-chamber, high commiſſion-courts, &c. which was the firſt of that kind preſented to the houſe. And in the Long Parliament, which began Nov. 3, 1640, when the city of London promiſed to advance one hundred thouſand pounds for the payment of the Engliſh and Scotch armies, and wanted ſecurity for that ſum, till an act was paſſed for the raiſing of it, he ſtood up in the houſe, and offered his ſecurity for one thouſand pounds, and above an hundred more did the like. He alſo voted for the earl of Strafford's attainder; but being, on the 6th of Auguſt, 1641, advanced to the dignity of a baron, by the title of lord Capel, of Hadham, he from thenceforward eſpouſed the king's intereſt, with the utmoſt reſolution and fidelity, but at laſt ſhutting himſelf up in Colcheſter, where he was one of the moſt reſolute in its defence, on the ſurrender of that place, after a long and cloſe ſiege, he was obliged to yield himſelf to the mercy of the lord Fairfax, when, in violation of promiſe of quarter given him by the general, he was committed priſoner to Windſor caſtle, and afterwards to the Tower, from whence he made his eſcape, but was diſcovered and taken two days after, and being tried before a high court of juſtice at Weſtminſter-hall for treaſon, and other crimes, he was condemned, and beheaded on a ſcaffold, erected before Weſtminſter-hall, on the 9th of March, 1648-9.

This nobleman was poſſeſſed of almoſt every virtue and accompliſhment that could endear him to his friends in private, or gain him honour and reſpect in public life. He behaved upon the ſcaffold with all the dignity of conſcious virtue, and met death with the ſame intrepidity, with which he had been accuſtomed to face the enemy. He wrote a book of Meditations, publiſhed after his death, to which are added a few of his Letters.

CAPEL (ARTHUR) earl of Eſſex, eldeſt ſon of the former, ſucceeded his father in his honour, and after the Reſtoration, on account of his father's loyalty and ſufferings, and his own perſonal merit, was advanced to the dignity of viſcount Malden, and earl of Eſſex. In 1670 he was ſent ambaſſador to Denmark, where his behaviour, in the affair of the flag, gained him great reputation. The king of Denmark had ordered the governor of Cronenburg to make all the ſhips that paſſed ſtrike to him; and therefore, when this nobleman was paſſing by, the governor let him know that he muſt either ſtrike to him, ſail by in the night, or keep out of his reach; otherwiſe he muſt fire, firſt with powder, and next with ball. The lord Eſſex reſolutely anſwered, That the kings of England made others ſtrike to them, but their ſhips ſtruck to none. He would not ſteal through in the dark, nor keep out of his reach, and if he ſhot at him, he would defend himſelf. The governor fired over him, or according to ſome, tore his rigging. The earl juſtified his conduct at the court of Denmark, by ſhewing treaties, in which it was expreſsly ſtipulated, that the Engliſh ſhips of war ſhould not ſtrike in the Daniſh ſeas; on which the governor of Cronenburg was ordered to beg his pardon upon his knees in the open ſtreet, which he did, the earl ſtanding in a balcony of his lodgings. At his return in 1672 he was ſworn of the privy council, and made lord lieutenant of Ireland, when he made it his whole ſtudy to underſtand the conſtitution, and promote the intereſt of that nation, but was recalled in 1677. When the excluſion of the duke of York was debated in the houſe of lords, he appeared againſt it, and with the earl of Halifax propoſed ſuch limitations of the duke's authority, when the crown ſhould devolve on him, as would diſable him from doing any harm in church or ſtate: but ſeeing that violent meaſures were going on, when the bill of excluſion was brought a ſecond time into the houſe of lords, he argued vehemently for it. In June, 1683, being accuſed by the lord Howard of being concerned in the Rye-houſe conſpiracy, he was committed to the Tower; and on the 13th of July following, he was found in a cloſet in his lodgings there, about nine o'clock in the morning, with his throat cut, from one jugular to the other, and through the windpipe and gullet into the vertebræ of the neck. The coroner's jury the next day brought in their verdict ſelf-murder; but it was then, and has ſince been thought, that he was murdered by Paul Bomeney, a French ſervant who attended him. He was a nobleman ſtrict in his juſtice, tender of his honour, and conſtant to his friend; of the moſt virtuous and religious principles, and of the greateſt ſedateneſs, ſteadineſs, and ſtrength of mind.

It is very remarkable, that great pains were taken by the court to oblige the coroner's inqueſt to bring in their verdict ſelf-murder, and to ſtifle all enquiry into it. Captain Howard, and one of the centinels in the Tower, mentioning ſome ſuſpicions from what they had ſeen, were murdered two days after. Bomeney was made one of the life guards. One Mr. Laurence Braddon, for being active in diſcovering the authors of this inhuman action, was fined two thouſand pounds in the king's bench, and Mr. Hugh Speke one thouſand pounds.

CAPEL (ALGERNON) earl of Eſſex, and ſon of the former, was gentleman of the bed-chamber to king William, colonel of a regiment of dragoons, ſerved under him in Flanders, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Landen, and attended at the great congreſs in 1690. In the reign of queen Anne he was conſtable of the Tower of London, lieutenant-general of her armies, and colonel of dragoons. He died Jan. 10, 1709-10.

CAPELLA (MARCIANUS MINEUS FELIX) a Latin poet, lived about the year 490. He is thought to have been an African and proconſul. Boetius cites him. He wrote a Poem, intitled, De Nuptiis Philologiæ et Mercurii, et de ſeptem Artibus liberalibus. Grotius, when only a boy of fourteen years of age, gave, in 1599, a good edition of this work in octavo, with notes and corrections, by which he reſtored an infinite number of corrupted paſſages, with a ſagacity and judgment that is very aſtoniſhing in a boy of his age.

CAPELLUS (LEWIS) an eminent and learned divine, was born at Sedan, in France, about the year 1579, and became profeſſor of divinity, and of the oriental languages, in the univerſity of Saumur. He was the author of ſeveral learned works, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the controverſy he had with the younger Buxtorf, concerning the antiquity of the Hebrew points, in which he proved that they were not known to the Jews before their diſperſion from Jeruſalem, but were invented by the Maſoreth Jews of Tiberias, about ſix hundred years after Chriſt. He alſo wrote Critica Sacra, which is a collection of various readings and errors, crept into the copies of the Bible through the fault of the tranſcribers, a work that took him up ſix and thirty years. He died at Saumur in 1658, at near eighty years of age.

CAPET. See HUGH CAPET.

CAPILUPI (CAMILLUS) a native of Mantua, lived in the ſixteenth century, and wrote a book entitled The Stratagem, in which he relates not only what was perpetrated at Paris during the maſſacre on St. Bartholemew's day, but alſo the artful preparations which preceded that horrid maſſacre.

CAPILUPI (LELIO) of Mantua, the brother of the former, was a celebrated poet in the ſixteenth century. He acquired great reputation by his centos of Virgil, in which he applies the expreſſions of that great poet to the affairs of his time.

He ought not to be confounded with his brothers Hyppolites and Julius Capilupi, who were alſo Latin poets.

CAPISTRAN (JOHN) a Franciſcan friar, lived in the fifteenth century. He was born in the village of Capiſtran, in Italy, anno 1383, and acquired prodigious reputation by by his fiery zeal and eloquence. He was ſent into Bohemia to convert the Huſſites, and into Hungary and Poland to preach up a cruſade againſt the Turks. He cruelly cauſed a great number of Jews to be burnt in all parts of Sileſia, upon pretence of their behaving irreverently towards the conſecrated bread. He died in 1456, and was canonized in October, 1690, by pope Alexander VIII. He wrote a work on the Power of the Pope and Council, another on the Pains of Hell and Purgatory, and another againſt the Huſſites.

CAPISUCCHI (Blasius) marquis of Monterio, and general of the pope's forces at Avignon, about the end of the ſixteenth century, was famous for his courage and ſkill in military affairs. He performed a remarkable action at the ſiege of Poitiers, in 1569. For the proteſtants, who had laid ſiege to that city, having thrown a bridge over the river in order to make an aſſault, he, with two other good ſwimmers, plunged into the water, and getting under the bridge, cut in ſunder the ropes that faſtened the pieces of it together, on which the bridge ſoon fell into the river. He afterwards ſerved under the duke of Parma, and was general of the pope's army at Avignon and the Venaſſin.

Capisucci (Camillo) marquis of Puy-Catin, and a famous warrior in the ſixteenth century, was brother to the former. He gave ſeveral proofs of his valour at the famous battle of Lepanto, ſignalized himſelf in the wars of the Low Countries, and, after ſeveral campaigns in that inſtructive ſchool, was raiſed to the command of the pope's forces, and gained great reputation in Hungary, where he died in Nov. 1597, in the ſixtieth year of his age. He underſtood the mathematics and fortification, and wrote a book De Officio Præfecti Caſtrorum, which his heirs have ſtill in manuſcript.

Capisucchi (Paul) became famous in the ſixteenth century, for the ſeveral employments he enjoyed, and the negociations he performed. He was canon of the Vatican, referendary of both ſignatures, auditor of the rota, biſhop of Neocaſtro, vicar-general of Clement VII. and of Paul III. prefect of the ſignature of grants, and vice-legate of Umbria. He publiſhed ſeveral very uſeful conſtitutions concerning the troubles of Perugia and Avignon, in the government of which he was vice-legate. He died at Rome in 1539.

Capisucchi (Raymond) raiſed to the purple by pope Innocent XI. September 1, 1681, was ſon to the former. At fourteen years old he entered among the Dominicans, and afterwards taught philoſophy publicly at Rome. Innocent X. appointed him ſecretary to the congregation of the index, and ſoon after to the examination of biſhops; and in 1654 created him maſter of the ſacred palace. He wrote, 1. Controverſiæ theologicæ ſcholaſticæ, morales, dogmaticæ, ſcripturales, ad Mentem Divi Thomæ Aquinatis reſolutæ. 2. Appendices ad Controverſias ſupradictas. 3. Vita beati Joannis Chiſii, &c.

CAPITANATA, one of the twelve provinces of the kingdom of Naples. It is bounded on the north by the gulph of Venice, on the eaſt by the Terra-di-Bari, on the ſouth by the Baſilicata, and by the Farther Principato, on the eaſt by the territory of Moliſſa, and a ſmall part of the Ulterior Abruzzo. It is about fifty-three miles in length, and as much where it is broadeſt. The country is generally level and ſandy. There are no trees, and the air is very hot. However, there is ſome good paſture-land near the rivers. The principal towns are Manfredonia, and Monte St. Angelo, which are an united archbiſhoprick. Troja, Aſcoli, Lucera, Veſta, Bovino, and St. Seviero are biſhopricks.

CAPITOL, in antiquity, a caſtle on Mons Capitolinus, at Rome, where there was a temple dedicated to Jupiter, in which the ſenate anciently aſſembled. The capitol conſiſted of three parts, a nave ſacred to Jupiter, and two wings, the one conſecrated to Juno, and the other to Minerva. The front was adorned with three rows of columns, the other ſides with two, and the aſcent from the ground was by an hundred ſteps; the frontiſpiece and ſides were ſurrounded with galleries, in which thoſe who were honoured with triumphs entertained the ſenate at a magnificent banquet, after the ſacrifices had been offered to the gods. Both the inſide and out were adorned with ornaments of prodigious value. In the capitol were alſo a temple to Jupiter the Guardian, another to Juno, and the mint. On the deſcent of the hill was the temple of Concord. This beautiful edifice alſo contained the moſt ſacred depoſits of religion, ſuch as the books of the Sybils, the Ancylia, &c.

CAPITOLINE Games, in Roman antiquity, annual games inſtituted by Camillus, in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus, and in remembrance of the capitol's not being ſurpriſed by the Gauls. Plutarch obſerves, that a part of the ceremony conſiſted in the public cryer's putting up the Hetrurians to ſale by auction, and in taking an old man, with a golden bulla tied about his neck, and expoſing him to the public deriſion.

There was another ſort of capitoline games, inſtituted by Domitian, in which profeſſors of all ſorts had a public contention, and rewards and crowns were beſtowed on thoſe poets, champions, orators, hiſtorians, and muſicians, who were victorious. Theſe laſt capitoline games were celebrated every five years, and became ſo famous, that inſtead of calculating time by luſtra, they began, in imitation of the Greeks, to count by capitoline games; but this cuſtom was not of long continuance.

CAPITOLINUS (Cornelius and Julius) two Latin hiſtorians in the third century.

CAPNOMANCY, καπνομαντεία, a kind of divination by the ſmoke of ſacrifices, in which it was obſerved what windings and turnings it made, how high it aſcended, and whether in a direct or oblique line, or in wreaths; alſo how it ſmelled, whether of the fleſh that was burning, or any thing elſe.

CAPO d' Istria, a conſiderable town of Italy, on the gulph of Trieſte, with a biſhop's ſee. The Venetians took it by aſſault in 932. The Genoeſe got poſſeſſion of it in 1380, but the Venetians retook it afterwards in 1478; ſince which it has continued in their hands. The air is temperate and healthy, and its chief revenue conſiſts in wine and ſalt. It is eight miles ſouth of Trieſte, and twenty-five north-weſt of Piſino. Long. 14. 0. E. Lat. 45. 48. N.

CAPPEL (Lewis) a learned proteſtant miniſter, and profeſſor of Hebrew at Saumur, was born on the 14th of October, 1585, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his critical learning and excellent works, the principal of which are, 1. Arcanum Punctuationis revelatum, in which he proves the novelty of the Hebrew points and accents, againſt the two Buxtorfs. 2. Critica ſacra. 3. Commentaries on the Old Teſtament, printed at Amſterdam, with the Defence of the Arcanum. In all his works he diſcovers great judgment and profound learning. He died at Saumur on the 16th of June, 1658.

CAPPERONNIER (Claudius) licentiate of the Sorbonne, and profeſſor of the Greek tongue in the royal college at Paris, was born at Montdidier, in Picardy, in 1671, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by publiſhing an edition of Quintilian, in folio, and writing ſeveral other works, moſt of which are ſtill in manuſcript. He died at Paris on the 24th of July, 1744.

CAPREOLUS (John) a Dominican monk, one of the moſt zealous defenders of St. Thomas of Aquinas, lived in the fifteenth century, and wrote Commentaries on the Maſter of the Sentences, and a Defence of Thomas of Aquinas.

Capreolus (Elias) an excellent civilian and learned hiſtorian, born in Breſcia, in Italy, wrote an Hiſtory of Breſcia, and other works, and died in 1519.

CAPRI, a city and an iſland, ſeated at the entrance of the gulph of Naples, three miles from the Continent, and twenty miles ſouth of the city of Naples. The iſland is four miles long, and two broad. At the weſt end there is a vaſt high rock, inacceſſible by ſea, on which is the town of Capri. This rock is covered with a fruitful ſoil, producing corn, and all manner of delicious fruits. This place was the retirement of the emperor Auguſtus, and the reſidence of Tiberius, where great works were cut out under the rock, with magnificent buildings on the ſurface, which are now all deſtroyed. The city is a biſhop's ſee. Long. 14. 48. E. Lat. 40. 35. N.

CAPRIATA (Peter John) a civilian and hiſtorian, was born at Genoa, and lived in the ſeventeenth century. He wrote, in Italian, the Hiſtory of the Wars of Italy, an Engliſh tranſlation of which was printed in London in 1663.

CAPUA, a famous city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, in the territory of Lavoro, with an archbiſhop's ſee. The ancient Capua, out of the ruins of which this was built, about two miles diſtant from it, was a celebrated city, of which there ſtill remains ſome monuments of its ancient ſplendor, ſuch as part of a magnificent church, the ruins of a theatre, of ſuperb temples, gates, porticoes, columns, ſubterranean vaults, and beautiful reſervoirs. This city was demoliſhed either by the Vandals or Lombards, and moſt of its fineſt ornaments were carried away to embelliſh New Capua, which, however, falls much ſhort of the beauty and grandeur of the former. It is called Capua the Amorous, and is ſeated on the banks of the river Volurna. It has nothing very remarkable but its fortifications, which in 1718 were built in the modern faſhion. The Spaniards took it in 1734, with the loſs of a great many men, before they could oblige general Traun, who was the commander, to capitulate. It is ſixteen miles north of Naples, twenty-five weſt of Benevento, and ninety-five ſouth-eaſt of Rome. Long. 15. 7. E. Lat. 41. 7. N.

CAPYCIUS (Scipio) a celebrated Latin poet in the ſixteenth century, was born at Naples, of a noble family, and acquired great reputation by his works, and eſpecially by his Poem on the Principles of Things, in which he ſtrives to imitate Lucretius.

CAR, or CARR, (ROBERT) earl of Somerſet, was the ſon of Mr. Carr, of Farnherſt in Scotland, and was born near Edinburgh. He was page to king James I. before his acceſſion to the throne of England; and was, at his coronation, made knight of the Bath; therefore the ſtory told by ſome of our hiſtorians of his introduction to the king at a tilting, about eight years after, is void of foundation. He made ſuch a rapid progreſs in the king's favour, that in 1609 he obtained a grant of the eſtate of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, upon the diſcovery of a flaw in that gentleman's conveyance of it to his ſon. In the next year he was advanced to the poſt of lord treaſurer of Scotland; and in 1611 was created viſcount Rocheſter, and inſtalled knight of the Garter, at the ſame time with the duke of York and the earl of Arundel. After the death of the earl of Saliſbury, lord treaſurer, in 1612, he had the cuſtody of the ſignets, as he had before during the earl's ſickneſs, and often during his abſence; and the diſpatches from all parts were addreſſed to him. The death of that amiable prince, Henry prince of Wales, on the 6th of November, in the ſame year, was an event ſo favourable to the authority of a favourite, that he could ſcarce diſguiſe his joy, which expoſed him to the moſt odious imputations of having occaſioned it. But however innocent he might be of that, he was unqueſtionably concerned in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, who had many years been his great confidant, and to whom he chiefly owed, as that gentleman affirmed, in an expoſtulatory letter to him during his impriſonment, his fortune, underſtanding, and reputation. In return, the viſcount had procured for him the honour of knighthood, and the reverſion of the office of treaſurer of the chamber. This murder was attended with many aggravating circumſtances of treachery and baſeneſs, for the particulars of which ſee the article OVERBURY.

The cauſe of Sir Thomas's death was concealed for a conſiderable time, and his lordſhip was ſo little ſuſpected of it, that on November 4, 1613, he was created earl of Somerſet, and baron of Brancepeth. On the 26th of December was celebrated, with extraordinary pomp and feſtivity, his marriage with the lady Frances Howard, who had been divorced from the earl of Eſſex. In 1614 he was advanced to the poſt of lord chamberlain; but in April 1615 he began to be ſupplanted by ſir George Villiers in the favour of the king, on account of the many inſtances he gave of his inſolence, and his ruin began to be completed in October following, by the diſcovery of the murder of ſir Thomas Overbury, which was communicated to his majeſty at Bewly, the ſeat of the earl of Southampton. On the 18th of that month he was committed to the cuſtody of the dean of Weſtminſter, and on the 2d of November ſent to the Tower; but was not brought to his trial till the 25th of May, 1616, when he was condemned, as his counteſs had been the day before, when ſhe pleaded guilty. But as the management both before and after the trial was of a very extraordinary kind, and reflected ſome diſgrace on the king, their ſentence was not executed; for the counteſs's pardon was ſealed in leſs than two months after, though the earl was confined in the Tower, till the 6th of January, 1621-2, when he obtained his liberty, on condition of his reſiding at viſcount Wallingford's, or in that neighbourhood.

By his counteſs, who died on the 23d of Auguſt, 1632, he had one daughter, named Anne, born in the Tower on the 9th of December, 1615, a lady of the moſt amiable qualities both of body and mind, who was married in 1637 to William lord Ruſſel, eldeſt ſon to Francis earl of Bedford; though that earl was very averſe to his ſon's marrying into that family, and though the earl of Somerſet's circumſtances were ſo reduced, that he was obliged to ſell his houſe and furniture at Chiſwick, to raiſe twelve thouſand pounds for his daughter's fortune. He died in July, 1645, and was interred in the church of St. Paul, Covent-Garden. The rev. Mr. Granger mentioning this nobleman in his Biographical Hiſtory, ſays, that he had the prudence to ſhew a due regard to the Engliſh, without ſlighting his own countrymen. That his talents were neither ſhining nor mean, and that he was habitually a courtier and a ſtateſman.

CARACALLA (MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS) emperor of Rome, was born at Lyons, on the 4th of April, 188, and ſucceeded his father, Septimus Severus, on the 4th of February, 211, when he was proclaimed emperor near Vinci. On his arrival at Rome he put to death the phyſicians for not haſtening his father's death, killed his brother Geta in his mother's arms, and cauſed the great lawyer Papinianus to be put to death, for refuſing either to excuſe or defend his parricide. He at length went into the Eaſt, and filled Alexandria with blood and ſlaughter, ſhamefully deceived his allies, and treated his ſubjects with inhumanity, and cruelty; but his crimes did not go unpuniſhed; for being become the deteſtation of the public, he was aſſaſſinated on the 8th of April, 217, by order of Macrinus his ſucceſſor. He took the name of Caracalla from a kind of garment he brought from Gaul. Though he performed none but the moſt infamous actions, he took the names of Germanicus, Parthicus, and Arabicus; upon which Helvius Pertinax, the ſon of the emperor of that name, ſaid, that he ought alſo to add that of Geticus; but this ſpeech coſt him his life. In ſhort, Caracalla was full of craft and diſſimulation, vicious, and addicted to women, and ſo cruel, that above twenty thouſand innocent perſons were maſſacred by his order, which rendered him the reproach and deteſtation of mankind.

CARACCIOLI (JOHN) though born a gentleman, was obliged to turn writer in his youth, on account of the unhappineſs of his circumſtances; but having the fortune to pleaſe Jane II. queen of Naples, and he yielding to her deſires, ſhe raiſed him to the higheſt poſts, and at length made him ſeneſchal of Naples; but afterwards engaging in ſome ſecret practiſes againſt the ſtate, the queen allured him into her preſence, and then cauſed him to be put to death, in Auguſt 1432.

CARACCIOLI (JOHN ANTHONY) ſon to John Caraccioli, prince of Melphi, and marſhal of France, was biſhop of Troies in the ſixteenth century, and publicly turned Proteſtant in the year 1561, on which he was driven from his dioceſe, and died at Chateauneauf on the Loire, in 1569.

CARACOAS, otherwiſe called ST. JOHN DE LEON, a conſiderable town of America, in Terra Firma, in the province of Venezuela, and in the territory of Caracoas. It is ſeated in a plain abounding with cattle and cacao-trees, which produces the nuts of which chocolate is made. It was pillaged by the French in 1679. Long. 67. 8. W. Lat. 9. 40. N.

CARACTACUS, a Britiſh king, who reigned jointly with his brother Tododumnus, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and prudence, in defending the weſtern borders of Shropſhire againſt the Roman forces in this kingdom; but was at laſt, after an obſtinate battle, defeated by Oſtorius the Roman general, and himſelf, his wife and daughter taken priſoners, when he eſcaping to Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, was betrayed by that princeſs; and together with his family was lead in triumph to Rome; where, being all brought before the emperor, he diſcovered ſuch manly reſolution, and made ſo noble a ſpeech, that the emperor, ſtruck with his magnanimity, freely granted him and his family a pardon.

CARAMANIA, a conſiderable province of Turky, in Aſia, in the ſouth part of Natolia: there are here contrivances to render the rooms airy; theſe are funnels which come out of the room through the roofs of the houſes; however, they take care to cloſe them up in winter. Bajazet united this province to his empire about the year 1488, and ſince that time it has continued in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. Satalia was the capital city, but it is now much decayed.

CARAMANTA, a town of South America, and capital of a province of the ſame name in Terra Firma, and in the audience of Santa Fe. Long. 72. 35. W. Lat. 5. 18. N. The province of Caramanta is extended on both ſides the river Cauca, and is bounded on the north by the diſtrict of Carthagena, on the eaſt by New Granada, on the ſouth by Popayan, and on the weſt by Popayan, and by the audience of Panama. It is a valley ſurrounded on every ſide by very high mountains.

CARAMUEL DE LOBKOWITZ (JOHN) a famous caſuiſt, was born at Madrid in 1606. He took the habit of a Ciſtercian monk, was abbot of Melroſe, then of Diſſemburg, ſuffragan of Mentz, and grand vicar of Prague. He at length became a ſoldier, and was made engineer and intendant of the fortifications in Bohemia, and then reſuming the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic, became biſhop of Konigſgratz, then of Campagna, and at laſt of Vigevano, where he died, in 1682. He wrote a great number of works, in which there is much wit, but little judgment and ſolidity.

CARANUS, the firſt king of Macedon, and the ſeventh of the race of the Heraclides. It is ſaid that this prince being deſirous of founding a monarchy, was adviſed by an oracle to eſtabliſh one where he ſhould be conducted by the goats; when following a great herd of them in Macedon, they led him to Edeſſa, wherein he ſurpriſed king Midas, and driving him out of that province, founded his monarchy there, about eight hundred and ninety-four years before the Chriſtian æra. There are uſually reckoned twenty-three kings from his reign to that of Alexander the Great.

CARAVAGGIO (MICHAEL ANGELO DA) a celebrated painter, born at Caravaggio, a village in Milan, in 1569. He was at firſt only a day-labourer; but having ſeen ſome painters at work upon a wall which he helped to raiſe, he was ſo charmed with their art that he applied to the ſtudy of it, and made ſo conſiderable a progreſs in a few years, that he was admired at Rome, Venice, and other parts of Italy, as the author of a new ſtile in painting. Upon his firſt firſt going to Rome, he was compelled by his neceſſities to paint flowers and fruit, under Gioſeppino; but growing tired of that ſubject, and returning to hiſtories, he made uſe of a method quite different from that of Gioſeppino, and followed nature as much too cloſely as the other departed from her, by imitating her defects as well as her beauties. Thus cramping his invention, he underſtood but little either of deſign or decorum in his compoſitions: he had however as good a guſto in colouring as he had a bad one in deſign. His pieces are to be found in moſt of the cabinets of Europe, and there is a picture of his drawing in the Dominican church at Antwerp, which Rubens uſed to call his maſter.

Caravaggio is ſaid to have been as ſingular in his temper as in his guſto of painting; for he was ſo quarrelſome, that his pencil was no ſooner out of his hand, than his ſword was in it. He treated his cotemporaries very contemptuouſly, and particularly uſed to make a jeſt of Gioſeppino. One day, in a diſpute with him, he run a young man through the body, who was endeavouring to reconcile them, which obliged him to fly to the marquis Juſtiniani for protection; that nobleman obtained his pardon from the pope: but he was no ſooner at liberty, than he went to Gioſeppino and challenged him. Upon which, the latter anſwering that he was a knight, and would not draw his ſword upon an inferior; he haſted to Malta, and having performed his vows and exerciſes, received the order of knighthood. He then ſet out for Rome, in order to force Gioſeppino to fight him; but in his return was ſeized with a fever, which put an end to his quarrel and his life, in the year 1609, when he was forty years of age.

CARAVAGGIO (POLIDORO). See POLIDORO DA CARAVAGGIO.

CARAVANSERAS, large ſtructures built in the eaſtern countries for the reception of travellers, where they may lodge gratis. But they muſt provide and dreſs their own proviſions, unleſs in ſome few that are endowed. They are uſually built like a college, but open at one ſide. In Turky and Perſia they are the moſt numerous, and moſt capacious. There are generally piazzas round the ground floor.

CARBO (LEWIS) profeſſor of divinity at Perugia, in the ſixteenth century, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by being the author of ſeveral works on rhetoric, philoſophy, and divinity.

CARCASSONE, an ancient city of France, in Lower Languedoc, with a biſhop's ſee. It is divided into the upper and lower town. They are both ſurrounded with walls, and though their ſituations are different, they are both watered by the river Aude. The upper town is ſeated on a hill, with a caſtle that commands it, as well as the lower town. It appears to be ſtrong, not only by its ſituation on a craggy rock, but alſo by ſeveral large towers which are joined to its walls, and which render it of difficult acceſs. The cathedral church is remarkable for nothing but its antiquity. That of the lower town has a very high ſteeple. The lower town is large, and built after the modern taſte. The ſtreets are very ſtrait, and lead to a large ſquare in the middle, from whence may be ſeen the four gates in the town. There is here a manufacture of cloth. The neighbouring country is full of olive trees, and in the mountains there is fine marble, commonly called marble of Languedoc. It is thirty miles weſt of Narbonne, forty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Toulouſe, thirty-eight north-eaſt of Foix, and four hundred ſouth of Paris. Long. 2. 25. E. Lat. 43. 11. N.

CARCERES, in the ancient Circenſian games, were incloſures in the circus, in which the horſes were confined till the ſignal given for ſtarting, when, by an admirable contrivance, they all flew open at once.

CARDAN (JEROM) a phyſician, and one of the moſt ſingular geniuſes of his age, was born at Pavia, September 24, 1501. He became a profeſſor in ſeveral univerſities in Italy; had a moſt odd and extravagant turn of mind, and pretended that nature had endowed him with four ſingular qualities, viz. 1. That he was raiſed to extaſy whenever he pleaſed: 2. That he ſaw whatever objects he choſe to ſee: 3. That he beheld in dreams all that was to befal him; and 4. That he knew it alſo by certain marks or ſpecks which aroſe upon his nails. He has been blamed for being ſo preſumptuous as to calculate the nativity of Chriſt. Some affirm, that Cardan having foretold the time of his own death, abſtained from food, that his continuing to live might not diſcredit the art he profeſſed. He wrote a great many books, but they are filled with digreſſions and obſcurity, and with many ingenious, as well as fabulous and whimſical things. His works were printed in 1663, in ten volumes in folio. He died in 1576.

CARDIFF, a town of Glamorganſhire, in South Wales, ſeated on the river Tave, in a rich and fruitful ſoil. It is a large compact well-built town, having a caſtle, a wall, and four gates, built by Robert Fitz Hamon, a Norman, about the year 1100. It is governed by the conſtable of the caſtle, twelve aldermen, twelve burgeſſes, &c. and ſends one member to parliament. Here the aſſizes and ſeſſions are held, beſides ſeveral courts. It carries on a good trade to Briſtol, and has two weekly markets, on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, and three fairs, on June 29, September 8, and November 30, for cattle. There is a handſome bridge over the river, to which ſmall veſſels come to take in their lading. It has now only one church, St. Mary's having been long ſince thrown down by the undermining of the river. The caſtle, though much decayed, makes a grand appearance, even at this time, and the walls of the town are very ſtrong and thick. The church has a fine tower-ſteeple, and the town-hall is a good ſtructure. The magiſtrates are elected every year by the majority of the burgeſſes. It is thirty-eight miles ſouth-by-weſt of Brecknock, one hundred and forty-five in the ſame point from Cheſter, ſixty-one weſt-by-north of Glouceſter, thirty-ſix on the ſame point from Monmouth, and one hundred and ſixty-five weſt by-north of London. Long. 3. 20. W. Lat. 51. 30. N.

CARDIGAN, the capital town of Cardiganſhire, in South Wales, is ſeated near the mouth of the river Teivy, on the Iriſh channel. It is indifferently large and well built, containing three wards, one church, and the county goal. It is governed by a mayor, thirteen aldermen, thirteen common-council-men, &c. Here are the ruins of a caſtle which was built by Gilbert de Clare, about the year 1160. It is placed on a ſteep bank of the river Teivy. Here was alſo a priory of black monks, ſubordinate to the abbey of Chertſey. It ſends one member to parliament, and has two markets held on Tueſdays and Saturdays. Its fairs are February 13, and April 5, for ſmall horſes and pedlars ware. On September 8, and December 19, for ſmall horſes, pedlars ware, and cattle. It is thirty-three miles north-eaſt-by-eaſt of St. David's, twenty-ſix ſouth-weſt-by-ſouth of Carmarthen, and two hundred and twenty-ſix weſt-north-weſt of London. Long. 4. 38. W. Lat. 52. 15. N.

CARDIGANSHIRE, a county in South Wales, bounded on the north by Merionethſhire and Montgomeryſhire, on the eaſt by Radnorſhire and Brecknockſhire, on the weſt by the Iriſh Sea, and on the ſouth by Caermarthenſhire. Its length from north-weſt to ſouth-eaſt is about forty-four miles, and its breadth near twenty. The air, as in other parts of Wales, varies with the ſoil, which in the ſouthern and weſtern parts is more upon a level than this principality generally is, which renders the air mild and temperate. But as the northern and eaſtern parts are mountainous, they are conſequently more barren and black. However, there are cattle bred in all parts; but they have neither wood nor coals of their own for fuel; they have rich lead mines and fiſh in plenty, with fowls both tame and wild.

The principal rivers are the Teivy, the Ridol, and the Iſtwith.

This county has five market towns, viz. Cardigan, Aberiſtwith, Llanbadarnvawn, Llanbedar, and Tregaron; with ſeventy-ſeven pariſhes, and was formerly computed to have three thouſand one hundred and ſixty-three houſes, and five hundred and twenty thouſand acres of land. It ſends two members to parliament, one for the county, and one for Cardigan.

CARDINAL (PETER) a Provençal poet, of the fourteenth century, was born of poor parents, though they took ſuch care of his ſtudies that he became very learned in all kinds of literature, and particularly ſucceeded in poetry, making verſes in all the living languages. Being ſettled at Tarraſcon, the principal inhabitants of that town were charmed with his wit, and ſettled on him a conſiderable appointment out of the public money, in order for him to inſtruct their children. Under ſo good a maſter they made ſuch progreſs, that Robert, duke of Calabria, paſſing through Tarraſcon, ſtopped to admire ſo excellent an eſtabliſhment; and when he ſet out for Naples with king Charles his father, he obtained, beſides the confirmation of the privileges of that town, an exemption from all taxes for ten years. Cardinal wrote a poem, intitled Las Lauzours de la Dama d'Argenſa.

CARDONNA, a handſome ſtrong town of Spain, in Catalonia, with a good caſtle, and the title of a duchy. It ſtands near an inexhauſtible mountain of ſalt, for it grows again in proportion as it is taken away. It is of various colours, which all diſappear when it is waſhed. The colours may be eaſily accounted for, becauſe they ſeem to be nothing elſe but the different refraction of the ſun-beams. As to its growing again we can ſay nothing, unleſs all the circumſtances attending it had been minutely related, and then perhaps the wonder would have ceaſed. However, it brings in forty thouſand ducats yearly to the duke of Cordona. This mountain is not barren, for it is covered with tall pine-trees, and excellent vineyards. The town is ſeated on an eminence, near the river Cardonero, thirty miles north-eaſt of Taragona, and the ſame diſtance north-weſt from Barcelona. Long. 1. 26. E. Lat. 41. 42. N.

CARDUEL, part of Georgia, a country in Aſia, is bounded by the country of the Dagheſtan Tartars and Zacheti on the eaſt, by Irvan on the ſouth, by Baratry and Imeretta on the weſt, and by Circaſſia on the north. It is ſubject to the Perſians, and Teflis is the capital. This diviſion of Georgia or Gurgiſtan is only to be met with in ſome authors.

CAREK, an iſland of Aſia, in the Perſian gulph, about ten miles in circumference, and near one hundred and twenty-five miles ſouth of Baſra.

CARELIA, a province of Finland, lying all along the eaſtern ſide of the gulph of the ſame name. That part of this country which formerly belonged to Sweden was given by treaty to Ruſſia, in 1743. Frederickſham was a ſtrong place in this province; but when the Ruſſians were coming to beſiege it, in 1742, it was burnt and abandoned by the Swedes. Wiburg is now the capital.

CARELSCROON, or CARLS-CRON, a port town of Bleking, in the province of Gothland, in Sweden. It was built in 1679, by admiral Hans Brachemeiſter, and has the beſt harbour in all that kingdom, becauſe it thaws ſooneſt at this place, and becauſe the neceſſary materials for building of ſhips are cheaper here than elſewhere. Near the port is a cavity cut in a rock eighty feet deep, where they refit their men of war. The entrance into the harbour is defended by two forts, which are ſeated in the water, and furniſhed with good artillery. It is the place of reſidence of the captain-general of this country. Long. 15. 2. E. Lat. 56. 20. N.

CARENTAN, a town of France, in Lower Normandy, ſeated about eight miles from the ſea, and conſiſts but of one pariſh. Its old caſtle was ſaid to be built in the time of Julius Cæſar. It is twenty miles north eaſt of Coutances, and twenty miles weſt of Bayeux. Long. 1. 14. W. Lat. 49. 20. N.

CAREW (Sir JOHN) knight, baron of Carew and Mulleſford, was born at Mohuns-Ottery. He was a great ſoldier, and ſerved king Edward III. with diſtinguiſhed bravery in his wars in France. In 1348 he was appointed lord deputy of Ireland, and after having continued in that honourable poſt about two years, returned to England. He died May 16, 1363.

CAREW (Sir THOMAS) the ſecond ſon of the former, was alſo a brave commander. He had the charge of the navy, and the command of three thouſand Engliſh ſoldiers, for the ſecurity of the emperor Sigiſmund, during his abode in England. In the beginning of the reign of king Henry V. he ſerved that heroic prince in his wars in France, and was at the glorious battle of Agincourt. In 1418 he kept and defended the paſſage over the Seine, and was made captain of Harfleur. He died January 25, 1430-1.

CAREW (THOMAS) a gentleman diſtinguiſhed by his martial ſpirit, attended Thomas, earl of Surry, in his expedition againſt Scotland, and was at the battle of Floddonfield, fought September 9, 1513, on which the Scots were defeated, and king James IV. ſlain. Before this battle, a Scottiſh knight having made a challenge to any Engliſh gentleman to fight with him for the honour of his country, Mr. Carew deſired to anſwer the challenge, and conquered his adverſary, which brought him into great favour with his general, the earl of Surry. But after the battle he had another opportunity of advancing in his eſteem and affection. For his lordſhip, taking Mr. Carew along with him, as he rode out upon ſervice, deſcried a party of Scots coming towards them, and having a very ſtrait paſſage over a bridge to croſs, was in great danger of being taken. To prevent which, Carew perſuaded him to exchange armour with him, in order that he might the more eaſily make his eſcape. To this the earl readily conſented; and the enemy coming up to this narrow paſs, Mr. Carew, in his rich armour and well mounted, croſſed the bridge, and for a while ſo valiantly defended it, that none being able to paſs over, the general had time to provide for his eſcape. Mr. Carew, however, was at laſt taken priſoner, to the great joy of the enemy, who imagined they had taken the general himſelf; but finding themſelves diſappointed, they carried him to the caſtle of Dunbar, where he remained a priſoner for ſome time. At length he was redeemed, and the earl of Surry never forgat the noble ſervice he had done him; but on all occaſions ſhewed himſelf his friend, and even made him his vice-admiral.

CAREW (GEORGE) afterwards earl of Totneſs, was born in 1557, and educated at Oxford, but being of an active ſpirit, on his leaving the univerſity, he went and ſerved in Ireland againſt the earl of Deſmond. In 1580 he was made governor of Aſketon caſtle. He was one of the commanders in the expedition to Cadiz in 1596, and in 1599 was appointed preſident of Munſter, and the next year treaſurer of the army, and one of the lords juſtices of Ireland. In theſe offices he behaved with the greateſt conduct and intrepidity, and, with a very ſmall force, reduced to the queen's obedience many caſtles and forts, took ſeveral of the principal rebels priſoners, and brought others to lay down their arms. In 1605 he was advanced to the degree of a baron, and on king Charles I.'s acceſſion to the crown, was, on February 1, 1625, created earl of Totneſs. He died in London, March 27, 1629, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age. He was a patron of learning, and wrote, Pacata Hibernia, or the Hiſtory of the Wars in Ireland, in 1599, 1600, 1601, and 1602, which was, after his death, printed in folio at London. Others of his collections relating to Ireland are in four volumes, folio, in the Bodleian library at Oxford.

CAREW (ſir ALEXANDER) beheaded for endeavouring to deliver Plymouth to king Charles I. was born at Anthony, in Cornwall, and was one of the knights choſen for that county, in the parliament which met November 3, 1640, when he ſided with thoſe members who oppoſed the court meaſures, and was one of the moſt violent amongſt them; but the king's forces having taken Briſtol, and laid ſiege to Exeter, ſir Alexander, who was entruſted by the parliament with St. Nicholas's iſland and fort, which commanded the harbour of Plymouth, and were looked upon as the ſecurity of that town, made an overture to his majeſty, on condition of a full pardon, to deliver them up; but this treaty being diſcovered to the mayor of Plymouth, he was, without reſiſtance, ſeized in his fort, ſent by ſea to London, tried, and found guilty, by a court-martial held at Guildhall, and beheaded on Tower-hill, Dec. 23, 1644.

CAREW (THOMAS) an eminent poet of the laſt century, was of the family of the Carews, in Glouceſterſhire. He was educated as Oxford, after which he travelled, and on his return was made gentleman of the privy-chamber, and ſewer in ordinary to king Charles I. who admired him as one of the moſt celebrated wits of his court. He was much eſteemed by the poets of his time, particularly by Ben Jonſon and ſir William Davenant. He died in the prime of his life, about the year 1639, leaving behind him ſeveral poems, and a maſque, intitled, Cœlum Britannicum.

CARIATI, a town of Naples, in Calabria Citerior, with a biſhop's ſee. It is twenty-five miles north of St. Severino, twenty-three ſouth of Roſſano, and thirty-eight north-eaſt of Coſſenza. Long. 17. 19. E. Lat. 39. 38. N.

CARIBBEE ISLANDS. Theſe are ſeated in the Atlantic Ocean, in America, and are thirty in number, the chief of which are, 1. Santa Cruz, not inhabited. 2. Anagada, not inhabited. 3. Sombrero, not inhabited. 4. Anguilla, Engliſh. 5. St. Martin, Engliſh and Dutch. 6. St. Bartholomew, Engliſh. 7. Barbuda, Engliſh. 8. Saba, Dutch 9. Euſtatia, Dutch. 10. St. Chriſtopher's, or St. Kitt's, Engliſh. 11. Nevis, Engliſh. 12. Antigua, Engliſh. 13. Montſerrat, Engliſh. 14. Guadaloupe, French. 15. Mariga'ante, French. 16. Dominica, Engliſh. 17. Martinico, French. 18. St. Vincent, Engliſh. 19. Barbadoes, Engliſh. 20. Granada, Engliſh. 21. St. Lucia, French; and, 22, Tobago, Engliſh. Tho' all theſe will be partcularly mentioned under diſtinct heads, yet we cannot chooſe a more proper place to give an account of the original inhabitants, the Caribbees.

Theſe people, about an hundred years ago, went entirely naked, but lately they have been perſuaded to cover their private parts with ſquare bits of cloth, faſtened round their waiſt with a cotton ſtrings, but in ſo careleſs a manner, that it ſeldom anſwers the purpoſe for which it is deſigned, particularly in the men. They are all upon an equality, for they have no ſuperior among them, nor is one more rich than another. The time of eating and drinking is only when they are hungry and thirſty, at leaſt before they were debauched by the ſpirituous liquors of the Europeans. They ſleep and work when they pleaſe, and in a literal ſenſe take no thought for to-morrow; that is, they neither fiſh nor hunt, but only to ſatisfy their preſent occaſions; and ſometimes they had rather be without their game, than take too much pains in obtaining it. Their ſhape, colour, and features are the ſame as the reſt of the Americans; that is, their hair is black, their ſkins red, and they have no beards nor hair on any other part of their bodies. Some have ſaid that the colour of theſe people is not natural; but this is contrary to experience, becauſe thoſe that have been clothed from their infancy preſerve the ſame complexion, only are of a brighter red. They are ſtrait limbed, well made, and ſtrong, without a crooked or deformed perſon among them. Even in old age they walk erect, contrary to what is frequently ſeen among us. Some have flat foreheads and noſes, but they ſay that is the effect of art.

Their underſtanding is as good as can be expected in thoſe that have not the leaſt tincture of letters. They are very penſive, their aſpect is always ſad and melancholy, and they paſs the greateſt part of the day ſitting in one poſture, with their eyes fixed upon the ground, without ſpeaking a ſingle word. They have no notion of exerciſe, and when they ſee an European walking backwards and forwards in a room, they will laugh very heartily. In general they are mild, good-natured, and compaſſionate, but when injured very revengeful. They generally paint themſelves with a red powder called rocou, mixed with the oil of palma-chriſti, which makes them look like boiled lobſters. However, it ſerves them in the room of clothes, preſerves their ſkins from cracking with the ſcorching beams of the ſun, and prevents their being ſtung by the muſkitoes, and other flies. When they go to war or to a feaſt, the women daub their faces with ſtreaks of black, with muſtachoes on the upper lip, which laſt is probably in imitation of the Spaniards, who firſt diſcovered theſe iſlands.

With regard to religion, they have a confuſed notion of a ſupreme God; but they generally believe there are two ſorts of gods, one good, and the other bad, and that they both have different ſexes, and conſequently increaſe and multiply. They alſo believe them to have been men formerly, like themſelves. They imagine theſe gods can promote the increaſe of their manioc, heal their diſeaſes, and render them ſucceſsful in war, that they raiſe hurricanes, and can deſtroy whom they pleaſe. Some of the ſavages are called boyez, which are a ſort of prieſts. Each of theſe boyez is ſaid to have a god, with whom he converſes very familiarly, and by whoſe aſſiſtance he performs a great many miraculous conjurations. But we ſhall relate none of theſe fables, which have been related either through deſign or ignorance. That the moſt barbarous people ſhould have their impoſtors is no wonder, but that men of common underſtanding ſhould relate their deceptions as ſo many ſacred truths, is a ſtrong inſtance either of the credulity or diſhoneſty of travellers.

The women, as in all hot countries, have very eaſy labours, and are ſeldom confined a day on that account. While the children are at the breaſt, the firſt things they give them as food are potatoes and banana. At three or four months they will creep on all four about the hut, and when they have ſtrength enough, they will riſe on their feet on their own accord, without ever being led about by their mothers, or in any manner being inſtructed how to walk. They fall often, it is true, but then it is always on their hands or backſide. When the mothers travel, they always carry the infants on their backs, faſtened on with a cotton cloth. When the children grow up, the girls ſtay with the mother, and the boys attend the father. And yet whatever may be their inward ſentiments, they afterwards pay no outward reſpect either to father or mother, probably for want of being better inſtructed. It is no wonder they ſhould not have the leaſt ſenſe of their nakedneſs, when they ſee none of their own country with clothes, or that they ſhould be guilty of many indecencies, while they have an unciviliſed education. All they are taught to do is to fiſh, hunt, ſwim, ſhoot with a bow and arrow, to make little baſkets, and cotton hammocks.

They are altogether ſtrangers to courtſhip, for when a young man wants a wife, he applies to the father without any regard to nearneſs of blood; for if you will believe Pere du Tertre, fathers take their daughters, and ſons their mother. However, it is well, he tells us, this happens very ſeldom. It is not ſo great a wonder to ſee the ſame man take too ſiſters, or even the mother and daughter, which he affirms is very common. The man generally goes to live with his father-in-law, unleſs he is a captain, and then he takes his wife home. Polygamy is common among them, inſomuch that they have almoſt all ſeveral wives, ſometimes ſix or ſeven a-piece. Every wife has a diſtinct hut, and the man will go and live with one a moon or month, and with another another. This being the caſe, it is no wonder that he chops and changes his wives whenever he pleaſes.

Their occupation or buſineſs is not very great, being rather diverſion than labour. In the morning they run to a river and waſh themſelves, then they light a fire in their huts, and ſit all round it, and talk or play on a ſort of pipe, till the women have prepared the breakfaſt. After this they go a fiſhing, which is performed in different manners. But the moſt common way is with a hook and line, and in the rivers they ſometimes intoxicate fiſh with the juice of certain herbs, and then take them with their hands. Some cut wood, others make ſieves, and others again make cotton lines, bows, and arrows. But the moſt diligent are employed in hollowing the trunks of trees for canoes; however, they ſeldom ſpend above an hour in a day at any of theſe employments. Notwithſtanding which, they will not ſuffer the poor women to be idle; for what with managing houſhold affairs, cultivating the gardens, and painting their huſbands, they have always enough to do.

The caribbees are very foul feeders, that is, they never mind how dirty or naſty their proviſions are. Their bread, called caſſavy, is made of the root of manioc, which is in general uſe in ſome of thoſe iſlands, and is their moſt common food. Beſides this, they live upon ſhell fiſh, crabs, ſoldier fiſh, tortoiſes, or turtles, and ſeveral ſorts of river and ſea fiſh. So far are they from being cannibals or men-eaters, as has been falſely repreſented, that they eat little or no fleſh, except that of birds. They never uſe milk, cheeſe, or butter, nor will they eat eggs or oil. They ſeaſon their diſhes with pimento or Jamaica pepper, but never put ſalt in any thing. The men and boys go to dinner firſt, for the women and girls always ſtay till they have done. While they are at their meals, all comers are welcome, for in this caſe they ſeem to have no manner of property.

Their huts or cabbins are only ground floors, divided into two or three rooms, whereof one ſerves to lodge in, another to eat in, and the third to receive ſtrangers. Some have a diſtinct room, where they put their bows, arrows, knives, hatchets, ſciſſars, baſkets, beads, and other trinkets. Their kitchen furniture conſiſts in earthen bowls, callabaſhes, and the like, with a four-legged ſtool to place their proviſions upon.

Inſtead of beds they have cotton hammocks. Theſe they carry along with them wherever they go. Their wives are ſometimes a whole year in making one of theſe. When they go to ſleep, they faſten the ends of theſe between two trees, or to the forks of a hut, letting them belly out a little, but not too much. When any perſon dies, he is painted, combed, and oiled, in the ſame manner as when alive, then they dig a round hole in the hut, and in it place the deceaſed, in the ſame poſture as that in which they all ſit; that is, with their backſides on their heels, their elbows on their knees, and the palms of their hands againſt their cheeks. After he has been viſited by all his acquaintance, they cover him up.

Since theſe iſlands have been peopled with colonies from Europe, the moſt common and uſeful herbs, plants, and pulſe have been propagated among them; and they have been ſtocked with ſeveral neceſſary animals, unknown there before.

CARIBIANA, is a country which lies on the north-eaſt coaſt of Terra Firma, in South America, ſince called Paria and Andaluſia. The inhabitants were called Caribbees, or men-eaters, on a ſuppoſition that they devoured human fleſh, but this has been found to be a miſtake.

CARIGNAN, a town in Piedmont, in a territory of the ſame name, which is a very fruitful and an agreeable country, with fine meadow ground. The French took it in 1544, after the battle of Ceriſoles, and levelled the fortifications, only they ſpared the caſtle. It was likewiſe taken and retaken in 1691. It is ſeated on the river Po, eight miles ſouth of Turin, and fifteen ſouth eaſt of Pignerol. Long. 7. 27. E. Lat. 44. 45. N.

CARINOLA, a town of the kingdom of Naples, in the Terra di Lavoro, with a biſhop's ſee. The air is very unhealthy. It is ſeated near Mount Maſſico, fifteen miles north-weſt of Capua, and twenty-eight north-weſt of Naples. Long. 15. 5. E. Lat. 41. 20. N.

CARINTHIA, a province of Germany, with the title of a duchy, is bounded on the north by Auſtria, on the eaſt by Stiria, on the ſouth by Carniola and Friuli, and on the weſt by Tyrol and the archbiſhoprick of Saltſburg. It is one hundred and forty-five miles in length, and forty-five in breadth. The inhabitants breed a great number of cattle, and ſell many every year to the Venetians, but corn is not very plentiful. However, there are fiſh and veniſon, beſides mines of iron. The Carinthians are of a quiet diſpoſition, and faithful to their prince; but they are little acquainted with arts and ſciences. There are twelve cities in this country, twenty towns, and ſixty thouſand houſes. It is divided into the Upper and Lower, according to their ſituation along the river Drave. Upper Carinthia lies to the weſt, towards the ſource of that river, and the Lower to the eaſt. The principal towns are Clagenfurt, the capital, St. Woit, Gurck, Lavamynd, Wolkmarck, and Villack. This province does not entirely belong to the archduchеſs of Auſtria, for the archbiſhop of Saltſburg poſſeſſes Lavamynd, and the biſhop of Bamberg is maſter of Villack, Pontefella, Wolſberg, and St. Leonhart, which makes a particular territory, over which that biſhop appoints a governor.

CARINUS (MARCUS AURELIUS) the ſon of the emperor Carus, who named him Cæſar in 282, and ſent him into Gaul, where he wallowed in debauchery, and oppoſed Diocleſian; but after ſeveral battles, he was killed in Mœſia by a tribune, whoſe wife he had debauched.

CARISTO, a town of Greece, in the eaſtern part of the iſland of Negropont, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated near the capital Loro. Long. 24. 15. E. Lat. 38. 6. N.

CARIUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Jupiter and Torrebia, who walking round the lake Torrebia, liſtening to the melodious voices of the nymphs, learnt their muſic, which he afterwards taught to the Lydians, who out of gratitude worſhipped him as a god, and built him a temple upon a hill, which was called by his name.

CARLETON (GEORGE) a learned biſhop of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Norham, in Northumberland, and educated at Oxford. He was conſecrated biſhop of Landaff on the 12th of July, 1618, and the ſame year was ſent by king James I. with three other Engliſh divines, and one from Scotland, to the ſynod of Dort, where he ſtood up in favour of epiſcopacy, and behaved in ſuch a manner, that, at his return, he was promoted to the ſee of Chicheſter, on the 8th of September, 1619. He was a man of conſiderable learning, and wrote ſeveral books, among which are, 1. Heroici Characteres, i. e. Heroic Characters, addreſſed to ſir Henry Neville. 2. Conſenſus Eccleſiæ Catholicæ contra Tridentinos, i. e. the Conſent of the Univerſal Church againſt the Council of Trent. 3. A thankful Remembrance of God's Mercy, &c.

CARLETON (DUDLEY) afterwards knighted and created baron and viſcount Dorcheſter, was a younger ſon of Anthony Carleton, of Baldwin-Brightwell, in Oxfordſhire, eſq. and was born in that place, March 10, 1573. He was educated at Oxford, and afterwards travelled and became ſecretary to ſir Henry Neville, ambaſſador in France. In 1605 he attended lord Norris into Spain; was knighted by king James I. on the 25th of June, 1610, and was afterwards ſent ambaſſador to Venice, and ſeveral other courts. On the 22d of May, 1626, king Charles I. created him baron Carleton, of Imber-court, in Surry: on the 28th of June, 1628, he was created viſcount of Dorcheſter, and on the 18th of December following was conſtituted one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate. He wrote ſeveral ſpeeches in parliament, and other tracts, ſome of which have been printed. The negotiations of this accompliſhed miniſter, lately publiſhed, relate, for the moſt part, to the ſynod of Dort. He died on the 15th of February, 1631-2, and was buried in the chapel of St. Paul, in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a neat monument of black and white marble is erected to his memory.

CARLINGFORD, a port town of Ireland, ſeated on Carlingford Bay, in the county of Louth, and province of Leinſter, twenty-two miles north of Drogheda. Long. 6. 24. W. Lat. 24. 5. N.

CARLISLE, the capital city of the county of Cumberland, ſeated on the ſouth of the river Eden, and between the Petterel on the eaſt, and the Caude on the weſt. It is ſurrounded by a ſtrong ſtone wall, and has a pretty large caſtle in the weſtern part of it, as alſo a citadel in the eaſtern part, built by Henry VIII. It flouriſhed in the time of the Romans, as appears from the antiquities that are to be met with here, and the Roman coins that have been dug up. At the departure of the Romans this city was ruined by the Scots and Picts, and was not rebuilt till the year 680, by Egfrid, who encompaſſed it with a wall, and repaired the church. In the eighth and ninth centuries the whole country was ruined again, and the city laid deſolate by the incurſions of the Norwegians and Danes. In this condition it remained till the time of William Rufus, who repaired the walls and the caſtle, and cauſed the houſes to be rebuilt. It was fortified by Henry I. as a barrier againſt Scotland, who alſo placed a garriſon in it, and made it an epiſcopal ſee. It was twice taken by the Scots, and afterwards burnt accidentally, in the reign of Richard II. The cathedral, the ſuburbs, and one thouſand five hundred houſes were deſtroyed at that time. It is at preſent in a good condition, and has three gates, the Engliſh on the ſouth, the Scotch on the north, and the Iriſh on the weſt. It has two pariſhes, and as many churches, St. Cuthbert and St. Mary's, the laſt of which is the cathedral, and is ſeparated from the town by a wall of its own. The eaſtern part, which is the neweſt, is a curious piece of workmanſhip. The choir with the iſles is ſeventy-one feet broad, and has a ſtately eaſt window forty-eight feet high, and thirty broad, adorned with curious pillars. The roof is elegantly vaulted with wood, and is embelliſhed with the arms of England and France quartered, as alſo with Piercy's, Lucy's, Warren's, Mowbray's, and many others. In the choir are the monuments of three biſhops who are buried there. The weſt end was in part demoliſhed in 1641, in the time of the civil wars. The Picts wall, which was built acroſs the country from Newcaſtle, terminates near this place. It was taken by the rebels, Nov. 15, 1745, and was retaken by the duke of Cumberland, on the 10th of December following. It is governed by a mayor, twelve aldermen, two bailiffs, &c. and has a conſiderable market on Saturday. The trade is chiefly in fuſtians. The fairs are Auguſt 26, for horned cattle and linen; September 19, for horſes and horned cattle; and the firſt or ſecond Saturdays after Oct. 10, for Scotch horned cattle. It is ſixty-nine miles north of Lancaſter, eighty ſouth-weſt of Berwick, fifty-ſeven weſt of Newcaſtle, and three hundred and one north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 29. W. Lat. 54. 45. N. It ſends two members to parliament.

CARLO DOLCI, a celebrated Florentine painter, was born in the year 1616, and became the diſciple of Jacopo Bignali. He had a pencil wonderfully ſoft and beautiful, which he conſecrated to divine ſubjects, rarely painting any thing elſe, except ſome portraits, in which he ſucceeded ſo well, that he was ſent for into Germany, to draw the empreſs's picture. He finiſhed all his works with the moſt ſurpriſing degree of neatneſs, but was ſo extremely ſlow, that, if we may believe tradition, his brain was turned upon his ſeeing the famous Luca Giordano diſpatch more buſineſs in four or five hours, than he himſelf could have done in ſo many months. He died in 1686, at eighty years of age.

CARLOMAN, the eldeſt ſon of Charles Martel, and the brother of Pepin the Short, to whom he was always united, was king of Auſtria, Germany, and Thuringia; but having diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral battles, he, in 746, quitted his dominions, went to Rome, embraced the monaſtic life, and became a monk of Mont-Caſſino. He died at Vienne, in Dauphiny, on the 17th of Auguſt, 755.

CARLOMAN, the ſon of Pepin the Short, and the brother of Charlemagne, was, in 768, king of Auſtraſia, Burgundy, and a part of Aquitain, and died in 771.

By his death Charlemagne became poſſeſſed of the whole French monarchy.

CARLOMAN, the ſon of Lewis the Stutterer, and the brother of Lewis III. had, in 879, Aquitaine and Burgundy between them. Theſe two princes lived in great harmony, and frequently defeated the Normans; but Lewis III. dying in 882, Carloman became the ſole king of France; but being at length wounded in the chace by a wild boar, he died on the 6th of December, 884.

CARLOMAN, the ſon of Lewis Germanicus, ſhared the kingdom of Bavaria with his brothers Lewis and Charles. He was alſo emperor and king of Italy. He died in 880, and was ſucceeded by his brother Charles the Fat.

CARLOSTAD, or CARLSTAD, a town of Sweden, in Wermeland, ſeated on the lake Waner, where there is plenty of ſalmon. It is one hundred and thirty-three miles weſt of Stockholm. Long. 14. 5. E. Lat. 59. 16. N.

CARLOSTAD, or CARLOWITZ, the capital of Croatia, was built by Charles, archduke of Auſtria, in 1579; and the emperor Charles VI. augmented the fortifications in 1733. It is a biſhop's ſee, and the uſual reſidence of the bannat of Croatia. It was never in the hands of the Turks. It is ſeated on the river Rulep, eight miles eaſt of Meteling, and twenty-three weſt of Zagra. Long. 16. 5. E. Lat. 45. 34. N.

CARLOWITZ, a ſmall town of Bohemia, ſeated on the weſt ſide of the Danube, famous for the treaty of peace concluded between the Chriſtians and the Turks, in 1699. It is five miles from Peterwaradin, and thirty-three north-weſt of Belgrade. Long. 20. 45. E. Lat. 45. 25. N.

CARLSTAD, a town of Germany, in the biſhoprick of Wurtzburg, and circle of Franconia, ſeated on the river Maine, fourteen miles north of Wurtzburg. Long. 9. 51. E. Lat. 50. 0. N.

CARMAGNIOLA, a fortified town of Italy, in Piedmont, with a good caſtle. It was taken by the French in 1691, and retaken by prince Eugene the ſame year. It is ſeated in a country abounding in corn, flax, and ſilk, near the river Po, twelve miles ſouth of Turin, ſeventeen ſouth-eaſt of Pignerol, and twenty-five north of Coni. Long. 7. 32. E. Lat. 44. 43. N.

CARMAGNOLA (FRANCIS) general under Philip Viſconti, duke of Milan, arrived to that honour, though he was only the ſon of a peaſant. He ſignalized himſelf by his bravery and conduct, and the duke married him to one of his own relations, but at length finding that he was upon the point of being diſgraced, he retired into the territories of the Venetians, who gave him the command of their army. He then defeated the duke of Milan's troops, and obliged him to aſk peace of the Venetians; but at length being conquered in a ſea-fight, the Venetians beheaded him at Venice, in the year 1422.

CARMARTHEN, the county town of Carmarthenſhire, in South Wales. It is large and well-built, and is ſeated on the river Towy, over which there is a large ſtone bridge. There is likewiſe a quay, where ſmall veſſels arrive to unload their goods. It is the birth-place of the famous Britiſh Merlin, who, becauſe he was a man of letters and a good mathematician, got the reputation of being the ſon of a ſuccubus and an enchanter. The Engliſh princes of Wales formerly made it the chancery and exchequer of South Wales. It is at preſent a town and county incorporate; the aſſizes and other courts are kept there; and they ſend one member to parliament. It is governed by a mayor, recorder, two ſheriffs, and ſixteen aldermen, who are cloathed in ſcarlet. It was ſurrounded with walls, which are now demoliſhed; but ſome of the walls of the caſtle are ſtill ſtanding. This town and caſtle fell into the hands of the Normans ſoon after they came into England, and have been often beſieged, and twice burnt; but afterwards the walls and caſtle were repaired by Gilbert, earl of Clare. It has two good markets on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, with ſix fairs, all for cattle, horſes, and pedlary, viz. June 3, July 10, Auguſt 12, September 9, October 9, and November 14. It is twenty-ſix miles ſouth of Cardigan, and two hundred and eight weſt of London. Long. 4. 27. W. Lat. 51. 50. N.

CARMARTHENSHIRE, in South Wales, is bounded on the north by Cardiganſhire, on the eaſt by Brecknockſhire and Glamorganſhire, on the weſt by Pembrokeſhire, and on the ſouth by St. George's Channel. It is thirty-five miles in length, and twenty in breadth where broadeſt. The air is healthy, and ſomewhat milder than in the neighbouring counties, and the ſoil is freer from rocks and mountains, inſomuch that there is plenty of corn and good paſture for cattle, beſides wood, pit-coal, fowl, and fiſh, particularly ſalmon. The principal rivers are the Tovy, the Cothy, and the Tave. The Tovy riſes in Carmarthenſhire, and running by Llangadoc, Llandilovawr, and Carmarthen, falls into St. George's Channel. The Cothy riſes on the borders of this county, and running ſouthward, joins the Tovy about five miles above Carmarthen. The Tave, or Teivy, has its ſource in Cardiganſhire, and ſoon after becomes the boundary of theſe two counties, till it unites with the river Reach, and then it parts Cardiganſhire and Pembrokeſhire.

There are in this county eight market-towns, of which Carmarthen is the principal, and eighty-ſeven pariſhes, with five thouſand three hundred and fifty-two houſes; and it ſend two members to parliament, one for the county and another for the town.

CARMENTA, an ancient poeteſs of Latium, who flouriſhed before the foundation of Rome. From her, it is ſuppoſed, that verſe, among the Latins, obtained the name of carmen. A temple was built at Rome, in which the ladies celebrated feſtivals to her honour.

CARMILIANUS (PETER) a Latin poet and an Engliſhman, lived in the beginning of the ſixteenth century. He publiſhed, among other poems, an abuſive epitaph on the king of Scotland, who had been killed in a battle won by the Engliſh, in 1513.

CARMONA, an ancient town of Spain, in Andaluſia. The gate which looks towards Seville is one of the moſt remarkable pieces of antiquity in all Spain. It is ſeated in a territory extremely fruitful, fifteen miles eaſt of Seville. Long. 5. 37. W. Lat. 37. 22. N.

CARNARVON, a borough town of Carnarvonſhire, in North Wales, commodiouſly ſeated on the ſea-ſhore, from whence it has a proſpect into the iſle of Angleſea. The extent is but ſmall, and yet it is very ſtrong both by nature and art, being encompaſſed on all ſides but one by the ſea, and ſurrounded by a firm wall, over which is ſeen Snowdon hill, thought to be the higheſt mountain in Wales. The caſtle, part of which is yet ſtanding, was built by king Edward I. In that part of the caſtle called the Eagle tower, Edward of Carnarvon, the firſt prince of Wales of Engliſh blood, afterwards Edward II. was born, April 25, 1284. This caſtle was beſieged by the parliament forces, and ſurrendered the beginning of June, 1646. It now belongs to the crown. Carnarvon ſends one member to parliament, and is governed by the conſtable of the caſtle, who is always mayor by patent, aſſiſted by an alderman and two bailiffs. It has a good market on Saturdays; and four fairs for cattle, and ſmall pedlary wares, on February 25, May 16, Auguſt 4, and Dec. 5. It is twenty-eight miles north-weſt of Harlech, eight ſouth-weſt of Bangor, and two hundred and fifty-two north-weſt of London. Long. 4. 25. W. Lat. 53. 25. N.

CARNARVONSHIRE, in North Wales, is bounded on the north by the Iriſh Sea, on the eaſt and ſouth-eaſt by Denbighſhire and Merionethſhire, on the weſt and ſouth-weſt by Angleſea and the Iriſh ſea. Its length is about forty miles, and its breadth twenty. The air is cold and piercing, which may be attributed to the lakes and the high mountains, which are covered with ſnow ſeven or eight months in the year. The ground is ſtoney, and the ſurface riſes into vaſt mountains, one above another, which occaſions ſome to call them the Engliſh Alps. This name is not improperly applied; for beſides their extraordinary height and craggy precipices, their abounding with lakes and rivers; and their being covered with ſnow for a conſiderable part of the year, they produce ſeveral of the ſame plants, and ſome of the ſame animals, particularly the berg amzel, or the mountain-blackbird, and the torgal, a fiſh, which is the ſame as the roetel. The number of the lakes may be about fifty or threeſcore, and not one of them is ſeated on the higheſt part of a hill, but in valleys, and are fed by ſprings and rivulets from the rocks and cliffs above them. They generally produce no other fiſh but the trout and eel, though in ſome there is the torgchiaid, ſuppoſed to be the red char, and another thought to be the gilt char of Winander Meer in Weſtmoreland. The time of taking them with nets begins on the 22d of November, and continues for a month. Between the hills there are pleaſant fruitful vallies. The principal commodities are cattle, ſheep, goats, wool, and plenty of fiſh from the lakes and rivers, as well as on the ſea coaſts. The principal river is Conwye, which parts this county from Denbighſhire. It riſes from a lake where Canarvonſhire, Denbighſhire, and Merionethſhire join, and falls into the Iriſh ſea at Aberconway. There are many ſmall rivers which run into the Iriſh ſea. In the river Conway there are pearls found in a large black muſcle; and this fiſhing has been known ever ſince the time of the Romans.

In this county there are ſix towns, all havens, of which Carnarvon, Conway, and Bangor are the chief; as alſo ſixty-eight pariſhes, and two thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-five houſes. It ſends two members to parliament, one for the town and one for the county. There have been ſeveral caſtles in this county, the ruins of which are yet remaining. That of Conway or Aberconway, ſeems to have ſuffered leaſt from the injuries of time, probably becauſe it has been kept up with the fortifications of the town.

CARNEA, Χαρνεια, in antiquity, a feſtival obſerved in moſt of the cities of Greece, and eſpecially at Sparta, in honour of Apollo, ſurnamed Carneus. This feſtival laſted nine days, and was in imitation of the method of living, and diſcipline uſed in camps, the people dwelling in tents, and doing nothing without expreſs orders from a public cryer.

CARNEADES, a famous Grecian philoſopher, was a native of Cyrene, and founded the third academy: was the antagoniſt of the Stoics, and applied himſelf with great eagerneſs to refute the works of Chryſippus. The Athenians being condemned to pay five hundred talents for having plundered the town of Oropus, Carneades was ſent on an embaſſy to Rome, with Diogenes the Stoic, and Critolaus the Peripatetic; when he harangued with ſuch eloquence, that Cato the Cenſor was of opinion that the ſenate ought to ſend him back as ſoon as poſſible, becauſe he dazzled the minds of his hearers in ſuch a manner, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh truth from falſhood. Carneades was accuſtomed frequently to repeat this maxim: "If we knew that an "enemy, or any other perſon, in whoſe life we were inte- "reſted, was going to ſit where an aſp was concealed un- "der the graſs, we ought to tell him of it, even though "there was none to reprove us for having kept ſilence." Carneades died about one hundred and twenty nine years before the Chriſtian æra, and, according to Cicero, at ninety years of age.

CARNIOLA, a province of Germany in the circle of Auſtria, is bounded on the north by Carinthia and Stiria; on the eaſt by Sclavonia and Croatia; on the ſouth by Morlakia and Iſtria, and on the Weſt by Friuli. It is one hundred and fifty miles in length, and one hundred and twenty-five in breadth. It is a very mountainous country, and produces no more corn than the inhabitants conſume; but they have wine in greater plenty. The inhabitants are poor and innured to labour from their infancy, but they hate war, though they have a body of militia of about four thouſand men; and, in caſe of neceſſity, can raiſe ten thouſand. This province has twenty-one cities, thirty-ſix towns, two hundred and fifty-four caſtles or country ſeats, and one thouſand villages. It is divided into four diſtricts, the upper, lower, middle, and interior.

Upper Carniola borders upon Carinthia, and is rich in mines of iron; Laybach is the capital. Lower Carniola is ſeated on the river Save on the frontiers of Stiria. This country is full of woods and mountains, but there is no conſiderable town in it. Middle Carniola is ſeated near the river Hulp; Gottſchee is the principal place. Interior Carniola abuts into the Adriatic ſea. Near Hydra there are quickſilver mines, where two hundred and eighty workmen are employed. In 1663 they got two hundred and fifty-five thouſand nine hundred and eighty-one pounds of quickſilver out of theſe mines. There are two ſorts, one they call virgin mercury, and the other quickſilver. When Dr. Brown was in this country, in 1669, he ſaw in the caſtle three thouſand bags of purified quickſilver, and each bag weighed three hundred and fifteen pounds. It is tranſported from thence to different parts.

CARNIOLA (ISTRIAN) is a part of Iſtria towards the mountains of Vena and the gulph of Cornero. Veſt is the principal town.

CARO (ANNIBAL) a celebrated Italian poet, was born at Civita Nuova in 1507, and became ſecretary to ſome biſhops at Rome, and afterwards to the duke of Parma, and at length to cardinal Farneſe. He was alſo made a knight of Malta. He tranſlated Virgil's Æneid into his own language, with ſuch elegance and propriety of expreſſion, that he was allowed by the beſt judges to have equalled the original. He alſo tranſlated Ariſtotle's Rhetoric, two oratorios of Gregory Nazianzen, with a diſcourſe of Cyprian. He wrote a comedy; and a miſcellany of his poems was printed at Venice in 1584. He died at Rome in the year 1566.

CAROLINA, including Georgia, lies between thirty-one and thirty-ſix degrees of north latitude, and is bounded on the eaſt by the Atlantic ocean; on the north by Virginia; on the ſouth by Florida; and on the weſt by the Miſſiſippi. In 1663 king Charles II. made a grant of Carolina to ſeveral lords and gentlemen, from Virginia to thirty-one degrees of latitude, and weſtward as far as the South Sea, reſerving a quit-rent of twenty marks yearly. In 1728 the proprietors thought fit to ſell their right to his majeſty king George II. which agreement was confirmed by act of parliament, reſerving an eighth part to lord Carteret, now lord Granville. In 1732 a charter was granted to truſtees for making a ſettlement in that part of Carolina now called Georgia, including all that country which lies from the northern ſtream of the Savanna river along the coaſt, to the moſt ſouthern ſtream of Atalamaha river, and weſt from the mouths of the ſaid rivers reſpectively, in direct lines to the South Sea.

This country is ſeated between the extremities of heat and cold, though the heat is more troubleſome in ſummer than the cold in winter; their winters being very ſhort, and the froſty mornings frequently ſucceeded by warm days. The air is generally ſerene and clear the greateſt part of the year. The great rains are in winter, though they are not without heavy ſhowers at midſummer; add to theſe the conſtant dews that fall in the night, which refreſh the ground, and ſupply the plants with moiſture. In North Carolina the north-weſt winds in the winter occaſion very pinching weather, but they are of no long continuance. Weſterly winds bring very pleaſant weather, but the ſoutherly are hot and unwholeſome, occaſioning fevers and other diſorders. But this muſt be underſtood of ſummer, for in winter they bring very comfortable weather. The depth of winter is towards the latter end of February, and then the ice is not ſtrong enough to bear a man's weight. In Auguſt and September there are frequently very great ſtorms and ſqualls of wind, which are ſometimes ſo violent as to make lanes through the woods, tearing up trees by the roots. Theſe ſtorms are generally attended with dreadful thunder, lightning, and heavy rain.

The ſoil in general is ſandy and fruitful, for which reaſon they have not yet been at the trouble to manure their land. The grain moſt cultivated are Indian corn and rice, though any ſort will thrive well enough; they have alſo pulſe of ſeveral ſorts, little known in England. All kinds of garden ſtuff uſual in England are cultivated here, and may be had in great plenty.

The king appoints a governor, who, with two houſes inſtituted in imitation of the lords and commons in England, have the management; however they are to make no laws but what are agreeable to the mother-country. They export large quantities yearly of rice, pitch, tar, turpentine, deer-ſkins, and timber for building; cypreſs, cedar, ſaſſafras, oak, walnut, and pine. Beſides theſe they are able to ſend out beef, pork, tallow, hides, furs, wheat, peas, potatoes, honey, bees-wax, myrtle-wax, tobacco, ſnake-root, cotton, ſeveral ſorts of gums and medicinal drugs. The deer ſkins are bought of the Indians with vermilion, lead, gunpowder, coarſe cloth, iron, and ſpirituous liquors. As yet they have not a ſufficient number of handicraftſmen, which renders labour very dear, and a ſupply of cloaths from England neceſſary.

The aſpect of the country is very fine, being adorned with beautiful rivers and creeks, and the woods with lofty timber, which afford delightful and pleaſant ſeats for the planters, and renders the fencing their lands very eaſy. And then they have plenty of fiſh, wild fowl, and veniſon, beſides other neceſſaries which this country produces naturally. The planters and their families that are born here, are troubled with few diſtempers; and are generally tall, well-made, and active, the rickets, a diſeaſe which diſtorts the limbs, being not known here. The women who are not expoſed to the weather are remarkably fair and handſome, with fine eyes. They marry at thirteen or fourteen, and where there is no clergyman the ceremony is performed by a juſtice of the peace. They are very fruitful, have eaſy labours, and the children at nine months old are able to run about the houſe. Both ſexes, as well young as old, are very dextrous in paddling and managing the canoes, being bred to it from their infancy.

The religion of the planters is that of the church of England; but, as there is liberty of conſcience, here are diſſenters of all ſorts. The moſt ſubſtantial build their houſes with brick and lime made with oyſter ſhells; for there is no ſtone except near the mountains. The meaner ſort make theirs with rough boards, and cover them with ſhingles. Their diet, except Indian corn, differs little from ours; and they import ſeveral ſorts of ſtrong liquors. Beſides which they have cyder, perſimon, and cedar-beer, of their own. They have likewiſe a beer made with molaſſes, wheat-bran, and hops, which is very good. There are mines of pit-coal in this country, but they have ſuch plenty of wood for firing, that there is no occaſion to work them. Their diverſions are the ſame as in England.

Their rivers are large and navigable a great many miles up the country. They riſe like all others near the mountains, and abound with delicate fiſh, beſides water-fowl of different kinds. In ſome there are iſlands which yield good paſture without the annoyance of wild beaſts. The chief mountains are the Cherokee or Allegany mountains, which are ſituated north and north-weſt five or ſix hundred miles diſtant from the ſea. They are very high, and abound with trees, plants, ſtones, and minerals of different kinds. The inhabitants chiefly make uſe of paper-money among themſelves. The moſt common diſeaſes are agues, cachexies, fluxes, the French pox, the yaws, colics, convulſions, the hooping-cough, tetters, the prickly heat, and the itch.

The Indians are like thoſe in other parts, well made, of a red copper colour, with black hair, and the whites of their eyes ſtreaked with red. They have no beard, nor hair on any part of the body. Thoſe that are cloathed and brought up among the planters, have their ſkins of a bright reddiſh colour, but thoſe that go naked are more duſky, from a cuſtom of daubing themſelves with bear's greaſe. However when they paint themſelves with rocou they are more red than they naturally would be. They uſe other colours on different occaſions. They generally go naked from top to bottom, except a few who have been taught to be a little more modeſt. Every tribe or nation has a different language, which is very eaſy to account for. They are great ſmoakers and good markſmen, and will walk on the ridge of a houſe without fear or danger of falling.

Their wigwams or huts are made with poles and the bark of trees; they are built in a round form, and round at the top, with floors that are neither paved nor ſwept. They have benches all round, except where the door ſtands, whereon they lay the ſkins of beaſts, and mats made of ruſhes, which ſerve them for beds. In theſe ſeveral families live together, men, women, and children. Their drink was water, till rum was introduced among them by the Europeans, with which they will get drunk, but they never call one another to account for what is done in their liquor.

They have no ſabbath, nor particular days of devotion; but they have feaſts, with dancing, and a great many odd ceremonies, which do not appear to be on a religious account. They have a particular ſort of men among them, which are rather doctors than prieſts, for they have the management of the ſick, and we know of nothing they do which in any ſenſe reſpects religion. But ignorant travellers have turned them into conjurors and enchanters, relating wonderful feats which they are able to do by the aſſiſtance of the devil. But theſe diabolical ſtories, as well as their eating human fleſh, are now rejected by men of ſenſe. When I was in theſe parts I made all the enquiry I could into the ground of theſe aſſertions, but could find nothing that countenanced theſe ridiculous tales. They have not the leaſt tradition about the creation, Noah's flood, or any thing that quadrates with the Moſaic account. But they ſeem to have a notion of a good and evil principle, in the ſame manner as the Manichees.

The Indian chief, or ruler of the nation, has others to aſſiſt him, as his war captains, and counſellors, who are choſen from among experienced men. Theſe are conſulted in all affairs relating to war, peace, trade, hunting, and the like; and will debate very gravely and deliberately on all public affairs; after they have done, the majority of voices determines the queſtion. Every town has a ruler, who, as well the chief, is ſucceeded by the ſiſter's ſon, as being the ſurer ſide. When they make war they do not meet their enemies fairly in the field, but uſe all the ſtratagems they can to get them into their power, dividing themſelves into ſmall parties, and lying in ambuſh, whether it be to attack a village or otherwiſe. That cruel cuſtom of ſcalping their priſoners is now but too well known. When they have gained a victory they make feaſts, and rejoice for ſeveral days together.

Their towns are nothing but an irregular collection of wigwams or huts, already mentioned, and that of the chief, or king, if you pleaſe, is in the centre. There is no regular ſtreets, or the leaſt ſign of any buſineſs going forward.

With regard to the trees and vegetables in this country, there are very few if any, which exactly reſemble theſe in our parts of the world, unleſs they have been carried over. They have ever-greens of various ſorts, as the tall cypreſs, or white cedar, the red cedar, the pitch pine, the yellow pine, the white pine with long leaves, and the ſmall almond pine; they have two ever-green oaks, the gall-berry tree, and the myrtle, which yields the myrtle-wax. For timber there is the cheſnut oak, which is fifty or ſixty feet high, and without boughs, till towards the top; it is commonly four or five feet in diameter. The white ſcaly-bark oak is not ſo high, but is uſeful in building of ſmall ſhips. The wood of the red oak is porous, and ſerves only for pipe ſtaves. The Spaniſh oaks will eaſily ſplit into clap-boards to build ordinary houſes, and to make rails, laths, and the like. The baſtard Spaniſh oak is uſed for the ſame purpoſes, and for firing. The black oak is a durable wood under water, and is ſometimes uſed in houſe-work. The white, iron, or ring oak is the beſt wood in this province for building ſhips. The Turkey oak is only ſerviceable for fire wood and fences. The live oak is an ever-green, and is excellent to make knees and the like in building ſhips. The freſh water oak is alſo an ever-green, and grows in ſwamps. It ſerves only for firing and fences. Moſt or all of theſe yield good acorns to fatten hogs.

The cypreſs is a tall thick tree, ſome being thirty-ſix feet in circumference. The nuts yield an excellent balſam, and the Indians make their canoes of this wood, ſome of which will carry thirty or forty barrels of pitch, though of one intire piece of timber. The tulip tree is exceeding tall, and ſometimes ten feet in diameter. It is uſeful in tables, wainſcots, and the like. Some bear only white tulips, and others party-coloured. That called the aſh-tree is different from ours both in leaves and bark, but is like it in the grain of the wood. The bark is food for beavers. The ſycamore tree is like ours in the leaves, but differs in the bark, fruit, and grain. This laſt is very beautifully mottled with a variety of colours. There are beeches, elms, and mulberry trees, but they all differ in ſome particulars from ours. One of theſe laſt yields a red mulberry above an inch long, and taper at both ends. Another bears white mulberries; and a third a fruit like a ſmall blackberry. There are likewiſe the ſweet, black, and white gum-trees. The locuſt-tree has prickles as long as a porcupine's all over the boughs and body: the Indians make their bows of the wood of this tree. The honey-tree is like it, but a little more prickly, and bears pods like kidney-beans.

Their laurel grows as high as the talleſt oak. The aſcopo-tree has a ſpicy bark, like caſſia lignea. The berries of the bay-tree yield wax to make candles. The perſimon-tree bears a fruit like our medlar. The chinkapin is like a ſmall cheſnut; the wood is tough, and, like the hickory, is uſed for walking-ſticks and whips. Saſſafras wood is uſed for poſts for houſes; the root and bark in phyſic. The willow-tree is in nothing like ours but in the grain and place of growth. They have a ſort of plums, cherries, damſins, and figs, but not like thoſe in England. The papaw-tree is not above ten inches in diameter, and yet it bears the largeſt leaves of any tree in the country. It bears an apple as big as an egg, which when ripe is yellow, and of a ſweet delicious taſte. The bud of the red-bud-tree is an excellent ſallad. The ſorrel-tree is ſo called from its leaf, reſembling ſorrel in taſte. The bark of the pellitory-tree has the ſame effect as the root of pellitory of Spain. The myrtle grows to be ten or twelve feet high, and is found in plenty in wet ſwampy grounds; it bears a great quantity of white berries, which are gathered in October and November: theſe they boil in large kettles, till the wax riſes to the top, which is of a greeniſh colour, and has a ſweet ſmell. Of this they make ſoap and candles, which are exceeding proper for hot countries, becauſe they will burn without melting. The indico-tree, which is now employed in making indico, and turns to a good account. The Indian nut-tree, whoſe ſap ſerves the Indians inſtead of wine, and is very refreſhing. Some make canoes of the wood, needles and bodkins of the thorns; as alſo ropes of the fibrous ſubſtance that covers the fruit; and from the fruit itſelf they expreſs an oil, excellent for pains and aches. The planters diſtil a ſort of brandy from the ſap. The palmito-tree is about forty or fifty feet high, and two feet in diameter; the leaves grow only on the top of the tree in cluſters, in the ſhape of a fan.

They have hollow canes or reeds for angle rods, arrow-wood for bows, arrows, and rammers for guns. The yaupan or Indian tea-tree is of three ſorts, the leaves of all which are uſed as tea, which is very diuretic. It appears like a box-tree, only the leaves are indented on the edges. The pimento-tree yields the fruit commonly called Jamaica pepper. There are four ſorts of trees or ſhrubs which yield fruit like whortle berries, or bilberies.

There are here alſo a variety of animals unknown in Europe, as the elk, the roe-buck, the minx, the opoſſum, the racoon, alligators, porcupines, tortoiſes or turtle; bull-frogs, tree-frogs, the rattle-ſnake, and ſeveral other ſpecies of the ſerpent kind. Among the birds are a vaſt variety, different from thoſe of Europe.

This country is divided into North and South Carolina, and Georgia, each of which is under a particular governor. The North is ſubdivided into four counties, Granville, Colleton, Berkley, and Craven. And South Carolina into two, Clarendon and Albemarle. This laſt is alſo divided into fourteen pariſhes, or townſhips, each of which has a brick or timber church. The former likewiſe has the ſame number of pariſhes. Charles-Town is the capital of the whole country, of which in its proper place. For a particular deſcription of the South part of this country, ſee the article GEORGIA.

CAROLINE (WILHELMINA DOROTHEA) queen conſort of George II. king of Great Britain, was the daughter of John Frederick, marquis of Brandenburg Anſpach, by Eleanor Erdmutch Louiſa, his ſecond wife, the daughter of John George, duke of Saxe Eyſnach, and was born on the firſt of March, 1682-3. As ſhe grew up her preſence became majeſtic, accompanied with ſweetneſs, modeſty, and good-nature: ſhe was courteous in her behaviour, and her wit was both ſolid and ſparkling. The reading of choice authors was one of her greateſt pleaſures. She looked with contempt on the trifling amuſements of her ſex, and was conſidered as one of the moſt learned princeſſes in Europe. Having loſt the marquis her father when very young, and her mother marrying George IV. elector of Saxony, ſhe was left under the guardianſhip of Frederic, elector of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Pruſſia, by which means ſhe ſpent part of her earlieſt years at the court of Berlin, where the electreſs, who was ſiſter to George I. afterwards king of Great Britain, gave her a tincture of her own politeneſs, for which ſhe was admired by all that approached her. The princeſs of Anſpach was at that time ſo famed for her beauty and other accompliſhments, that ſhe was ſolicited in marriage by Charles III. then king of Spain, and afterwards emperor of Germany, who offered her his hand and his crown; and all imaginable artifices were uſed to gain her affections, and to induce her to change her religion; but ſhe rejected all theſe flattering offers; her opinions were fixed, and no views of ambition could induce her to violate her conſcience, by acting inconſiſtently with its dictates. This, however, did not deprive her of a crown, ſo juſtly due to her merit. She was married to his late majeſty at Hanover, on the 22d of Auguſt, 1705, and thus became the wife of the electoral prince of Brunſwick Lunenburg. Nine years after ſhe ſaw her father-in-law raiſed to the throne of Great Britain. On her thus becoming princeſs of Wales, ſhe was ſo prudent as to keep fair with both the parties which then divided the royal family. Her father-in-law, George I. had a ſincere eſteem for her, and ſhe, in return, paid him the utmoſt reſpect. On his death ſhe was crowned, with his late majeſty, on the 11th of October, 1727. During the reſt of her life ſhe continued to diſtinguiſh herſelf by the ſweetneſs of her temper, her candour, and affability. She had an impartial love of truth, and a deſire of promoting learning in general. She was ſkilled in matters of the niceſt and moſt abſtract ſpeculations, and was highly eſteemed by the wiſe and judicious; in private life ſhe was an example of all the ſocial virtues, and in ſhort was an excellent wife, mother, friend, patron, and benefactreſs. She died on the 20th of November, 1737, in the fifty-ſixth year of her age, after having four ſons and five daughters, by his majeſty; viz. Frederic Lewis, prince of Wales, born January 20, 1706, his preſent majeſty's father; Anne, princeſs of Orange, born October 22, 1709; the princeſs Amelia Sophia, born May 30, 1711; the princeſs Caroline Elizabeth, born May 30, 1713; William Auguſtus, duke of Cumberland, born April 15, 1721; the princeſs Mary, born February 22, 1723, married to the prince of Heſſe; the princeſs Louiſa, born December 7, 1724, married to the king of Denmark; alſo a prince dead born; and George William, duke of Glouceſter, born November 2, 1717, who died on the 6th of February following.

CARPENTER (RICHARD) a divine and poet, of the laſt century, had his education at Eton-college and at Cambridge, and afterwards travelling, received holy orders at Rome; took upon him the order of St. Benedict, and was ſent into England, to make proſelytes; but turning proteſtant, obtained the ſmall vicarage of Poling, in Suſſex. In the time of the civil war he retired to Paris, where reconciling himſelf to the Romiſh church, he made it is buſineſs to rail againſt the proteſtants. Afterwards returning to Ayleſbury, in Buckinghamſhire, he became once more a proteſtant, and often preached there in a very fantaſtical manner, to the great mirth of his auditors. He was living there in 1670; but before his death returned a third time to popery, cauſing his pretended wife to embrace that perſuaſion, and in that faith he died. He publiſhed ſome ſermons, and a comedy called The Pragmatical Jeſuit. He was generally eſteemed a man of a moſt fantaſtical character; and for his juggles and tricks in religion, a theological mountebank.

CARPENTER (GEORGE, lord) baron Carpenter of Killaghy, in the county of Kilkenny, in Ireland, was the ſixth ſon of Thomas Carpenter, Eſq. and was born at Pitcher's Ocull, in Herefordſhire, February 10, 1657. By his military atchievements he diſtinguiſhed himſelf through the whole courſe of the wars in Ireland, Flanders, and Spain, where his courage and prudence raiſed him, by gradual promotions, from being a private gentleman in the third troop of guards, through all the commiſſions of cornet, lieutenant, and captain, till he was advanced to be lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, and afterwards to be brigadier-general, major-general, and lieutenant-general, in which laſt poſt he, in 1715, obliged the rebels at Preſton to ſurrender at diſcretion. He was the next year conſtituted governor of Minorca, and commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in Scotland; in 1719 was created baron of Kiilaghy, and in 1722, was choſen member for the city of Weſtminſter, when he became as diligent in the ſervice of his country in the houſe, as he had before been in the field. This great and brave man died February 10, 1731-2, being ſeventy-four years of age, and was buried at Owſelbury, in Hampſhire, near his lady, where a neat monument of white and blue veined marble is erected to his memory, by his ſon the lord Carpenter.

CARPENTRAS, an ancient town of Provence, in France, with a biſhop's ſee. It is the capital of the territory of Venaiſſin, but is ſubject to the pope. It is ſeated on the river Auſon, at the foot of the mountain Ventoux, twelves miles ſouth-eaſt of Orange, twelve north-eaſt of Avignon, and one hundred and ſixty-five ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 22. 43. E. Lat. 44. 4. N.

CARPI, a town of Italy, in the Modeneſe, with a good caſtle, and the title of a principality. The French were forced to abandon it in 1703, but they retook it in 1707; and prince Eugene obliged them to leave it in 706. It is eight miles north of Modena, fourteen north-eaſt of Reggio, and thirteen ſouth-weſt of Mirandola. Long. 10. 50. E. Lat. 44. 45. N.

CARPI, a ſmall town of Italy, in the Veroneſe, famous for the battle which prince Eugene gained there over the French, in 1701. It is ſeated on the Adige, and belongs to the Venetians. Long. 11. 10. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

CARRACCI (LUDOVICO) a celebrated painter, was the couſin-german of Auguſtino and Annibale, and born at Bologna, in the year 1555. Under his firſt maſter, Proſpero Fontana, he diſcovered but an indifferent genius for painting; but afterwards art ſupplied the defects of nature, and by his diligence in ſtudying the works of Parmegiano, Correggio, Titian, and other great men, he arrived at laſt to a degree of perfection hardly inferior to any of them. He aſſiſted his couſins in founding and ſettling the famous academy of deſign at Bologna, and afterwards in painting the Palazzo Farneſe at Rome. He excelled in deſign and colouring, which he performed with ſuch grace, that Guido, the ſcholar of Annibale, afterwards imitated him with great ſucceſs. He ſurvived both his couſins, and died in the year 1619, aged ſixty-four.

CARRACCI (AUGUSTINO) a celebrated and learned painter, was born at Bologna, in 1557, and by the care and inſtructions of Domenico Tebaldi, Aleſſandro Minganti, and his couſin Ludovico, became not only a very good deſigner and painter, but ſurpaſſed all the maſters of his time in the art of engraving. He was likewiſe ſkilled in the mathematics, natural philoſophy, rhetoric, muſic, and moſt of the liberal arts and ſciences. He was beſides an admirable poet, and an accompliſhed gentleman. From Bologna he went to Venice, where he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Paulo Veroneſe, Tintoret, and Baſſan; and having engraved a conſiderable number of their works, returned home, and ſoon afterwards followed his brother Annibale to Rome, and joined with him in finiſhing ſeveral ſtories in the Farneſe gallery; but ſome little difference ariſing between them, Auguſtino removed to the court of the duke of Parma, and died in his ſervice, in the year 1602, aged 45. His moſt celebrated piece of painting is that of the Communion of St. Jerome, in Bologna, an admirable piece, which made it lamented that he ſhould withdraw himſelf from the practice of an art, in which his abilities were ſo very extraordinary, to follow the profeſſion of an engraver.

CARRACCI (ANNIBALE, or HANNIBAL) was born at Bologna, in the year 1560, and was the diſciple of his couſin Ludovico. Among his other admirable qualities, he had ſo prodigious a memory, that whatever he had once ſeen, he never failed to retain and make his own; ſo that at Parma he acquired the ſweetneſs and purity of Correggio; at Venice, the ſtrength and diſtribution of colours of Titian; and at Rome, the correctneſs, deſign, and beautiful forms of the antique. By his wonderful performances in the Palazzo Farneſe, he ſoon made it appear, that all the ſeveral perfections of the moſt eminent maſters, his predeceſſors, were united in him. In his converſation he was plain, honeſt, and open-hearted, very communicative to his ſcholars, and ſo extremely kind to them, that he generally kept his money in the ſame box with his colours, where they might have recourſe to either as they had occaſion. But his temper inclining him to melancholy, the ill uſage he received from cardinal Farneſe, who, through the perſuaſions of an ignorant Spaniard, his domeſtic, gave him but a little above two hundred pounds ſterling for eight years labour, ſo confirmed him in it, that he reſolved never more to touch his pencil; and he would undoubtedly have kept his reſolution, had not his neceſſities compelled him to reſume it. Yet ſo far did his vexation gain upon him, that, at certain times, it deprived him of the right uſe of his reaſon, and at laſt betrayed him into ſome irregularities, which concealing from his phyſicians, he met with the ſame fate as Raphael, in the like caſe, had done before him, and ſeemed to copy that great maſter, as well in the manner of his death, as in his works. Indeed he imitated Correggio, Titian, and Raphael, in their different manners, as he pleaſed, only you ſee not in his pictures the nobleneſs, the graces, and the charms of Raphael; and his out-lines are neither ſo pure nor ſo elegant: but in all other things he was wonderfully accompliſhed, and of an univerſal genius. Nay, ſuch was his veneration for Raphael, that he deſired on his death-bed to be buried in the ſame tomb with him, which was accordingly done, in the Pantheon at Rome, in the year 1609, he dying at forty-nine years of age. There are extant ſeveral prints of the Bleſſed Virgin, and other ſubjects, etched by the hand of this admirable artiſt.

CARRACCI (ANTONIO) alſo an admirable painter, was the natural ſon of Auguſtino, and was brought up under the care and tuition of his uncle Annibale, after whoſe deceaſe he applied himſelf ſo ſucceſsfully to the ſtudy of all the capital pieces in Rome, that it is thought he would have ſurpaſſed even Annibale himſelf, had not death prevented him, in the year 1618, when he was only thirty-five years of age.

CARRANZA (BARTHOLOMEW) a native of Miranda, in Navarre, was one of the moſt famous Dominicans of the ſixteenth century. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the council of Trent, in the year 1546, and coming over with Philip of Auſtria, when he came into England to marry queen Mary, employed his utmoſt abilities in endeavouring to extirpate the Proteſtant religion. He was made the queen's confeſſor, and, in 1557, archbiſhop of Toledo; but in the year 1559 was ſeized by the Inquiſition as an heretic, and after twenty years impriſonment, was obliged to ſave the character of his calumniators by a ſolemn abjuration of opinions he had never maintained. He died May 2, 1576, at ſeventy-two years of age.

CARRAVEIRA, an archiepiſcopal city of Turky, in Europe, in Macedonia. Long. 22. 25. E. Lat. 40. 27. N.

CARRICKFERGUS, a town in Ireland, in the county of Antrim, and in the province of Ulſter, ſeated on a bay of its own name, where there is a good harbour. It is a borough and a market-town, where the aſſizes and quarter-ſeſſions are kept. It is a well fortified place, and has ſome modern outworks. It was beſieged by the duke of Schomberg, who was ſent to reduce Ireland by William III. and was taken in a ſhort time. Veſſels of ſmall burthen may come within the pier. It is fourteen miles eaſt of Antrim, and ninety north of Dublin. Long. 6. 16. W. Lat. 54. 45. N.

CARRICK ON THE SURE, a town of Ireland, in the county of Tipperary, and province of Ulſter, fourteen miles north-weſt of Waterford. Long. 7. 22. W. Lat. 52. 16. N.

CARS, a town of Armenia, or Turcomania, called Agen by the Turks. It is built upon an eminence, expoſed to the ſouth and ſouth-eaſt. It is almoſt ſquare, and the caſtle is ſeated on a very ſteep rock, at the upper part of the town. It is pretty well kept up, but is defended only by old towers. The reſt of the place is like a kind of a theatre, behind which is a deep valley, ſteep on every ſide, through the middle of which runs the river which falls from the mountains, and paſſes thro' a great plain in the way from Erzerum. After having winded about the plains, it comes to Cars, where it forms an iſland, runs under a ſtone bridge, and along the valley behind the caſtle, where it not only turns ſeveral mills, but alſo waters the fields and gardens. At laſt it joins the river Arpagi, which flows not far from thence, keeping the ſame name till they fall into the Aras or Araxes. It is one hundred miles north eaſt of Erzerum, and one hundred weſt of Erivan. Long. 43. 50. E. Lat. 41. 30. N.

CARSUGHI (RAINIER) a Jeſuit, born at Citerna, in Tuſcany, in 1647, was the author of a Latin poem, entitled, Ars bene ſcribendi, which is eſteemed both for the elegance of the ſtyle, and for the excellent precepts it contains. Carſughi alſo wrote ſome good Epigrams. He died in 1709.

CARTAMA, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Granada, formerly very conſiderable. It is ſeated near the river Guadala Medina, at the foot of a mountain, eight miles north-weſt of Malaga, and twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Antequera. Long. 4. 28. W. Lat. 36. 40. N.

CARTE (THOMAS) the hiſtorian, was born at Clifton upon Dunſmore, in Warwickſhire, where his father was, at that time, vicar, and educated in Univerſity college, Oxford. Upon his entering into holy orders, he was appointed reader of the abbey church of Bath, where a ſermon, on the 30th of January, in which he vindicated king Charles I. with regard to the Iriſh maſſacre, and this engaged him in a controverſy with Mr. Chandler and Dr. Calamy, two diſſenting miniſters. On the acceſſion of the preſent royal family, he refuſed to take the oaths to the government, put on a lay habit, and is ſaid to have been ſecretary to biſhop Atterbury, before his troubles. In 1722, being accuſed of high treaſon, a reward of one thouſand pounds was offered for apprehending him. He, however, fled to France, where he reſided ſome time, and being introduced to many men of learning and family in that country, gained acceſs to all libraries, public and private. At length queen Caroline, having a favourable opinion of this learned gentleman, obtained leave for his return home. He publiſhed, 1. An edition of Thuanus, in ſeven volumes, folio. 2. The Life of the firſt Duke of Ormond, three volumes, folio. 3. The Hiſtory of England, four volumes, folio. 4. A Collection of original Letters and Papers, concerning the Affairs of England, two volumes, octavo; and ſome other works. He died in April, 1754.

CARTEROMACHUS (Scipio) a native of Piſtoia, in Tuſcany, was one of the ableſt men of the ſixteenth century. He was well ſkilled in the Latin and Greek tongues, and very happy in explaining the difficult paſſages of ancient authors. He lived with cardinal de Medicis in 1512, and died at about forty-three years of age.

CARTES (Rene des) one of the moſt eminent philoſophers and mathematicians of the ſeventeenth century, was the younger ſon of Joachim des Cartes, counſellor in the parliament of Rennes, and was born at La Haye, in Touraine, March 31, 1596. His father uſed to call him the Philoſopher, on account of his inſatiable curioſity in deſiring to know the reaſons of every thing. He was educated at the Jeſuits college at La Fleche, and after his leaving that ſeminary, abandoned his books, and learnt to ride the great horſe, to fence, and other exerciſes ſuitable to his quality. In 1616 he went to Holland, and enliſted himſelf among the prince of Orange's troops as a volunteer. While he lay in garriſon at Breda, during the truce between the Spaniards and Dutch, an unknown perſon cauſed a problem in mathematics to be fixed up in the ſtreet, and des Cartes ſeeing the concourſe of paſſengers, who ſtopped to read it, deſired one who ſtood near him to explain in French or Latin, the meaning of the note, which was written in Dutch. This the gentleman promiſed, upon condition he would engage to ſolve the problem; and M. des Cartes accepted the conditions with ſuch a reſolute air, that the gentleman, little expecting ſuch a thing from a young cadet in the army, gave him his name in writing, with the place where he lived, when Mr. des Cartes found that this was Mr. Iſaac Beekman, principal of the college of Dort; upon which, returning to his lodging, he applied himſelf to the examination of the problem, and found the ſolution of it very readily. The next day he viſited Mr. Beekman, who ſeemed ſurpriſed at his having ſolved the problem ſo ſpeedily; but his wonder was much more increaſed, when he began to diſcourſe with the young gentleman, whoſe knowledge he found much ſuperior to his own in thoſe ſciences in which he had employed his whole time for ſeveral years. He therefore deſired his friendſhip and correſpondence, which des Cartes immediately agreed to, and returned his civilities with the moſt unreſerved friendſhip and confidence, though he was younger than Mr. Beekman by near thirty years. During his ſtay at Breda, he wrote a Treatiſe on Muſic, and laid the foundation of ſeveral of his works. He afterwards entered into the ſervice of the duke of Bavaria, and at length into that of the emperor, and was preſent at ſeveral ſieges, employing his leiſure hours in ſtudy, but the raiſing of the ſiege of Newhauſell, with the loſs of his general, made him abandon the profeſſion of arms. Upon this he began his travels into the North, in his paſſage to which he was in danger of being killed on board a ſhip by ſome ſailors, who taking him for a merchant who had a large ſum of money about him, and perceiving him to be of a mild diſpoſition, reſolved to murder him, and throw his body into the ſea. They diſcourſed of their deſigns before him, not knowing that he underſtood any language but French, in which he ſpoke to his valet de chambre. M. des Cartes diſcovering their intention, ſuddenly ſtarted up, and drawing his ſword, ſpoke to them in their own language, in a tone that ſtruck them with terror, threatening to run them through if they preſumed to ſtir. Upon this they afterwards behaved very civilly to him, and landed him ſafe at the place whither he was bound. Having viſited the coaſts of the Baltic, he returned to Holland, and from thence to France. He afterwards travelled through Switzerland to Italy, and at his return made a ſhort tour to England, and not far from London made ſome obſervations on the declinations of the magnet. Some years after he removed to Leyden, where he was invited to ſettle in England, by ſir Charles Cavendiſh, brother to the earl of Newcaſtle, and at the latter end of the year 1641, Lewis XIII. invited him to his court, upon very honourable conditions; but no ſolicitations were then capable of weaning him from his retirement: however, taking a journey into France in the year 1647, the king ſettled upon him a penſion of three thouſand livres, and ſome time after Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, having invited him into that kingdom, he went to Stockholm, where he was received with the higheſt civility by her majeſty, who engaged him to attend her every morning at five o'clock, to inſtruct her in his philoſophy, and deſired him to reviſe and digeſt all his writings, that were unpubliſhed. She propoſed likewiſe to allow him a revenue of three thouſand crowns per annum, to give him an eſtate which ſhould deſcend to his heirs and executors for ever, and to form an academy, of which he was to be the director. But theſe deſigns were broke off by his death, which happened February 11, 1650, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe of the World. 2. A Treatiſe on Mechanics. 3. Four Treatiſes concerning Method, Dioptrics, Meteors, and Geometry. 4. Meditations on the Exiſtence of God, and the Immortality of the Soul. 5. Principles of Philoſophy. 6. A Treatiſe of the Paſſions. 7. A Treatiſe on Man. 8. His Opuſcula Poſthuma, phyſica & mathematica, &c.

It is worthy of remark, that though the body of this great philoſopher was interred at Stockholm, yet ſeventeen years after it was removed to Paris, where a magnificent monument was erected for him, in the church of St. Genevieve du Mont.

The great ſir Iſaac Newton has demonſtrated the abſurdity of des Cartes's opinion of a plenum, and that the earth and other planets move in a vortex, on which the whole Carteſian ſyſtem of natural philoſophy falls to the ground; however, it muſt be allowed, that he extended the limits of geometry as far beyond the place where he found them, as ſir Iſaac did after him, and was the firſt who taught the method of expreſſing curves by equations; yet des Cartes's Algebra evidently appears to have been borrowed from our countryman Mr. Harriot's book on that ſubject. He applied his geometry to dioptrics, which, when treated by him, became a new art. This, as Mr. Voltaire obſerves, was a guide which he himſelf had in ſome meaſure formed, and which would have ſafely conducted him through the ſeveral paths of natural philoſophy, had he not abandoned that guide, and given entirely into the humour of forming hypotheſes. "He was miſtaken in the nature of the ſoul, "in the proofs of the exiſtence of a God, in matter, in "the laws of motion, and in the nature of light. He ad- "mitted innate ideas, invented new elements, created a "new world, and made man according to his own fancy; "and it is juſtly ſaid, that the man of des Cartes, is, in "fact, that of des Cartes alone, very different from the "real one. However, it will not be making him too "great a compliment, if we affirm, that he was valuable "even in his miſtakes. He deceived himſelf, but then it "was at leaſt in a methodical way. He deſtroyed the ab- "ſurd chimeras with which mankind had been infatuated "for two thouſand years. He taught his cotemporaries "how to reaſon, and enabled them to employ his own wea- "pons againſt himſelf."

Cartes (Catherine des) the niece of Rene des Cartes, diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her wit and learning. She wrote in a very eaſy and elegant ſtyle, both in verſe and proſe. The poetical collection of P. Bouhours, and the poetical works of the counteſs de la Suze, have ſome of her pieces. She was cloſely connected with the ingenious mademoiſelle de Scuderi, and died in 1706.

CARTHAGENA (John) was firſt a Jeſuit, and afterwards a Franciſcan. He was born in Spain, and was a profeſſor in Salamanca: he afterwards went to Rome, and taught divinity there with applauſe, under the pontificate of Paul V. No man was ever more devoted to the intereſt of the court of Rome, or ever exaggerated more the rights of the popes. This appears by the works he publiſhed, on the diſputes between Paul V. and the republic of Venice. He died at Naples in 1617.

Carthagena, a city of Spain, in the kingdom of Murcia, and capital of the territory of the ſame name. It is moderately large, and was formerly a biſhop's ſee, which is now tranſlated to Murcia. It has been much more conſiderable than it is now, having been built by the Carthaginians in the time of the ſecond Punic War, who made it a magazine and an arſenal. It became a conſiderable place in a very ſhort time, and at length was advanced to be the chief city of Spain. Notwithſtanding the great care they took of it, Scipio was ſo fortunate as to take it in one day, in the year of Rome, 544, and found a prodigious quantity of riches therein. Six hundred years after it was demoliſhed by the Vandals, and then by the Goths. It continued a long while buried under its ruins; but the conveniency of its port drew many people thither, who rebuilt it, and in the reign of Philip II. it was inhabited five or six hundred families. It was therefore in that reign ſurrounded with walls, and fortified, to defend it from the Moors and Turks, and from that time it has been in a more flouriſhing condition. The port is the beſt in all Spain, and one of the principal in Europe. It is ſeated at the bottom of a ſmall bay, five hundred paces in length, and about ſix or ſeven hundred at the mouth. The anchoring is ſo good, that it will commodiouſly hold two hundred galleys. The bay yields plenty of Mackarel, and in the neighbourhood precious ſtones have been found. But the greateſt advantage ariſes from the alum mines, for they bring in forty thouſand ducats yearly. This city is defended by a fortreſs built about one hundred and ſixty years ago. It was taken by ſir John Leak in 1706, and ſoon after retaken by the duke of Berwick. It is twenty-eight miles ſouth of Murcia. Long 0. 58. W. Lat. 37. 36. N.

CARTHAGENA, a large ſtrong town of America, the capital of a province of the ſame name, on the coaſt of Terra Firma, with a biſhop's ſee. It was built about the year 1562, and has three forts, Bocca Chica, Santa Cruz, and St. Lazaro. Its port is accounted the beſt in all Spaniſh America. It carries on a prodigious trade, particularly in pearls, which renders it one of the richeſt and moſt important towns in that part of the world. All the king of Spain's revenue from New Grenada and Terra Firma is brought to this place. The entrance into the harbour is ſo narrow, that no more than one ſhip can paſs at a time. However, it was taken by ſir Francis Drake in 1585, and by Ponti, the French admiral, in 1697. But when it was beſieged by admiral Vernon in 1741, the Engliſh were obliged to leave it, after they had made themſelves maſters of all the forts and harbours.

Caſimani is the ſuburb, and is called the Lower Town, as Carthagena is the Upper. It is ſeated in a peninſula, which is a large ſandy plain, joined to the main land by a cauſeway three hundred paces long, and twelve broad, which has two arches under it to let the tide in and out. The town is well built, and has five ſtreets, that reach from the port or weſtern part, almoſt to the oppoſite ſhore. Each of theſe ſtreets is about ſix hundred paces long, and has fine houſes on each ſide, with courts and gardens. The moſt remarkable buildings are the town-houſe and cuſtom-houſe. They have a convent of Dominican Friars, and another of Franciſcans. Long. 76. 50. W. Lat. 10. 30. N.

The government of Carthagena is bounded on the north-weſt by the North Sea, on the eaſt by Rio Grande, and the river Madelena, on the ſouth by the audience of Santa Fe, and on the weſt by the river and gulph of Darien. It is full of hills, mountains, and woods, in which are a great number of wild beaſts.

CARTHAGO, a conſiderable town of Mexico, and in the province of Coſta Rica, with a biſhop's ſee, and a Spaniſh governor. It is a rich trading town. Long. 81. 20. W. Lat. 9. 5. N.

CARTIER (James) a famous French mariner, born at St. Malo's, who, it is ſaid, ſailed to Canada in 1534, and gave an exact deſcription of the iſlands, coaſts, ſtreights, and other places he diſcovered.

CARTMEL, a town in Lancaſhire, with a market on Mondays. It is ſeated near a bay of the Iriſh ſea, not far from the river Kent, and is beautified with a handſome church, built, like a cathedral, in the form of a croſs. The market is well ſupplied with corn, fleſh, and fiſh. The fairs are on Whitſunday, and the firſt Tueſday after October 23, both for pedlar wares. It is twelve miles north-by-weſt of Lancaſter, and two hundred and fifty-nine north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 43. W. Lat. 54. 15. N.

CARTWRIGHT (Thomas) a learned Engliſh divine in the ſixteenth century, was, during ſome years, profeſſor of divinity at Cambridge, but eſpouſing the cauſe of the Nonconformiſts, was deprived of his place; on which he retired to Geneva, where he contracted an acquaintance with Theodore Beza, who entertained an extraordinary eſteem for him. Mr. Cartwright was ſucceſſively paſtor of a congregation at Antwerp, and at Middleburg; but at length returned to England, and preached at Warwick, where he died in 1603. His principal works are, Commentaries on the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, and St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Coloſſians, in Latin; and, A Confutation of the Rhemiſh Tranſlation of the New Teſtament, in folio.

CARTWRIGHT (Christopher) a learned divine, well verſed in ſacred antiquities, was born at York in 1602, and was miniſter there till his death, which happened in 1658. His principal work is entitled, Electa Targumico-Rabbinica in Geneſim & in Exodum.

CARTWRIGHT (William) an eminent divine and poet, born at Northway, near Tewkſbury, in Glouceſterſhire, in September, 1611. He finiſhed his education at Oxford, afterwards went into holy orders, and became a moſt florid preacher in the univerſity. In 1642 he had the place of ſuccentor in the church of Saliſbury, and, in 1643, was choſen junior proctor in the univerſity. He was alſo metaphyſical reader there. Wit, judgment, elocution, a graceful perſon and behaviour, occaſioned that encomium of him from dean Fell. "That he was the utmoſt that man could "come to" He was an expert linguiſt, he underſtanding not only Greek and Latin, but French and Italian, as perfectly as his mother tongue; he was alſo an excellent orator, and at the ſame time was eſteemed an admirable poet. There are extant of his four Plays, and ſome Poems. This ingenious gentleman died December 23, 1643, in the thirty-third year of his age.

CARVEI (Jacopo) a celebrated painter. See Puntormo.

CARVILIUS Maximus (Spurius) a celebrated Roman commander, was conſul with Papirius Curſor, two hundred and ninety-three years before the birth of Chriſt. He took Amiterno, killed two thouſand eight hundred men, took four thouſand priſoners, and made himſelf maſter of Cominium, Palumbi, Herculaneum, and other places. At his return to Rome he was honoured with a triumph.

It is ſaid that Carvilius his ſon, who was alſo conſul, was the firſt Roman who repudiated his wife, about two hundred and thirty-one years before the Chriſtian æra; but others attribute this innovation to Carvilius Ruga.

CARUS (Marcus Aurelius) a native of Narbonne, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his conduct, and was elected emperor at the death of Probus in 282. He defeated the Sermates and Perſians, and nominated his two ſons, Carinus and Numerianus, cæſars; but, after a reign of ſixteen months, was killed at Cteſiphonte by lightning.

CARWAR, a town on the coaſt of Malabar, in the Eaſt Indies, where the Engliſh have a factory, from whence they import pepper. It is ſixty miles ſouth of Goa. Long. 73. 6 E. Lat. 15. 0. N.

CARY (Henry) afterwards created viſcount Falkland, was the ſon of Sir Edward Cary, knight, and was born at Aldenham in Hertfordſhire. He was educated at Oxford, and on his leaving the univerſity was introduced to court. In 1608 he was created knight of the Bath. In 1617 he was ſworn in comptroller of his majeſty's houſhold, and one of his privy-council, and on November 10, 1620, was created viſcount of Falkland, in the county of Fife, in Scotland. He was two years after conſtituted lord deputy of Ireland; but keeping a ſtrict hand over the Roman catholics in that kingdom, their clamours againſt him, and the prevailing power of his popiſh enemies, cauſed him to be removed in the year 1629. He wrote ſeveral things which never were publiſhed, except the Hiſtory of the moſt unfortunate Prince Edward the ſecond, found among his papers, and printed in 1680, in folio and octavo. He died in 1633.

CARY (Lucius) eldeſt ſon of Henry lord viſcount Falkland, the ſubject of the laſt article, was born, as is ſuppoſed, at Burford in Oxfordſhire, about the year 1610, and received his academical learning at Trinity college, Dublin, and in St. John's college, Cambridge, after which he was ſent to travel. At his return to England he applied himſelf to polite literature, and particularly to poetry, in which he made ſuch ſucceſsful attempts, that he gained the eſteem and admiration of the moſt eminent poets of his time, particularly of Ben Jonſon and Sir John Suckling. In 1639 he was in the expedition againſt the Scots; and in 1640 was choſen member for Newport in the Iſle of Wight, in the parliament which began at Weſtminſter on the 13th of April of the ſame year; and from the unhappy and unſeaſonable diſſolution of that parliament he grew jealous of the court. He was choſen again for the ſame place, in the parliament which began the 3d of November following; and in the beginning of it declared himſelf very ſharply againſt thoſe meaſures taken by the court that were thought moſt grievous to the ſtate. He impeached the lord Finch, concurred in the impeachment of the earl of Strafford, and in the firſt bill to take away the votes of the biſhops in the houſe of lords. He was however afterwards made a privy-counſellor and ſecretary of ſtate. He attended the king to Edgehill-fight; was alſo with his majeſty at Oxford, and at the ſiege at Glouceſter: but from the beginning of the civil war his natural chearfulneſs and vivacity left him; and the extreme uneaſineſs he felt on account of the calamities of his country, ſeems to have hurried him on to his deſtruction. For the morning before the firſt battle of Newbury, he called for a clean ſhirt, and being aſked the reaſon of it, anſwered, That if he were ſlain in the battle they ſhould not find his body in foul linen. Being diſſuaded by his friends from going into the fight, as having no call to it, and being no military officer; he ſaid he was weary of the times, and foreſaw much miſery to his country, but believed he ſhould be out of it before night. Putting himſelf therefore into the firſt rank of lord Byron's regiment, he was ſhot with a muſquet in the lower part of the belly, September 20, 1643, and the ſame inſtant fell from his horſe; but his body was not found till the next morning. As this noblenobleman's parts were great, ſo alſo were his knowledge and learning very conſiderable, of which he has left ſeveral ſignal proofs in his writings, which are 1. Poems. 2. Several Speeches. 3. A Diſcourſe concerning Epiſcopacy. 4. A Diſcourſe on the Infallibility of the Church of Rome, &c.

CARY (HENRY) earl of Monmouth, was grandſon to Henry lord Hunſdon, couſin-german to queen Elizabeth. In his tender age he was educated with the duke of York, afterwards Charles I. Before he entered upon his travels, he received this admonition from Charles, "Be always doing ſomething while you are abroad." It appeared that he acted in conformity to that prince's advice, as he returned home a complete maſter of the languages of thoſe countries through which he paſſed. He was a great ſufferer by the civil war, particularly by the death of his ſon, a young gentleman of great hopes, who was killed at Marſton-Moor. He ſeemed, indeed, to have diſtruſted his abilities as a ſoldier; for while ſome of the nobility were actually embroiled in this war, and others were miſerable from the effects of it, he enjoyed the calm pleaſures of a ſtudious retirement. He compoſed nothing of his own, but tranſlated from Malvezzi, Bentivoglio, Paruta, Biondi, &c. no leſs than ſeven folios, two octavos, and a duodecimo. He died on the 13th of June 1661, at ſixty-five years of age, and was interred in the church of Rickmanſworth in Hertfordſhire. Mr. Granger's Biographical Hiſtory of England.

CARY (ROBERT) a learned chronologer in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Cockinton in the county of Devon, about the year 1615, and having ſtudied for ſome years in the univerſity of Oxford, was ſent to travel. At his return he was preſented to the rectory of Portlemouth in Devonſhire, and at the reſtoration was preferred to the archdeaconry of Exeter, but was ſoon after ejected, when he retired to his rectory of Portlemouth, where he ſpent the remainder of his days. He wrote an excellent work in folio, entitled, Palæologia Chronica, i. e. a Chronological Account of ancient Times. He died in September 1688, aged ſeventy-three.

CARYA, Χάρυα, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival in honour of Diana, ſurnamed Caryathis, from Caryum in Laconia, where this ſolemnity was obſerved. It was uſual for virgins to meet at the celebration of this feaſt, and join in a certain dance, ſaid to be invented by Caſtor and Pollux.

CARYL (JOSEPH) a moderate independent miniſter, was ſome time a commoner at Exeter college in Oxford. He was one of the aſſembly of divines, and a frequent preacher before the long parliament, in the reign of king Charles I. He was ſeveral times appointed to attend upon that unhappy prince, particularly when he was a priſoner at Holdenby, and a little before his death; but the king waved all offers of his ſervice. In 1650, he and Dr. Owen were, by order of parliament, ſent to attend Cromwell in Scotland, and to officiate as miniſters. He was a man of parts and learning, and of indefatigable induſtry. He wrote a conſiderable number of ſermons, but his great work is a Commentary on Job, in two volumes folio, which conſiſt of upwards of ſix hundred ſheets. It is alſo printed in two volumes quarto. He died in February 1672-3.

CASAL, a ſtrong town in Italy, and capital of Montferrat. The duke of Mantua ſold it to the French in 1681, who afterwards ſeized the town. In 1695 it was reſtored to the allies, who diſmantled the town, and demoliſhed the caſtle and citadel. The French afterwards took it again, but the king of Sardinia became maſter of it in 1706. The French in 1745 got it again into their poſſeſſion, and the king of Sardinia drove them out in March 1746. It is ſeated on the river Po, thirty-eight miles north-eaſt of Turin, thirty-five ſouth-weſt of Milan, and fifty north-weſt of Genoa. Long. 8. 37. E. Lat. 45. 7. N.

CASAL MAGGIORE, a town of Italy in the duchy of Milan, ſeated on the river Po, twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Cremona, and fourteen north of Parma. Long. 11. 5. E. Lat. 45. 6. N.

CASAN, a conſiderable town in Aſia, capital of a kingdom of the ſame name. It is ſeated on the river Caſanka, in a ſpacious plain, four miles from the Volga. It is pretty large, but all the houſes are built of wood, only the caſtle and fortifications are built of ſtone. The inhabitants are Muſcovites and Tartars. Great numbers of theſe are in the neighbourhood, who ſupply the market with horſes, ſheep, and other cattle. This town has ſeveral manufactures of red Ruſſia leather, and ſends large quantities of it yearly to Peterſburgh. It had formerly a great trade to Khieva and Bokara, which is now loſt. However Turky ſupplies them with wine and fruits, Moſcow with groceries and European commodities, Siberia and Tartary with furs and all kinds of iron works: the caravans which annually arrive from China, bring them plenty of tea. In ſhort, it is a great magazine of all kinds of merchandize. Here is a conſiderable admiralty-yard, where they build a great number of ſmacks, fly-boats, and other veſſels. Proviſions in general are very cheap, great quantities of which are ſent down to Aſtracan, and to all the towns and ſettlements on the Volga. This province reaches quite to Siberia, and abounds in oaks. They have plenty of cattle, tallow, and excellent wood for the building of ſhips. Caſan was taken by the czar John Baſilowitz in 1551, and his ſon became maſter of the whole kingdom in 1554. Long. 51. 35. E. Lat. 55. 38. N.

CASA-NOVA (MARC ANTONY) a Latin poet, born at Rome, ſucceeded particularly in epigrams, by his gay, lively, and pleaſant ſatire. The poems he compoſed in honour of the illuſtrious men of ancient Rome, are alſo much eſteemed. He died in the year 1527.

CASA (JOHN DE LA) one of the politeſt Italian writers in the fifteenth century, was born at Florence, and became archbiſhop of Benevento. He was employed in ſeveral important negotiations by the popes, and died at Rome in 1557, beloved and eſteemed by the learned. He wrote ſeveral Italian books, both in verſe and proſe, with much wit and delicacy.

CASAS (BARTHOLOMEW DE LAS) biſhop of Chiapa, diſtinguiſhed for his humanity and zeal for the converſion and liberty of the Indians, was born at Seville in 1474, and went with his father, who ſailed to America with Chriſtopher Columbus in 1493. At his return to Spain he embraced the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic, and obtained a curacy in the iſland of Cuba; but ſome time after quitted his cure, in order to procure liberty for the Indians, whom he ſaw treated by the Spaniards in the moſt cruel and barbarous manner, which very naturally gave them an unconquerable averſion to Chriſtianity. Bartholemew de las Caſas exerted himſelf with extraordinary zeal for fifty years together, in his endeavours to perſuade the Spaniards that they ought to treat the Indians with equity and mildneſs, and to ſet them a good example, for which he ſuffered a number of perſecutions from his countrymen. He nevertheleſs obtained from Charles V. the power of informing againſt the governors of the Indies. He then became a Dominican, and procured ſeveral eſtabliſhments in Peru for the monks of that order. He returned to Spain in 1543, when the court, moved by his continual remonſtrances, made laws in favour of the Indians, and gave orders to the governors to obſerve them and ſee them executed. After having refuſed ſeveral biſhopricks in America, he was obliged in 1544 to accept of that of Chiapa. He reſided there till 1551, when he was forced to return to Spain for the ſake of his health. He then reſigned his biſhopric, and died at Madrid in 1566, aged ninety-two. He wrote ſeveral works, which breathe nothing but humanity and virtue; we there ſee ſolidity of judgment, a pleaſing rectitude of heart, true piety, and profound erudition; the principal of them are, 1. An Account of the Deſtruction of the Indies. 2. Several treatiſes in favour of the Indians, againſt Dr. Sepulveda, who wrote a book to juſtify the inhuman barbarities committed by the Spaniards. 3. A very curious and ſcarce work in Latin, on this queſtion: "Whether kings or princes can, conſiſtently with conſcience, or in virtue of any right or title, alienate their ſubjects, and place them under the dominion of another ſovereign?"

CASATI (PAUL) a learned Jeſuit, born at Placentia, in 1617, entered early among the Jeſuits, and after having taught mathematics and divinity at Rome, was ſent into Sweden to queen Chriſtina, whom he prevailed on to embrace the popiſh religion. He wrote, 1. Vacuum proſcriptum. 2. Terra Machinis mota. 3. Machanicorum, libri octo. 4. De Igne Diſſertationes, which is much eſteemed. 5. De Angelis Diſputatio Theolog. 6. Hydroſtaticæ Diſſertationes. 7. Opticæ Diſputationes. It is remarkable that he wrote this treatiſe on Optics at eighty-eight years of age, and after he was blind. He alſo wrote ſeveral books in Italian, and died at Parma, at ninety-one years of age.

CASAUBON (ISAAC) a learned critic, born at Geneva, February 18, 1559. He was educated at firſt by his father, and made ſo quick a progreſs in his ſtudies, that at the age of nine years he could ſpeak and write Latin with great eaſe and correctneſs. He learnt the Greek tongue under Francis Portus, of the Iſle of Candy, who was profeſſor of that language, and whom he ſucceeded in the year 1582, this profeſſorſhip he enjoyed fourteen years, and in that time ſtudied philoſophy and civil law, under Julius Pacius. He was afterwards profeſſor at Montpellier: at length he was invited by Henry IV. of France to a profeſſorſhip at Paris, and in 1603 was alſo appointed his library-keeper. He was frequently ſollicited by his friends of the Roman Catholic religion to abandon the proteſtant faith, but in vain. In 1610 he obtained leave of the queen of France to come over to England, with ſir James Wotton, embaſſador extraordinary from James I. and was extremely well received. He died July 1, 1614, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey. This great man was admired not only on account of his profound learning, but likewiſe for his modeſty, ſincerity, verity, and probity. He wrote, 1. Notes on Diogenes Laertius. 2. Lectures upon Theocritus. 3. Notes upon Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. 4. A Commentary upon Suetonius. 5. An edition of Athenæus. 6. A treatiſe on Eccleſiaſtical Liberty; and many other learned pieces.

CASAUBON (MERIC) ſon of the preceding, was born at Geneva, Auguſt 14, 1599. He began his firſt ſtudies at Sedan, and continued them in England, whither he came with his father. He was inſtructed by a private maſter, till 1614, when he was ſent to Chriſt-church college, in Oxford. After ſeveral promotions in the church, he was made a prebendary of Canterbury; collated to the vicarages of Minſter and Monckton, in the Iſle of Thanet, and created doctor of divinity; but about the year 1644, during the heat of the civil wars, he was deprived of his preferments, abuſed, fined, and impriſoned. In 1649 he was ſeveral times ſollicited by meſſages from Oliver Cromwell to write the hiſtory of the laſt war; but though he abſolutely refuſed this employment, Cromwell was ſo ſenſible of his merit, that as a teſtimony of it, he ordered there ſhould be delivered to him three or four hundred pounds, by a particular bookſeller in London, whenever his occaſions ſhould require it, without acknowledging, at the receipt of it, who was his benefactor. He had alſo a noble propoſal made him by Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, to induce him to ſettle in her dominions; but he ſtaid in England, and at the Reſtoration recovered his preferments. He was the author of ſeveral learned works, as, an Engliſh Tranſlation of M. Aurelius Antoninus's Meditations; and of Lucius Florus; editions of ſeveral of the claſſics, with notes; a Treatiſe of Uſe and Cuſtom; a Treatiſe of Enthuſiaſm; and many other works. He died July 14, 1671.

CASBIN, or CASWIN, a large city of Perſia, in Irac-Agemi, ſeated in a fine plain, nine miles from the mountain Elwend. This is one of the higheſt and moſt famous mountains in all Perſia, it being a branch of Mount Taurus. The greateſt length of this city is from north to ſouth, and is about ſix miles in compaſs. It was formerly ſurrounded with a wall, ſome of the ruins of which are ſtill remaining. It once contained one hundred thouſand inhabitants, among whom were about forty families of Chriſtians, and one hundred of Jews, all very poor. The houſes are built with brick dried in the ſun, and are all flat on the top; but the greateſt part are now demoliſhed. The ſtreets are not paved, which makes them very duſty when there is any wind. It has no water but what is brought from the mountain Elwend, through aquæducts, into ciſterns, or tanks. Almoſt every family preſerves ice and ſnow for the ſummer ſeaſon. There are two maidans or market-places, and on one ſide of the largeſt there are ſeveral palaces belonging to great men. The other maidan is in the weſt part of the city. Beſides theſe there are bazars, or covered ſtreets, where are warehouſes and ſhops, frequented by a great number of merchants, in which there are a variety of goods and merchandizes, ſold at very reaſonable rates.

In the evening, after the ſhops are ſhut, there are a great number of common women, placed in rows, with their faces covered with veils, and behind them ſtands a bawd, who has a bed and a coverlid. When a cuſtomer comes, ſhe lights a candle that he may view their faces, and chooſe which he likes beſt.

The old royal palace has ſeven gates, and the gardens belonging to it are handſome and well kept. Adjoining to which is a new one, built by Nadir Shah, the entrance of which is through an avenue of trees, near three hundred yards long, and fifteen or twenty broad. The wall which is about it is a mile and a half in circumference. There is only one entrance through it, which is an arched gate. Within are four large ſquares, with lofty trees, fountains, and running water. The apartments are raiſed ſix feet from the ground, and ornamented in the Indian taſte. The windows are made with glaſs, curiouſly painted. The royal moſque is one of the largeſt and fineſt in all Perſia. It ſtands at the end of a great ſtreet planted with tall trees, which begin at the great gate of the king's palace. The caravanſerais or public inns are very handſome. The royal caravanſerai has two hundred and fifty rooms, with a great baſon of water ſurrounded with trees in the middle of the court. There are alſo two gates which lead to the court, through two ſtreets of ſhops, where the moſt precious commodities are ſold. There are not ſo many gardens here as at the other cities, becauſe the ſoil is dry and ſandy, and water is ſcarce. The air is groſs and unhealthy, eſpecially in ſummer, there being no river to carry off the filth. However, there are great plenty of proviſions, becauſe the fields at ſome diſtance are well watered, and abound with cattle, corn, piſtachio-nuts, and excellent grapes. The weather is extremely hot in the day-time in ſummer; but the nights are ſo cool, that it is dangerous to be out in them without warm cloaths. Long. 48. 6. E. Lat. 36. 30. N.

CASEL (JOHN) born at Gottingen, in 1533, was profeſſor of philoſophy and eloquence at Roſtock and Helmſtat. He ſtudied the Greek fathers, wrote ſeveral works, and died at Helmſtat, in 1613, aged eighty.

CASERTA, a town of Naples, in the Terra di Lavoro, with the title of a duchy, and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated at the foot of the mountain Caſerta, eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Capua, and twelve eaſt of Naples. Long. 15. 5. E. Lat. 41. 5. N.

CASHAN, a city of Perſia, in the province of Irac Agemi, is ſeated in a ſpacious plain, near a high mountain, and is about three miles in length, and three quarters of a mile in breadth, and when beheld at a diſtance reſembles a half moon. It has no river, but ſeveral ſubterraneous canals bring the water into ciſterns. It is ſurrounded with double walls, and flanked with towers, built in the antique manner. It has five gates, whereof one at the eaſt is called the Royal Gate, becauſe it is near the king's palace. The city and ſuburbs may contain about ſix thouſand five hundred houſes, forty moſques, three colleges, and more than two hundred tombs of the deſcendants of Ali. The principal moſque is over-againſt the great market, and has a tower built with free-ſtone. The houſes are built with earth and bricks, and are very ordinary. But the bagnios are handſome buildings, and kept very neat. The royal caravanſerai is without the city, near the eaſtern gate, and is not only the moſt magnificent in Caſhan, but in all Perſia. There is a great manufacture carried on of ſilks, velvets, and gold and ſilver brocades. The bazar, the meidan, and other public ſtructures, have all their ſtore-houſes, galleries, and rooms for merchants. The Indians, of whom there are a great number, have a particular place for their habitation and trade. The weavers work in open places, where they may be ſeen by all paſſengers.

The air of Caſhan is good, but extremely hot, inſomuch that the inhabitants can hardly breathe in ſummer. This place has been remarkable for a great number of ſcorpions, whoſe ſting is dangerous; but they are now ſo diminiſhed, that travellers ſeldom or never meet with them. The valleys about the city are fruitful in wheat, wine, and fruit, inſomuch that the pooreſt inhabitant may have ſomewhat for pleaſure as well as the neceſſaries of life. Long. 50. 2. E. Lat. 34. 15. N.

CASHEL, a town of the county of Tipperary, in the province of Munſter, in Ireland, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is thirteen miles north-weſt of Clonmel, and eighty ſouth-weſt of Dublin. Long. 7. 36. W. Lat. 52. 16. N.

CASHMIRE. See CASSMIRE.

CASIMIR I. king of Poland. In his youth he went into France incognto, ſtudied at Paris, became a monk at Cluni, and took deacon's orders; but the Poles having diſcovered the place of his retreat, obtained from pope Benedict X. leave for him to govern his dominions, and to marry. On which he married Mary, the daughter of Ulodomir, duke of Ruſſia; governed his dominions with great wiſdom, civilized the Poles, defeated Maſſas, duke of Moſcovy, in 1044; took Sileſia from the Bohemians, founded a great number of churches, eſtabliſhed an epiſcopal ſee at Breſlaw, and died on the 28th of November, 1058, after a reign of eighteen years.

CASIMIR III. called the Great, was born in 1309, and crowned king of Poland in 1333. He defeated John, king of Bohemia, from whom he took ſeveral places, and afterwards conquered Ruſſia. But, notwithſtanding this, he was a lover of peace; he founded and protected the churches and hoſpitals; built a great number of fortreſſes, and by his mildneſs, clemency, and juſtice, obtained the love of all his ſubjects. He died of a fall from his horſe, on the 8th of September, 1370, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, and the thirty-ſeventh of his reign.

CASIMIR V (JOHN) the ſon of Sigiſmund III. by his ſecond wife Conſtance of Auſtria, was deſigned for the church. He was made a Jeſuit, and Innocent X. gave him a cardinal's hat. But the Poles chuſing him for their king in 1648, after the death of his brother Ladiſlaus Sigiſmund, he obtained a diſpenſation from the pope for marrying Mary de Gonzague, his brother's widow. He was defeated by Charles Guſtavus, king of Sweden; but at length drove him out of his dominions, and in 1660 concluded a peace with his ſucceſſor. His army defeated the Moſcovites in 1661. Caſimir afterwards repreſſed a ſedition raiſed in his dominions; and then, abdicating the crown, went to France, where Lewis XIV. gave him a kind reception, and allowed him a princely penſion; but being of a weak conſtitution, he fell ſick at Nevers, where he died, on the 14th of December, 1672.

CASIMIR (St.) the ſon of Caſimir IV. king of Poland, and grand duke of Lithuania, was born in 1458. He diſcovered in all his actions great piety, an inviolable chaſtity, and a zeal for the popiſh religion. He died on the 4th of March, 1482, in the twenty-fourth year of his age, and was canonized by Paul V.

CASIMIR (MATTHIAS SARBIEWSKI) a moſt excellent Latin poet, and a Jeſuit of Poland, was born in 1597. His odes, epodes, and epigrams have been thought equal to ſome of the productions of the fineſt wits of ancient Greece and Rome; and Grotius, Daniel Heinſius, and many others have not ſcrupled to affirm that he is ſometimes ſuperior, even to Horace himſelf. Dr. Watts has tranſlated one or two of his ſmall pieces, which are added to his lyric poems. He died at Warſaw, on the 2d of April, 1640, at forty-five years of age, ſince which there have been many editions of his poems, the beſt of which is that of Paris, in 1759.

CASPIAN SEA, a vaſt lake in Aſia, which is called a ſea, becauſe its waters are ſalt. The north end lies in forty-ſix degrees twenty-two minutes of latitude, and the ſouth in thirty-ſix degrees forty-five minutes; and is therefore five hundred and ſeventy-ſeven miles long, reckoning ſixty to a degree. The narroweſt part from eaſt to weſt is one hundred miles over, and the broadeſt three hundred and ſixty. All geographers, till very lately, ſuppoſed that ſeveral rivers ran into it on the eaſt ſide, which are now known to fall into the Aral, another vaſt lake, but much more inconſiderable than the Caſpian Sea. However, it receives the Jamba, the Yaic, the Volga, the Kur, and ſeveral other rivers which run from the mountains of Georgia, and the adjacent countries. Theſe are on the north or weſt ſide. On the weſt there are none; for the river is dried up, or loſt in the ſand, and the Sihun and Gihun, ſo often mentioned in the oriental writers, run into the lake Aral. We have therefore no need of a pretended communication between this ſea and the ocean, for accounting why it riſes no higher. We may rather wonder why it continues ſo full, conſidering its vaſt extent, and how much water is evaporated by the ſun, and bruſhed off by the wind. It is poſſible in extremely wet cloudy years, that it may riſe ſo high as to overflow its banks; but this is ſeldom or never the caſe; otherwiſe ſome hiſtorian would have taken notice of it. The navigation on this ſea is often dangerous, from the boiſterous winds, and the ſhallows near the ſhores. It has great plenty of fiſh, which ſome pretend are better than in the ocean. Long. from 49. to 55. E.

CASSAGNES (JAMES) doctor of divinity, and member of the French academy, was born at Niſmes, of very wealthy parents. He went when young to Paris, and there applied himſelf to preaching and poetry. The ode he wrote in 1660, in praiſe of the French academy, occaſioned his being received into that academy, at twenty-ſeven years of age; and the poem he publiſhed the following year, acquired him the eſteem of M. Colbert, who procured him a penſion, and the place of keeper of the king's library. The abbé Caſſagnes was on the point of preaching before the court, when Boileau, joining him and Cotin together in his third ſatire, this cenſure of his ſermons, made him leave off preaching, and imagining that he had loſt the eſteem of the public, he endeavoured to re-eſtabliſh his reputation by publiſhing one work after another, but his too great application diſordered his brain, which obliged his relations to put him into the hoſpital of St. Lazarus, where he died, on the 19th of May, 1679, aged forty-ſix.

CASSAN, king of Perſia, defeated Baidu in 1294, and abjured the Chriſtian religion, in order to maintain himſelf on the throne. Some time after he returned to the faith, entered into an alliance with the Chriſtian princes, and ſubdued Syria. He died in 1304, very much regretted by the Chriſtians.

CASSANDER, king of Macedon, after Alexander the Great, was the ſon of Antipater. He made ſeveral conqueſts in Greece, aboliſhed democracy at Athens, and gave the government of that ſtate to the orator Demetrius. Olympias, the mother of Alexander, having cauſed Aridæus and his wife Eurydice, with others of Caſſander's party, to be put to death, he beſieged Pydne, whither the queen had retired, took it by a ſtratagem, and cauſed Olympias to be put to death. He married Theſſalonica, Alexander's ſiſter, and killed Roxana and Alexander, the wife and ſon of that conqueror. At length he entered into an alliance with Seleucus and Lyſimachus, againſt Antigonus and Demetrius, over whom he obtained a great victory near Ipſus, a city of Phrygia, three hundred and one years before the Chriſtian æra, and died three years after, in the nineteenth year of his reign.

CASSANDER (GEORGE) one of the greateſt men in his time, was born at Bruges, or, according to others, in the iſle of Caſſand, in 1515. He was well verſed in the languages, in polite learning, law, and divinity. And though he always continued of the popiſh perſuaſion, no writer ever ſhewed more zeal for conciliating peoples minds, in relation to religious controverſies, more moderation in his writings, more mildneſs and probity of manners, or more diſintereſtedneſs of conduct. He died in 1566. His works were printed at Paris, in 1616, in folio.

CASSANDRA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was beloved by Apollo, who conſented to give her the ſpirit of prophecy, on condition of her afterwards conſenting to the gratification of his paſſion. Caſſandra ſeemed to accept the propoſal, but had no ſooner obtained that gift, that ſhe laughed at the tempter, and broke her word with him. Apollo, being enraged, revenged himſelf by cauſing no credit to be given to her predictions; for which reaſon, ſhe in vain propheſied the ruin of Troy. Ajax, the ſon of Oileus, having raviſhed her in the temple of Minerva, he was ſtruck with thunder. She fell into the hands of Agamemnon, who loved her to diſtraction: but in vain did ſhe predict that he would be aſſaſſinated in his own country. He was killed with her by the intrigues of Clytemneſtra; but their death was avenged by Oreſtes.

CASSANDRA (FIDELIS) a very learned Venetian lady, who publiſhed Letters, and other works, which have been greatly praiſed by the learned. She died in a very advanced age, about the year 1567.

CASSANDRE (FRANCIS) a Frenchman of learning, and a poet, in the ſeventeenth century; who was of ſo ſavage and ill-natured a diſpoſition, that nobody would keep him company; which made him loſe all the advantages he might have derived from his literary merit. Boileau mentions him in his firſt ſatire, under the name of Damon. He wrote, 1. An excellent Tranſlation of Ariſtotle's Rhetoric, the beſt editions of which are thoſe of 1675, 1698. and 1718, and the laſt, which is that of the Hague, is moſt eſteemed. 2 Les Paralleles Hiſteriques. He died in the year 1695.

CASSANO, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Milan, rendered remarkable by an obſtinate battle fought there between the Germans and the French, in 1705. It is ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria, and is ſeated on the river Adda, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Milan. Long. 10. 0. E. Lat. 45. 20. N.

CASSANO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, in Calabria Citerior, with a biſhop's ſee. It is five miles from the gulph of Torrento, eighteen north-weſt of Roſſano, and thirty-eight north of Coſenza. Long. 16. 30. E. Lat. 39. 55. N.

CASSEL, a town of French Flanders, and capital of a Chattellany of the ſame name; it was taken by the French in 1677, and ceded to them in 1678, by the treaty of Nimeguen. It is ſeated on a mountain, where the terrace of the caſtle is ſtill to be ſeen, and from whence there is one of the fineſt proſpects in the world; for one may ſee no leſs than thirty-two towns, with a great extent of the ſea, from whence it is diſtant fifteen miles. It is ten miles north-eaſt of St. Omers, nineteen ſouth-eaſt of Gravelines, fifteen ſouth-eaſt of Dunkirk, and one hundred and thirty north of Paris. Long. 2. 27. E. Lat. 50. 48. N.

CASSEL, the capital city of the landgravate of Heſſe-Caſſel, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, in Germany; is divided into the Old, New, and High Towns. The new town is beſt built, the houſes being of ſtone, and the ſtreets broad; among which there are very handſome palaces. The houſes of the old town, which is within the walls, are moſtly of timber. However, the ſtreets are broad, and the market-places ſpacious. It has four churches, the principal of which is that of St. Martin, which was formerly the cathedral, in which are the monuments of the landgraves, with their buſts in marble and copper. The fortifications of the town are not very regular, but the palace is as ſtrongly fortified as a citadel. It has noble apartments, richly furniſhed, and a beautiful proſpect of the adjacent country. It contains many curioſities, which are well worth a traveller's notice, as well as the gardens, the arſenal, and the library. There is a church for French proteſtants, who are the chief inhabitants of the new town, and carry on a woollen manufacture. It is ſeated on the declivity of a hill, near the river Fulva, forty-eight miles north-eaſt of Marpurg, twenty-eight north-eaſt of Waldeck, and forty ſouth-eaſt of Paderborn. Long. 9. 20. E. Lat. 51. 20. N.

CASSIAN (JOHN) a famous anchoret, born in Scythia. He ſpent a part of his life in the monaſtery of Bethlehem, with his friend the monk Germanus, and defended St. Chryſoſtom againſt Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria. He went to Rome, and from thence to Marſeilles, where he founded two monaſteries, one for men, and the other for virgins. He died about the year 433, and left the following works, which are written in Latin, in a clear, ſimple, and inſinuating ſtyle. 1. Conferences of the Fathers of the Deſart. 2. Inſtitutions, in twelve books; and ſeven Books on the Incarnation.

CASSINI (JOHN DOMINIC) a famous aſtronomer, born of a noble family in the county of Nice, on the 8th of June, 1625. After he had laid a proper foundation for his ſtudies at home, he was ſent to continue them in a college of Jeſuits, at Genoa. He had an extraordinary turn for Latin poetry, poetry, but at length happening to ſee ſome books of aſtronomy, he read and ſtudied them with great eagerneſs, and felt a ſtrong inclination to proceed farther in that ſcience. He purſued the bent of his inclinations, and made ſuch an amazing progreſs, that, in the year 1650, the ſenate of Bologna invited him to be their public mathematical profeſſor, upon which going to Bologna, he there taught mathematics, and made obſervations upon the heavens with great aſſiduity. In 1657 he attended a nobleman, who was ſent to Rome to compoſe ſome differences which had ariſen between Bologna and Ferrara, from the inundations of the Po, and ſhewed ſuch ſkill and judgment in the management of that affair, that, in 1663, Marius Chigi, brother of pope Alexander VII. appointed him inſpector-general of the caſtle of Urbino, and afterwards committed to his care all the rivers in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Mean while he carefully continued his aſtronomical ſtudies, and diſcovered ſeveral new things in Mars and Venus, particularly the revolution of Mars round his own axis; but the principal point he had in view was to ſettle an accurate theory of Jupiter's ſatellites, which he happily effected, and publiſhed it at Rome, among other aſtronomical pieces, in 1666. Picard, the famous French aſtronomer, found Caſſini's tables of Jupiter's ſatellites ſo very exact, that he conceived the higheſt opinion of his ſkill, and from that time his fame increaſed ſo faſt in France, that Lewis XIV. deſired to have him a member of the academy, and therefore requeſted pope Clement IX. and the ſenate of Bologna, to permit Caſſini to come to France. Leave was granted him for ſix years, and Caſſini arriving at Paris in the beginging of the year 1669, was immediately made the king's aſtronomer. When that term was near expiring, the pope and ſenate of Bologna inſiſted upon Caſſini's return, on pain of forfeiting his revenues and emoluments, which had been remitted to him; but the miniſter Colbert prevailed on him to ſtay. He was the firſt perſon who inhabited the royal obſervatory at Paris. In 1697 he demonſtrated the diurnal revolution of Jupiter round his axis, to be performed in nine hours, fifty-eight minutes, from the motion of a ſpot in one of his larger belts. In 1684 he diſcovered four of the ſatallites of Saturn, beſides that which Huygens had found out. In 1695 he took a journey to Bologna, to examine the meridian line he had fixed there in 1655; and in the year 1700, continued the meridian line thro' France, which Picard had begun, to the moſt ſouthern extremity of that country. After Caſſini had inhabited the royal obſervatory above forty years, and done great honour to himſelf and his royal maſter, by many excellent and uſeful diſcoveries, which he publiſhed from time to time, he died on the 14th of September, 1712, at eighty-ſeven years of age.

CASSIODORUS (Marcus Aurelius) ſecretary of ſtate to Theodoric, king of the Goths, was born at Squillace, in the kingdom of Naples, about the year 470. He was conſul in 514, and was in great credit under the reigns of Athalaric and Vitiges; but at ſeventy years of age retired into a monaſtery in Calabria, where he amuſed himſelf in making ſun-dials, water hour-glaſſes, and perpetual lamps. He alſo formed a library, and compoſed ſeveral works, the beſt edition of which is that of father Garet, printed at Rouen, in 1679. Thoſe moſt eſteemed are his Divine Inſtitutions, and his Treatiſe on the Soul. He died about the year 562, at above ninety-three years of age.

CASSIOPE, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, and the mother of Andromeda. The poets tell us, that boaſting ſhe was more beautiful than the Nereids, thoſe goddeſſes were ſo provoked, that they deſired Neptune to revenge them; on which he ſent into the country of Cepheus, a ſea monſter, which committed dreadful ravages. To put a ſtop to which, Andromeda was expoſed to be devoured by this monſter; but being delivered by Perſeus, that hero prevailed on Jupiter to place Caſſiope in the heavens, among the conſtellations.

CASSIUS Viscellinus (Spurius) a famous Roman, who, after having thrice enjoyed the conſular dignity, been once general of the horſe under the firſt dictator that was created at Rome, and after having twice obtained the honour of a triumph, was accuſed of aſpiring to royalty, and thrown from the Tarpeian rock, four hundred and eighty-five years before the Chriſtian æra.

Cassius Longinus (Lucius) a Roman pretor, and ſo formidable and inflexible a judge, that his tribunal was called The Rock of the Accuſed. He lived about one hundred and thirteen years before the birth of Chriſt.

Cassius Longinus (Caius) one of the greateſt men of his age, and one of the murderers of Julius Cæſar, at which time he ſaid to one of his accomplices, "Strike, tho' the dagger ſhould go through my body." He was an Epicurian, but was regular in his manners, and to him was given the elogium of being the laſt of the Romans. He was a great warrior; he made the Parthians raiſe the ſiege of Antioch, defeated them, and obliged them to abandon Syria; and Mark Anthony no longer doubted of obtaining a victory, when he heard that Caſſius was dead. Valerius Maximus ſays, that Caſſius advancing briſkly to the battle of Philippi, ſaw Cæſar in a form more auguſt than human, coming full ſpeed, with a threatening countenance, to charge him, when being aſtoniſhed at the ſight, he turned his back, ſaying, "I muſt now quit the party." Caſſius cauſed himſelf to be killed by Pindarus, forty-two years before the Chriſtian æra.

Cassius (Avidius) a celebrated Roman captain, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and conduct under the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus: after the death of the laſt, which happened in 169, he was ſaluted emperor in Syria; but was killed three months after, and his head ſent to Marcus Aurelius, in 175.

Cassius (Chærea) captain of the Roman guards, and the ringleader of the conſpirators who murdered Caligula, was a brave and worthy man, who executed, with reluctance, the ſevere commands of that tyrant. His compaſſion for the oppreſſed people made him levy the money ariſing from the taxes with leſs diſpatch than the emperor required. Caligula looked upon the humanity he exerciſed on this occaſion as a mark of cowardice, and thereupon inſulted and reproached him in a very outrageous manner, and in giving out the word to him, he ever made uſe of ſuch a ſatirical term as was expreſſive of indolence and effeminacy, which was ſure to ſet the officers and ſoldiers a laughing, to whom Caſſius was obliged to give out the word. Exaſperated to find himſelf the emperor's laughing-ſtock and the ſport of the regiment he commanded, he formed a conſpiracy, and conducted his plot with ſuch art, that Caligula was murdered, himſelf giving the firſt blow. Caſſius immediately fled to the houſe of Germanicus; when hearing that the ſenate were pleaſed with what he had done, he ſhewed himſelf to the people. One of the conſul's made a long oration in praiſe of liberty, and concluded with declaring, that all the conſpirators, eſpecially Caſſius, ought to be raiſed to the greateſt honours. Caſſius then went to the conſuls to know the word, who gave him that of Liberty; this he gave to the cohorts, who obeyed the ſenate; and as he was the ſoul of the party, he ſent one Lupus, a tribune, to kill Ceſonia, the wife of Cagliula, with her daughter. But Claudius being ſaluted emperor by the prætorian cohorts, and the ſenate being forced to approve of this election, the new emperor puniſhed Caſſius, who ſuffered death with the greateſt reſolution.

There have been ſeveral other famous men of the name of Caſſius.

CASSMIRE, or Cashmire, a province of the mogul's dominions, in Aſia, ſuppoſed to be formerly a lake, but is now a beautiful country. It is ſeated at the extremity of Indoſtan, to the north of Lahor, and is ſurrounded with the mountains of Caucaſus, between Great Thibet, Little Thibet, Bokaria, Cabelſtan, and Lahor. Thoſe mountains that are neareſt the plain are of a moderate height, and are covered with green trees or paſture land, and are full of cattle of ſeveral ſorts, as cows, ſheep, goats, and horſes, as well as the muſk-goat. There are likewiſe various kinds of game, as partridges, hares, gazels, &c. But there are no ſerpents, lions, tygers, nor bears. However, there are a great number of bees, whence theſe mountains may properly ſaid to flow with milk and honey.

Beyond theſe mountains there are others, which riſe very high, the tops of which are always covered with ſnow. From all theſe mountains there riſes a great number of ſprings and rivulets, which the inhibitants conduct to their rice fields. At length they all unite into one ſtream, large enough to carry boats, which, after ſeveral turnings and windings, runs through the middle of the capital city, and at length finds a paſſage out between two ſteep rocks, and falling down precipices, unites with other ſtreams, and proceeds toward Atock. This province, or kingdom, is about eighty miles in length, and thirty in breadth, and is full of towns and villages, groves, meadows, rice and wheat fields, beſides ſeveral ſorts of pulſe, hemp, and ſaffron. Theſe are intermixed with ditches, canals, ſmall lakes, and rivulets. There are here all ſorts of European trees and plants, ſuch as apple, pear, plum, apricot, nut-trees, &c.

The capital city, which has the ſame name as the kingdom, is about two miles in length, and one and a half in breadth. It is ſeated in a flat country, ſix miles from the mountains, and on the banks of a lake of freſh water, which is about twelve miles in compaſs. The river has two wooden bridges built over it, to maintain a communication between both parts of the city. The houſes are generally of wood, and well built, and there is a great number of idol temples, which are all of free-ſtone, but they are now in ruins. The houſes near the river have their gardens next the water, which make a very fine appearance,

ance, eſpecially into ſummer. At one end of the city is a hill, which yields a very agreeable perſpective, on account of the fine houſes, with the gardens on the declivity, and a moſque on the top, with a great number of green trees.

The lake is full of iſlands, on which they have made pleaſure gardens, and planted fruit trees. Theſe are generally ſurrounded with tall trees, whoſe leaves are only on the top, like palms. Some have called this kingdom the terreſtial paradiſe of the Indies. The inhabitants are witty, lovers of poetry, and capable of learning the ſciences, as well as the Perſians; beſides, they are very laborious and induſtrious, making palankins, and all ſorts of cabinets and boxes, in a very curious manner, which are diſperſed all over the Indies. They alſo make a vaſt number of ſhales, which are pieces of ſtuff about an ell and a half long, and one broad, curiouſly embroidered. They are extremely fine and ſoft, and ſell at a great price. The Indians, both men and women, wear them over their heads in the winter. The people have a clear complexion, and are well made, having no reſemblance of the Tartars, who have flat noſes and ſmall eyes, both in Thibet and Caſhgar. The women are very handſome, but none but the common ſort are generally ſeen abroad, or in the ſhops. However, they are not ſo reſerved as they appear to be at firſt, for if you can be introduced to the children, to give them ſweetmeats, they will immediately come out of their apartments to have their ſhare.

It has been ſuſpected the ten tribes of Iſrael were carried away captive to this country, but it does not ſeem probable, for there are no traces of Judaiſm remaining, all the inhabitants being either Gentoos or Mahometans. Theſe have the name of Mouſa, or Moſes, often in their mouths, which is no great wonder, ſince moſt of that perſuaſion have the famous men of the Old Teſtament in great veneration. The longitude of the city is 75. 25. E. Lat. 34. 30. N.

CASSOVIA, or CASCHAW, a ſtrong town in Upper Hungary, the capital of Abanwywar, with the beſt arſenal in all the country. It is ſeated near the river Horat, forty-five miles north of Agria, one hundred and four north-eaſt of Buda, and thirty-eight north of Tokay. Long. 20. 33. E. Lat. 48. 38. N.

CASSUMBAZAR, a town ſeated on the river Ganges, in the kingdom of Bengal, in the Eaſt Indies, where the Engliſh and Dutch have factories. It is large and much frequented by merchants, which renders it very rich. The country round about it produces a great quantity of rice, which enables them to export it to different parts, particularly to Ceylon, and the Maldivia Iſlands. Several ſorts of pulſe may be had almoſt for nothing, which, with rice and butter, are the common food of the lower claſs of people, and for a rupee, which is not much above a ſhilling, you may have twenty fowls or more, and geeſe and ducks in proportion. There are ſheep and goats in abundance, and hogs are ſo numerous, that the Portugueſe live upon little elſe; beſides the Engliſh and Dutch make uſe of them to victual their ſhips. There is likewiſe fiſh of ſeveral kinds, as well freſh as ſalted. The Chriſtians formerly made Bengal a place of refuge, when they were driven from their ſettlements by the Dutch. This extraordinary plenty, together with the good humour, beauty, and freedom of the women, who are the natural inhabitants, have made a common ſaying, that there are an hundred gates to enter into the kingdom of Bengal, and not one to go out of it.

The commodities of this country bring a great number of merchant; theſe are ſugar and ſuch a variety of cottons and ſilks, that one would think it was a magazine not only for the Indies, but for all the world. The Dutch have employed ſix or ſeven hundred workmen of the country at Caſſumbazar, and the Engliſh in proportion. There is likewiſe a great quantity of ſalt petre, borax, gum lac, opium, wax, muſk, and butter, which laſt is uſed in many of the adjacent countries. The air is not very healthy, for ſtrangers, and particularly ſailors, who uſed to die very faſt if they ſtaid here long. However, ſome have attributed this to punch, arrack, and the exceſſive uſe of the Indian women. Above three hundred miles on each ſide of the Ganges there are large canals, made into that with immenſe labour, for the more eaſy tranſportation of merchandize. Theſe canals are bordered with populous towns and villages of the Gentoos, and with large fields of rice, ſugar, and corn, with three or four kinds of pulſe, muſtard, and ſeſamum, to make oil; as alſo mulberry-trees, for the nouriſhment of ſilk worms. But the great number of ſmall iſlands in the middle of the Ganges yield the moſt beautiful proſpect perhaps in the univerſe.

Theſe iſlands are very fruitful, and full of fruit-trees, pines, and all ſorts of ever-greens. However, ſeveral of theſe iſlands neareſt the ſea are become deſert and abandoned, on account of the depredations of the pirates, and are now only inhabited by tygers, wild hogs, and gazels. CASTALIA, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph beloved by Apollo, who purſuing her, ſhe vaniſhed from him in the form of a fountain, which was afterwards ſacred to the Muſes, who were thence called the Caſtalian ſiſters.

CASTALIO (SEBASTIAN) a perſon who deſerves an honourable place among authors, was born in the country of the Allobroges, in the year 1515. He gained the eſteem and friendſhip of Calvin, during the ſtay he made at Straſburgh, in 1540 and 1541, and even lodged ſome days at his houſe. Calvin prevailed on him to accept a ſchool-maſter's place in the college of Geneva, but Caſtalio diſapproving of the puniſhment of heretics, and the doctrine of predeſtination, expoſed himſelf to the indignation of Calvin and Beza, who loaded him with ill language; he therefore retired to Baſil, where he was made Greek profeſſor. His principal work is a Latin and French verſion of the Scriptures; and four dialogues, which contain, in excellent Latin, the principal hiſtories of the Bible. This has had many editions. He died at Baſil, December 29, 1563.

CASTEL (LEWIS BERTRAND) a learned Jeſuit, was born at Montpellier, on the 11th of November, 1688, and entered among the Jeſuits in 1703. He ſtudied polite literature in his youth, and at length applied himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of mathematics and natural philoſophy, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing on gravity, the mathematics, and on the muſic of colours, a very whimſical idea, which he took great pains to reduce to practice. His piece on gravity, entitled Traité de la Penſateur univerſelle, was printed at Paris, in 1724, in two vols. duodecimo, and was attacked by the famous abbé de St. Pierre, on which Caſtel anſwered him. He afterwards publiſhed his Mathematique univerſelle, in quarto, which occaſioned his being unanimouſly choſen a fellow of the Royal Society of London, without the leaſt ſollicitation. He was alſo a member of the academies of Bourdeaux and Rouen; but his Clavecin oculaire made the moſt noiſe, and he ſpent much time and expence in making an harpſichord for the eye, but without ſucceſs. He alſo wrote for and againſt ſir Iſaac Newton, and publiſhed ſeveral other works, the principal of which are Le Plan du Mathematique abregée, quarto, and a Treatiſe entitled Optique des Colours, duodecimo. He led a very exemplary life, and died on the 11th of January, 1757.

CASTELL (EDMUND) D. D. a learned Engliſh divine of the ſeventeenth century, diſtinguiſhed by his ſkill in the eaſtern languages. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was maſter of Catherine hall and Arabic profeſſor, and was at length canon of Canterbury. He had the greateſt ſhare in the Polyglot Bible of London, and wrote the Lexicon Heptaglotton, pro ſeptem Orientalibus, &c. an excellent work, printed at London, after his death, in 1699. He died in the year 1685.

ſhare

CASTELLANUS, or CASTEL, (PETER) great almoner of France in the ſixteenth century, was a very worthy and and learned man. He was born at Archi, in Burgundy, and ſtudied at Dijon, where the progreſs he made amazed his teachers. He learned the Greek tongue without a maſter. He travelled into Germany, where he became acquainted with Eraſmus. He afterwards travelled into Italy, was invited to teach polite literature in the capital city of the iſland of Cyprus, which he accepted of, and continued there two years. He then went into Egypt, and viſited Jeruſalem; then returning to France, he was made reader to Francis I. promoted to the biſhoprick of Tulle, and afterwards to that Macaon, and after that prince's death was made great almoner to Henry II. who promoted him to the ſee of Orleans. He died February 3, 1552.

CASTELLI (BERNARD) an Italian painter, was born at Genoa in 1557, and excelled in colouring and in portraits. He was the intimate friend of Taſſo, and took upon himſelf the taſk of deſigning and etching the figures of his Jeruſalem Delivered. He died at Genoa in 1629.

Valerio Caſtelli, one of his ſons, was born at Genoa in 1625, and ſurpaſſed his father. He particularly excelled in painting battles, and died in 1659.

CASTELNAUDARY, a city of France in Languedoc, and capital of Laurgeois: it is ſeated upon an eminence, at the foot of which is the baſon of the canal of Languedoc. The roofs of the houſes advance in ſuch a manner, that they almoſt cover the great ſtreet. The choir of the collegiate church is tolerably handſome. It is famous for the defeat of an army of rebels in 1632 by the duke of Orleans. The country about it is very fertile in corn. It is fifteen miles diſtant from Carcaſonne, thirty-three ſouth-eaſt of Touloufe, and three hundred and ninety-two ſouth from Paris. Long. 2. 3. E. Lat. 43. 19. N.

CASTELVETRO (LEWIS) a native of Modena, and one of the moſt ſubtle writers of the ſixteenth century. He was extremely fond of crititizing others, but had the weakneſs of not being able to bear being criticized upon himſelf. He is chiefly known by his Commentary upon the Poetics of Ariſtotle. This he himſelf ſeemed to value as the beſt of his performances; for his houſe at Lyons being on fire, he cried out Al Poetica! Al Poetica! ſave my Poetics, ſave my Poetics. He died in 1571.

CASTIGLIONE, a ſtrong town of Italy in the Mantuan, with a caſtle. It is twenty miles north-weſt of the city of Mantua. Long. 10. 29. E. Lat. 45. 23. N.

CASTIGLIONE (BALTHASAR) an Italian poet, born at Mantua in 1478. He married the celebrated Hippolita Taurella, or rather Tozelli, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his works in verſe and proſe. Julius Scaliger beſtows great praiſes on his Latin poems. His Courtier alſo acquired him great reputation. He was ſent by Clement VII. to the emperor Charles V. who gave him the biſhoprick of Avila. He died at Toledo on the 5th of February, 1529. The emperor, who was there at Toledo, was ſo extremely grieved at his death, that he commanded all the prelates and lords of his court to attend his body to the principal church, where the funeral offices were celebrated by the archbiſhop, with ſuch ſolemnity and pomp, as was never permitted to any one before, except the princes of the blood.

CASTIGLIONE (GIO. BENEDETTO) an excellent Genoeſe painter, was born at Genoa in 1616. He was at firſt the diſciple of Battiſta Paggi, and Ferrari, his countryman, and afterwards improved himſelf by the inſtructions of Van Dyck, while that great painter reſided at Genoa; and at laſt became an imitator of the manner of Nicoli Pouſſin. His inclinations led him to figures with landſcapes and animals, which he touched up with a great deal of life and ſpirit; and he was particularly remarkable for a briſk pencil and a free handling in all his compoſitions. There are likewiſe ſeveral good prints of his etching. As he never loved to ſtay long in one place, his works lie ſcattered up and down in Genoa, Rome, Naples, Venice, Parma, and Mantua, at which laſt place he died, in 1670.

CASTILE, a province of Spain, bounded on the north by Aſturias de Santillana and Biſcay; on the eaſt by the kingdoms of Navarre, Arragon, and Valencia; on the ſouth by Murcia and Andaluſia; and on the weſt by the kingdoms of Portugal and Leon. This country is watered by the largeſt rivers in Spain, they having their ſources here. The air is generally pure and wholeſome, but the country is very mountainous and dry, becauſe it rains here but very ſeldom, and for want of people is not ſufficiently cultivated. However the vallies produce corn, wine, and fruits, but more in the ſouth part than in the north. To make amends for this, the north has better paſtures, and a great quantity of fine wool. It is divided into two parts, the Old and the New, ſeparated by a long chain of mountains, which run eaſt and weſt. Thoſe on the weſt are called Sierra Tablada, and thoſe on the eaſt Sierra Moſina.

Old Caſtile contains all the tract of land between the mountains of Tablada, Molina, and Aſturias. So that it comprehends, beſides Old Caſtile, properly ſo called, the ſmall territories of Rioxa and Bureva. It is about two hundred miles from north to ſouth, and one hundred and twenty-five from eaſt to weſt. The rivers Ebro and Dobro have their riſe in this country, and water one part of it. Its principal towns are Burgos, the capital, Valladolid, Avila, Segovia, Siguença, Oſma, Soria, Calhorra, St. Domingo de la Calçada, Nagera, and Logrono..

New Caſtile is bounded on the north and eaſt by a long chain of mountains, which ſeparate it from Old Caſtile; on the weſt by Portugal; and on the ſouth by Andaluſia, Grenada, and Murcia. It is about one hundred and fifty miles in length from eaſt and weſt. The rivers Tajo and Guadiana have their ſources in this country, as well as the Guadalquivir. The laſt ſoon leaves it, but the two former traverſe the whole length from eaſt to weſt, and carry fertility along with their waters. This country is divided into four parts, that on the north is called Algaria; that on the eaſt La Sierra; that on the ſouth La Mancha; and that on the weſt Eſtremadura. The principal towns are Madrid, the capital of all Spain; Toledo, Alcala de Henares, Guadalaxara, Cuença, Cividad Real, Truxilla, Merida, Badajos, Coria, Alcantara, and Placentia. It was taken from the Moors towards the end of the eleventh century, and was called by them the kingdom of Toledo.

CASTILE D'ORO, or GOLDEN CASTILE, a large and fruitful country of South America in Terra Firma, lying to the weſt of the river Oronooko. It contains eight governments, viz. Terra Firma, properly ſo called, Carthagena, St. Martha, Rio de la Hacha, Venezuela, New Andluſia, Popayan, and the new kingdom of Granada. The climate is extremely hot, and would be more ſo if it was not a little cooled by the north winds, which are frequent, and by the rains, which continue a long while. The inhabitants are of the colour of red copper, and formerly went quite naked, but they have now a little more modeſty. They are expert at throwing poiſoned lances, and their principal employment is hunting and fiſhing. All the mines of gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones belonging to the Spaniards, are pretty well exhauſted.

CASTILLON, a town of France in Perigord, and in the province of Guienne. It is ſeated on the river Dordogne, twenty-eight miles eaſt of Bourdeaux. Long. 0. 8. E. Lat. 44. 52. N.

CASTLE-CARY, a town in Somerſetſhire, with a market on Tueſdays. The fairs are on Midlent Tueſday, the firſt of May, and Whitſun Tueſday, all for bullocks and ſheep. It is twelve miles ſouth ſouth-eaſt of Wells; twenty-four ſouth-by-weſt of Bath; thirty-two ſouth of Briſtol, and one hundred and ſeventeen weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 2. 36. W. Lat. 51. 15. N.

CASTLE-RISING, a town in the county of Norfolk, which ſends two members to parliament; it had markets and fairs, but they are now diſuſed becauſe the harbour is ſtopped up. It is governed by a mayor and twelve aldermen: but the caſtle, from which it took its name, is now demoliſhed. However it has a handſome alms-houſe for twenty-two widows. It is ſix miles north-eaſt of King's Lynn; thirty weſt north-weſt of Norwich; and one hundred and two north-by-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 39. E. Lat. 52. 46. N.

CASTLE-TOWN, or CASTLE-RUSHEN, a town in the Iſle of Man, ſo called from a fine ſtrong caſtle, ſaid to be built by Guthred king of Man in the year 960, which being of a coarſe durable marble, ſhows little ſigns of decay. In this town the governor reſides; likewiſe the courts of juſtice and chancery are kept here. Here is a good public library, which was much enlarged by the beneficence of a late biſhop. The natives of this town and the reſt of the iſland imitate the Engliſh in their habit and manners, only the poorer ſort wear a kind of ſandal of untanned leather, which is cheap, and not unſightly. Long. 4. 40. W. Lat. 53. 50. N.

CASTON, a town in Norfolk, with a market on Tueſdays, and three fairs, on January 10, April 14, and Auguſt 28, for ſheep and petty chapmen. It is ſeated on the river Bure, over which there is a bridge, and is nine miles north-weſt of Norwich; and one hundred and thirteen north north-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 22. E. Lat. 52. 45. N.

CASTOR and POLLUX, in pagan mythology. Jupiter having an amour with Leda, the wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, in the form of a ſwan, ſhe brought forth two eggs, each containing twins. From that impregnated by Jupiter proceeded Pollux and Helina, who were both immortal; from the other Caſtor and Clytemneſtra, who being begot by Tyndarus were both mortal. They were all however called

called by the common name of Tyndaridæ. Theſe two brothers entered into an inviolable friendſhip: they went with the other noble youths of Greece in the expedition to Colchis, in ſearch of the golden fleece, and on ſeveral occaſions ſignalized themſelves by their courage; but Caſtor being at length killed, Pollux obtained leave to ſhare his own immortality with his brother, ſo that they are ſaid to live and die alternately every day; for being tranſlated into the ſkies they form the conſtellation Gemini, one of which ſtars riſes as the other ſets.

Theſe deities were eſteemed propitious to navigation, for it is ſaid the Argonauts being endangered by a tempeſt, Orpheus offered vows for the ſafety of the ſhip, when immediately two lambent flames appeared over the heads of Caſtor and Pollux, which appearance was ſucceeded by a calm. In ſucceeding times theſe fires, often ſeen by mariners, were taken as a favourable omen; but when one was ſeen alone it was called Helena, and imagined to forebode ſome evil.

A martial dance, called the Pyrrhic or Caſtorian dance was invented to the honour of theſe deities, whom the Cephalenſes placed among the Dii Magni, and offered to them white lambs. The Romans alſo paid them particular honours, on account of the aſſiſtance they are ſaid to have given them in an engagement againſt the Latins, in which appearing mounted on white horſes, they turned the ſcale of victory in their favour, for which a temple was erected to them in the Forum.

Caſtor and Pollux were repreſented as two beautiful youths, completely armed, and riding on white horſes, with ſtars over their helmets.

CASTOR, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Mondays, and two fairs, on June 1, for ſheep, and on October 16, for horned cattle and ſheep. It is eighteen miles north north-eaſt of Lincoln; ten ſouth-weſt of Grimſby, and one hundred and fifty-five north-by-weſt of London. Long. 17. 13. Lat. 53. 35.

CASTRES, a city of France in Upper Languedoc with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in an agreeable plain bounded by mountains, which are fruitful in corn, wine, and wood. The river Lagout divides the town in two, and the rivulet Durenque paſſes near its walls, and joins with the former at one end of the town. There are three ſtone bridges over theſe rivers of which two are on the principal. It had formerly Gothic walls, and was inhabited by the Proteſtants, but after the revocation of the edict of Nantes they were diſperſed. The cathedral church is a new building, in the modern faſhion; the biſhop's palace is over-againſt it on the ſide of the river, and is one of the fineſt in France. The gardens are very delightful, being adorned with fountains, arbours, groves and graſs-plots: it is ſupported by immenſe vaults, on account of the inequality of the ground. The principal place for walking is called the Mall. It is covered with turf, and is one thouſand paces long, by four or five hundred broad, and lies along the ſide of the rivulet. The two great walks are bordered with rows of elm-trees, and are raiſed higher than the reſt, and ſerve for playing at mall. The churches, except the cathedral, are but ordinary, and there are but two pariſhes. The Cordeliers, the Capuchins, the Trinitarians, the Jacobins, and the Jeſuits have their churches. There are likewiſe two ſmall nunneries. The inhabitants are noted for a fine deep blue dye; and carry on manufactures in flannel, hats, fine coverlets for beds, and other woollen ſtuffs. It is twenty miles ſouth of Alby, thirty-five eaſt of Toulouſe, and three hundred and ſeventy from Paris. Long. 2. 5. E. Lat. 43. 37. N.

CASTRITIUS (MARCUS) was a magiſtrate of Rome eighty-five years before the Chriſtian æra, when the conſul Cneius Carbo, endeavouring to engage all the cities of Italy in Marius's party againſt Sylla, demanded hoſtages of them. Caſtritius not permiting the citizens of Placentia to deliver any, Carbo endeavoured to intimidate him by telling him, that he had a great number of ſwords, "And I, many years," replied old Caſtritius. This anſwer ſilenced Carbo, and the affair ſtopped here.

CASTRITIUS (TITUS) taught rhetoric at Rome in the ſecond century, with greater reputation than any of his cotemporaries. He unfolded very ſubtilly thoſe falſe ſentiments which become almoſt imperceptible when they are concealed under the harmonious cadence of a beautiful ſtyle; and his manners no leſs than his learning contributed to procure him the eſteem of the emperor Hadrian.

CASTRO, a town of Italy, and capital of a duchy of the ſame name in the patrimony of St. Peter. It was raſed to the foundations by order of pope Innocent X. for having killed their biſhop. It is ſeated near the rivulet Oſpado, ten miles from the ſea, twenty-five ſouth weſt of Orvietta, and fifty-five north-weſt of Rome. Long. 12. 34. E. Lat. 42. 33. N.

CASTRO, the duchy of, is bounded on the north by Orvietano; on the ſouth by the Mediterranean; on the eaſt by the river Marta, which ſeparates it from the Patrimony of St. Peter; and on the weſt by Tuſcany. It formerly belonged to the dukes of Parma, but in 1643 the pope reunited it to his own dominions. The principal towns are Farneſe, Monte Alto, Toſcanella, Marta, and Borghetto, beſides Caſtro juſt mentioned.

CASTRO, a maritime town of Italy in the kingdom of Naples, and in the territory of Otranto. It was almoſt entirely ruined by the Turks in 1537. It is eight miles ſouth-weſt of Otranto. Long. 19. 25. E. Lat. 40. 18. N.

CASTRO, a ſtrong town, the capital of the iſland of Chiloe, on the coaſt of Chili in the South Sea. Long. 82. 5. W. Lat. 43. 0. S.

CASTRO MARINO, a town of Algarva in Portugal. It is very ſtrong, and ſeated near the mouth of the Guadiana, ſixty miles north-eaſt of Lagos, fifty-five ſouth of Beja, and one hundred and five weſt of Seville. Long. 8. 16. W. Lat. 37. 6. N.

CASTRO NOVO, a town of Sicily in the valley of Mazara, ſeated on a hill near the ſource of the river Platani. Long. 13. 55. E. Lat. 37. 40. N.

CASTRO VERREYNA, a town of South America, in Peru, famous for its ſilver mines, good tobacco, and ſalubrious air. It is one hundred and fifty miles north-eaſt of Lima. Long. 62. 35. W. Lat. 13. 0. S.

CASTRUCCIO (CASTRACANI) a celebrated Italian general, was born at Lucca, in Florence, in 1284, and left in a vineyard covered with leaves, where he was found by Dianora, a widow lady, the ſiſter of Antonio, a canon of St. Michael in Lucca, who was deſcended from the illuſtrious family of the Caſtracani. The lady having no children, they reſolved to bring him up, and educated him as carefully as if he had been their own. They intended him for a prieſt, but he was ſcarcely fourteen years old, when he began to devote himſelf to military ſports, and thoſe violent exerciſes which ſuited his great ſtrength of body. The factions named the Guelfs and Ghibilins, then ſhared all Italy between them, divided the popes and the emperors, and engaged in their different intereſts, not only the members of the ſame town, but even thoſe of the ſame family. Franciſco, a conſiderable perſon on the ſide of the Ghibilins, obſerving Caſtruccio's uncommon ſpirit and great qualities, prevailed with Antonio to let him turn ſoldier; on which Caſtruccio ſoon became acquainted with every thing belonging to his profeſſion, and was made a lieutenant of a company of foot by Franciſco Guinigi, and in his firſt campaign gave ſuch proofs of his courage and conduct, as ſpread his fame all over Lombardy; and Guinigi dying ſoon after, committed to him the care of his ſon, and the management of his eſtate. Still diſtinguiſhing himſelf by his military exploits, he filled his chief commander with ſuch jealouſy and envy, that he was impriſoned by ſtratagem, in order to be put to death. But the people of Lucca ſoon releaſed him, and afterwards choſe him for their ſovereign prince. The Ghibilins conſidered him as the head of their faction; and thoſe who had been baniſhed from their country fled to him for protection, and unanimouſly promiſed that if he could reſtore them to their eſtates, they would ſerve him ſo effectually, that the ſovereignty of their country ſhould be his reward. Flattered by theſe promiſes, he entertained a deſign of making himſelf maſter of Tuſcany, and for this purpoſe entered into a league with the prince of Milan. He kept his army conſtantly on foot, employing it as beſt ſuited his own deſigns. He was made ſenator of Rome, with more than ordinary ceremony; but, while there, received news which obliged him to haſten back to Lucca. The Florentines entered into a war with him, but Caſtruccio fought his way through them; and the ſupreme authority of Tuſcany was ready to fall into his hands when a period was put to his life. In May 1328 he gained a complete victory over his enemies, who amounted to thirty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe, in which twenty-two thouſand of them were ſlain, with the loſs of not quite ſixteen hundred of his own men: but as he was returning from the field of battle, fired with the action, and covered with ſweat, he halted a little, in order to thank and careſs his ſoldiers as they paſſed, when the north wind blowing upon him, he was immediately ſeized with an ague, which he at firſt neglected, but it carried him off in a few days in the forty-fourth year of his age.

CATACOMBS, in Roman antiquity, are a vaſt aſſemblage of ſubterraneous ſepulchres, three leagues from Rome, in the Via Appia, ſuppoſed to be the ſepulchres of the firſt Romans, before the practice of burning the dead was introduced, and built in conſequence of the opinion that the ſouls of the departed hate the light, and love to hover about the places where their bodies were laid. Others ſuppoſe them to be the Puticuli mentioned by Feſtus Pompeius, into which the Romans threw the bodies of their ſlaves, to whom they denied the honour of burial. Each catacomb is three feet broad, and eight or ten high, running in form of an alley or gallery, and communicating one with another.

CATALDUS, one of the ſaints of the church of Rome, and the particular patron of the city of Tarentum, was biſhop of that city. It is pretended that about a thouſand years after his death he appeared to a prieſt in a dream, and ſaid to him, "Go, dig up a book which I wrote, and conceal-"ed in ſuch a place, carry it immediately to the king; it is "a work which contains the ſecrets of heaven" As the dream was not regarded, he appeared ſeveral times. At laſt the prieſt being alone in his church, and fully awake, ſaw St. Cataldus in his epiſcopal robes, who commanded him to go and dig up his book the next day, in the place which he had directed him to in his dreams, and to carry it immediately to the king; threatening him with a ſevere puniſhment in caſe of diſobedience. The next day therefore the prieſt went in proceſſion with the people to the place where the book was buried. It was found there in a leaden box, and contained an account of the miſeries which were ſoon to overwhelm the king of Naples; and by what means they were to be prevented. The whole affair it ſeems was a cruel fraud, intended to engage Ferdinand king of Naples to extirpate the Jews. It happened in April 1492.

CATALONIA, a province of Spain, bounded on the north by the Pyrennean mountains, which divide it from France; by the kingdom of Arragon and Valencia on the weſt; and by the Mediterranean Sea on the ſouth and eaſt. It is one hundred and fifty-five miles in length, and one hundred in breadth. It is watered by a great number of rivers beſides the Ebro, which only croſſes one ſmall corner of it; the principal of which are the Lobregat, the Ter, the Tet, and the Segra. The air is temperate and healthy; but the land is mountainous, except in a few places. However it produces corn, wine, oil, pulſe, flax, and hemp ſufficient for the inhabitants. The mountains are covered with large foreſt of tall trees, ſuch as the oak, the ever-green oak, the beech, the pine, the fir, the cheſnut, and many others; and a great many cork-trees, ſhrubs, and medicinal plants. There are ſeveral quarries of marble of all colours, cryſtal, alabaſter, amethyſts, and lapis lazuli. Gold duſt has been found among the ſands of one or two of the rivers; and there are mines of tin, iron, lead, alum, vitriol, and ſalt. They likewiſe fiſh for coral on the eaſtern coaſt of Catalonia. The inhabitants are hardy, courageous, active, vigorous, and good ſoldiers, but apt to be diſcontented. The miquelets are a ſort of ſoldiers which guard the paſſes over the mountains, and ought to protect travellers, but if they are not paid to their minds, they ſeldom fail to pay themſelves.

The river Lobregat divides Catalonia into two parts, the eaſt and weſt, according to their ſituation. This province comprehends ſeventeen vigueries or territories, two of which are in Rouſillon, and belong to the French. The reſt are ſubject to the Spaniards. The principal towns are Barcelona, the capital, Tarragona, Tortoſa, Lerida, Solſonia, Cardona Vich, Girona, Seu d'Urgel, Pui Cerda, and Cervera.

CATANEA, a city of Sicily, ſeated on a gulph of the ſame name, near the foot of Mount Etna or Gibel. It ſuffered greatly by earthquakes in 1669 and 1693. This laſt overturned the city, and a great part of the cathedral in a moment. Eighteen thouſand of the inhabitants periſhed in the ruins, and yet the fertility of the ſoil has cauſed it to be repeopled. It is thirty-three miles north of Syracuſe, and fifty-three ſouth-weſt of Meſſina. Long. 15. 19. E. Lat. 37. 30. N.

CATANZARO, a city in the kingdom of Naples, the capital of Calabria Ulterior, with a biſhop's ſee. It is the uſual reſidence of the governor of the province, and is ſeated on a mountain ten miles ſouth-weſt of Belcaſtro. Long. 18. 20. E. Lat. 38. 58. N.

CATARO, a ſtrong town of the Venetian Dalmatia, with a good caſtle and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a gulph of the ſame name ten miles north-weſt of Scutari, and twenty eight eaſt of Raguſa. Long. 19. 19. E. Lat 42. 25. N.

CATEGATE is the name of a gulph in the Baltic Sea, by which it communicates with the ocean. It lies between Denmark and Sweden. Long. 7. 1. W. Lat. 52. 45. N.

CATHARINE (St.) the virgin and martyr, is ſaid to have been ſo learned, that at eighteen years of age ſhe diſputed with fifty philoſophers, and vanquiſhed them by the force of her reaſoning, and that ſhe ſuffered martyrdom under the reign of Maximinus. But there is nothing certain in relation to this St Catharine, and her name was only mentioned in the beginning of the ninth century, on occaſion of the body of a young woman being found uncorrupted on Mount Sinai, in Arabia. The Chriſtians of that country took the body for that of a ſaint, and giving it the name of Catharine, which ſignifies pure and ſpotleſs, paid it a kind of religious worſhip, which paſſed from them to the Greeks and Latins. The feſtival of this imaginary ſaint is kept on the 25th of November.

CATHARINE (St.) was born at Sienna, in Tuſcany, in the year 1347, and when ſhe was turned of ſeven years old, became a nun of the order of St. Dominic, and is repreſented as having made ſuch prodigious advances in piety and devotion, as to have ſeen a multitude of viſions, and to have wrought many miracles before ſhe was grown up. The monks have even aſſerted, that ſhe not only converſed face to face with Chriſt, but was married to him in form. She brought about a reconciliation between pope Gregory XI. and the Florentines, in 1376, and had ſuch influence upon that pope, as to induce him, the following year, to remove to Rome, and re-eſtabliſh the pontifical ſeat there, ſeventy years after pope Clement V. had removed it to France. She wrote Dialogues in Latin, upon the Providence of God, an Oration in Latin, three hundred and ſixty-four Letters to Popes, Cardinals, Kings, and Princes, publiſhed at Venice in 1506, and a book of Revelations, publiſhed in 1553. She died on the 30th of April, 1380, at only thirty-three years of age, and was canonized by pope Pius II. in 1461.

CATHARINE (St.) born at Bologna, on the 8th of September, 1413. At fourteen years of age ſhe was admitted into a convent at Ferrara, where ſhe made her profeſſion in the year 1432. The inhabitants of Bologna, afterwards, beſought her to come and preſide over a nunnery juſt founded among them She wrote a book of Revelations, and ſome other pieces in Latin and Italian, and died on the 9th of March, 1463.

CATHARINE JAGELLON, or of Poland, queen of Sweden, was the youngeſt daughter of Sigiſmund I. king of Poland, and was ſought in marriage by ſeveral great princes, and among others by Baſil, or John Baſilides, grand-duke of Muſcovy, and by John of Sweden, duke of Finland, the ſon of Guſtavus I. and the brother of Eric XIV. king of Sweden She preferred this laſt, but had no ſooner arrived there, when being in the caſtle of Wiburg with her huſband, Eric, a vicious prince of a ſuſpicious and jealous temper, laid ſiege to that fortreſs, and obliged them to ſurrender at diſcretion. He left his brother priſoner in the caſtle, and offered Catharine to ſet her at liberty, but that virtuous princeſs refuſing to leave her huſband, was his faithful companion during ſeven years, in which ſhe comforted him in his confinement, and had by him one ſon and two daughters. At length Eric ſet his brother at liberty, and made him viceroy of Sweden; but ſoon after reſuming his jealouſy, he reſolved to get rid of his brothers, and knowing that Baſilides, grand duke of Moſcovy, was paſſionately in love with Catharine, determined to ſend her to him; but his deſigns being happily diſcovered, the nobles, headed by John, made war againſt him, and he being taken priſoner, John was placed on the throne in 1568.

Catharine being now queen of one of the moſt powerful kingdoms in the North, endeavoured to reſtore the Romiſh religion, and ſtrove, with indefatigable zeal, to prevail on the king to ſecond her deſign, but without effect. She died in 1583.

CATHARINE of France, queen of England, was the youngeſt daughter of Charles VI. of France, and Iſabella of Bavaria. In order to put a ſtop to the progreſs of the arms of king Henry V. and to ſecure the crown of France to England, ſhe was married to that valiant prince, in 1420, but he dying two years after, ſhe married privately Owen Tudor. By her firſt huſband ſhe had Henry VI. king of England, and by her ſecond Edmund, earl of Richmond, the father of king Henry VII.

CATHARINE DE MEDICIS. See MEDICIS.

CATHARINE of Arragon, queen of England, was daughter to Ferdinand V. king of Arragon. She had a learned and pious education, and made a conſiderable progreſs in the ſciences. She was married on the 14th of November, 1501, to Arthur, prince of Wales, the ſon of Henry VII. king of England; but he dying five months after, as it is ſaid, without conſummating the marriage; a diſpenſation was obtained from pope Julius II. for her being married to Henry VIII. Arthur's brother; who, when he aſcended the throne, was unwilling to complete the marriage, till he was prevailed on by his council, who made him ſenſible of its being of great importance to the nation. He accordingly married Catharine, in 1509, who the next year brought him a ſon; but that young prince lived only three months; however, ſhe was ſome time after delivered of a daughter, named Mary, who aſcended the throne after the reign of Edward VI. This union laſted above twenty years, when the king ſeeing Anne Boleyn, fell deſperately in love with her, and being unable to obtain her without divorcing Catharine, ſet about this grand event, which he at length effected; and privately married his new queen, on the 14th of November, 1532, without waiting till the ſentence againſt his marriage with Catharine of Arragon was pronounced. An edict was publiſhed, forbidding any one to give give Catharine the title of queen; and that princeſs was baniſhed to Kimbolton, one of the king's houſes in Bedfordſhire, where ſhe compoſed Meditations on the Pſalms, and a Treatiſe on the Complaints of a Sinner, and died in 1536, a little above three years after the divorce.

CATHARINE of Portugal, the wife of Charles II. king of England, was the daughter of John IV. king of Portugal, and was born on the 25th of November, 1638, while her father was duke of Braganza. She was married in 1661 to king Charles II.

The manners of this princeſs, eſpecially at her firſt appearance at court, ſays the rev Mr Granger, retained a ſtrong tincture of the convent, and were but ill formed to pleaſe, much leſs to retain the gay and diſſolute Charles. She at firſt rejected the Engliſh dreſs, and the attendance of Engliſh ladies, and choſe to appear in the formal habit of her own country, and be attended by her duennas, whoſe perſons were the ſcorn and jeſt of every courtier. She, for ſome time, carried herſelf towards the royal miſtreſs with all the diſdain which ſhe thought becoming her dignity and her virtue; but when ſhe ſaw that the king was reſolved to retain her, ſhe ſuddenly fell into the other extreme, and treated her with ſuch exceſſive affability and condeſcenſion, as loſt the little eſteem he had for her. The firſt years of her marriage were rendered unhappy by almoſt every paſſion that could diſturb a female mind. At length every ſpark of conjugal affection ſeemed to be extinguiſhed, and ſhe ſunk into all the tranquility of indifference. During the reign of James II. this princeſs enjoyed great tranquility. She lived during that and part of the next reign at Somerſet-houſe, and in 1692 returned to Portugal, carrying with her ſeveral valuable pictures, belonging to the royal collection. In 1704 ſhe was declared regent of that kingdom, by king Pedro her brother, whoſe infirmities rendered repoſe neceſſary, when ſhe is ſaid to have ſhewn great wiſdom and prudence in the council, and during her regency the Portuguſe carried on a war with Spain with much vigour, and recovered many important places from the Spaniards. This princeſs died on the 31ſt of December, 1705.

CATHARINE, empreſs of Ruſſia, diſtinguiſhed by her wiſdom and humanity, was born in a village called Runghen, in Livonia, and loſing her parents, who were poor, became deſtitute. However, the pariſh clerk, who kept a ſchool, took her into his houſe, and kept her till Dr. Gluck, miniſter of Marienburg, happening to come to the village, was pleaſed with the girl, and taking her home with him, treated her almoſt as if ſhe had been his daughter, and not only had her taught ſpinning and ſewing, but inſtructed her himſelf, and gave her a very extraordinary education. At length, a Livonian ſerjeant in the Swediſh army, falling in love with her, ſhe agreed to marry him, to which Dr. Gluck the more readily conſented, as his circumſtances were very narrow. But the next day, the Ruſſians making themſelves maſters of Marienburg, the general, accidentally ſeeing Catharine, was ſo ſtruck with her air and manner, that he took her under his protection, and afterwards into his ſervice. Some time after, ſhe was advanced to be houſe-keeper to prince Menzikoff, who was the general's patron; where, being ſeen by Peter the Great, ſhe made ſuch an impreſſion on him, that he married her, in the year 1711, nine years after her being taken priſoner at Marienburg. She then ſhewed that ſhe was poſſeſſed of extraordinary abilities and addreſs, and was a very fit conſort for ſuch a prince as Peter, the ſeverity of whoſe temper ſhe moderated by her ſweetneſs and humanity, ſhe even, by her advice, reſcued him from ruin, when he was ſurrounded by the Turks; and he ſeems to have ever after made her the partner of his councils and undertakings, as well as of his bed. Indeed, he ſhewed the high opinion he had of her by his nominating her to ſucceed him, which ſhe did on the 28th of January, 1725. The lenity of this princeſs, ſays Voltaire, in his Life of Peter the Great, was carried to a degree unparallelled in the hiſtory of any nation. She promiſed that during her reign nobody ſhould be put to death; and ſhe kept her word. She was the firſt ſovereign that ever ſhewed this regard to the human ſpecies. Malefactors were condemned to ſerve in the mines, and other public works; a regulation not leſs prudent than humane, ſince their puniſhment was rendered of ſome advantage to the ſtate. Her reign was however but ſhort, for ſhe died on the 17th of May, 1727, leaving iſſue Anne, who married Frederic, duke of Holſtein; and Elizabeth, the late empreſs of Ruſſia. She was ſucceeded by Peter II. the grandſon of Peter the Great, by his firſt wife.

CATHARINUS (AMBROSE) a celebrated divine, in the ſixteenth century, was born at Sienna, and taught civil law under the name of Lancelot Politi till thirty years of age; but in 1515 took the name of Catharinus, and applied himſelf to divinity. He appeared at the council of Trent, was biſhop of Minori in 1547, and archbiſhop of Conza in 1551, and died ſome years after. He wrote ſeveral works, in which he, without ſcruple, deviated from the ſentiments of St. Auguſtine, Thomas of Aquinas, and other divines. He pretended that St. John the Evangeliſt did not die, but was tranſlated to heaven like Enoch and Elijah; and was the firſt perſon in the Romiſh church who maintained that the ſacrament is valid, though he who adminiſters it has no intention that it ſhould be ſo. He alſo maintained that infants dying without baptiſm, were in a ſtate of indolence, in which they had a degree of happineſs ſuitable to their condition.

CATHAY, a country of Aſia, which cauſed a great diſpute among former geographers, about its real ſituation. But it is now well known that the north part of China went by that name.

CATHERLOUGH, a town of Ireland, in the county of Catherlough, and province of Leinſter, ſeated on the river Barrow, ſixteen miles north-eaſt of Kilkenny. Long. 7. 1. W. Lat. 52. 45. N.

CATILINE (LUCIUS) a famous Roman, of a noble family, who having ſpent his whole fortune in debauchery, formed the deſign of oppreſſing his country, deſtroying the ſenate, ſeizing the public treaſure, ſetting Rome on fire, and uſurping a ſovereign power over his fellow-citizens. In order to ſucceed in this bold and wicked deſign, he drew into his plot ſome young men of quality; whom he prevailed upon, it is ſaid, to drink human blood as a pledge of their union. His conſpiracy was however diſcovered by the vigilance of Cicero, who was then conſul; and the particulars made known by Fulvia, who was beloved by one of the conſpirators: when Cicero, having accuſed and convicted Catiline in full ſenate, he retired, threatening that he would extinguiſh the embarraſſment into which he was thrown, under the ruins of Rome: at length, putting himſelf at the head of an army, with ſeveral of the conſpirators, he fought with incredible valour againſt Petreius, lieutenant to Anthony, who was colleague with Cicero in the conſulſhip; but was defeated and killed in battle, ſixty-two years before the Chriſtian æra.

Catiline was ambitious, enterpriſing, and capable of deſtroying the Roman republic, had it not been for the diſcovery of his conſpiracy; by which means Lentulus, Cethegus, and the principal conſpirators were ſeized, by order of the ſenate, before the battle.

Salluſt has given an excellent hiſtory of this conſpiracy.

CATINAT (NICHOLAS) marſhal of France, was born of a noble family, in September, 1637, and ſignalized himſelf by his valour and prudence in ſeveral ſieges and combats. He was made marſhal of France in 1693, and died in 1712, aged ſeventy-four.

CATO THE CENSOR (MARCUS PORTIUS) a celebrated Roman, born in Tuſcany. He went to Rome at the ſolicitation of Valerius Flaccus, and was elected military tribune of Sicily, about two hundred and five years before the Chriſtian æra; and at length quæſtor in Africa, under Scipio, who accuſed him before the ſenate. Afterwards he was made prætor, when he fulfilled the duties of his office with the ſtricteſt juſtice. He conquered Sardinia, governed with admirable moderation, and was created conſul. Being tribune in the war of Syria, he gave diſtinguiſhed proofs of his valour againſt Antiochus the Great; and at his return was made cenſor; an important poſt, which he diſcharged with an integrity of which there had been no example. His enemies accuſed him ſeveral times; and indeed he appears to have been avaricious, and in ſome inſtances to want humanity. He was the occaſion of the third Punic war, and in the debates of the ſenate, always gave his opinion for the ruin of Carthage. He died about one hundred and forty-eight years before the birth of Chriſt, aged eighty-ſix.

Cato the Cenſor, was, according to Cicero, an excellent orator, an accompliſhed ſenator, and a great general. He learnt Greek in his old age, and compoſed ſome works which are loſt. He ſaid he repented of three things; his having paſſed a day without learning any thing; his having truſted a ſecret to a woman; and his having gone by water, when he could as well have travelled by land.

CATO of Utica, ſo called from the place of his death, was great grandſon to the former. He was educated by his uncle Livius Druſus, and diſcovered in his infancy ſuch courage, that at fourteen years of age he demanded a ſword to kill the tyrant Sylla. Cato was an admirer of philoſophy, and adhered to the ſect of the Stoics, from whom he obtained that grandeur of ſoul which he ſhewed on many occaſions. He performed his firſt campaign in the war of the rebellious ſlaves, commanded by Spartacus, ſeventy-three years before the birth of Chriſt, and a ſhort time after had the command of a thouſand foot in Macedonia. At his return he was made quæſtor, and demanded the dignity of tribune to prevent a wicked man from having it. He joined Cicero againſt Catiline, and oppoſed Cæſar in the ſenate.

His

His enemies cauſed him to be ſent to ſeize the iſland of Cyprus, which had been unjuſtly forfeited by Ptolemy, thinking by this ſtep to make him loſe his reputation; but he behaved there with ſuch prudence, that they had nothing to reproach him with. Cato made uſe of all his endeavours to reconcile Cæſar and Pompey, during the civil wars; but not being able to ſucceed, joined with Pompey's party, conſidering him as the defender of the republic. In ſhort, after the battle of Pharſalia, and the death of Pompey, he retired to Utica, where, being informed that he was purſued by Cæſar, he adviſed his friends to fly, and his ſon to make a trial of Cæſar's clemency. At length, placing himſelf on his bed, he read twice over Plato's treatiſe on the Immortality of the Soul, and then ſtabbed himſelf with a poniard, of which he died, forty-five years before the Chriſtian æra, aged forty-eight.

Hiſtorians are very laviſh in his praiſe, and yet there are ſeveral particulars in his life which are not to his honour, and which it is impoſſible to excuſe.

CATO, a Latin poet and grammarian, was, according to Suetonius, born in Gallia Narbonnenſis. He opened a ſchool, by which he acquired a great reputation, and conſiderable wealth; but theſe advantages he ſoon loſt, and ſupported with courage his extreme indigence. He wrote a piece which is ſtill extant, intitled Diræ, or Imprecations. He died in about the thirtieth year before the birth of our Saviour.

CATOCH (CAPE) a promontory of the province of Yucatan, in Mexico, and in North America. Long. 89. 10. W. Lat. 21. 30. N.

CATROU (FRANCIS) a celebrated writer, born at Paris, on the 28th of December, 1659. After having ſtudied humanity and philoſophy, he renounced the temporal advantages offered him by M. de Luber, his uncle, who was treaſurer-general of the marine, and entered among the Jeſuits, in 1677; his ſuperiors deſtining him for the pulpit, he preached ſeven years with applauſe; but at length the diſguſt he felt at being obliged to get his ſermons by heart, made him leave off preaching; and as the Journal de Trevoux was then beginning to be printed, he was choſen to labour at that work, which he did for about twelve years. He alſo applied at the ſame time to ſeveral other works, which made him known to the learned, and died at Paris, in October, 1737, aged ſeventy-eight. He wrote, 1. A general Hiſtory of the Empire of the Mogul; the beſt edition of which is that of 1715, in four volumes, duodecimo. 2. An Hiſtory of the Phanataciſm of the Proteſtant Religions, three volumes, duodecimo. 3. A French Tranſlation of Virgil, with critical and hiſtorical notes; the beſt edition of which is that of 1729, in four volumes duodecimo. And 4. A large Roman Hiſtory, with notes. This is his principal work. The notes were written by father Rouille, a Jeſuit, who joined with Catrou in the compoſition of that work, and continued it; but dying in 1740, it was finiſhed by father Ruth.

CATULLUS (CAIUS VALERIUS) an excellent Latin poet, born at Verona, the eighty-ſixth year before the birth of Chriſt. The harmony of his numbers acquired him the eſteem and friendſhip of Cicero, and other great men of his time. It were however to be wiſhed that he had not defiled many of his poems with ſuch groſs obſcenities. He wrote ſatirical verſes againſt Cæſar, under the name of Marmoro. This however only furniſhed Cæſar with an opportunity of ſhewing his moderation and humanity; for after Catullus, by repeated invectives, had given Cæſar ſufficient room to reſent it, eſpecially from one whoſe father had been his familiar friend; Cæſar, inſtead of expreſſing any uneaſineſs at this uſage, generouſly invited the poet to ſupper with him, and there treated him with ſo much affability and good-nature, that Catullus was perfectly aſhamed of what he had done, and reſolved to make him amends for the future.

Clodia was one of the women he was moſt fond of, and to her he gave the name of Leſbia, in alluſion to Sappho, who was of the iſle of Leſbos. He ſpent his whole life in a ſtate of poverty, and died in the flower of his age, and the height of his reputation, when he was about thirty years old, and about fifty-ſeven years before the Chriſtian æra.

Joſeph Scaliger, Paſſerat, Muret, and Iſaac Voſſius, have written learned notes on this poet.

CATZ (JAMES) a great civilian, politician, and Dutch poet, was born at Brouwerſhaven, in Zealand, in the year 1577. After having made ſeveral voyages, he fixed at Middleburg, and acquired by his pleadings ſuch reputation, that the city of Dort choſe him for its penſionary, as did alſo, ſome time after, that of Middleburg. In 1634 he was nominated penſionary of Holland and Weſt Frieſland, and in 1648 he was elected keeper of the ſeal of the ſame ſtate, and ſtadtholder of the fiefs; but ſome time after he reſigned theſe employments, to enjoy the repoſe which his advanced age demanded. As the poſt of grand penſionary had been fatal to almoſt all thoſe who had enjoyed it, from the beginning of the republic till that time, Catz delivered up his charge on his knees, before the whole aſſembly of the ſtates, weeping for joy, and thanking God for having preſerved him from the inconveniences that ſeemed attached to the duties of that office. But though he was reſolved to ſpend the reſt of his days in repoſe, the love of his country engaged him to comply with the deſires of the ſtate, who importuned him to go on an embaſſy to England, in the delicate conjuncture in which the republic found itſelf during the protectorate of Cromwell: but at his return from England, he retired to his fine country ſeat at Sorgvliet, where he lived in tranquility till the year 1660, in which he died. He wrote a great number of poems in Dutch, moſt of which are on moral ſubjects, and ſo eſteemed, that they have been often printed in all the different ſizes; and next to the Bible there is no work ſo highly valued by the Dutch. The laſt edition of his works appeared in 1726, in two volumes, folio.

CATZENELLENBOGEN, a territory belonging to the landgrave of Heſſe, in the circle of the Upper Rhine. It conſiſts of ſeveral parcels of land, which, if they were united, would form a country of ſixty miles in length, and thirty in breadth. It is divided by the river Maine, which falls into the Rhine not far from hence. The city of Mentz, with its territory, is placed in the middle of this, which divides the parts thirty miles aſunder, and divides it into High and Low. High Catzenellenbogen is on this ſide the Maine, and at ſome diſtance from the Rhine, and is likewiſe called the landgravate of Darmſtadt. The principal towns are Darmſtadt, Gereu, and Umſtadt. The Lower is ſeated to the weſt of the Rhine, and belongs to the landgrave of Rheinfels, who is a Roman Catholic. The principal places are St. Goar, Rheinfels, Longen Schwalbach, and Bourg Schwalbach.

CAVA, a conſiderable city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, in the Hither Principato, with a biſhop's ſee, and carries on a conſiderable trade in cloth. It is ſeated at the foot of Mount Metelian, twenty-five miles eaſt of Naples, and five north-weſt of Salerno. Long. 15. 5. E. Lat. 40. 40. N.

CAVAILLION, a ſmall town of France, in the territory of Venaiſſin, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Durance, in a very fruitful agreeable country, thirteen miles ſouth of Avignon, twenty-three north-eaſt of Arles, and twenty-five north-weſt of Aix. Long. 5. 4. E. Lat. 43. 50. N.

CAVALCANTI (GUIDO) a nobleman of Florence, lived in the thirteenth century. He was the ſon of Cavalcante di Cavalcanti, and having followed the party of the Guelfes, experienced the changeableneſs of fortune. He was baniſhed, and afterwards reſtored to his country again. He ſhewed great courage and ſtrength of mind in his misfortunes; and was not only an able philoſopher, but a good poet. He wrote a treatiſe, in Italian, on the rules for writing in a good ſtyle; and there are ſome verſes of his extant, which are very much eſteemed.

CAVALIERI (BONAVENTURE) a very eminent mathematician in the ſeventeenth century, was a native of Milan, and a friar of the order of the Jeſuati of St. Jerom. He was the diſciple of Galileo, the friend of Toricelli, and became chief profeſſor of the mathematics in the college of Bologna, where he publiſhed ſeveral works, the moſt remarkable of which are, his Geometria Indiviſibilibus Continuorum nova quadam Ratione promota, and his Exercitationes Geometriæ ſex. He died in 1647.

CAVAN, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulſter, is bounded by Fermannah on the north, Longford and Weſt-Meath on the ſouth, Leitrim on the weſt, part of Monaghan, Meath, and Lowth on the eaſt. It is forty-ſeven miles in length, and twenty-five in breadth, where broadeſt. It ſends ſix members to parliament, two for the county, and two each for the boroughs of Cavan and Belturbet. Some parts are full of lakes, with boggy coarſe land, and others are well cultivated and improved. The chief places are Kilmore, Belturbet, and Cavan.

CAVAN, the capital of a county of the ſame name, is ſeated ſeven miles from Belturbet, and ſixty north-weſt of Dublin. Long 7. 32. W. Lat. 54. 0. N.

CAUCASUS, a great chain of mountains, which extend from the Black Sea to the Caſpian Sea, between the towns Sahum and Derbent, and is a kind of a wall acroſs the Iſthmus, formed by the two ſeas. It is almoſt always covered with ſnow, eſpecially on the top. Many parts of it abound with honey, corn, gum, fruits, hogs, and horned cattle. The vines climb very high round the trees. The inhabitants call themſelves Chriſtians, but they have ſcarce any thing left beſides the name. They have a fair complexion, and would be handſome if they were not ſo naſty. They make a practice of ſelling their children, eſpecially the girls, to the Turks. They are called by different names, accord-according to the different parts which they inhabit, as Abcaſſes, Alans, Circaſſians, Ziques, and Caracolis. They carry on a ſort of trade, but it is only by exchanging one thing for another, for they make uſe of no money.

CAUDEBEC, a town of France, in Normandy, capital of the territory of Caux It is ſmall, but populous, on account of its juriſdiction and trade. The walls are flanked with towers at certain diſtances, and it is ſurrounded with deep ditches. A ſmall river, divided into ſeveral canals, croſſes the town, and ſets ſeveral mills a-going. The pariſh church is tolerably handſome. It has alſo a convent and a nunnery. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, near the river Seine, eighteen miles north-weſt of Rouen, thirty north-eaſt of Liſieux, and eighty-eight north-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 46. E. Lat. 40. 30. N.

CAVE (WILLIAM) D. D. a very learned divine in the end of the ſeventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, was born at Pickwell, in Leiceſterſhire, of which pariſh his father was rector, and was educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of maſter of arts. In 1662 he was admitted to the vicarage of Iſlington, in Middleſex, and ſome time after became chaplain in ordinary to Charles II. In 1672 he took the degree of doctor in divinity: In 1679 was collated to the rectory of Allhallows the Great, in Thames-ſtreet, London: in 1684 was inſtalled canon of Windſor; and, in 1690, was admitted to the vicarage of Iſleworth. He wrote, 1. Primitive Chriſtianity. 2. Tables of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers. 3. The Hiſtory of the Lives of the Apoſtles. And, 4. The Hiſtory of the Lives, &c. of thoſe who were Cotemporaries with, or immediately ſucceeded the Apoſtles; and ſeveral other works. This very learned perſon died at Windſor, on the 4th of Auguſt, 1713, and was buried in Iſlington church, where a monument was erected to his memory.

He was an excellent and univerſal ſcholar, a polite writer, and a florid and a very eloquent preacher.

CAVE (EDWARD) the compiler of the firſt periodical pamphlet, intitled a Magazine, was born at Newton, in Warwickſhire, on the 29th of February, 1691. His father, who was a ſhoe-maker, ſettling at Rugby, he was educated in the free-ſchool of that town, where he made a quick progreſs in learning, after which he was placed with a collector of the exciſe, and uſed to recount, with ſome pleaſure, a journey or two which he rode with him as his clerk, and relate the victories he gained over the exciſe-men in grammatical diſputation. But the inſolence of his miſtreſs diſguſting him, he came to London, and was put apprentice to a printer, where his maſter and miſtreſs lived in perpetual diſcord; but in two years time he attained ſuch ſkill in his art, and gained ſo much the confidence of his maſter, that he was ſent to conduct a printing-houſe at Norwich, and publiſh a weekly paper. In this undertaking he met with ſome oppoſition, which produced a public controverſy, and procured him the reputation of a writer. When his apprenticeſhip was expired he worked as a journeyman at the printing-houſe of alderman Barber, and was for ſome years a writer in Miſt's Journal; and having married, obtained by his wife's intereſt a ſmall place in the poſt office, and by the correſpondence which this place procured him, he obtained country news-papers, and ſold their intelligence to a journaliſt of London for a guinea a week. He was afterwards raiſed to the office of clerk of the franks, in which he acted with great ſpirit and firmneſs, and often ſtopped franks which were given by members of parliament to their friends, becauſe he thought ſuch an extenſion of a peculiar right illegal. By this conſtancy of diligence, and diverſification of employment, he in time collected a ſum ſufficient for the purchaſe of a ſmall printing-houſe, and began the Gentleman's Magazine, of which he had formed the project ſeveral years before. But though he had long talked of his plan among printers and booksellers, none of them thought it worth the trial, or were willing to ſhare with him in the hazard of printing that periodical work. Yet to this undertaking he owed the affluence in which he paſſed the laſt twenty years of his life, and the fortune he left behind him, which, though large, would have been much more conſiderable, had he not impaired it by innumerable projects, which failed of ſucceſs. He died on the 10th of January, 1754.

CAVEDONE (JAMES) an Italian painter, born at Saſſuolo, in the Modeneſe, in 1580; was the diſciple of Annibal Carracci, whoſe manner he imitated to the greateſt perfection; but his family involved him in ſuch misfortunes, that he became diſordered in his mind, and this reduced him to ſuch diſtreſs, that he was forced publicly to beg. One day being taken ill, he was dragged into a neighbouring ſtable, where he died at Bologna, in 1660.

CAVENDISH, or CANDISH, (THOMAS) a famous navigator in the ſixteenth century, and the ſecond Engliſhman that ſailed round the world, was the ſon of William Cavendiſh, of Trimley St. Martin, in the county of Suffolk, eſq. Having ſpent a conſiderable eſtate in gallantry and attending the court, he reſolved to endeavour to recover his ſinking fortune by a voyage to the South Sea, in order to diſtreſs the Spaniards, who were then at war with England. For this purpoſe he procured three ſhips, viz. the Deſire, of one hundred and twenty tons, the Content of ſixty, and the Hugh Gallant, a bark of forty-two tons, two of them new built from the ſtocks. They carried in all one hundred and twenty-three perſons of all ſorts, and proviſions ſufficient for two years, all which were furniſhed by Mr. Cavendiſh himſelf, who was admiral of this little fleet, which ſailed from Plymouth, on the 21ſt of July, 1586. After having taken, plundered, ſunk, and burnt ſeveral merchant ſhips of ſmall value, they, on the 13th of May, made themſelves maſter of a ſhip of three hundred tons, and of two others, laden with ſugar and proviſions, of which one was valued at twenty thouſand pounds; they took out what they wanted, and burnt the reſt with the ſhips. Coming on the 20th of the ſame month to Paita, they drove the inhabitants up into the mountains, pillaged the town, which conſiſted of two hundred houſes, and, among other valuable commodities, found twenty-five pounds weight of pieces of eight. And having ſet the town on fire, ſailed to the iſland of Puna, where moſt of the cables in the South Sea were made. They found in the harbour a ſhip of two hundred tons, which they ſunk; they alſo burnt a church that was in that iſland, and brought away the bells, put to flight an hundred Spaniards, and two hundred Indians, burnt the town, which conſiſted of three hundred houſes, and alſo four large ſhips that were on the ſtocks; but they had loſt ſo many hands, that they were ſoon after obliged to ſink the Hugh Galant. On the 9th of July they took a ſhip of one hundred and twenty tons, and having taken out the men and whatever they wanted, ſet it on fire. The day after they took and burnt an advice-boat, and ſailing up the river Copalita, burnt the town of Acapulco, with the church and cuſtom-houſe, in which were ſix hundred bags of anile, for dying cloth, each bag worth forty crowns, and four hundred bags of cocoa. They next burnt the town of Puerto de Natividad, with two new ſhips of two hundred tons each, and afterwards the town of Acatlan, near the bay of Malacca. Having refitted and furniſhed themſelves with neceſſaries in an iſland near the tropic of Cancer, they ſet ſail again, when they had the good fortune to meet the St. Anne, a ſhip of ſeven hundred tons, the Spaniſh admiral of the South Seas, which, after three ſharp engagements, they made themſelves maſters of. It had in it one hundred and twenty thouſand pezos, or pieces of gold, of eight ſhillings value, great quantities of rich ſilks, and other valuable commodities, the chief of which they ſhared among themſelves, and having put the whole crew on ſhore, which conſiſted of one hundred and ninety perſons, they ſet fire to the ſhip, with five hundred tons of goods in it, and ſaw it burnt down to the water. Thus did Mr. Cavendiſh and his company ravage the coaſts of Chili, Peru, and New Spain, from the middle of February to the middle of November, 1587, when being ſatisfied with the prodigious booty they had gained, they ſailed to the Eaſt-Indies, and from thence to England, where they arrived at Plymouth, on the 9th of September, having ſpent two years, one month, and nineteen days, in ſailing round the globe. On his arrival, it is ſaid, his ſoldiers and ſailors were cloathed in ſilk, his ſails were damaſk, and his top-maſt covered with cloth of gold.

Mr. Cavendiſh's good fortune in this voyage made him undertake another in 1591, with three tall ſhips and two barks, but he had now very different ſucceſs, for tho' they burnt ſeveral towns, yet the men proving mutinous, Mr. Cavendiſh met with nothing but diſappointments, and after continual labour and vexation, died; but whether at ſea, or on land, is uncertain. This laſt voyage was as full of unhappineſs as the firſt was of glory. No man ever compaſſed the globe in ſo ſhort a time; no man ever did greater things abroad, or returned to his country in greater pomp and triumph; and it is not unlikely but that he might have ſhone this laſt time as bright as he did the firſt, had not the ill humours of a company of mutinous fellows prevented him.

CAVENDISH (ſir WILLIAM) a great favourite and privy counſellor of three princes, viz. Henry VIII. Edward VI. and queen Mary, was born about the year 1505. He was gentleman-uſher to cardinal Wolſey, at the time when that prelate lived with all the ſtate and dignity of a prince; he had a great ſhare in his confidence, and his fidelity to that unhappy prelate recommended him to the favour of Henry VIII. who, immediately after the cardinal's death, ſent for him to court, and conſtituted him one of the commiſſioners for viſiting and taking the ſurrender of religious houſes. He afterwards appointed him one of the auditors of the court of augmentations, gave him a grant of ſeveral lordſhips, made him his treaſurer of the chamber, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and ſoon after he was ſworn one of the privy council: this honour he enjoyed eleven years, in which time his eſtate was much increaſed by the grants he received from Edward VI. in ſeven ſeveral counties. He wrote the Hiſtory of Cardinal Wolſey, and died in the year 1557.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) the ſecond ſon of the former, and the firſt of this family raiſed to the dignity of the peerage, was created baron Cavendiſh, of Hardwick, May 4, 1605, in the third year of the reign of James I. and earl of Devonſhire, Auguſt 7, 1618, in the ſixteenth year of that king. He had the character of being one of the worthieſt noblemen and trueſt patriots of his time. He died March 3, 1625.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) ſon to the former, and the ſecond earl of Devonſhire of this family, was born in 1589, and carefully educated in the houſe of his father, who, when he grew up to the age of nineteen, ſent for Mr. Hobbes, ſo well known to the world by the name of the Philoſopher of Malmſbury, to be the director of his ſon's ſtudies, and from him he obtained a ſtrong paſſion for hiſtory, politics, antiquities, and other parts of polite learning. This noble earl was beloved and admired in both houſes of parliament, and a great ſpeaker in them: he contracted a vaſt debt by his magnificent manner of living, and as he had the ſtricteſt regard to juſtice, he procured an act for the ſale of part of his eſtate, in order to diſcharge it. He died at his houſe, without Biſhopſgate, (where Devonſhire-ſquare is now built) on the 20th of June, 1628, and was buried at the church of Allhallows, at Derby, where a ſtately monument with his own ſtatue in white marble, ſtanding in the middle of it, is erected to his memory, but without any inſcription.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) ſon to the former, and third earl of Devonſhire of this family, was born November 10, 1617, and being nine years of age at his father's deceaſe, was left under the care of his mother the counteſs dowager, who in 1631, committed him to his father's tutor Mr. Hobbes, who inſtructed him at home for about three years, and in 1634 travelled with him as his governor to France and Italy; from which tour he returned in 1637. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his loyalty to king Charles I. oppoſed the attainder of the earl of Strafford; followed the king into the North, and was one of the peers that in June 1642 ſubſcribed the famous declaration at York, that was ſo ill reliſhed at Weſtminſter, that by a reſolution of the houſe of lords, himſelf and eight other peers were excluded from all privilege of parliament, and ordered to ſtand committed to the Tower. His horror of the civil war was ſuch, that he choſe to retire out of the kingdom; but was obliged ſoon after to return to preſerve his eſtate from ſequeſtration. At the Reſtoration he was made lord-lieutenant of the county of Derby, and lived moſtly in the country, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his moderation and hoſpitality. He died Nov. 3, 1684.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) Baron Ogle, viſcount Mansfield, earl, marquis, and duke of Newcaſtle, was one of the moſt accompliſhed perſons, moſt able generals, and diſtinguiſhed patriots of his age. He was ſon of Sir Charles Cavendiſh, youngeſt ſon of Sir William Cavendiſh, and younger brother of the firſt earl of Devonſhire, by Catharine, daughter of Cuthbert, lord Ogle. He was born in the year 1592, and very early acquired a large ſtock of ſolid learning. In 1610 he was made knight of the Bath; in 1620 raiſed to the dignity of a peer, by the title of baron Ogle and viſcount Mansfield; and in the third year of king Charles I. created earl of Newcaſtle upon Tyne, and baron Cavendiſh of Boleſover. He was after this made governor to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. When the firſt troubles broke out in Scotland, and the king's treaſury was but indifferently provided, he contributed ten thouſand pounds, and alſo raiſed a troop of horſe, conſiſting of about two hundred knights and gentlemen, who ſerved at their own charge, and this was commanded by the earl, and honoured with the title of the prince's troop. He had after this the command of the northern counties, and conſtituted general and commander in chief of all the forces that might be raiſed north of Trent, and of ſeveral counties ſouth of that river. He afterwards raiſed an army of eight thouſand horſe, foot, and dragoons, with which he took ſome towns, and gained ſeveral important victories; on which he was advanced to the dignity of marquis of Newcaſtle: but his majeſty's affairs being totally ruined by the raſhneſs of prince Rupert, he, with a few of the principal officers of the army, went abroad, and ſtaid for ſome time at Paris, where, notwithſtanding the vaſt eſtate he had when the civil war broke out, his circumſtances were now ſo bad, that himſelf and his young wife were reduced to the neceſſity of pawning their cloaths for a dinner. He afterwards removed to Antwerp, that he might be nearer his own country, and there, though under great difficulties, reſided for ſeveral years; but notwithſtanding his diſtreſſes, he was treated, during an exile of eighteen years, with extraordinary marks of diſtinction. On his return to England at the Reſtoration he was advanced to the dignity of earl of Ogle and duke of Newcaſtle. He ſpent his time in a country retirement, and was the patron of men of merit. He wrote an excellent work on horſemanſhip, and four comedies, which are not eſteemed.

Mr. Granger obſerves that he was maſter of many accompliſhments, and was much better qualified for a court than a camp; that he underſtood horſemanſhip, muſic, and poetry, but was a better horſeman than muſician, and a better muſician than poet.

His grace died the 25th of December, 1679, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

His titles deſcended to his ſon Henry, earl of Ogle, who was the laſt heir male of his family, and who died on the 26th of July 1691, in whom the title of duke of Newcaſtle in the line of Cavendiſh was extinct.

CAVENDISH (MARGARET) ducheſs of Newcaſtle, famous for her voluminous productions, was the youngeſt daughter of Sir Charles, afterwards lord Lucas, and was born at St. John's near Colcheſter, about the latter end of the reign of James I. She was remarkable from her infancy for her turn to books and ſtudy. In 1643 ſhe went to Oxford, where the court then reſided, and became one of the maids of honour to Henrietta Maria, the royal conſort of king Charles I. And when the queen was forced to retire into France, ſhe attended her thither, and at Paris met with the above William Cavendiſh, then marquis of Newcaſtle, who admiring her perſon, and her mental qualifications, married her in the year 1645. She continued abroad with her lord till the reſtoration of Charles II. and then returning to England, ſpent the remaining part of her life in writing plays, poems, letters, philoſophical diſcourſes, and orations, which, including the life of her huſband, amount to about twelve volumes in folio; but they are not now eſteemed. Mr. Walpole, in his Catalogue of royal and noble Authors, obſerves, that "What gives one the beſt idea of her unbounded paſſion for ſcribbling, was her ſeldom reviſing the copies of her works, leſt as ſhe ſaid, it ſhould diſturb her following conceptions. What a picture of fooliſh nobility, he adds, was this ſtately poetic couple, retired to their own little domain, and intoxicating one another with circumſtantial flattery, on what was of conſequence to no mortal but themſelves." Her grace died at London in 1673, and was interred at Weſtminſter, where the duke cauſed a magnificent monument to be erected to her memory; but dying himſelf in 1676, it ſerved for them both. They are repreſented lying under a rich canopy of ſtate, and have the following extraordinary epitaph: "Here lies the loyal duke of Newcaſtle and his ducheſs, his ſecond wife, by whom he had no iſſue. Her name was Margaret Lucas, youngeſt ſiſter to the lord Lucas of Colcheſter, a noble family; for all the brothers were valiant, and all the ſiſters virtuous. This ducheſs was a wiſe, witty, and learned lady, which her many books do well teſtify. She was a moſt virtuous, and loving, and careful wife, and was with her lord all the time of his baniſhment and miſeries; and when ſhe came home, never parted from him in his ſolitary retirements."

CAVENDISH (CHARLES) brother to William the third, and ſon to William the ſecond earl of Devonſhire, was born at London, May 20, 1620, and having gone through a ſtrict and regular education, took the tour of Europe, and viſited Conſtantinople, Alexandria, and Egypt. At his return to England in 1641 he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his loyalty; and the next year was at the battle of Edge-hill, where by his bravery he obtained a troop, which he himſelf converted into a regiment; and by his valour and conduct in ſeveral engagements obtained the rank of lieutenant-general of horſe; but was unhappily killed near Gainſborough in 1643. He was a nobleman of great merit and learning, and univerſally beloved and admired.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) the firſt duke of Devonſhire, one of the ableſt ſtateſmen, and moſt diſtinguiſhed patriots of his time, was born January 25, 1640, and was attended in his travels by Dr. Killigrew, afterwards maſter of the Savoy, who inſpired him with a true reliſh for poetry, and all the refinements of ſenſe and wit. In 1665 he went a volunteer, and expoſed his perſon extremely in his attendance upon the duke of York, who that year commanded the Britiſh navy. In the ſpring of the year 1669 he accompanied his intimate friend Mr. Montague in his embaſſy to France; and being accidentally at the opera at Paris, met with an adventure, which, though it endangered his life, gained him a very high reputation. He was ſtanding upon the ſtage, when three officers of the king's guard came alſo up. They were full of wine, and one of them walking up to him with a very inſulting queſtion, he gave him a blow on the face, upon which they all drew, and puſhed at him him very hard: when ſetting his back againſt one of the ſcenes, he made a ſtout defence, receiving ſeveral wounds, till a ſturdy Swiſs belonging to the lord ambaſſador Montague caught him up in his arms, and threw him over into the pit. In his fall his arm catched upon an iron ſpike, and was grievouſly torn. The officers were by the king's order ſent to priſon, where they remained, till by his lordſhip's interceſſion they were diſcharged. He afterwards ſerved as knight of the ſhire for the county of Derby for ſeveral parliaments. In 1679 he was choſen one of the king's new privy-council; but finding his attendance ineffectual, he with ſeveral others deſired leave to withdraw, which was granted them. He vigorouſly promoted the bill of excluſion, and carried up to the lords an impeachment againſt the lord chief juſtice Scroggs, for his arbitrary and illegal proceedings in the court of King's Bench, and continued to oppoſe the meaſures of the court. At the lord Ruſſel's trial he appeared as a witneſs for him; and when his noble friend was under ſentence of death gave him a proof of his friendſhip, by ſending him a meſſage that he would come and change cloaths with him in priſon, and ſtay there to repreſent him if he thought that in ſuch diſguiſe he could make his eſcape. In 1684, by the deceaſe of his father he became earl of Devonſhire; but two years after had an exorbitant fine of thirty thouſand pounds laid upon him for ſtriking colonel Culpepper within the verge of the court. His abhorrence of popery made him one of the earlieſt in inviting over the prince of Orange, and at his landing he appeared in arms for him, and was very zealous for declaring the prince and princeſs of Orange king and queen of England. He was afterwards appointed lord-ſteward of their majeſties houſhold; inſtalled knight of the garter, and in 1694 was created marquis of Hartington and duke of Devonſhire. Theſe and his other honours he enjoyed in the reign of queen Anne, and died Auguſt 18, 1707.

His grace's genius for poetry ſhewed itſelf particularly in two pieces, written with equal ſpirit, dignity, and delicacy: theſe are an Ode on the Death of Queen Mary; and An Alluſion to the Archbiſhop of Cambray's Supplement to Homer. He had great ſkill in the languages, was a true judge in hiſtory, and a critic in poetry; he had a fine hand in muſic, an elegant taſte in painting, and in architecture had a genius and ſkill equal to any perſon of the age in which he lived. He himſelf ordered the following inſcription to be placed on his monument:

Willielmus Dux Devon,
Bonorum Principum Fidelis Subditus,
Inimicus et Inviſus Tyrannis.

William Duke of Devonſhire,
Of good Princes the faithful Subject,
The Enemy and Averſion of Tyrants.

CAULIAC (Gui de) a phyſician of the univerſity of Montpelier, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing a Treatiſe on Surgery, which is much eſteemed. He flouriſhed in the beginning of the fourteenth century.

CAURRE (John des) principal of the college of Amiens, and canon of St. Nicholas, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. He was a native of Morœul in Picardy, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing in French, among other books, one intitled Moral Works, interſperſed with Hiſtories, &c. and an Ode in Praiſe of the Maſſacre of St. Bartholemew's Day.

CAUSSIN (Nicholas) a French Jeſuit, and confeſſor to Lewis XIII. ſurnamed the Juſt, was born at Troyes in Champagne, in the year 1580. He wrote ſeveral books in Latin and French, but none of them did him more honour than that which is intitled La Cour Sainte, which has been tranſlated into almoſt all the European languages. He died in the Jeſuit's convent at Paris, July 2, 1651.

CAUX, a territory of Normandy, in the dioceſe of Rouen. It comprehends ten cities, thirty towns, and about ſix hundred pariſhes. The moſt remarkable cities and towns are Caudebec, St. Valery, Dieppe, Arques, Eu, Aumale, L'Illbone, Yvetot, Longueville, Havre, Montivilliers, Harfleur, and Feſcamp. It is forty miles in length, and as much broad. The country is high and flat, with few or no vallies, and but little water; and yet it is fruitful in corn, pulſe, flax, hemp, and fruits.

CAWOOD, a town in the weſt riding of Yorkſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. Here is a caſtle which belongs to the archbiſhop. The fair is on May 12, for cattle and wooden ware. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth of York, and one hundred and eighty-ſeven north of London. Long. 0. 52. W. Lat. 53. 45. N.

CAWTON (Thomas) a very learned miniſter among the nonconformiſts in the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of the reverend Mr. Thomas Cawton, a diſſenting miniſter, who was baniſhed for his loyalty. He was born at Wivenhoe near Colcheſter; about the year 1637; ſtudied the oriental languages at Rotterdam, and was afterwards ſent to the univerſity of Utrecht. On his return to England he went to Oxford, and was chaplain to Sir Anthony Irby of Lincolnſhire, and then to lady Irwin, after which he preached to a congregation of Diſſenters in Weſtminſter, with ſome interruptions from the ſeverities of the government, for about ſeven years. He publiſhed 1. A Theſis on the Syriac Verſion of the New Teſtament. 2. A Diſſertation on the Uſefulneſs of the Hebrew Language in the ſtudy of Theoretic Philoſophy. 3. A Copy of Hebrew Verſes on his Majeſty's Reſtauration. And 4. His Father's Life. He died April 10, 1677.

CAXTON (William) the firſt who introduced and practiſed the moſt uſeful and inſtructive art of printing in England, was born in Kent about the year 1411, and after learning Latin and French was put apprentice to a mercer in London. His maſter dying in 1441, he was intruſted by the mercer's company as their factor in Holland, Zealand, Flanders, &c. which he enjoyed for about twenty-three years, when he was joined with Richard Whitchill, Eſq. in a commiſſion granted them by king Edward IV. for continuing and confirming a treaty of trade and commerce between his majeſty and Philip duke of Burgundy. While he was abroad he found means to learn the invaluable art of printing, then in its infancy, which he brought into England about the year 1471, and firſt practiſed it in Weſtminſter-abbey, where he printed ſeveral works, either of his own compoſition, or tranſlated by him; the firſt book printed in Engliſh being intitled The Recuyell of the Hiſtorys of Troy, &c. which he is ſaid to have printed abroad: and the firſt printed in England was a moral work, intitled the Game of Cheſs, dated in 1474. This worthy man died in 1491.

Caxton, a town in Cambridgeſhire, with a market on Tueſdays. The fairs are May 5, and October 12, for pedlary ware. It is ſeven miles ſouth of Huntingdon, and fifty north of London. Long. 0. 13 W. Lat. 52. 10. N.

CAXAMALCA, a town of Peru, in South America, not far from Quito. The country abounds in paſtures, Indian corn, and mines of ſeveral metals. The Indians are peaceable and induſtrious. It is about ſeventy-five miles from the South Sea. Long. 75. 33. W. Lat. 8. 0. S.

CAYET (Peter Victor Palma) a perſon diſtinguiſhed by his extraordinary learning, ſtudied in his youth at Geneva, while a ſervant to Calvin, and was afterwards choſen paſtor of a congregation at Poitiers, and at length became chaplain to king Henry the Great's ſiſter. But being accuſed not only of having written an apology for public ſtews, but alſo of having ſold himſelf to the devil, the ſynod deprived him of the office of a miniſter, upon which he turned catholic, in the year 1595, and was ſoon made regius reader for the oriental languages in the univerſity of Paris, and commenced doctor of divinity. He wrote ſeveral hiſtories and other works, and died July 22, 1610.

CAZIMIER, a town in Poland, in the palatinate of Lublin. It is ſeated on a mountain covered with trees, and the houſes are all of wood. It is ten miles from Belgitz. Long. 22. 10. E. Lat. 51. 5. N.

CEBARES, the name of Darius's gentleman of the horſe, who, after the death of Smerdis, made uſe of a ſtratagem to make Darius's horſe neigh, and by that means procured him the throne of Perſia.

CEBES, a philoſopher of Thebes, in Bœotia, and the diſciple of Socrates, to whom a Dialogue is attributed, intitled, The Picture of Human Life; but this work is of a much later date. Giles Boileau, of the French academy, has given a tranſlation of it in French, which is eſteemed.

CECIL (William) baron Burleigh, and lord high treaſurer of England, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was the ſon of Richard Cecil, eſq. maſter of the robes to king Henry VIII. and was born at Bourn, in Lincolnſhire. He was educated at Cambridge, from whence he was removed to Gray's Inn, London, in order to ſtudy the law; but while he was thus employed, an accident introduced him to the knowledge and favour of his ſovereign. O'Neil, a famous Iriſh chief, coming to court, brought with him two of his chaplains, who were very great bigots, not only to the faith, but the power of the Romiſh pontiff, and Mr. Cecil coming to the palace to ſee his father, had a warm diſpute with them in Latin, which was managed with ſuch ſkill and vivacity on the part of Cecil, that the two prieſts, finding their deficiency in point of argument, fell into a downright paſſion. This being reported to the king, he had the curioſity to ſee the young man, and, after a long converſation, was ſo much taken with his abilities, that he directed his father to find out a place for him; but there being none vacant, the old gentleman aſked the reverſion of the cuſtos brevium, worth two hundred and forty pounds a year, which was readily granted, and ſome years after, at the beginning of the reign of Edward VI. it came into his poſſeſſion; and this introduction induced Mr. Cecil to puſh his his fortune in that road which he had ſo happily entered. In 1547 he was made maſter of the requeſts, the firſt who bore that title in England; the next year he advanced to the high poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, and, in 1551, was knighted, and ſworn of the privy council. However, in the reign of queen Mary, he was obliged to reſign his employments, but was twice choſen knight of the ſhire for the county of Lincoln. In that reign he carried on a private correſpondence with the princeſs Elizabeth, and on her coming to the throne in 1558, was ſworn privy counſellor, and ſecretary of ſtate. In 1561 he was made maſter of the wards; in 1571 was created baron of Burleigh, the next year knight of the Garter, and, the year after, lord high treaſurer. He was remarkable for the prudence and ſteadineſs of his conduct; and though he tranſacted a variety of buſineſs of different kinds, yet every thing ſeems to have been managed with as much attention as if he had nothing elſe in view, agreeable to his own favourite and excellent maxim, "That the ſhorteſt way to do many things is to "do but one thing at a time." This great miniſter died Auguſt 4, 1598.

This great ſtateſman wrote, 1. La Complainte de l'Ame Pechereſſe, in French verſe, extant in the king's library. 2. Slanders and Lies, malicioufly, groſly, and impudently vomited out in certain traiterous Books and Pamphlets, concerning two Counſellors, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord-keeper of the Great Seal, and Sir William Cecil, principal Secretary of State to her Majeſty. 3. Lord Burleigh's Precepts, or Directions for the well ordering and Carriage of a Man's Life, printed in 1637. 4. Meditations on the Death of his Lady. 5. A Meditation of the State of England, during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. 6. The Execution of Juſtice in England, for Maintenance of Public and Chriſtian Peace, againſt certain Stirrers of Seditions, and Adherents to the Traitors and Enemies of the Realm, &c. The ſecond edition was printed in 1583. He likewiſe wrote, 7. Anſwers to many Libels againſt the Queen and Government, and ſeveral other pieces. His lordſhip likewiſe drew up a great number of pedigrees, and many of his letters are ſtill preſerved.

CECIL, or CECYLL (ROBERT) the firſt earl of Saliſbury, and one of the ableſt ſtateſmen in Europe, was the ſon of the former, and was born about the beginning of the year 1550. He was bred a courtier from his cradle, and being trained under his excellent father, became a very great proficient in the knowledge of all ſtate affairs: queen Elizabeth therefore employed him in affairs and negociations of the higheſt conſequence. Having conferred on him the honour of knighthood, ſhe ſent him aſſiſtant to the earl of Derby, ambaſſador to the king of France. At his return in 1596, ſhe made him ſecond ſecretary of ſtate, with ſir Francis Walſingham; after whoſe deceaſe he continued principal as long as he lived. In 1597, he was conſtituted chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, and was alſo lord-privy-ſeal. He was one of the chief inſtruments in the diſgrace and fall of Robert, earl of Eſſex, who had conſtantly oppoſed his promotion. In 1599 he ſucceeded his father in the office of maſter of the wards, for which he reſigned the place of chancellor of the duchy. He ſucceeded him alſo in the high poſt of prime miniſter; in which office he was continued under the reign of king James, who, in 1603, created him baron of Eſſenden, in Rutlandſhire: in 1604, viſcount Cranborne, in Dorſetſhire; the next year, earl of Saliſbury, and knight of the garter; and in 1608, lord high-treaſurer of England. He died May 24, 1612. He has been blamed, amongſt other things, for raiſing money by ſeveral means, which were looked upon as oppreſſive, for being a promoter of the brave ſir Walter Raleigh's fall, and before that, for his ſharp proceedings againſt the earl of Eſſex. He was, however, a perſon of great dexterity and judgment in the diſpatch of public affairs; he in general conſulted the intereſt of the nation, and always encouraged induſtry and manufactures.

CECILIA (St.) has been honoured as a martyr by the Romiſh church ever ſince the fifth century; but there is no account of her life, actions, and death. She is, however, ſaid to be the inventreſs of the organ.

CECILIAN, deacon of Carthage, was elected biſhop of that ſee in 311, after Menſurius; but ſome miniſters of the ſame church, at the head of whom was Botrus, Celeſius, and a rich lady, named Lucilla, raiſing an oppoſition againſt him from the biſhops of Numidia, they elected Majorinus in his room, and declared Cecilian's ordination void, under the pretence that it had been performed by Felix of Aptonge, who was accuſed of having delivered up the ſacred books to the perſecutors of the Chriſtians. Donatus, biſhop of Caſæ Nigræ, and ſeveral African biſhops, took the part of Majorinus, while others continued in communion with Cecilian, which occaſioned a ſchiſm in the African church. The emperor Conſtantine declared himſelf in favour of Cecilian, in 312, and ordered Anulinus, proconſul of Africa, to cauſe him to be acknowledged as the lawful biſhop; but Majorinus's party preſenting memorials to the proconſul, he referred the affair to the emperor, who nominated Maternus biſhop of Cologne, Rheticus biſhop of Autun, and Marinus biſhop of Arles, to decide this affair, in conjunction with Miltiades, biſhop of Rome, who having held a council, Cecilian was declared the lawful biſhop. The Donatiſts, however, perſiſting in their obſtinacy, and requiring a new judgment from the emperor, he called the council of Arles, held in 314, when Cecilian was juſtified, and his adverſaries condemned. In fine, the Donatiſts appealing again to the emperor, he declared, on the 8th of November, 316, that Cecilian was innocent, and his adverſaries calumniators, on which Cecilian remained in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the biſhoprick of Carthage till his death, which happened about the year 347.

CECILIUS. See METELLUS and STATIUS.

CECROPS, in fabulous hiſtory, a people whom Jupiter hired to aſſiſt him againſt the Titans, but they refuſing to join him after they had taken his money, he turned them into apes.

CECROPS, an Egyptian, and the firſt king of the Athenians, built, or according to others, embelliſhed the city of Athens. He married Agraule, the daughter of Actus, and civilized the people of Attica, about the one thouſand one hundred and fifty-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra. He had ſixteen ſucceſſors in the ſpace of four hundred and eighty-eight years, till the time of Codrus.

CECULUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Vulcan, was conceived by a ſpark of fire flying into the boſom of his mother Preneſte, and as a mark of what gave him his being, had always an inflammation in his eyes. He built the town of Preneſte, in Italy, and took the part of Turnus againſt Æneas.

CEDONGNA, a town of Naples, in the Farther Principata, with a biſhop's ſee. It is thirteen miles north-weſt of Melfi. Long. 15. 33. E. Lat. 41. 5. N.

CEFALONIA, a conſiderable iſland of Greece, lying to the ſouth of Albany, and to the north-eaſt of the Morea. It produces oil, muſcat wines, and currants. The climate is ſo hot, that bloſſoms appear on the trees all the winter. It is ſubject to the Venetians. The capital town is Cefalonia, which has a biſhop's ſee united to that of Zante. Long. 20. 45. E. Lat. 38. 30. N.

CEFALU, a town of Sicily, in the valley of Demon, with a caſtle, a harbour, and a biſhop's ſee. Long. 14. 18. E. Lat. 38. 5. N.

CEIX, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Lucifer, king of Trachinia, and uncle of Chirone, whoſe tongue Diana ſhot through with an arrow, which ſo greatly afflicted her father Dædalion, that he threw himſelf from a precipice. Upon which Ceix having ſtrange viſions, went to conſult the oracle of Apollo at Claros, but was caſt away in his return. On hearing this news, Alcione, his wife, alſo drowned herſelf, and they were both tranſormed into king's fiſhers.

CELANO, a town in the kingdom of Naples, in the Farther Abruzzo, about two miles from a lake of the ſame name. Long. 13. 55. E. Lat. 42. 0. N.

CELEBES, an iſland in the Indian ſea, ſeated under the Equator, and called by ſome Macaſſar. The length and breath has not been accurately computed, but the circumference, at a medium, is about eight hundred miles. It had formerly ſix kingdoms, which are reduced to one. The air is hot and moiſt, and ſubject to great rains during the north-weſt winds, which blow from November to March, at which time the country is overflowed, for which reaſon they build their houſes on piles of wood, ten feet high. The moſt healthful time is during the northern monſoons, which ſeldom fail blowing regularly in one part of the year. The chief vegetables are rice and cocoas, but they have ebony, calambar, ſanders, and other dying woods. Their fruits and flowers are much the ſame as in the neighbouring parts of the Indies. They have pepper, ſugar, betel, arek, the fineſt cotton, and opium. Few countries have larger and better cattle; but they are infeſted with large monkies, which keep together in conſiderable bodies, for which reaſon the wild beaſts will not attempt them, but the ſerpents will purſue them to the very tops of the trees. They have little horſes, but the natives uſe no ſaddle but a painted cloth, and the bridle is a cord, with a bit of wood. They employ oxen and buffaloes in drawing.

The natives have bright olive complexions, and the women have ſhining black hair. They are thought to be very handſome by the Dutch and Chineſe, who often purchaſe them for bedfellows. Their noſes are flat, but whether they are made ſo by art, as is pretended by ſome, may be juſtly doubted. Both men and women are of a low ſtature, but their limbs are ſtrait, and their features regular. The females are very loving and faithful, if well uſed; but if they are ill treated, revengeful. The men are induſtrious, robuſt, buſt, and make excellent ſoldiers. Their arms are ſabres, and trunks, from whence they blow poiſoned darts, which are pointed with the tooth of a ſea-fiſh. Some likewiſe uſe poiſoned daggers. They were the laſt of the Indian nations that were enſlaved by the Dutch, which could not be effected till after a long war. They teach their children to read and write, and their characters have ſome reſemblance of the Arabic. Their religion being Mahommetan, it is no wonder the men indulge themſelves in many wives and concubines. The employment of the women is ſpinning, cookery, and making their own and the men's clothes. Their common food is rice, herbs, roots, fruit, and fiſh. Sometimes they cut boiled fowls, beef, or kid, into ſmall pieces, and mix them with the rice. Their meals are two, one in the morning, and the other at night. Their drink is water, ſherbet, tea, and coffee. They have likewiſe palm wine or toddy, and arrack. The men wear jewels in their ears, and the women only gold chains about their necks. The inhabitants in general go half naked, without any thing on their head, legs, or feet, and ſome have nothing but a cloth round their middle. Their houſes are of wood, raiſed on ſtakes or piles, as before obſerved, and covered with palm leaves. The furniture conſiſts of utenſils to dreſs their victuals, a carpet to ſleep on, and little tables, which they uſe at their meals. However they are more cleanly than many in this part of the world. The ſtreets in Macaſſer are ſpacious, and planted with trees on each ſide; the town ſtands by the ſide of the only large river they have in the iſland. The Dutch have a fort here, mounted with forty guns, and garriſoned with ſeven hundred men. They have two markets, the one a little before ſun-riſing, and the other a little after ſun-ſetting, where the women only buy and ſell. There is only one other town of note, called Jampandam, which was the firſt place of conſequence taken by the Dutch, and where they have ſtill a fort. This iſland is nothing nigh ſo populous as it was before the Dutch conquered it; the men being hired for ſoldiers in moſt of the neighbouring countries and iſlands.

The animals are of the ſame kind as in other parts of the Eaſt Indies, except the Macaſſer fox, which perhaps may be peculiar to this place, or at leaſt is chiefly here to be met with. This has an exceeding long buſhy tail, which ſtands quite upright, flat feet, long claws, and very ſhort ears. Indeed he has nothing like the European fox but the name. Celebes lies between the one hundred and nineteenth and one hundred and twenty-fourth degree of eaſt longitude, and between one degree fifty minutes of north latitude, and five degrees and forty minutes of ſouth latitude; according to which it muſt be four hundred and fifty miles in length; but this is not very certain.

CELESTIN I. a Roman, ſucceeded pope Boniface I. in 423. He condemned the opinions of Neſtorius in a council held at Rome in 430, and ſent deputies to the general council of Epheſus in 431. He had a quarrel with the African biſhops in 426, who defended the privileges of their churches, and taxed his inſiſting upon appeals as an encroachment, and a piece of ſecular vanity. He died in 432.

CELESTIN II. a native of Tiſerne, was elected pope after Innocent II. on the 25th of September 1143, and died five months after.

CELESTIN III. a Roman, ſucceeded pope Clement III. in 1191. He had a great zeal for the conqueſt of the Holy Land, and on that account took the part of Richard king of England againſt ſome of his barons, who had taken arms while that prince was attempting to make conqueſts in the Eaſt. After the death of the emperor Henry, Celeſtin gave Sicily to Frederic his ſon, on condition of his paying an annual tribute to the holy ſee. He died in 1198. There are ſtill extant ſeventeen of his letters.

CELESTIN IV. a native of Milan, was elected pope on the 22d of September 1241, after the death of Gregory IX. but died eighteen days after his election.

CELESTIN V. whoſe original name was Peter of Morron, was born at Iſernia in 1215. He entered into the order of St. Benedict, and in 1244 retired to Mont Majello, where he founded the order of the Celeſtins, which was confirmed by Gregory X. in 1273, at the ſecond general council of Lyons. Celeſtin was elected pope on the 5th of July 1294; but five months after his election made a voluntary abdication of the pontificate at the ſolicitation of cardinal Cajetan, who was at the head of the political affairs, and was ſecretly deſirous of being elected himſelf, as he actually was, and took the name of Boniface VIII. Celeſtin after his abdication retired into his ſolitude; when Boniface cauſed him to be ſeized and ſhut up in the caſtle of Fumon, where he died in 1296. He wrote ſeveral pieces, and was canonized by Clement V. in 1313.

CELEUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Eleuſis, who giving an hoſpitable reception to Ceres, that goddeſs in return taught him the art of ſowing corn; and to render his ſon Triptolemus immortal, covered him every night with fire, which Celeus diſcovering, was ſo affrighted that he cried out and revealed himſelf, on which the goddeſs killed him. See TRIPTOLEMUS.

CELL, a town of Triers. See ZELL.

CELLARIUS (CHRISTOPHER) one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Smalcald in Germany, in 1638. After having taught philoſophy and the oriental languages in ſeveral cities in Germany, he was made profeſſor of eloquence and hiſtory at Hall in Saxony, where he acquired great reputation. He wrote a learned work in Latin on ancient geography, and a great number of other books, and died on the 4th of June 1707, aged ſixty-eight.

CELLINI (BENVENUTO) an excellent goldſmith, jeweller, ſtatuary, and engraver of dyes for medals, was born at Florence in 1500, and was one of the moſt admirable artiſts of the ſixteenth century. In his youth he cultivated the goldſmith's buſineſs, and had no equal in that branch for many years, nor in making fine figures in alto and baſſo relievo, and every other branch of that ingenious art. He ſet jewels and adorned them with admirable collets, and diminutive figures, ſo admirably formed, and ſome of them ſo odd and whimſical, that nothing finer or more beautiful can be conceived. The medals which he in his youth made of gold and ſilver, cannot be ſufficiently praiſed; hence pope Clement VII. employed him in making ſtamps for the mint; and there never were ſeen finer coins than thoſe that were ſtruck in Rome at that period. That pope alſo entruſted him with the defence of the caſtle of Angelo, in which by his bravery and prudence he acquired great honour. After the death of pope Clement, Benvenuto returned to Florence, where he likewiſe made ſtamps with the head of duke Alexander, which were admirably executed. He afterwards returned to Rome, and worked for the pope; but meeting with enemies, he was confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo, where he ſuffered a long and cruel impriſonment, but was at length releaſed at the interpoſition of Francis I. king of France, who invited him to his court, where he attached himſelf to ſculpture, and caſting ſtatues in bronze; and made many works alſo in ſilver and gold: but having made madam d'Eſtampes, the king's miſtreſs, his enemy, he returned to Florence, and entered into the ſervice of duke Coſmo, by whom he was at firſt employed as a goldſmith, and afterwards in certain pieces of ſculpture: he particularly executed in metal the fine ſtatue of Perſeus which ſtands near the ducal palace, which he placed on a marble pedeſtal, with ſome fine bronze figures. He alſo made a Chriſt upon the croſs, as big as the life, which is a moſt exquiſite and extraordinary performance. He was a man of great ſpirit and vivacity, bold, active, enterpriſing, and formidable to his enemies. He wrote his life, in quarto, which has been tranſlated into Engliſh by Dr. Nugent; and likewiſe a Treatiſe on Goldſmith's Work, &c. He died at Florence on the 13th of February 1570.

CELSUS (AURELIUS CORNELIUS) a celebrated phyſician of the firſt century, who wrote eight books on medicine in elegant Latin. He was the Hippocrates of the Latins, and Quintilian gives him a great eulogium. The great Boerhaave tells us that Celſus is one of the beſt authors of antiquity for letting us into the true meaning and opinions of Hippocrates; and that without him, the writings of this father in phyſic would be often unintelligible, often miſunderſtood by us. He ſhews us alſo how the ancients cured diſtempers by friction, bathing, &c. His eight books De Medicina have been ſeveral times printed. The Elzivir edition in the year 1650, by Vander Linden is the beſt, as being entirely corrected from his manuſcripts. Other editions have been printed ſince; as that of Amſterdam in 1687, in duodecimo, and that of Leyden in 1730, in two volumes octavo.

CELSUS, an Epicurean philoſopher in the ſecond century. He wrote a work againſt the Chriſtians, intitled The true Diſcourſe, to which Origen, at the deſire of Ambroſe his friend, wrote a learned anſwer. To this philoſopher Lucian dedicated his Pſeudomantis.

CELMIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the foſter-father of Jupiter, who, while he was a young man, was extremely fond of him; but that god, after he had baniſhed his father Saturn, recollected that Celmis had told ſome people that he was mortal, on which he transformed him into a diamond.

CENALIS, in French Cenou (ROBERT) a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, and biſhop of Avranches in the ſixteenth century, was the author of many works. He died at Paris, the place of his birth, in 1560.

CENCHRIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Cinyras, and the mother of Myrrha. See MYRRHA.

CENE (CHARLES LE) a celebrated proteſtant divine, was born at Caen in 1647. After having been ſome time miniſter at Honfleur, he was, in 1682, called to Charenton: but ſome ſermons which he preached there rendering him ſuſpected of Arminianiſm, involved him in ſome trouble, but before this was ended the revocation of the edict of Nantes obliged him to leave France. Le Cene then came to England, where he applied himſelf to making a new tranſlation of the Bible in French, and in 1696 publiſhed his plan, which is one of the moſt excellent works that has been publiſhed on the Holy Scriptures. He died at London, in 1703. His ſon, who was a bookſeller of Amſterdam, a few years after, publiſhed his Verſion of the Bible. Charles le Cene alſo wrote, 1. De L'état de l'Homme après le Péché & la Prédeſtination au Salut. 2. Entretiens ſur diverſes Matieres de Theologie. 3. Converſations ſur diverſes Matieres de Religion.

CENEDA, a town of the province of Trevignano, in Italy, in the ſtate of Venice, with a biſhop's ſee. It is twenty miles north of Trevigio, and ten miles ſouth of Belluno. Long. 12. 40. E. Lat. 46. 5. N.

CENIS, or CÆNIS, in fabulous hiſtory, a young virgin, who, being raviſhed by Neptune; that god, to appeaſe her, promiſed her any ſatisfaction; on which the injured maid, that ſhe might no more ſuffer violation, deſired to be changed into a man, and to become invulnerable. This requeſt Neptune granted; on which the youth now took the name of Cæneus; aſſiſted at the marriage of Perithous, and fought againſt the Centaurs; but was killed by their caſting great trees upon him, by which he was ſmothered; when Neptune, remembering the love he formerly had for him, transformed him into a bird.

CENOTAPH, Κενοτάφια, in Grecian antiquity, a monument erected in honour of the dead, without containing any of their remains: of which there were two ſorts; one a kind of honorary tomb, erected to perſons whoſe funeral rites had been performed in another place. The other a monument erected for thoſe who had never been interred: for the ancient Greeks were poſſeſſed with an opinion that the ghoſts of men unburied could not be admitted into the bleſſed regions; but were forced to wander in miſery for an hundred years; and that when any perſon had periſhed in the ſea, or any other place where the body could not be found, the only method of giving him repoſe, was, to to erect a ſepulchre, and by repeating three times, with a loud voice, the name of the deceaſed, to call his ghoſt to the habitation prepared for it.

The ſign by which theſe kinds of ſepulchres were diſtinguiſhed from others, was commonly the wreck of a ſhip, to ſignify the deceaſe of a perſon in ſome foreign country, or his being loſt at ſea.

CENSOR, in Roman antiquity, a magiſtrate of great dignity, whoſe office conſiſted in numbering the people; in the correction and reformation of their manners; in eſtimating the effects of each citizen; in the proportioning of taxes; the ſuperintendance of tribute; the care of the public places, and defraying the expence of ſuch ſacrifices as were made upon the public account. In ſhort, he inſpected the management of private familes, relating to education and expence; and had authority to reprimand and correct any irregularity, even in the ſenators themſelves, and to take care that perſons, both in a public and private capacity, behaved themſelves in a becoming manner.

The two cenſors were firſt created in the three hundred and eleventh year of Rome, upon the ſenate's obſerving that the conſuls were generally ſo much taken up in military actions, as to have no leiſure to attend to private affairs. They were at firſt choſen out of the ſenate, but after the plebeians had got the conſulate open to them, they ſoon arrived at the cenſorſhip; however, it was not uſual for any perſon to aſpire to it till he had paſſed all the other offices. It was at firſt held for five years; but Mamercus Æmilius ſhortened the term to eighteen months.

The cenſors, after their election, took an oath to act equitably, and with impartiality, through the whole courſe of their adminiſtration; and notwithſtanding their great authority, they were obliged to give an account of their management to the tribunes and ædiles curales.

This office continued no longer than to the time of the emperors, who diſcharged it themſelves.

CENSORINUS (APPIUS CLAUDIUS) a Roman ſenator, and great warrior, in the third century, was twice conſul, preſect of Rome, and embaſſador to Perſia and Sarmatia. He was raiſed to the empire about the year 269, to oppoſe Claudius II. but his extreme ſeverity occaſioned his being murdered by thoſe very perſons who raiſed him to that dignity, on the ſeventh day after his election.

CENSORINUS, a celebrated writer in the third century, well known by his treatiſe De Die Natali, a very important work with reſpect to the ſtating of chronology. This treatiſe, which was written about the year 238, Gerard Voſſius calls a little book of gold, and declares it to be a moſt learned work, of the higheſt uſe and importance to chronologers, ſince it connects and determines, with great exactneſs, ſome principal æras in Pagan hiſtory. It was printed at Cambridge, with the notes of Lindenbrokius, in 1695.

CENTAURS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſons of Ixion, and a cloud, formed by Jupiter, in the ſhape of Juno. They were half men and half horſes; and being invited to the nuptials of Perithous and Deidamia, quarrelled with the Lapithæ, and uſed them ill; but were at laſt overcome by Hercules, who drove them out of Theſſaly. See IXION.

Some theologiſts imagine that the people of Theſſaly, near Mount Pelion, were diſtinguiſhed by their ſkill in breaking and managing horſes, and that being ſeen on horſeback by the neighbouring people, who never ſaw any before, were imagined to form one animal with the horſe on which each perſon rode, and were therefore called Centaurs.

CENTLIVRE (SUSANNA) a celebrated comic writer, was the daughter of Mr. Freeman, of Holbeach, in Lincolnſhire, and had ſuch an early turn for poetry, that, it is ſaid, ſhe wrote a ſong before ſhe was ſeven years old. She learned French from a neighbouring gentleman, who ſo much admired her ſprightly wit and manner, that he undertook to inſtruct her in that language, in which ſhe made ſuch a rapid progreſs, that before ſhe was twelve years of age, ſhe could not only read Moliere, but enter into the ſpirit of all the characters. Her father dying, left her to the care of a ſtep-mother, whoſe treatment being not agreeable to her, ſhe left her, and entered into a company of ſtrolling players, who came to Stamford, and began with the part of Pariſatis, in Alexander the Great; but afterwards ſtruck into the men's parts. Several little poems procured her conſiderable preſents from the great; particularly prince Eugene made her a preſent of a fine gold ſnuff-box, for a poem inſcribed to him. Her peculiar talent was comedy, and ſhe particularly excelled in the contrivance of the plots and incidents; ſhe wrote fifteen plays, and for many years kept up a correſpondence with gentlemen diſtinguiſhed by their wit and abilities; particularly with ſir Richard Steel, Mr. Rowe, Mr. Budgel, &c. She died in Spring-Gardens, on the firſt of December, 1723, at the houſe of her third huſband, Mr. Joſeph Centlivre, and was interred in the church of St. Martin's in the Fields.

CENTONARII, in Roman antiquity, certain officers of the army, who provided tents and centons, which were a kind of covering deſigned to reſiſt the fire, and keep off the darts, which the enemy threw into a camp.

CENTUMVIRI, in Roman antiquity, magiſtrates appointed to decide common cauſes among the people. Three of theſe were choſen out of each tribe; and though they amounted to an hundred and five perſons, were thus called from the round number centum, an hundred.

CENTURION, in antiquity, a Roman officer in the infantry, who had the command of a century, or an hundred men. The centurions held the firſt rank in the firſt cohort of a legion.

The Centurion Primipilus was the chief of the centurions; and was not under the command of a tribune, as all the reſt were; he had four centurions under his direction, and guarded the ſtandard and the eagle of the legion.

CENU, a town of Terra Firma, in South America, eighty miles ſouth of Carthagena. Long. 300. 35. E. Lat. 9. 0. N.

CEPHALUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Æolus, married Procris, the daughter of Erichtheus, king of Athens. Aurora frequently ſeeing him early in the woods, intent on his ſport, conceived a violent paſſion for him, and carried him with her to heaven, where ſhe in vain uſed all her arts to engage him to violate his conjugal vow. The prince, as fond of his wife as the goddeſs was of him, remained inexorably faithful. Aurora therefore, in order to undeceive him, ſent him to Procris, in the diſguiſe of a merchant, to tempt her conſtancy by rich preſents: this artifice ſucceeded, and juſt when his ſpouſe was on the point of yielding, the unhappy huſband diſcovered himſelf; on which Procris fled to the woods to hide her ſhame; but being afterwards reconciled, ſhe made Cephalus a preſent of an unerring dart. A preſent like this increaſed his love of hunting, and proved doubly fatal to the donor. One day the young prince wearied with his toil, ſat down in the woods, and called for Aura, or the gentle breeze, to cool him. This being overheard, was told to Procris; ſhe inſtantly becoming jealous, followed her huſband, and concealed herſelf in a thicket, where ſhe could eaſily obſerve his motions; but unfortunately, the noiſe ſhe made alarmed Cephalus, who, thinking that ſome wild beaſt lay there concealed, diſcharged the infallible dart, and pierced her to the heart.

CEPHEUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Arcadia, on whoſe head Minerva faſtening one of Meduſa's hairs, rendered him invincible.

CERAM, an iſland of Aſia, in the Eaſt Indies, to the weſt of New Guinea, and to the ſouth of Amboyna and Banda.

It is one hundred and forty miles in length, and forty in breadth. It is a mountainous woody country, where the Dutch have a fortreſs to keep the natives in ſubjection. The inhabitants are Mahommedans, and Cambello is the principal town. Longitude from 126. to 129. E. Lat. 3. 0. S.

CERATINUS (James) a learned man of the ſixteenth century. Eraſmus honoured him with very great encomiums, not only on account of the regularity of his life and manners, but alſo for his erudition. He wrote, 1. a piece intitled De Sono Græcarum Literarum. 2. A Tranſlation of St. Chryſoſtom's firſt and ſecond Dialogue on the Excellency of the Prieſthood, and a Greek and Latin Lexicon. He died at Louvain, April 10, 1530.

CERBERUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a dreadful three-headed maſtiff, born of Typhon and Echidna, and placed to guard the gates of hell. He fawned upon all who entered, but devoured thoſe who attempted to get back. He was however maſtered by Hercules, who dragged him up to the earth, when, in ſtruggling, a foam dropt from his mouth, which produced the poiſonous herb called aconite, or wolfsbane. For the origin of this fable, ſee Elysian Fields.

CERCEAU (John Anthony du) a Jeſuit and French poet, born at Paris, in 1670. He endeavoured to imitate Marot, but was greatly inferior to that excellent poet. He died at Varet, near Tours, on the 4th of July, 1730.

CERDA (John Lewis de la) a learned Jeſuit, in the ſixteenth century, was a native of Toledo, and wrote large Commentaries on Virgil, and a part of Tertullian, and alſo ſeveral other works.

Cerda (de la) a Spaniſh poet, whoſe poems are eſteemed in Spain.

Cerda (Bernarda Ferreira de la) an illuſtrious Portugueſe lady, who lived in the middle of the ſeventeenth century, and diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her ſkill, not only in polite learning, but in philoſophy and the mathematics. She wrote well, both in verſe and proſe, and publiſhed a collection of poems, a volume of comedies, a poem intitled Eſpagna Libertata, and other works.

CERDAGNA, a ſmall province near the Pyrenean Mountains, partly in Catalonia, in Spain, and partly in Rouſſillon, in France. Puycerda is the capital in Spain, and Mount Lewis in France.

CERDON, a perſon who taught very erroneous opinions, at the end of the firſt and beginning of the ſecond centuries. It is ſaid that he held there were two gods, the one good, and the creator of heaven; and the other evil, who was the creator of the earth; that he rejected the law and the prophets, and all the New Teſtament, except a part of the goſpel of St. Luke, and ſome of St. Paul's epiſtles; and maintained that Jeſus Chriſt had not a real body compoſed of fleſh and bones like ours; but a body only in appearance.

CEREALIA, in antiquity, feſtivals inſtituted in honour of Ceres, by Triptolemus of Eleuſis, in Attica. Theſe feaſts were celebrated with ſuch purity, that while they laſted, it was even accounted pollution for a man to lie with his wife, and no perſon known to be guilty of any crime was allowed to be preſent at the ſacrifices.

From the Greeks the Cerealia paſſed to the Romans, who held them for eight days ſucceſſively, beginning on the 12th of April. The women alone were concerned in the celebration of them, they were all dreſſed in white, and the men were only ſpectators. They eat nothing till ſun-ſet, in imitation of Ceres, who, in her ſearch after her daughter, took no repaſt but in the evening. There were exhibited among the Romans, combats on horſeback, though theſe were afterwards changed into combats of gladiators.

CERENZA, a town of the kingdom of Naples, in Italy, in the Hither Calabria, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a rock, ten miles north-weſt of St. Severina. Long. 17. 15. E. Lat. 39. 23. N.

CERES, in Pagan mythology, the goddeſs of the harveſt, a deity, who, it is ſaid, firſt taught men to plow and ſow, to reap and houſe their corn, to make bread, to cultivate gardens, and to fix limits or boundaries to aſcertain their poſſeſſions. She was the daughter of Saturn and Rhea, and in her youth was ſo beautiful, that her brother Jupiter fell in love with her, by whom ſhe had Proſerpine. Her next amour was with Neptune, by whom, ſome ſay, that ſhe had a daughter named Hiera, and others, the horſe Arion; for that deity careſſed her in the form of a horſe: however, ſhe was ſo aſhamed of this laſt affair, that ſhe cloathed herſelf in mourning, and retired to a cave, where ſhe continued till the world was in danger of periſhing for want. But her retreat being diſcovered by Pan; Jupiter, at the interceſſion of the Parcæ, or Fates, appeaſed her; and reſtored her to the world. While ſhe was in Sicily, her daughter Proſerpine was raviſhed by Pluto; when the diſconſolate mother carried her complaints to Jupiter; but obtaining little ſatisfaction, ſhe lighted her torches at Mount Ætna, and mounting her car, drawn by dragons, ſet out in ſearch of her beloved daughter, in which ſearch ſhe met with various adventures; particularly in Lycia, where, being thirſty, and deſirous of drinking at a ſpring, the clowns of the country not only hindered her, but mudded the water, and reviled her for her misfortunes, on which the incenſed goddeſs transformed them into frogs. For her other adventures, ſee Proserpine, Celeus, Hypothoon Abas, Triptolemus, &c.

Ceres had ſeveral names; ſhe was called Magna Dea, or the Great Goddeſs, from her bounty in ſupporting mankind; Alma Altrix, and Mammoſa, from her impregnating all ſeeds and vegetables, and being as it were the common mother of the earth; Euclæa, from her verdure; Melaina, from her black cloathing; and the Arcadians ſtyled her Deſpoina, or the Lady; ſhe was alſo honoured with the epithet of Theſmophoris, or the Legiſlatreſs, from her introducing the uſe of land marks, and teaching the value of ground, the ſource of property and law.

She was uſually repreſented of a tall majeſtic ſtature, with a fair complexion, languiſhing eyes, and yellow or flaxen hair. Her head was crowned with poppies, or ears of corn, her right hand filled with the ſame materials; in her left ſhe held a lighted torch, and her breaſts were repreſented full and ſwelling. When ſeen in a car or chariot, ſhe is drawn by dragons.

The gardeners ſacrificed to Ceres in the beginning of April, to obtain a plentiful produce from their grounds. The uſual ſacrifices offered to her were a ſow with pig, or a ram; and the garlands uſed on theſe occaſions were myrtle, or rape-weed; flowers were prohibited, becauſe Proſerpine was loſt as ſhe gathered them; and the poppy alone was ſacred to her, not only on account of its growing amongſt the corn, but becauſe Jupiter gave it her to eat in her diſtreſs, that ſhe might ſleep and forget her cares. For her ſacred rites and feſtivals, ſee Eleusinian rites, Ambarvalia, &c.

Mythologiſts have given very different accounts of the origin of this goddeſs; ſome ſuppoſe her to be the earth, the nurſe of mankind, and imagine Proſerpine to be the corn, which lies long concealed before it ſprouts forth. The abbé la Pluche plainly proves her to be of Egyptian origin. The Iſis, or emblematical figure ſhewn at the feaſt appointed for the commemoration of the ſtate of mankind, after the inundation of the Nile, he obſerves, repreſented the earth, and bare the name of Cerets, diſſolution or overthrow. She was repreſented in mourning, and with a torch, to denote the grief ſhe felt for the loſs of Perſephone, a word derived from peri, fruit or corn, and ſaphan, loſt. The torch ſhewed the pains men were at during this ſeaſon to warm and light them; and the poppies with which this Iſis was crowned, ſignified the joy men received at the firſt abundant crop; the word bobo, in their language, ſignifying not only the poppy, but a double crop. But theſe ſimple emblems, when tranſplanted to Greece and Rome, became the ſources of the moſt extravagant fables, and the groſſeſt idolatry.

CERET, a town of France, in Rouſſillon, with a magnificent bridge of one arch. It is ſeated near the river Tee, thirteen miles from Perpignan. Long. 2. 46. E. Lat. 42. 43. N.

CERETA, or Cereti (Laura) a lady rendered illuſtrious by her learning, was born at Breſcia, in Italy, in the year 1469, and made ſuch a rapid progreſs in the ſciences, that at eighteen years of age ſhe publicly maintained theſes in philoſophy, and was ſeven years profeſſor of that ſcience, by which ſhe acquired a very great reputation, and according to Thomaſſin, few perſons in that age equalled her in learning. There has been publiſhed a collection of her letters that is much admired.

CERIGO, an iſland in the Archipelago, anciently called Cytherea; noted for being the birth place of Helen, and as the poets ſay, of Venus. Notwithſtanding which there is nothing very delightful in the place; for the country is mountainous, and the ſoil dry. It abounds in hares, quails, turtle, and excellent falcons. It is about fifty miles in circumference, and had formerly good towns; but there is now none remaining but that which gives name to the iſland. This is ſtrong both by art and nature, it being ſeated on a craggy rock. The inhabitants are Chriſtian Greeks, and ſubject to the Venetians, who keep a governor there, who is changed every two years.

CERINES, a town in the iſland of Cyprus, with a good caſtle, an harbour, and a biſhop's ſee. Long. 33. 35. E. Lat. 35. 22. N.

CERINTHUS, an hereſiarch, contemporary with the apoſtles. He aſcribed the creation of the world, not to God, but to the angels: taught that Jeſus Chriſt was the ſon of Joſeph, and that the uſe of circumciſion ought to be retained under the goſpel.

CERNE, a town of Dorſetſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays, and four fairs, held on March 18, Midlent Monday, Holy Thurſday, and October 2, for horſes, bullocks, and hogs. It is by ſome called Cerne-Abbey, from a flouriſhing abbey that ſtood near it, now in ruins. It is ſeated in a dry bottom, watered with a fine rivulet, and in a champaign country, very proper for hunting and ſhooting. It is ſeven miles north-weſt of Dorcheſter; twenty-ſeven weſt of Pool; twenty ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Shafteſbury, and one hundred and twenty-four weſt by ſouth of London. Long. 15. 0. Lat. 50. 38.

CERVANTES SAAVEDRA (MIGUEL DE) a celebrated Spaniſh writer, born at Seville in 1549. According to ſome authors, he ſerved as a common ſoldier at the famous battle of Lepanto, where he diſcovered great valour, but had the misfortune to loſe his left hand. He however at length enjoyed the poſt of ſecretary to the duke of Alba: when living at Madrid he obſerved that the duke of Lerma, prime miniſter to Philip III. and others of the Spaniſh nobility were infatuated with notions of chivalry, on which he compoſed his romance of Don Quixote, a work which has immortalized his name: in this romance he ridiculed in a very ingenious, delicate, and inſtructive manner, the duke of Lerma, and thoſe of his nation who were fond of knight-errantry. However, having publiſhed the firſt part of his romance in 1605, he was uſed ill by that miniſter, which prevented his continuing it; but Fernandez de Avellaneda publiſhing a bad continuation of that work in 1614, Cervantes publiſhed a ſecond part of it himſelf. He wrote other works, and died in 1616.

CERVERA, a town of Catalonia in Spain. It is ſeated on a ſmall river, twenty-three miles north-weſt of Terragona. Long. 1. 9. E. Lat. 41. 28. N.

CERVIA, a rich town of Italy in Romania, with a biſhop's ſee. The air is very bad. It is ſeated on the gulph of Venice, ten miles ſouth eaſt of Ravenna. Long. 13. 5. E. Lat. 44. 16. N.

CESARE (GIULIO) a celebrated painter. See GIULIO.

CESAREUS (St.) brother to St. Gregory Nazianzen, and phyſician to the emperor Julian. At his brother's entreaties he quitted that emperor's court, and was at length made quæſtor of Bithynia. He died about the year 368. Four dialogues are attributed to him, but it is evident they were written by a later author.

CESAREUS, archbiſhop of Arles in the beginning of the ſixth century, was diſtinguiſhed for his learning and and piety. He preſided at ſeveral councils; wrote ſome homilies and other works, and died on the 27th of Auguſt, 542.

CESENA, a ſtrong and handſome town of Italy in Romania, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Savio, fifteen miles eaſt of Radvena, and fifteen weſt of Rimini. Long. 12. 20. E. Lat. 44. 8. N.

CESTUS, in Roman antiquity, a large gauntlet made of the thongs of a raw hide, and ſtrengthened with lead or plates of iron. It was uſed by the boxers at the public games; and as it encompaſſed the hand, the wriſt, and a part of the arm, it ſerved both to defend thoſe parts, and to add force and weight to the blows that were given.

CESTUS, among the ancient poets, a fine embroidered girdle, ſaid to be worn by Venus, to which Homer aſcribes the power of charming and conciliating love. This ceſtus Juno borrowed of her in order to entice Jupiter to love her.

CESTUS, among the ancients, was alſo a woollen girdle, which the bridegroom untied for his ſpouſe the firſt day of marriage before they went to bed.

CETHEGUS, a noble Roman, born of a family fruitful in great men, had ſuch credit in Rome, that no public poſt could be obtained without his conſent. But as he had a miſtreſs of whom he was ſo fond, that he could refuſe her nothing ſhe aſked, ſhe had the entire diſpoſal of every thing within the city of Rome: Lucullus was obliged to make his court to her to obtain the commiſſion of carrying on the war againſt Mithridates.

He ought not to be confounded with Caius Cornelius Cethegus, who was the principal accomplice in Cataline's conſpiracy, and who was ſtrangled in priſon.

Thoſe of this family affected a particular manner of dreſs, which made them conſidered as hardy and active men.

CETTE, a port town of France, in the province of Languedoc, ſeated on the bay of Maguelone, in the Mediterranean, a little to the eaſt of Agde. Long. 3. 15. E. Lat. 43. 25. N.

CEVA, the capital of a marquiſate of the ſame name in Piedmont, with a good fort. It is ſeated on the river Tanaro, eight miles, ſouth-eaſt of Mondovi, twenty-two ſouth of Alba, and eighteen weſt of Savona. Long. 8. 6. E. Lat. 44. 20. N.

CEVENNES, mountains of France, in the province of Languedoc, where the proteſtants formerly retired to defend themſelves againſt the tyranny of the king of France.

CEUTA, a town of Africa, on the coaſt of Barbary, in the kingdom of Fez, with a good port and a biſhop's ſee. It is well fortified, and defended by a ſtrong citadel. It ſuſtained a vigorous ſiege againſt the Moors in 1697. It is ſeated in the Streights over againſt Gibraltar, and almoſt oppoſite to it. Long. 6. 25. W. Lat. 35. 6. N.

CEYLON, a large iſland in the Eaſt Indies, two hundred and fifty miles in breadth, in the form of a pear, ſeated near the ſouth eaſt coaſt of India, on this ſide the Ganges. It is a country very fertile in rice and all ſorts of fruits, ſuch as ananas, or pine-apples, cocoas, oranges, lemons, citrons, figs, cajouves, grapes, guavas, papajes, pomegranates, and potatoes. Grapes are to be had all the year, except in the three rainy months. It abounds in ſugar-canes, and mulberry-trees, and produces a good quantity of ſilk, ginger, pepper, cardamoms, tobacco, wild palm-trees, calabaſh-trees, cotton-trees, Portugueſe figs, mangoes, long pepper, water-melons; and, ſince the Dutch came, European plants and garden herbs. But the principal produce is cinnamon, which has a leaf like a lemon tree, but not quite ſo broad. The bloſſom is white, and and turns to a yellowiſh fruit, not unlike a ſmall olive, from which they expreſs an oil, which is like the oil of nutmegs, with a cinnamon ſmell. This tree has two barks, the inner of which is the cinnamon. When the bark is taken off the trees periſh, and the wood, which is white, is uſed by the natives for building. When burnt it yields a moſt agreeable ſcent. The root yields a ſort of camphire, which is very volatile, and has a ſtrong ſmell. The fineſt cinnamon is from the young trees, and the coarſe from the old.

The lignum colubrinum, or ſnake-wood, is white, inclining to yellow, and is very hard, with a very bitter taſte. It is excellent againſt the itch, and the bitings of ſerpents. Here is likewiſe the banian tree, whoſe branches falling to the ground, take root again, and cover a conſiderable ſpot of ground. The tamarind-trees are very large; and there is a tree whoſe leaves ſhrink back like the ſenſitive-plant. Beſides theſe they have a great many medicinal herbs, whoſe names are not known in Europe.

With regard to the animals, the elephants deſerve our firſt notice, which are ſo numerous and ſo miſchievous, that travelling is not ſafe without ſoldiers to drum and frighten them away. But they are moſt dangerous towards the evening, when they are hungry. At a place called Matura there are vaſt ſtables, where the elephants are tamed, and afterwards ſold to the Moors of Bengal and Coromandel. They feed upon green herbs, and the leaves of fig-trees, cocoas, and the like. The elephants of this iſland are accounted the largeſt of all the Indies. The horſes were brought here by the Portugueſe, and they are now ſo multiplied, that they feed in droves. Buffaloes are very numerous, and they have likewiſe bulls, oxen, cows, ſheep, goats, ſtags, deer, elks, tame and wild boars, hares, partridges, and monkeys in abundance.

In the woods there are tigers, bears, jackals, and leopards: there are vaſt quantities of birds, for which the inhabitants have peculiar names. Thoſe called murhottos by the Portugueſe often ſteal young chickens. The owls make a terrible noiſe in the night-time. They have geeſe, herons, wild and tame ducks, peacocks, pigeons, turtles, partridges, paroquets, pewits, ſwallows, bats, &c. They have alſo abundance of ſinging-birds, larks, ſea-gulls, and water-ſnipes, bees, fire-flies, gnats, and locuſts. They have likewiſe variety of fiſh, as cacaps, plaice, crabs, pikes, king's-fiſh, ſail-fiſh, craw-fiſh, haddocks, galleon-fiſh, ſharks, doradoes, ſardins, large ſmelts, bat-fiſh, ſeals, oyſters, ſhrimps, pampuſes, barbels, &c. They have likewiſe the true crocodiles, (not the alligators of America, which ſmell of muſk) ſome of which are eighteen feet long.

Serpents are very common all over the iſland of Ceylon. The ſea-ſerpents are ſometimes nine or ten yards long. The land-ſnakes, called rat-catchers, are likewiſe very large, and get to the tops of the houſes, but they are very harmleſs. Thoſe called cobres copellos by the Portugueſe, are very dangerous, their bite being generally fatal. There are ſeveral other ſorts for which they have no European names: as alſo centipees, ſcorpions, prodigious large ſpiders, toads, frogs, &c. They have likewiſe precious ſtones, as ſapphires, rubies, topazes, granates, and chryſtals in abundance. The ſea produces pearls and coral, not to mention ambergriſe, which is ſometimes found floating thereon.

The natural inhabitants of Ceylon are black, and are divided into clans or tribes; of which the Bellales are now looked upon to be the chief. Theſe wear a kind of garment wrapped about their bodies, above the navel, and brought between the legs like a pair of drawers. They have likewiſe a ſort of ſandals, faſtened to the bottom of their feet with leathern ſtraps. They make a kind of bag with the fore part of their garment, which hangs over their bellies. In this they keep areko, betel, and paper. On the right is placed a knife in a ſheath, and an iron pen pointed with ſilver, as alſo a piece of ſteel to ſharpen the knife upon. They hang gold pendants in their ears, which draw them down to their ſhoulders. They live by huſbandry, and are rich in cattle, as cows, ſheep, goats, and buffaloes. Their habitations are neat enough, conſidering the country; and their gardens pleaſant, being watered with ſprings, and well planted with betel. Their harveſt is in January and February, and their winter or rainy ſeaſon in November and December. In low marſhy grounds they have an harveſt twice a year. They tread the ſeeds of the corn with oxen: in the rainy ſeaſon before-mentioned the fields are over-flowed. They make butter, which is much eſteemed among them with a mill, as we do chocolate. They are likewiſe very fond of curds and whey. The cattle are never houſed, but are driven into an incloſure every night. Theſe people are the richeſt in the country; however they are very litigious, and will go to law with each other for a trifle.

The Brahmans are another tribe, and have a very good character for morality, being ſober, clean, induſtrious, and moderate, both in eating and drinking: they bathe twice a day, drink no ſtrong liquors, nor eat any thing that had life. However, like the reſt of the Indians, they are very voluptuous with regard to women. Some of them have been brought to profeſs Chriſtianity, but ſtill retain many of their pagan cuſtoms, as is evident in their not eating fleſh. They know ſomething of aſtronomy, and can calculate eclipſes; but they reckon a prodigious number of years ſince the creation of the world. When they marry, they tie the bracelet of the bride about the bridegroom's neck, which he wears till he dies. This they look upon as a neceſſary ceremony. They frequently marry their own nieces without any manner of ſcruple; and the girls in general are married ſo young, that they have commonly children at thirteen or fourteen. After the marriage-ceremony is over they erect a kind of triumphal arch with fig-tree branches, and adorn it with flowers. The richer ſort make a feaſt, and the evening is ſpent in ſinging, dancing, and other diverſions. Sometimes theſe diverſions are continued for four or five days.

The tribe of the Chivias perform all ſorts of drudgery for the Dutch, ſuch as fetching wood and water. They likewiſe carry them in their chairs or litters, ten or twelve being employed at a time in that office. The Parruas practiſe pearl-fiſhing, and diving for ſea-horſes teeth. The Chitties are merchants, and deal in linen, and the like. We may here obſerve, once for all, that the children of every tribe always follow the father's profeſſion, and that the whole tribe is of the ſame buſineſs.

The tribe of the Carreas are fiſhermen, in which employment they uſe monſtrous large nets, and live near the ſea-ſhore, as well as on the banks of the ſalt river. The tribe of Mokkuas are likewiſe of the ſame profeſſion. The Nallouas are generally ſlaves to the Bellales, and are blacker than the reſt. Their buſineſs is to gather toddy, that is the ſap of the cocoa-trees, to dig the ground, attend the cattle, water the trees, and the like. The Parreas are the moſt deſpicable of them all, their buſineſs being to carry out dung, and to do the baſeſt drudgery. They live upon rats and mice. None of all theſe tribes eat cow's fleſh, which is the reaſon there are none killed but by the Dutch. Each inferior tribe always pays very great reſpect to the ſuperior when they meet in the ſtreet.

The general vices of all theſe tribes are fornication and adultery, which indeed is too much practiſed in all the Eaſt. They are very ſuperſtitious, attending to the cries and flight of birds. They have no need of a tribe for the practice of phyſic, for they pretend to cure diſeaſes by following old receipts, which perhaps are known to moſt. Their barbers always carry a ſmall looking-glaſs and razors along with them; and theſe make it their buſineſs to ſhave the beard and head, to pare the finger and toe-nails, as alſo to cleanſe the ears. They have likewiſe a great number of callico-printers, whoſe colours never waſh out. The weavers ſit on the ground, and have holes made for their feet. They have likewiſe excellent workmen in ivory and ebony, as alſo in gold and ſilver, who work at the houſes of the Dutch. But whether theſe artificers are diſtinct tribes, or perſons not included in any tribe, we are not able to ſay. However all the tribes, as well women as men, agree in one thing, and that is not to wear any cloaths, except a cloth wrapt about their middles.

They formerly worſhipped a monkey's tooth, which the Portugueſe ſtole away; after which a cunning fellow pretended to find it again, and ſold it to the natives for ten thouſand pounds. This ſtory is told by all authors who have deſcribed this iſland; but in this they only copy one another without variation, according to cuſtom. They likewiſe tell you that the natives believe the firſt man was created upon a very high hill in this country, which for that reaſon is called by the Europeans Adam's Pike. There is the ſhape of a man's foot cut in a rock on the top of this hill, which they ſay is the print of the firſt man's foot. It is five or ſix times as long as a common foot, and is had in high veneration, not only by them, but by the people of ſome parts of the continent. They likewiſe ſay that a ſand bank, which runs from the iſland towards the continent, was a bridge made by the angels to carry the firſt man over to the continent. This is called by the Europeans Adam's Bridge, but by the natives Ramena Coil.

This iſland is uſually divided into three large provinces; that of Wunny, which is ſeated on the north coaſt; Candy or Candia to the eaſt, and Cuneland to the weſt. The Portugueſe were the firſt Europeans who diſcovered this iſland; they kept poſſeſſion of it for about one hundred years, and were then driven away by the Dutch, who ſeized the maritime parts, and ſtill lord it over the original inhabitants. The places poſſeſſed by the Dutch are Colombo, where they have a good fortreſs, and where the Dutch governor reſides. They took it from the Portugueſe in 1606. Negombo a ſmall town with a fortreſs; Chilao, which has given its name to the adjacent ſtraits. Porto Gallo, a fortreſs with a good harbour. Trinquemale, a conſiderable town near the gulph, remarkable for the cinnamon that grows near it. Pantacolo another town; Mutura, a town with a harbour; Jafanapatnan, an important fortreſs, where they carry on a great trade. But the capital city called Candy is ſeated nearly in the centre of the iſland on the river Trinquemale. It is a large place, and was the reſidence of the king of Candy, who was the moſt powerful in all the country. However it is now ſaid the royal ſeat hath been tranſlated to Nellemby-Near, much to the prejudice of the former. Long. from 78. 0. to 82. 1. E. Lat. from 6. 0. to 10. 0. Near the iſle of Ceylon is the iſle of Manar, where they fiſh for pearls, and where there is a fortreſs of the ſame name.

CHABANES (James de) marſhal of France, and one of the greateſt commanders of his time, was deſcended from a noble family, and ſignalized himſelf by his courage and prudence in ſeveral ſieges and battles, under the reigns of Charles VIII. Lewis III. and Francis I. and was killed at the battle of Pavia in 1525.

CHABLAIS, a province of Savoy, bounded on the north by the lake and territory of Geneva; on the eaſt by the Valais; on the ſouth by Fauſigni; and on the weſt by the republic of Geneva. Thonon and Evian are the principal towns.

CHABLIS, a town of France on the confines of Champagne, ten miles from Auxere, remarkable for its white wine. Long. 3. 45. E. Lat. 47. 47. N.

CHABOT (Peter Gauthier) a learned humaniſt, was born at Sainloup in Poitou, in the year 1516, and acquired great reputation by teaching Latin and Greek at Paris. He was extremely regular in his life and manners; and ſubmitted three times, with great patience, to the plunder of his poſſeſſions during the fury of the civil wars. His chief work was a Commentary on Horace. He died about the year 1597.

CHABRIAS, a celebrated Athenian general, who obtained a great victory over Pollis, general of the Lacedæmonians. He defended the Bœotians againſt Ageſilaus; reſtored Nectenabo to the kingdom of Egypt, and performed very ſignal ſervices for his country. He periſhed before the iſle of Chio (to which he laid ſiege) by his veſſel being ſunk to the bottom, in the three hundred and fifty-ſeventh year before the Chriſtian æra.

CHAGRE, a fort at the mouth of the river Chagre in the province of Darien in America, a little to the ſouth-weſt of Porto Bello, and three hundred and fifty miles weſt of Carthagena. It has been taken ſeveral times by the buccaneers, and in 1740 by admiral Vernon. Long. 82. 7. W. Lat. 9. 50. N.

CHAISE-DIEU, a town of France in Auvergne, thirteen miles eaſt of Brioude. Long. 3 47. E. Lat. 45. 15. N.

Chaise (Francis de la) confeſſor to Lewis XIV. was born at the caſtle of Aix Foraz, in the province of Lyons, on the 25th of Auguſt, 1624, and was of an ancient, but reduced family. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his wit and learning, and became profeſſor of divinity in the province of Lyons, and rector and provincial of the Jeſuit's college there. In 1663, the biſhop of Bayeux introduced him to cardinal Mazarine, who ſhewed him many marks of favour, and two years after preſented him to the king, who, in 1675, made him his confeſſor, and about ten years after he was the principal adviſer and director of the marriage with Madam de Maintenon. La Chaiſe now found himſelf a miniſter of ſtate, without expecting it, and doing buſineſs regularly with the king, ſaw all the lords and prelates at his feet. He was a lover of wit and learning, and by the confeſſion of his enemies, always patronized thoſe poſſeſſed of theſe accompliſhments. He had to the laſt ſo great a ſhare of the king's favour and eſteem, that his majeſty conſulted him on his death bed about the choice of his ſucceſſor. La Chaiſe died in January, 1709.

CHALCIDIUS, a famous Platonic philoſopher, in the third century, who wrote a Commentary, which is eſteemed, on the Timæus of Plato. This work has been tranſlated from the Greek into Latin.

CHALCONDYLAS (DEMETRIUS) a learned Greek, born at Conſtantinople, left that city after its being taken by the Turks, and afterwards taught Greek in ſeveral cities in Italy. He compoſed a Greek Grammar, and died at Milan, in 1513.

CHALCONDYLAS (LAONICUS) a famous Greek hiſtorian, of the fifteenth century, was born at Athens, and wrote an excellent Hiſtory of the Turks from Ottoman, who reigned about the year 1300, to Mahomet II. in 1463.

CHALES (CLAUDIUS FRANCIS MILET DE) a learned French mathematician, born at Chambery, of a noble family, in 1621. He became a Jeſuit, and profeſſor of mathematics at Marſeilles, Lyons, and Paris; and died at Turin, in 1678. He wrote a courſe of mathematics in Latin, the beſt edition of which is that of 1680, in four volumes, folio. His Treatiſe on Navigation is alſo an excellent performance.

CHALLON SUR SAONE, a town of France, the capital of Challonois, in Burgundy, with a citadel and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the banks of the river Saone, and is divided into the New and Old town. The new ſurrounds the old, which conſiſts only of three long ſtreets, that begin at Pont de Pierre, and end at the Porte de Beanne. The middle is the largeſt, wherein is the palace of the bailiwick, built in the modern taſte, and ſeated near the river. The cathedral church has nothing remarkable but its antiquity, nor nothing handſome but the two ſteeples over the great gate. The town-houſe, the Jeſuits college, the citadel, St. Peter's abbey, and ſome of the convents, are worth a traveller's notice. The walk is very pleaſant, becauſe it is raiſed high, and affords a very agreeable proſpect. It is thirty-five miles ſouth from Dijon, thirty ſouth-eaſt of Auſtun, ſixty-five north of Lyons, and one hundred and ninety ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 37. E. Lat. 46. 47. N.

CHALON (PHILIBERT DE) prince of Orange, and a brave warrior, was of the ancient and illuſtrious houſe of Challon ſur Saone, in Burgundy. He offered his ſervices to Francis I. king of France, but that prince anſwering him with contempt, he entered into the ſervice of the emperor Charles V. and was preſent at the taking of the city of Rome by aſſault; when the conſtable de Bourbon being dead, the emperor's army choſe him general, after which he found means to conduct them into Naples, which was at length beſieged by M. de Lautrec; and ſoon after, the viceroy of Naples dying, the Neopolitan army alſo choſe him for their general, and he obliged the French to raiſe the ſiege. This brave prince was killed at the ſiege of Florence, at thirty years of age. He was in love with Catharine de Medicis, and had been promiſed her by the pope. He left a daughter, who brought his titles and eſtates to the houſe of Naſſau.

CHALONER (Sir THOMAS) a gallant ſoldier, an able ſtateſman, and a very learned writer, born at London, about the year 1515. He was educated at Cambridge, and on his leaving that univerſity, went to court, and was ſoon after ſent into Germany with ſir Henry Knevit, the Engliſh embaſſador. He attended the emperor Charles V. in his wars, and at his return to England was made firſt clerk of the council, which poſt he held during the remainder of the reign of Henry VIII. In the beginning of the next reign, he attended the duke of Somerſet into Scotland, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo glorioufly in the battle of Muſſelburgh, that the duke conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and after his return to court, the ducheſs of Somerſet preſented him with a rich jewel. Queen Elizabeth, at the beginning of her reign, ſent him embaſſador to the emperor Ferdinand I. and afterwards to the court of Spain, where, being taken ill, he obtained leave to return, and died in London, October 7, 1565. He began very early to employ his pen for the ſervice of the public, and wrote, 1. De Rep. Anglorum Inſtauranda, i. e. of the Reforming or Reſtoring of the Engliſh Republic. 2. A Latin poem, in praiſe of king Henry VIII. 3. A Collection of Panegyrics, Epigrams, and Epitaphs, in Latin. 4. The Praiſe of Folly, tranſlated from Eraſmus: and 5. A little Dictionary for Children.

Sir Thomas was honoured with the friendſhip of ſome of the greateſt perſons of that age. Sir William Cecil, then principal ſecretary of ſtate, aſſiſted at his funeral in St. Paul's cathedral, and honoured his memory with a fine copy of Latin verſes, and Dr. Walter Haddon, maſter of requeſts to queen Elizabeth, wrote his epitaph, which is as follows:

Natura THOMAS CHALONERUS, & arte valebat,
Utilis & patriæ vir fuit ille ſuæ
Publica cum magna ſuſcepit munera laude,
Laude pari libros ſcripſerat ille domi.
Sic patriæ vixit magno, dum vixit, honore,
Sic patriæ magno concidit ille malo.

In Engliſh, thus:

Nature and art in CHALONER combin'd,
And for his country form'd the patriot's mind,
With praiſe deſerv'd his public poſts he fill'd;
And equal fame his learned labours yield.
While yet he liv'd, he liv'd his country's pride,
And firſt his country injured when he dy'd.

CHALONER (Sir THOMAS) the ſon of the former, was born in the year 1559, and educated at Oxford, after which he took the tour of Europe, and obtained from the moſt learned men in different countries, their moſt important diſcoveries in natural philoſophy. In 1591 he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him; and ſome years after the firſt alum mines that were ever known in this kingdom were diſcovered by his ſagacity, near Giſborough, in Yorkſhire. Being in Scotland, he accompanied king James in his journey to England, and that monarch was ſo pleaſed with his converſation, that he intruſted him with the care of prince Henry's education. He died November 17, 1615.

CHALONS, a town of France, in Champagne, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in a fruitful plain, on the river Marne, part of which enters the city, where it forms an iſland, and yields great conveniences to the inhabitants. It is ſurrounded with a wall and ditches, which are always full of water. The cathedral church ſtands in the iſland, beſides which there are thirteen pariſh-churches, of which ſome are collegiate; thirteen courts of judicature, and thirteen convents. The ſtreets are handſome, and the houſes pretty well built, with large ſquares, among which is that wherein the town-houſe ſtands, and that in which the church of Notre Dame is placed. The river Marne renders this town a place of conſiderable trade. It is divided into the city, the iſland, and town, which communicate by ſeveral bridges. The long walk called Jards is one of the moſt pleaſant and agreeable in the kingdom. Chalons is forty miles ſouth-weſt of Verdun, thirty ſouth-eaſt of Rheims; fifteen north-weſt of Vitry, and ninety eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 37. E. Lat. 48. 57. N.

CHALVET (MATTHEW DE) in Latin, Calventius, preſident of the enquetes in the parliament of Toulouſe; was born in May, 1528, and ſtudied civil law in that city, where he took his doctor's degree. He made a French Tranſlation of Seneca. He was a perſon of a moſt amiable character, and died June 20, 1607, being ſeventy-nine years of age.

CHALUS, a town and caſtle of France, in Limoſin, remarkable for its horſe fair on St. George's day. Long. 1. 25. E. Lat. 45. 16. N.

CHAMB, a town of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, ſeated on the river Chamb. Long. 12. 0. E. Lat. 49. 14. N.

CHAMBER, or CHAMBRE (JOHN) a learned phyſician, in the ſixteenth century, chiefly noted for being one of the founders of the college of phyſicians in London, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards travelling into Italy, ſtudied phyſic at Padua, where he took his doctor's degree. After his return, he became phyſician to Henry VIII. and in conjunction with ſeveral other doctors of phyſic, founded the college of phyſicians, by a charter, bearing date September 23, 1518. Being in holy orders, he became canon of Windſor, and after having obtained ſeveral conſiderable dignities in the church, died, in 1549.

CHAMBERLAYNE (EDWARD) author of The preſent State of England, was born at Odington, in Glouceſterſhire, December 13, 1616, and educated at Oxford. He travelled during the civil wars, and after the Reſtoration became ſecretary to the earl of Carliſle, when he was ſent to Stockholm, to carry the order of the garter to the king of Sweden: he was made doctor of the civil law; appointed tutor to Henry, duke of Grafton, one of the natural ſons of king Charles II. and afterwards inſtructor in the Engliſh tongue to prince George, of Denmark. He died at Chelſea, near London, in the year 1703. Beſides the above work, he wrote A brief Relation of the five Years Civil Wars of Henry III. king of England: England's Wants; and ſeveral other pieces. He alſo tranſlated ſome works out of Spaniſh, Portugueſe, and Italian, into Engliſh.

CHAMBERLAYNE (JOHN) ſon of the former, and gentleman uſher to prince George, of Denmark, was admitted into Trinity college, Oxford, in 1685. He tranſlated from the French and Spaniſh, The manner of making Tea, Coffee, and Chocolate. From the Italian, Durant's Treaſure of Health. From the Dutch, The Religious Philoſopher, and Brandt's Brandt's Hiſtory of the Reformation in and about the Low Countries, four volumes, folio, and ſeveral other works. He died in the year 1724. It was ſaid of him that he underſtood ſixteen languages; but it is certain that he was maſter of the Latin, Greek, French, High and Low Dutch, Portugueſe, and Italian.

CHAMBERRY, the capital city of the duchy of Savoy, ſeated at the confluence of the two rivers, Leſſa and Orbana. It ſtands in an agreeable plain, ſurrounded with hills and country ſeats. It was formerly the reſidence of the duke, and is now the ſeat of the parliament and chamber of accompts. The parliament conſiſts only of fifteen ſenators, and four preſidents. It is an open town, and on that account has been much expoſed to the inſults of enemies, in time of war. It has ſeveral fountains, which have their ſource in St. Martin's Hill, from whence the water is conducted to ſeveral parts of the town. It is well built, and tolerably large. The fronts of the houſes are ſupported with arches, which form piazzas, where the paſſengers may at all times be ſheltered from the extremities of the weather. The ſuburbs are large and handſome. That of Montmeillan is on the eaſt, and that of Marchée Vernai on the weſt. In the centre of the town is the caſtle, where king Victor Amadeus II. reſided, after he had abdicated the crown, in 1730. In 1731 this caſtle was almoſt reduced to aſhes, by a fire; but it is now rebuilt. The principal church is that of St. Leger, and the Jeſuit's college is the moſt magnificent of all the religious buildings. The Spaniards became maſters of this city in 1742, and in 1743 the caſtle took fire again, inſomuch that Don Philip, infanta of Spain, had much ado to ſave himſelf from the flames. It is now reſtored to the king of Sardinia. The inhabitants are civil, and the ladies handſome, but dreſs very indifferently. It is twenty-eight miles north-eaſt of Grenoble, forty ſouth of Geneva, forty-five eaſt of Lyons, and one hundred and ninety ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 45. E. Lat. 45. 35. N.

CHAMBERS (Ephraim) fellow of the Royal Society, and the celebrated author of the Cyclopædia, or Univerſal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, in two volumes, folio. He ſerved his apprenticeſhip to Mr. Senex, the famous globe and map-maker; but particularly applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the ſciences. The great ſale of the above work, which was firſt printed in the year 1727, encouraged the booksellers for whom he wrote it, to make him a very generous and advantageous propoſal for continuing it, which he accepted, and having taken chambers in Gray's Inn, applied himſelf with ſuch diligence to the proſecution of it, that he not only impaired his health, but brought on the diſorders that occaſioned his death, which happened about the year 1740; after which the Supplement was completed by other hands. Mr. Chambers alſo tranſlated The Jeſuit's Perſpective, from the French, which was printed in quarto, and has alſo undergone ſeveral editions.

CHAMBRE (Marin Cureau de la) phyſician in ordinary to the French king, was diſtinguiſhed by his knowledge in medicine, philoſophy, and polite learning. He was born at Mons, and was received into the French academy in 1635, and afterwards into the academy of ſciences. He wrote a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. The Characters of the Paſſions. 2. The Art of knowing Men. 3. On the Knowledge of Beaſts, &c. and died at Paris, on the 29th of November, 1669, aged ſeventy-five.

Chambre (Francis Illhartart de la) a celebrated doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Paris, on the 2d of January, 1698. He began his ſtudies among the Jeſuits, continued them at Mazarine college, and finiſhed them at the Sorbonne, where he took the degree of doctor of divinity. From that time he led a ſedentary life, and applied himſelf to inceſſant ſtudy. He was of a mild, gentle, and ſociable diſpoſition, and of a juſt and clear underſtanding. He at length became canon of St. Benedict's, and died at Paris, of a malignant fever, on the 16th of Auguſt, 1753, at fifty-ſix years of age. He wrote among other works, 1. A Treatiſe on the Church, ſix volumes, duodecimo. 2. A Treatiſe on Grace, four volumes, duodecimo. 3. On Logic, Morality, and Metaphyſics, two volumes, duodecimo; all in French.

CHAMIER (Daniel) an eminent proteſtant divine, born in Dauphiné. He was many years preacher at Montellimart, from whence he went, in 1612, to Montaubon, to be profeſſor in divinity in that city, and was killed by a cannon ball, during the ſiege, in 1621. The moſt conſiderable of his works is his Panſtratia Catholica, or Wars of the Lord, in four volumes, folio, in which he treats very learnedly of the controverſies between the Proteſtants and Roman Catholics.

CHAMOND, a town of France, in Lyonnois, with a very ſtrong caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Giez, fifteen miles from Lyons. Long. 4. 23. E. Lat. 45. 8. N.

CHAMPAGNE, a conſiderable province of France, about one hundred and ſixty-three miles in length, and one hundred and thirteen in breadth; bounded on the north by Hainault and Luxembourg; on the eaſt by Lorrain and the Franche Compté; on the ſouth by Burgundy; and on the weſt by the Iſle of France and Soiſſonnois. The heart of the country is a vaſt plain; but the extremities are covered with wood, and are full of mountains and hills, which produce every thing that ſupply the neceſſities of life. The principal rivers are the Meuſe, which riſes near a village of the ſame name, and runs a courſe of three hundred miles, or thereabouts, and falls into the Ocean between the Brille and Graveſende; under the name of the Meruve. It begins to be navigable at St. Thibaud. The Seine is ſpoken of elſewhere. The ſource of the Marne is at the foot of a mountain in Baſſigny. It runs through the generalities of Chalons, Soiſſons, and of Paris. It begins to be navigable at Vitry, and falls into the Seine at Charenton-bridge, above Paris. The Aube riſes in the confines of Burgundy and Champagne, and then running north, it paſſes by Ferte, Bar, Arcis, &c. and falls into the Seine at Conflans. The Aiſne has its ſource above St Menhout, on the confines of Champagne and Lorrain, and running through the generalities of Chalons and Soiſſons, falls into the Oiſe, above Compiegne.

At Bourbonne there are famous mineral waters, which are hot, and of a ſaltiſh taſte. At Attencourt there are wells which partake of iron, and are uſeful in many diſeaſes. Champagne produces corn, and that valuable wine of the ſame name. The ſheep of this country are in high eſteem, but they are ſcarce. The inhabitants have the reputation of not being over wiſe, but they are laborious, loyal, and make good ſoldiers. This province is divided into eight parts; Champagne, properly ſo called; Rhemois, Retelois, Pertois, Vallage, Baſſigny, Senonois, and La Brie Champagnoiſe. The principal towns are Troye the capital, Sens, Langres, Vitry, St. Dizier, Chalons, Rheims, St. Menehout, Rethel, Mezieres, Sedan, Charleville, &c.

Champagne (Proper) is one of the eight parts of the province of Champagne, which contains the cities of Troyes, Chalons, St. Menehold, Epernay, and Vertu.

CHAMPAIGNE (Philip) a celebrated painter, born at Bruſſels, on the 16th of May, 1602. He became rector of the Royal Academy of Painting, at Paris. Queen Mary de Medicis, Lewis XIII. and Cardinal de Richelieu, gave him public marks of their eſteem. He died on the 12th of Auguſt, 1674. There are a vaſt number of his pieces at Paris, and other parts of France; particularly in the chapter-houſe of Notre Dame, and in ſeveral churches of that city. But the beſt of his works is thought to be the cieling of the king's apartment at Vincennes, made on the ſubject of the peace, concluded in 1659.

CHAMPEAUX (William de) a learned divine, of the twelfth century, thus named from the place of his birth, was archdeacon of Paris, and eſtabliſhed a community of regular canons at St. Victor les Paris, where he taught with reputation. Abelard, his diſciple, had a great quarrel with him. He was at length biſhop of Chalons ſur Marne, and died in 1121.

CHAMPS (Stephen Agard de) a learned Jeſuit, born at Bourges, in 1613. He taught divinity at Paris, and was thrice provincial of the Jeſuits. His principal work is intitled De Hæreſi Janſenianâ. He died in 1701, aged eighty-eight.

CHANDIEU (Anthony de) a learned proteſtant miniſter, who retired to Geneva in 1583, and died there in 1591. He wrote many controverſial works, in which he took the name of Sadeel, which in Hebrew ſignifies the Field of God.

CHANDLER (Mary) diſtinguiſhed by her talent for poetry, was the daughter of a diſſenting miniſter at Bath, and was born at Malmſbury in Wiltſhire, in 1687. She was bred a milliner; but from her childhood had a turn for poetry, and in her riper years applied herſelf to the ſtudy of the poets. Her poems, for which ſhe was complimented by Mr. Pope, breathe the ſpirit of piety and philoſophy. She had the misfortune to be deformed, which determined her to live ſingle, though ſhe had great ſweetneſs of countenance, and was ſollicited to marry, and in this ſtate ſhe died on the eleventh of September 1745, in the fifty-eighth year of her age.

Chandler (Samuel) D. D. an eminent diſſenting miniſter, was the ſon of the Rev. Mr. Henry Chandler, and was born at Hungerford, in Berks, in the year 1693. Having made an extraordinary proficiency in claſſical learning, he was ſent to an academy in Bridgewater, whence he removed to another academy at Glouceſter, where he was animated in his ſtudies by the diſtinguiſhed geniuſes of ſeveral of his fellow ſtudents, one of whom was the learned Dr. Butler, afterwards biſhop of Durham, and the other Dr. Secker, the late archbiſhop of Canterbury. On his leaving the the academy, he began to preach, in 1714, and two years after was choſen miniſter of the preſbyterian meeting at Peckham, near London. Some time after, a weekly evening lecture being ſet up in the Old Jewry, in which, two of the moſt eminent young miniſters of each denomination were to treat on the evidences of natural and revealed religion, Mr. Chandler was choſen one of them; and on that lecture being dropped, and another of the ſame kind ſet up, to be preached by one perſon, Mr. Chandler was choſen for this ſervice. In the courſe of this lecture he preached ſome ſermons on the confirmation which miracles gave to the divine miſſion of Chriſt, and vindicated the truth of his religion againſt the objections of Collins, in his Grounds and Reaſons, &c. theſe ſermons he afterwards threw into the form of a continued treatiſe, which he cauſed to be printed; and this work gained him ſuch eſteem, that upon the firſt vacancy he was choſen, about the year 1725, miniſter to the wealthy congregation in the Old Jewry, which he enjoyed till his death, notwithſtanding his being offered, in caſe he would conform, a conſiderable preferment in the eſtabliſhed church. While he was employed in advancing the intereſts of religion, liberty and learning, he was honoured by the univerſities of Edinburgh and Aberdeen, who each of them ſent him, unaſked, the diploma of doctor of divinity. He was the firſt who formed the deſign of raiſing a fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of poor diſſenting miniſters; and by his intereſt and applications he engaged a number of gentlemen in the generous ſubſcription that laid the foundation on which that excellent charity has ſince ariſen to its preſent greatneſs. Beſides the above work, he wrote 1. A Commentary on the Prophet Joel. 2. The Life of King David; in which he vindicates him from the aſperſions of Boyle, and other writers. 3. Several pamphlets in defence of Chriſtianity againſt Annet, and other oppoſers of that holy religion; and others in defence of religious and civil liberty. He died in the year 1765.

CHANSI, or, according to our pronunciation, SHANSI, is one of the leaſt provinces of China. It is bounded on the eaſt by Petchli; on the ſouth by Honan; on the weſt by Chenſi, or Shenſi; and on the north by the great wall which ſeparates China from Tartary. It has but five cities of the firſt rank, and eighty-five towns which depend thereon. There are alſo ſeveral forts built to defend the wall, which are larger and more populous than many of the towns. The climate is healthful and agreeable, but very mountainous; yet ſome of thoſe mountains are very fruitful, and others abound in coal mines. It produces a great deal of all ſorts of grain except rice, and its vines bear very good grapes fit to make wine of. There is alſo abundance of muſk, porphyry, marble, and jaſper of divers colours. There are likewiſe iron mines, from whence they ſupply the other provinces with iron. Lapis lazuli is very common, and there are lakes of ſalt water, of which they make ſalt; and alſo ſeveral mineral ſprings.

CHANTEL-LE-CHATEL, a town of France in Bourbonnois, ſeated on the river Boule. Long. 3. 0. E. Lat. 46. 10. N.

CHANTELOU. See CHAMBRAI.

CHANTEREAU LE FEVRE (LEWIS) a learned French writer, was born at Paris in 1588, and by his knowledge in civil and canon law, hiſtory, politics, and the belles lettres, became one of the moſt learned men of his time. Lewis XIII. gave him ſeveral very conſiderable poſts; and his houſe was a place of reſort for men of learning, who met every Wedneſday to converſe on the ſciences. He wrote Hiſtorical Memoirs of the Houſes of Lorrain and Bar, with ſeveral other works, and died at Paris on the ſecond of July 1658.

CHANTONG, one of the moſt fruitful provinces of the empire of China, is bounded on the eaſt by the province of Petcheli, and part of Honan; on the ſouth by Hiangnan; on the eaſt by the gulph of Kiangnan; and on the north by the gulph of Petcheli. It is divided into ſix diſtricts; has ſix cities of the firſt rank, one hundred and fourteen of the ſecond and third; beſides fifteen forts built on the ſides of the havens and rivers, and the ſeveral iſlands in the gulph, which are very populous. The imperial canal runs through part of this province, along which all the veſſels paſs from the ſouthward to Peking. The length of this canal, the thickneſs and height of the dykes on each ſide, which are made of free-ſtone, and the ornaments erected at proper diſtances, ſerve to ſhow the induſtry and application of the Chineſe. This province in general is well watered with lakes, rivers, and brooks, which render it very fruitful. It bounds in rice, millet, wheat, barley, beans, and all ſorts of fruit; as alſo in pheaſants, poultry, partridges, quails, and hares. As for fiſh, they are in prodigious plenty, and may be had for little or nothing. The fruits are excellent, pears, cheſnuts, peaches, ſeveral ſorts of nuts, plums, and a ſort of fig, which they dry for uſe. There is a ſort of caterpillars, which ſpin a coarſe ſilk, and leave it on the buſhes and ſhrubs, from which it is gathered; and this when manufactured is the principal trade of this country. Near the principal city Tſinan they make glaſs, but it is ſo brittle that it is of little ſervice, probably from the want of nealing it. Within the walls there are great lakes; and in mountains within its diſtrict iron mines. Yentcheou is one of the moſt conſiderable marts of the empire, it being ſeated on the great canal. At Lin-tſin-tcheou, a town in the diſtrict of Tong-tchang, there is a tower eight ſtories high, covered on the outſide with porcelain, adorned with various figures, and the inſide is of poliſhed marble of different colours. At every ſtory there is a marble gallery, with iron rails gilt; and at the corner of each gallery there are little bells, which being ſhaken by the wind, make an agreeable ſound. There are likewiſe ſeveral idol temples of curious architecture. The territory of Tſintcheou is partly mountainous, and partly watered with rivers. The inhabitants drive a trade in fiſh-ſkins. The cows breed a ſtone, which is ſaid to be as good as bezoar; all this may very well be, ſince all theſe ſorts of ſtones are no better than oyſter-ſhells.

CHAOURCE, a town of France in Champagne, ſeated at the ſource of the river Armance. Long. 4. 5. E. Lat. 48. 6. N.

CHAPELAIN (JOHN) one of the forty of the French academy, acquired great reputation under the miniſtry of cardinal de Richelieu, to whom he addreſſed an ode that was much admired; but his reputation as a poet ſunk as ſoon as his poem entitled La Pucelle, or the Maid, appeared, which he had promiſed, and people waited for during twenty years; which occaſioned the two following verſes, written by M. Monmor.

Illa Capellani dudum expectata Puella,
Poſt tanta in lucem tempora prodit Anus.

Chapelain died at Paris, the place of his birth, in 1674, aged ſeventy-nine.

CHAPELLE (CLAUDIUS EMANUEL LUILLIER) the natural ſon of Francis Luillier, took the name of Chapelle from a village between Paris and St. Denys, where he was born. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing ſmall pieces of poetry, in which he diſcovered great delicacy, an eaſy turn, and an admirable facility of expreſſion. He was the friend of Gaſſendi and Moliere, and died in 1686.

CHAPELLE (JOHN DE LA) receiver-general of the finances; ſecretary of ſtate to the prince of Conti, and one of the forty of the French academy. He wrote, among other works, Letters from a Swiſs to a Frenchman on the Intereſt of Princes, and died at Paris in 1723, aged ſixty-eight.

CHAPMAN (GEORGE) an Engliſh poet, highly celebrated in his time, was born in the year 1557, and ſtudied at one of the univerſities, where he obtained a perfect knowledge of the Greek and Latin tongues. Then coming to London he became acquainted with Shakeſpeare, Ben Jonſon, Sidney, Spenſer, and Daniel, and was valued by all his friends; only it is ſaid that Ben Jonſon, after the death of Shakeſpeare, when he was without a rival, became jealous of him, and endeavoured to ſuppreſs his riſing fame. He wrote 1. Seventeen Dramatic Pieces. 2. A Tranſlation of Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey. He alſo attempted ſome part of Heſiod. He died in the year 1633, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

CHAPPEL IN FRITH, a market town in Derbyſhire, which has a market on Thurſdays, and eleven fairs, held on the Thurſday before Old Candlemas-Day, February 13, March 29, Thurſday before Eaſter, April 30, three weeks after Holy Thurſday for cattle, July 7, for wool; Thurſday before Bartholemew-day, Auguſt 24, for cheeſe and ſheep. Thurſday after September 29, Thurſday before November 11, for cattle. Its diſtance from London is one hundred and ſixty-three miles, and from Derby thirty-eight. Long. 1. 48. W. Lat. 53. 22. N.

CHAPPEL (WILLIAM) biſhop of Cork, Cloyne, and Roſs, was born at Lexington in Nottinghamſhire, December 10, 1582, and educated at Cambridge. He was inſtalled dean of Caſhel in Ireland in 1663; was ſworn into the office of provoſt of Trinity college, near Dublin in 1637; and the next year was advanced to the biſhoprick abovementioned: but being obliged to leave Ireland a few years after, on account of the rebellion; he returned to England, and died at Derby in 1649. He wrote Methodus Concionandi, i. e. The Method of Preaching; and ſome have imagined him to be the concealed author of that excellent treatiſe The Whole Duty of Man.

CHAPPUZEAU (SAMUEL) a gentleman born at Geneva, became preceptor to William III. king of England, and afterwards governor of the pages of George duke of Brunſwick Lunenburg, which poſt he enjoyed till his death, which happened at Zell on the 31ſt of Auguſt 1701, after having compoſed a ſonnet, in which he complained of being old, poor, and blind. He put in order and printed Tavernier's Voyages, in 1675, quarto, and wrote many works works in French, among which are, 1. L'Europe Vivante, which is an hiſtorical and political account of all the ſtates of Europe, as they were in 1666. 2. A Treatiſe, in verſe, on the Manner of Preaching, followed by four Sermons pronounced at Caſſel. 3. Several comedies, printed together under the title of La Muſe enjouée.

CHARABON, a ſea-port town, on the north-eaſt coaſt of the iſland of Java, in the Indian Ocean. Long. 108. 0. E. Lat. 6. 0. S.

CHARAS (Moses) a learned phyſician, born at Uſez. He acquired an immortal reputation by his ſkill in pharmacy, which he practiſed at Orange, Paris, England, Holland, and Madrid, in which laſt place he was thrown into the Inquiſition, from which he was not delivered till he had abjured the proteſtant religion. At his return to Paris he was received into the academy of ſciences, and died in 1698, aged eighty. He wrote a Pharmacopea, a Treatiſe on Theriaca, and another on the Viper, all of which are eſteemed.

CHARCAS, a province of South America, in Peru, in which is the ſilver mines of Potoſi. Plata is the capital town.

CHARD, a town of Somerſetſhire, with a market on Mondays, and three fairs; on May 3, Auguſt 5, and November 2, for cattle of all ſorts, and pedlars ware. It is ſeated on the ſide of a hill, near the edge of the county where it joins to Dorſetſhire and Devonſhire. It is ſixteen miles ſouth of Bridgewater, twenty-nine ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Wells, and one hundred and forty-one weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 3. 10. E. Lat. 50. 50. N.

CHARDIN (Sir John) a celebrated traveller, born at Paris, on the 16th of November, 1643. His father, who was a jeweller, had him educated in the proteſtant religion, after which he travelled into Perſia and India. He traded in jewels, and died at London, on the 5th of January, 1713. His Travels are eſteemed.

CHARENTE, a river of France, which riſes in Limoſin, paſſes Angoumoiſe into Saintonge, and falls into the Ocean.

CHARENTON, a town in the Iſle of France, ſeated on the river Seine, five miles from Paris. It is famous for a church made uſe of by the Hugonots, before the revocation of the edict of Nants, but demoliſhed in 1685. Long. 2. 29. E. Lat. 48. 45. N.

CHARES, the Lydian, a celebrated ſtatuary, was the diſciple of Lyſippus, and made the famous Coloſſus of the Sun, in the city of Rhodes.

CHARIBERT, or Caribert, king of Paris, ſucceeded his father Clotaire I. in 562, and died at the caſtle of Blaye, on the 7th of May, 567.

He ought not to be confounded with Charibert, king of Aquitaine, and the brother of Dagobert I.

CHARILLA, Χαρίλα, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival obſerved once in nine years by the Delphians, of which Plutarch gives the following account. A great drought having brought a famine upon the Delphians, they went with their wives and children as ſupplicants to the palace, on which the king diſtributed meal and pulſe, to thoſe who were moſt known, he not having enough to give to all. But a little orphan girl, who was a vagrant beggar, importuning him, he beat her with his ſhoe, and threw it in her face; on which the girl, unable to bear the affront, went and hanged herſelf. The famine however increaſing, the Pythia was conſulted by the king, who was anſwered, that the death of Charilla, who ſlew herſelf, muſt be expiated. The Delphians, after a long ſearch, diſcovered at length that the maid who had been beaten with a ſhoe was called by that name, and inſtituted certain ſacrifices, mixt with expiatory rites, which were religiouſly obſerved every ninth year. The king preſided at them, and diſtributed corn and pulſe to all perſons, ſtrangers as well as citizens; and Charilla's effigies being brought in, the king ſmote it with his ſhoe; then the governeſs of the Thyades conveyed it to ſome deſolate place, where a halter being put about its neck, it was buried in the ſpot where Charilla was interred.

CHARISTIA, a feſtival of the ancient Romans, celebrated in the month of February, in which the relations by blood and marriage met, in order to preſerve a good underſtanding; and that if there was any difference among them, it might be the more eaſily accommodated by the good humour and mirth of the entertainment.

CHARITE, a town of France, in the Nivernois, ſeated on the river Loire, thirteen miles north of Nevers, and twenty-eight eaſt of Bourges. Long. 3. 5. E. Lat. 47. 8. N.

CHARLEMAGNE, ſo called from Carolus Magnus, or Charles I. king of France, the firſt emperor of the Weſt, and one of the greateſt princes that have reigned in Europe, was born at Saltzburg, a caſtle in Upper Bavaria (and not at Ingelheim) about the year 742. He was the eldeſt ſon of Pepin the Short, and was crowned at Noyon, on the 9th of October, 768. He defeated Hunaud, duke of Aquetain, and became ſole king of France in 771, by the death of Carloman his brother. He gained a great victory over the Saxons, near Oſnabrug; paſſed into Italy with a powerful army; took Pavia; and in 774 defeated Deſiderus, king of the Lombards; brought him priſoner to France, and put an end to the kingdom of the Lombards. He at length turned his arms a ſecond time againſt the Saxons, and defeated them ſeveral times, during a war which laſted thirty-three years, and was not ended till he had conſtrained Witikind their king to be baptized. Charlemagne at length marched into Spain againſt the Saracens, from whom he took Hueſcar, Barcelona, and ſeveral other important places; but returning from thence, the rear-guard of his army was defeated at Roncevaux, when the famous Rolando, and a great number of other brave officers periſhed. In 781 Charlemagne returned to Italy, when he cauſed his two ſons to be crowned by pope Adrian, the firſt king of Italy, and the ſecond king of Germany. He ſubdued the Britons, vanquiſhed Aragiſus, duke of Beneventum, and Taſſilon, duke of Bavaria; and defeated the Huns and Sclavonians. On Chriſtmas day, 800, he was crowned emperor at Rome, by Leo III. on which he took the names of Auguſtus and Cæſar, with the Roman eagle. Nicephorus, the emperor of the Eaſt, conſented to theſe titles, and the bounds of the two empires were fixed and determined. From this time Charlemagne applied himſelf to correct the manners of the people in his dominions, and to the promotion of religion and the ſciences. He drew the learned into France; founded a great number of monaſteries, and publiſhed the laws now known under the title of Capitularies. It is ſaid that he himſelf ſtudied the Holy Scriptures, and that he had always St. Auguſtin on the City of God laid under his pillow. He had a deſign to make a communication between the Ocean and the Euxine Sea, by joining the Rhine to the Danube, by means of a canal; but this great project was not put in execution. He died at Aix la Chapelle, in 814, aged ſeventy-two.

Charlemagne was tall, and well made; he was eaſy of acceſs, mild, beneficent, and charitable to the poor. His greateſt fault was his attempting to ſpread Chriſtianity through the nations who had not yet been ſo happy as to embrace it, by fire and ſword. Beſides the Capitularies abovementioned, there are ſtill extant of his, a Grammar, and ſome other works.

CHARLEMONT, a town of Ireland, in the county of Armagh, and province of Ulſter, ſix miles ſouth-eaſt of Dungannon. It is ſeated on the river Blackwater. Long. 6. 49. W. Lat. 54. 16. N.

Charemont, a town of the Low Countries, in the diſtrict of Namur. It is ſeated on a craggy rock, which is almoſt inacceſſible. The greateſt part of the fortifications are ancient, but have been ſtrengthened by Vauban. The town is of an irregular form, and has two gates. The ſtreets are tolerably large for ſuch a ſmall place, and there is a handſome ſquare; though there is but one church and one houſe worth taking notice of, and that is the governor's. The place is ſurrounded with a dry ditch, cut out of the rock. It is ſeated near the river Meuſe, twenty-five miles ſouth-weſt of Namur, and twenty north-eaſt of Recroi. Long. 4. 58. E. Lat. 50. 5. CHARLEROY, a ſtrong town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the diſtrict of Namur, built by the Spaniards, in 1666. It has been ſeveral times taken by the French, and reſtored. The laſt time the French took it, was in 1746, and it was rendered back to the Auſtrians, by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle. It is ſeated on the Sambre, twenty miles weſt of Namur, and thirteen eaſt of Mons. Long. 4. 48. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

CHARLES II. ſurnamed the Bald, king of France, and at length emperor, was the youngeſt ſon of Lewis the Debonnaire. He was born at Frankfort, on the Maine, on the 13th of July 823, and ſucceeded his father in 840. He defeated his brothers Lothario and Pepin, who had reſolved to invade his dominions; puniſhed Bernard, duke of Septimania; conquered the inhabitants of Britanny, who had revolted in 845; and was crowned emperor in 875. At length, after having ſpent his whole life in a war againſt his brothers and relations, he died at Briord, in Breſſe, on the 6th of October, 877, aged fifty-four, being poiſoned by Sedecias, his phyſician.

Charles III. ſurnamed the Simple, king of France, was the poſthumous ſon of Lewis the Stutterer, and was born on the 17th of September, 879. Foulques, archbiſhop of Rheims, a prelate of great courage, placed him on the throne, which had been uſurped during his minority, and crowned him at Rheims, on the 29th of January, 895; but Haganon, his favourite, drawing upon him the hatred of both the nobility and common people, they forſook him at Soiſſons, in 920. Robert, count of Paris, cauſed himſelf to be crowned in 922; but Charles killed him in battle the following year. He however received no advantage from this victory; for ſoon after, Herbert, count of Vermandois, took him priſoner at St. Quintin, and ſent him to Chateau Thierri, upon the Marne, and thence to Peronne, where he died, after a confinement of ſeven years, on the 7th of October, 929, aged fifty.

CHARLES IV. ſurnamed the Fair, king of France and Navarre, was the third ſon of Philip the Fair, and ſucceeded his brother Philip the Tall, in 1321; about which time he alſo ſucceeded his mother Jane, queen of Navarre. He ſent his uncle Charles of Navarre at the head of an army into Guienne, who, in 1324, ſeized the greateſt part of that province; but queen Iſabella, of England, arriving in France, with her eldeſt ſon Edward, and paying him homage for Guienne, and the duchy of Ponthieu, Charles concluded a treaty of peace, in 1326. The pope offered him the empire, but he refuſed it; and died at Vincennes, on the firſt of February, 1328, aged thirty-three.

CHARLES V. ſurnamed the Wiſe and Eloquent, and one of the greateſt kings France has produced, was the eldeſt ſon of king John. He was born at Vincennes, on the 21ſt of January, 1337, and was the firſt who bore the title of Dauphin. He ſucceeded his father in 1364; but though he ſeldom appeared in the field, he made war in his cabinet with ſucceſs. He firſt brought over to his intereſt his brother Philip the Bold, and having given the command of his armies to Bertrand du Gueſclin, and the marſhal de Boucicaut, gained the battle of Cocherel, in Normandy, on the 23d of May, 1364, againſt the king of Navarre, the moſt formidable of his enemies. He then ſent ſuccours into Britanny, to ſupport Charles of Blois, againſt John of Montfort; and into Spain, to aſſiſt Henry, count of Triſtemare, againſt Peter the Cruel, who, to pleaſe his concubine, had cauſed his wife Blanch of Bourbon to be ſtrangled. Immediately after, Charles V. at the ſolicitation of the people of Guienne, confiſcated whatever belonged to the Engliſh in France, and recalling Gueſclin from Spain, made him conſtable, and by his means drove the Engliſh out of Berry, Touraine, Anjou, Limouſin, and Rouergue; gained the battle of Chizé, in Poitou, in 1370, and a famous victory at ſea, on the coaſt of Rochelle, in 1372, in which the earl of Pembroke was taken priſoner, with eight thouſand men. Charles IV. died at Paris, in 1380, aged forty-three, of a ſlow poiſon, which the king of Navarre had cauſed to be given him ſome years before.

This prince ordained by an irreverſible edict, that the kings of France ſhould be eſteemed of age at fourteen years old.

CHARLES VI. ſurnamed the Well Beloved, was born at Paris, on the 3d of December, 1368, and ſucceeded his father in 1380. His uncle Lewis, duke of Anjou, regent and chief of the council, oppreſſed the people by extraordinary taxes, to provide for his expedition to the kingdom of Naples, where he died, in 1384. Theſe taxes occaſioned the ſedition of the Hammerers, ſo called from the people's breaking into the town-houſe of Paris, and arming themſelves with three or four thouſand iron hammers; a ſedition that would have been attended with fatal conſequences, if the king had not immediately ſuppreſſed it, at his return from Flanders, where he had been to puniſh the inhabitants of Ghent, who had revolted againſt their count. Theſe he defeated in the famous battle of Roſebeck, in 1382, in which he killed twenty-five thouſand men. In 1388, Charles VI. obliged the duke of Gueldres to return to his duty; conſented to a truce with the Engliſh, and in 1391, entered into an alliance with the king of Scotland. He at length marched into Britanny, to chaſtiſe John, duke of Montfort, who had afforded a retreat to Peter of Craon, the aſſaſſin of Peter of Cliſſon, conſtable of France. In his way thither, Charles, who had before given ſome ſigns of madneſs, had his brain greatly diſordered by the heat of the ſun. He had, however, during the remainder of his life, very happy intervals. At length, a quarrel aroſe between the houſes of Burgundy and Orleans, on account of the aſſaſſination of the duke of Orleans, by John, duke of Nevers, who had ſucceeded Philip the Bold, duke of Burgundy, and this quarrel divided the whole kingdom into ſeveral factions. At this time the Engliſh entered France, and with a ſmall and ſickly army gained the glorious battle of Agincourt, on the 25th of October, 1415, in which four princes of the blood, and the flower of the French nobility were killed, or taken priſoners. The Engliſh then took Roan, with all Normandy and Maine; mean while the duke of Burgundy filled Paris with blood and ſlaughter; but was himſelf killed in 1419, by Tonnegui du Chatel. To revenge this murder, Philip the Good, his ſon, with Iſabella, the wife of Charles VI. entered into an alliance with the conqueror, Henry V. king of England, at the expence of the dauphin her ſon, who was declared incapable of ſucceeding to the crown; and Catharine being married to king Henry V. he was, in 1420, declared regent and heir to the kingdom. Charles died at Paris, on the 20th of October, 1422, aged fifty-four; his death being preceded by that of Henry V. king of England, who died the ſame year.

CHARLES VII. ſurnamed the Victorious and the Well-ſerved, was born at Paris, on the 22d of February, 1403. He took the title of regent in 1418, and was crowned at Poictiers, in 1422. The beginning of his reign was very unfortunate. His mother, Iſabella of Bavaria, in concert with the Burgundians, cauſed Henry VI. the ſon of king Henry V. of England, to be proclaimed king of France. After which the Engliſh gained ſeveral battles; but Charles VI. entering into an alliance with the duke of Britanny, gained the battle of Gravelle in 1423, and that of Montargis in 1427. But the Engliſh, encouraged by their former ſucceſs, laid ſiege to Orleans; at length, that city was on the point of ſurrendering, and Charles VII. was meditating a retreat into Dauphiné, when Joan of Arc, a young woman of about eighteen years of age, got herſelf introduced to Charles, and revived his courage. This heroine obliged the Engliſh to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans, on the 8th of May, 1429, and gained the battle of Patay. Charles's affairs inſtantly took a more favourable turn: Auxerre, Troies, Chalons, Soiſſons, Compiegne, and ſeveral other cities, ſurrendered to him. Rheims opened its gates, and Joan of Arc, now called the Maid of Orleans, cauſed him to be crowned, on the 17th of July, 1429, after which ſhe would have retired, but was prevailed upon to ſtay, and being afterwards taken priſoner in Compiegne, by the Engliſh, was carried to Roan, where ſhe was burnt as a witch. The Engliſh afterwards crowned their young king at Paris, but were ſoon driven from thence, and Charles made his public entry into that city in 1437. He took the city of Metz; conquered the Engliſh at the battle of Formigni, in 1450; took Roan, Normandy, and Guienne; and the brave Talbot, the Engliſh general, being ſlain in 1451, at the battle of Carliſle, the counts of Dunois, Penthievre, Foix, and Armagnac, drove the Engliſh out of France, leaving them only the city of Calais.

The armies of Europe had hitherto been compoſed of the troops furniſhed by the nobles, who commanded at the head of their vaſſals. But Charles VII. (ſays an ingenious hiſtorian) availing himſelf of the reputation he had acquired by his ſucceſſes againſt the Engliſh, and taking advantage of the impreſſions of terror ſuch a formidable enemy had left upon the minds of his ſubjects, executed what his predeceſſors durſt not attempt. Under the pretence of keeping always on foot a force ſufficient to defend the kingdom againſt any ſudden invaſion of the Engliſh, he, at the time when he diſbanded his other troops, retained under arms a body of nine thouſand cavalry, and of ſixteen thouſand infantry, and appointed the officers who commanded and diſciplined them. The prime nobility, who had hitherto in a manner been independent, courted this ſervice, in which they were taught to depend on their ſovereign, and to look up to him as the judge and rewarder of their merit. The feudal militia, compoſed of the vaſſals, whom the nobles could call out to follow their ſtandard, being greatly inferior to a body of ſoldiers regularly trained to war, ſunk gradually in reputation. Thus the regulations of Charles VII. by eſtabliſhing the firſt ſtanding army known in Europe, occaſioned an important revolution in its affairs and policy. By depriving the nobles of that direction of the military force of the ſtate, which had raiſed them to ſuch high authority and importance, it gave a deep wound to the feudal ariſtocracy in that part where its power ſeemed to be moſt complete. France, by forming this body of regular troops, acquired ſuch advantages, either for attack or defence over its neighbours, that ſelf-preſervation made it neceſſary for them to imitate its example. Mercenary troops were introduced into all the conſiderable kingdoms on the continent, and gradually became the only military force that was employed or truſted. He was alſo the firſt monarch of France, who, by his royal edict, without the concurrence of the parliament, levied an extraordinary ſubſidy on his people. Robertſon's Hiſtory of the Emperor Charles V.

Charles VII. however owed his crown chiefly to the count of Dunois. He did not indeed want courage; but his paſſion for a young woman, named Agnes Sorrel, made him ſpend his whole time in gallantry, ſports, and feſtivals. This luxurious indolence, and ſome other pretences, cauſed Lewis, the dauphin, who was deſirous of dethroning him, to retire to the duke of Burgundy; from whence he did not return till after Charles's death, which happened on the 22d of July, 1461, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. For he at laſt grew ſo ſuſpicious of this ſon, that we are told he died of hunger, through the fear of being poiſoned.

CHARLES VIII. ſurnamed the Affable and Courteous, was born at Amboiſe, on the 30th of June, 1470, and ſucceeded his his father Lewis XI. in 1483, at thirteen years of age. Anne of France, his eldeſt ſiſter, had the government of his perſon, which occaſioned the duke of Orleans, who was the firſt prince of the blood, and who made pretenſions to the regency, to put himſelf at the head of an army, but he was defeated and taken priſoner, on the 26th of July, 1488. Charles was contracted to Margaret of Auſtria, the daughter of the emperor Maximilian, who had been educated at the court of France; but the duke of Brittany dying, he, in 1491, married Anne of Brittany, who had been married, by proxy, to Maximilian, to whom the king ſent his daughter Margaret. Charles VIII. flattered with the idea of conquering the kingdom of Naples, a conqueſt founded on the rights of the houſe of Anjou, which had been ceded to Lewis XI. concluded a peace with Henry VII. king of England, with the king of the Romans, and the king of Aragon, to whom he ſurrendered Cerdaigne and Rouſſillon, and thus giving a reality for a mere ſhadow, put himſelf at the head of an army in 1492.

The impetuoſity of the French valour, ſays Dr. Robertſon, appeared to the Italians to be irreſiſtible. Florence, Piſa, and Rome opened their gates as the French army advanced. The proſpect of this dreadful invaſion ſtruck one king of Naples with ſuch panic terror, that he died, if we may believe hiſtorians, of the fright; another abdicated his throne from the ſame puſillanimous ſpirit. A third fled out of his dominions as ſoon as the enemy appeared on the Neapolitan frontiers. Charles, after marching thither with as much rapidity, and almoſt as little oppoſition as if he had been on a progreſs through his own dominions, took quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, and intimidated or gave law to every power in Italy. The Italians quickly perceived that no ſingle power, which they could rouſe to action, was an equal match for a monarch at the head of ſuch a martial people; but that a confederacy might accompliſh what the ſeparate members durſt not attempt. To this expedient they had therefore recourſe. While Charles inconſiderately waſted his time at Naples in feſtivals and triumphs, on account of his paſt ſucceſſes, or was fondly dreaming of future conqueſt in the Eaſt, to the empire of which he now aſpired, they formed againſt him a powerful combination of almoſt all the Italian ſtates, ſupported by the emperor Maximilian, and Ferdinand king of Arrogan. The union of ſo many powers, who ſuſpended or forgot all their particular animoſities, that they might act in concert againſt an enemy who had become formidable to them all, awakened Charles from his thoughtleſs ſecurity. He ſaw no proſpect of ſafety but in returning to France. An army of thirty or forty thouſand men, aſſembled by the allies, was ready to obſtruct his march; and though the French, with a daring courage, which more than counter-balanced their inferiority of number, fought their way through them, and gained the battle of Fornove, on the 6th of July, 1495, by which Charles opened a paſſage into his own territories; he was ſtripped of all his conqueſts in Italy in as ſhort a time as it had coſt him to acquire them, and the political ſyſtem of France reſumed the ſame appearance as before his invaſion. Charles afterwards delivered his couſin the duke of Orleans, who was beſieged in Novare, and died three years after, at the caſtle of Amboiſe, on the 7th of April, 1498, aged twenty-ſeven.

CHARLES IX. the ſecond ſon of Henry II. and Catharine de Medicis, was born at St. Germain en-Laye, on the 27th of June, 1550. He ſucceeded his brother, Francis II. on the 15th of December, 1560, at ten years of age, and was crowned at Rheims, on the 15th of May, 1561. His mother had the adminiſtration of the kingdom, and Anthony of Bourbon, knight of Navarre, was declared lieutenant-general. The prince of Condé, who had been impriſoned, was ſet at liberty, and, together with the duke of Guiſe, the conſtable Montmorenci, and the marſhal de St. Andrew, formed a kind of triumvirate, which divided the kingdom into two parts, that of the princes of Bourbon, and that of the Guiſes, which occaſioned a moſt bloody civil war. The queen cauſed an aſſembly of the Notables to be held at St. Germains, and a conference at Poiſſi, in 1561, to put an end to the diſputes raiſed on account of religion; but theſe diſputes only ſerved to irritate people's minds. The king of Navarre joined the triumvirate, which induced the queen to counterbalance that party, by allowing the Calviniſts, in 1562, the public exerciſe of their religion. Francis, duke of Guiſe, being wounded at the maſſacre of the Proteſtants of Vaſſi, the prince of Condé, ſurpriſed Orleans, and the Calviniſts, after his example, ſeized Roan, and ſeveral other cities, but they were defeated by the duke of Guiſe, at the battle of Dreux, on the 19th of December, 1562, when the prince of Condé and the conſtable, with the generals of the two armies, were made priſoners. The following year Francis, duke of Guiſe, was aſſaſſinated by Poltrot, at the ſiege of Orleans. Charles IX. took Havre from the Engliſh, and was declared of age, when thirteen and one day old. He concluded a peace with the Engliſh, went to viſit the ſeveral provinces in his kingdom, and had a conference at Bayonne in 1565, with his ſiſter Iſabella, queen of Spain. The following year he held an aſſembly of the ſtates at Moulins, but the Proteſtants attempting to ſeize his perſon as he was going from Meaux to Paris, the civil war broke out again, and they were defeated at the battle of St. Denis, on the 10th of November, 1567, by the conſtable of France, who died of his wounds. Henry, duke of Anjou, the king's brother, then put himſelf at the head of the popiſh army, and gained the battle of Jarnac, after which the prince of Condé was killed in cold blood by Monteſquieu, on the 13th of March, 1569. The duke of Anjou, the ſame year, gained the bloody battle of Montcontour. In 1570 a peace was concluded with the Calviniſts at St. Germains; but the following year the Proteſtants not being able to baniſh their ſuſpicions, Charles IX. under the pretence of removing them, propoſed the marriage of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry the Great, with Margaret his ſiſter; but immediately after the ceremony was performed, the admiral de Coligni was ſhot at and wounded, and ſome days after they began with him in perpetrating the cruel maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day, 1572, when the ſlaughter at Paris was beyond imagination horrible, and at the ſame day and hour the bloody ſcene was exhibited almoſt through the whole kingdom, and even the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé were forced to abjure their religion to ſave their lives. The king, who charged the duke of Guiſe with being the author of theſe diabolical ſcenes of cruelty, had given him his orders, and the parliament had decreed, that the admiral ſhould be hung in effigy on a gibbet at Montfaucon.

At this horrid maſſacre the Engliſh court went into mourning, and the moſt undiſſembled ſorrow ſat on every countenance, when the French ambaſſador, ſoon after that event, had his audience of queen Elizabeth. This ſcene of blood only ſerved to irritate thoſe Calviniſts who were ſo happy as to eſcape; and therefore refuſing to deliver up thoſe places of ſafety that had been granted them, the duke of Anjou laid ſiege to Rochelle, which was defended by la Noue; but the Proteſtants being now grown deſperate, he, in 1573, loſt almoſt his whole army; when being informed that he was elected king of Poland, he went to take poſſeſſion of that crown, and did not return till after the death of his brother, Charles IX. which happened at the caſtle of Vincennes, on the 30th of May, 1574, in the twenty-fifth year of his age.

It is ſaid that this prince had great courage, was very eloquent, and had a talent for poetry, but that the marſhal de Retz, a Florentine, had perverted all his natural good inclinations.

CHARLES ſurnamed the Fat, elected emperor of Germany in 881, was the third ſon of Lewis the German. He at firſt ſignalized himſelf by his valour, but falling ſick, and loſing the uſe of his limbs, he became incapable of application; on which he reſigned the empire to his nephew Arnulph, in 887, when he became reduced to extreme poverty, and died with vexation, on the 13th of January, 888.

CHARLES IV. emperor of Germany, king of Bohemia, and duke of Luxemburgh, was the grandſon of the emperor Henry VII. and the ſon of John, king of Bohemia. He was elected in 1346, and, in 1356, made the famous golden bull relating to the election of the emperors. It is ſaid that he ruined his family to obtain the empire, and at length ruined the empire to recover his family. He founded the city of Prague, and died there, on the 29th of November, 1378.

CHARLES V. emperor of Germany, king of Spain, and one of the greateſt princes the houſe of Auſtria has produced, was the eldeſt ſon of Philip the Handſome, archduke of Auſtria, and of Joanna, queen of Caſtile. He was born at Ghent, on the 24th of February, 1500; in 1517 ſucceeded to the ſtates of Burgundy, and the crown of Spain, and two years after was elected emperor, after the death of his grandfather, Maximilian I. Francis I. king of France, alſo endeavoured to obtain the empire, and, in 1521, theſe two princes began an open war. Charles V. entered France, took Ardes and Tournai, and in Italy ſeized the Milaneze. He entered into an alliance with Henry VIII. king of England, and pope Leo X. and found means to corrupt Charles of Bourbon, conſtable of France. The French, commanded by admiral Bonivet, were defeated at Biagras, and in 1525 loſt the famous battle of Pavia, at which Francis I. was taken priſoner, and afterwards carried to Spain, but returned the following year, when he entered into an alliance with pope Clement VII. the princes of Italy, and the king of England; on which the conſtable of Bourbon, who was the emperor's general, marched to Rome, and was killed before that city in 1527, which, however, did not prevent its being taken, plundered, and the inhabitants treated with great great cruelty by the army, which was compoſed of Imperialiſts, Italians, and Spaniards. Charles V. pretending to diſapprove of this proceeding, put on mourning, and cauſed public proceſſions to be made for the deliverance of the pope, though he could have inſtantly procured it by an order to his general. In 1529 the pope purchaſed his liberty at a dear rate. The emperor, on the 5th of Auguſt, in the ſame year, concluded a treaty of peace with Francis I. He then obliged Solyman to raiſe the ſiege of Vienna, placed Mulei Haſſan on the throne of Tunis, and, in 1536, carried the war into Provence, from whence he was obliged to retire, with the loſs of almoſt his whole army, after having in vain formed the ſiege of Marſeilles. In 1538 he agreed to a truce with France, and the following year demanded a paſſage through that kingdom, that he might go and chaſtiſe the inhabitants of Ghent, who had revolted, promiſing the French king to grant the inveſtiture of Milan to which of his children he pleaſed. Charles V. was received in France in the moſt magnificent manner, and nothing was omitted that could do him honour. It is difficult to determine which of the two princes ought moſt to be admired, the emperor who entered Paris with confidence, and put himſelf in the power of a prince, whom he had ſo often irritated, and even treated with ſeverity while he was his priſoner, or Francis I. who, on this occaſion, preferred his honour to his intereſt and reſentment. But Charles V. after having chaſtiſed the inhabitants of Ghent, refuſed to fulfil his promiſe, on which the war was rekindled in 1542, but the Imperialiſts being defeated at Cerizoles in 1544, a peace was concluded the next year at Crepi.

The Proteſtants of Germany, thus called from their proteſting in 1529, againſt the decree of the diet of Spires, which enjoined their conforming to the Romiſh religion, prepared, in 1530, the Confeſſion of Augſburg, and entered into a league, offenſive and defenſive, at Smalkald, by which they obliged Charles V. to grant them liberty of conſcience, till a general council was called. That prince however defeated the Lutherans at the battle of Mulburg, in 1547, in which he took John Frederick, elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Heſſe, priſoners. However, the year after he publiſhed the Interim, a proviſional regulation in favour of the Lutherans, relating to the articles of faith, neceſſary to be believed till the deciſion of a general council. But Maurice, elector of Saxony, and Joachim, elector of Brandenburg, entering into a league with the French king, Henry II. againſt the emperor, they, in 1552, obliged him to conſent to a peace by the treaty of Paſſau; by which the Lutherans were to enjoy religious liberty. The ſame year Charles turned his arms againſt the French, and inveſted Metz with a powerful army, but was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, that city being bravely defended by Francis, duke of Guiſe. However, the following year he took and entirely deſtroyed Therouen, which was the laſt effort of his ambition; for, on the 25th of October, 1555, he reſigned the crown of Spain in favour of his ſon, Philip II. and then concluding a truce with Henry II. at Vaucelles, abdicated the empire in favour of his brother Ferdinand, in 1556, and retiring to the convent of St. Juſtus, in the province of Eſtramadura, died there, on the 21ſt of September, 1558, at near fifty-nine years of age, after a reign of thirty-eight years.

Charles V. was enterpriſing, vain, full of diſſimulation, and a great politician: he had courage, was exceſſively ambitious, and ſacrificed every thing to his ruling paſſion. In his reign Cortes conquered Mexico, and rendered that empire ſubject to Spain.

CHARLES VI. the ſixteenth and laſt emperor of the houſe of Auſtria, was the fifth ſon of the emperor Leopold, and the brother of the emperor Joſeph. He was born on the firſt of October, 1685, and was made archduke in 1687. He had infuſed into him from his infancy a great zeal for the Romiſh religion, a particular regard for the clergy, and a competent knowledge of the languages, ſciences, and military exerciſes. Charles II. king of Spain, dying without heirs, on the firſt of November, 1700, Philip of France, the ſecond ſon of the dauphin, was proclaimed king of Spain at Madrid and Verſailles, by the name of Philip V. on which the archduke cauſed himſelf to be crowned king of Spain at Vienna, in 1703, by the name of Charles III. and thus a bloody war was begun, for the ſucceſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy. The archduke at firſt obtained great advantages, and made his public entry into Madrid; but Philip V. having received conſiderable ſuccours commanded by the duke of Vendôme, Charles quitted Madrid, and retired into Catalonia, where he loſt every thing except Barcelona and Taragon. At the death of the emperor Joſeph he was obliged to quit Spain, and to leave the regency to his conſort, and the command of his army to the count of Stharemburg; but was the ſame year (that is in 1711) proclaimed emperor. The war was however continued in Spain, which did not prevent Charles VI. from declaring war againſt the Turks, on the 5th of June, 1716; after which prince Eugene defeated them, took Temeſwaer, Belgrade, and ſeveral other places, which obliged the Turks to demand a peace; which was granted them in 1718, at Paſſarowitz, and by that treaty the emperor ſecured his conqueſts. All acts of hoſtility in Italy had been ſuſpended, in virtue of a treaty of neutrality; when the enterprize of the Spaniſh miniſter, cardinal Alberoni, in cauſing Sardinia to be taken, occaſioned the quadruple alliance, concluded at London, on the 2d of Auguſt, 1718, between Great Britain, France, the emperor, and the ſtate's general; by which Charles VI. promiſed to acknowledge Philip V. as king of Spain; and the allies, on their ſide, promiſed to maintain the emperor in the poſſeſſion of the dominions he poſſeſſed as archduke of Auſtria; and to cauſe Sicily to be given him in the room of Sardinia; but the court of Spain not being willing to accede to this treaty, the war was continued, to the diſadvantage of Spain, till, cardinal Alberoni being diſgraced, the Spaniards entered into the quadruple alliance, on the 26th of January, 1720, which put an end to the war. Charles VI. at length endeavoured to introduce and confirm the pragmatic ſanction, in relation to the ſucceſſion of his hereditary ſtates. After having cauſed it to be accepted and ſigned by moſt of the German princes, he concluded a treaty with Spain at Vienna, on the 30th of Auguſt, 1725, in which both parties renounced all right to the kingdoms and countries each other then poſſeſſed, and at the ſame time guarantied the hereditary ſucceſſon of Don Carlos to the eſtates of Tuſcany and Parma, and the pragmatic ſanction.

Notwithſtanding theſe ſeveral treaties, Charles VI. was, in 1733, involved in another war; for Auguſtus, king of Poland, dying, France reſolved to place and ſupport king Staniſlaus Leſzinſky on the throne; Charles VI. on the contrary, cauſed the elector of Saxony, who took the name of Auguſtus III. to be elected: on which the French took Kehl, Treves, Trarbach, and Philipſburg; and in Italy gained the battles of Parma and Guaſtalla. Don Carlos, aſſiſted by a Spaniſh army, commanded by the duke de Montemar, attacked the kingdom of Naples, and after the battle of Bitonto, cauſed himſelf to be crowned king. He alſo rendered himſelf maſter of Sicily, and in 1735 the Imperialiſts poſſeſſed no part of Italy except Mantua; but the Ruſſians and Saxons marching to reinforce the emperor's army on the Rhine, all hoſtilities ſuddenly ceaſed, and a peace was concluded. Auguſtus III. remained king of Poland; king Staniſlaus had the duchies of Lorrain and Bar, on condition that after his deceaſe they ſhould belong to France; to the emperor was reſtored Parma, Placentia, and the Milaneze: France guarantied the Pragmatic Sanction; the duke of Lorrain had the Reverſion of the duchy of Tuſcany; and Don Carlos kept the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily.

This war was, in 1737, ſucceeded by another with the Turks, which was very unſucceſsful; for Charles VI. was obliged by the treaty of peace concluded in 1739, to give up Belgrade, Servia, and all the places poſſeſſed by the houſe of Auſtria, in Walachia. After this diſadvantageous peace, he died, on the 20th of October, 1740, aged fifty-five.

CHARLES VII. emperor of Germany, was the ſon of Maximilian Emanuel, elector of Bavaria, and Thereſa Cunegonda, the daughter of John III. king of Poland. He was born at Bruſſels, on the 6th of Auguſt, 1697, and was named Charles Albert. He married the daughter of the emperor Joſeph, in 1722, and ſucceeded his father the elector of Bavaria, in 1726. After the death of the emperor Charles VI. he refuſed to acknowledge his ſiſter-in-law the archduchеſs Maria Thereſa, the eldeſt daughter of the late emperor, as univerſal heireſs of the houſe of Auſtria; and alſo to acknowledge the Pramatic Sanction, made in favour of that princeſs. Having received troops from France, he rendered himſelf maſter of Paſſau; took the title of archduke of Auſtria; made himſelf maſter of Lintz and Upper Auſtria; conquered Bohemia; was proclaimed king; and at length elected emperor, on the 24th of January, 1742. But this great proſperity was of ſhort duration. The queen of Hungary proteſted againſt his election, and retook Paſſau, Lintz, and Upper Auſtria. Her troops at length entered Bavaria, took Braunau, Landſhut, and Munich; laid almoſt the whole electorate under contribution, and ſome time after reduced the Bavarians to the moſt dreadful extremities. Charles VII. died at Munich, on the 20th of January, 1745.

CHARLES I. king of Great Britain, was born at Dumferling, in Scotland, on the 19th of November, 1600: he ſucceeded his father James I. in 1625; and the ſame year married Henrietta of France, the daughter of Henry IV. and the ſiſter of Lewis XIII. Two years after he ſent aſſiſtance to the French Calviniſts, to prevent the taking of Rochelle, but the Engliſh being defeated, and Rochelle taken, taken, a treaty of peace was concluded between the two crowns. The king engaging in ſeveral unjuſtifiable and arbitrary meaſures to obtain that money which was refuſed him by the parliament, that body was greatly diſſatisfied; and at length his majeſty attempting to take ſeveral members out of the houſe of commons while they were cenſuring his conduct, they roſe by degrees into open rebellion, as the Scots had done ſome time before, which produced a very bloody civil war, which laſted till, after many ſieges and battles, this unhappy and ill-adviſed king was ſtripped of his dominions, and the Scots, with whom he had taken refuge, having delivered him up to the Engliſh, he was at laſt brought to his trial before a high court of juſtice, and having ſentence of death paſſed upon him, was beheaded before the Banquetting-houſe at White-hall, on the 30th of January, 1648, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign.

There have been warm diſputes whether the Εικων Βασιλικη was compoſed by king Charles or not. His majeſty likewiſe wrote Reaſons againſt the pretended Juriſdiction of the High Court of Juſtice, which he intended to deliver in writing, on Monday, January 22, 1648. His majeſty likewiſe tranſlated Biſhop Saunderſon's Lectures de Juramenti Promiſſorii Obligatione, which he deſired biſhop Juxon, Dr. Hammond, and Mr. Thomas Herbert, to compare with the original. This tranſlation was printed in octavo, in 1655. This prince, like his father, did not confine himſelf to proſe: biſhop Burnet has given us a pathetic elegy, ſaid to be written by king Charles, in Cariſbrook caſtle. The poetry is moſt uncouth and unharmonious, but it contains ſtrong thoughts, and a ſtrain of majeſtic piety. Several of his manuſcript letters are extant in private hands.

CHARLES II. king of Great Britain, and the ſon of the former, was born on the 29th of May, 1630. Being informed while at the Hague of the death of his unhappy father, he went into Scotland, where he was proclaimed king of England, Scotland, and Ireland; but Cromwell, to whom the command of the army was then given, marched againſt him with the Engliſh forces, defeated him near Dunbar, and afterwards following him to Worceſter, entirely routed his army, when being obliged to fly, he, by means of ſeveral diſguiſes, made his eſcape, and arrived at Roan, where finding that the French had entered into a treaty with Cromwell, he retired to Cologn. The Spaniards then declared war againſt Cromwell, and at the ſame time allowed prince Charles a penſion, who went into Flanders, and from thence retired to Holland, where he ſtayed till Cromwell's death, which happened on the third of September, 1658. In 1660, general Monk having rendered himſelf abſolute maſter of the parliament, recalled the prince and his two brothers; on which Charles was crowned the following year, and in 1662 married to the infanta of Portugal. In 1665 war was declared againſt the Dutch and French, and on the third of June a great victory was obtained over the Dutch at ſea, and the ſame year a moſt terrible peſtilence broke out in London. In 1666 another victory was obtained over the Dutch at ſea, ſoon after which ſir Robert Holmes burnt one hundred and fifty ſail of Dutch merchantmen; and that year a moſt dreadful fire happened at London, which burnt about thirteen thouſand houſes. In 1667 the kings of France and Sweden acted the part of mediators between England and Holland; when the Dutch taking advantage of our being off our guard, entered Chatham river, and burnt ſeveral men of war. But king Charles, notwithſtanding this piece of treachery, concluded the peace at Breda. This peace was however but of ſhort continuance, for in 1672, king Charles joined with the French, who attacked the Dutch by land, while the Engliſh engaged their fleets at ſea; but a peace was concluded two years after. In the latter part of king Charles's reign, ſeveral miſunderſtandings happened between him and the parliament; who endeavoured to exclude his brother the duke of York from the ſucceſſion, on account of his being a bigotted papiſt, but without effect. King Charles died on the 16th of February, 1685, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and was buried in Henry the Seventh's chapel in Weſtminſter-abbey. He was ſucceeded by his brother James, duke of York.

CHARLES GUSTAVUS X. king of Sweden, the ſon of John Caſimir, count palatine of the Rhine, and of Catharine, the daughter of Charles IX. king of Sweden, was born at Upſall, in 1622, and ſucceeded queen Chriſtina his couſin, who abdicated the throne in his favour, in 1654. Charles Guſtavus immediately engaged in a war with the Poles, took Warſaw, Cracow, and ſeveral other places; but Caſimir, king of Poland, defeated him in his turn; and after ſeveral battles, drove him out of his dominions. Charles at length made war on the Danes, over whom he obtained great advantages. He was brave, enterpriſing, and propoſed to execute the greateſt deſigns; but death put a ſtop to his projects. He died at Gottemburg, on the 13th of February, 1660, aged thirty-ſeven.

CHARLES XI. king of Sweden, was the ſon of the former, and was born on the 25th of December, 1655, and ſucceeded to the crown on the death of his father. He was inveſted with the enſigns of the garter, by Charles Howard, earl of Carliſle, and Henry St. George, eſq. Richmond herald. The queen, his mother, governed with great wiſdom during his minority, and cauſed him to be carefully educated in the art of war, in the knowledge of the ſciences and the languages. He was crowned in 1674. Chriſtiern V. king of Denmark, then attacked the Swedes: but Charles gained great advantages over him, and won the battles of Halmſtadt, Lunden, and Landſcroon, which did not prevent the king of Denmark and the elector of Brandenburg from taking all the places he poſſeſſed in Pomerania; but theſe places were reſtored to him by the treaty of Nimeguen, in 1679. Charles obliged the king of Denmark, who had ſeized the perſon and dominions of the duke of Holſtein Gottorp, to ſet that prince at liberty, and reſtore his duchy. He afterwards obſerved an exact neutrality with reſpect to the wars of Europe. He was a prince of great penetration, frugality, and induſtry; but proud, ſelfiſh, and tyrannical. He deprived the ſenate of the ſhare in the government which they had formerly poſſeſſed, and erected an arbitrary court, called the Chamber of Liquidations, by which, multitudes of his ſubjects were reduced to extreme poverty and diſtreſs. His haughty and ſevere treatment of his queen, who was one of the beſt of women, threw her into a diſtemper that haſtened her death. He died on the 15th of April, 1697, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles XII. The queen regent, his mother, buried him with more pomp than had been ſeen in Sweden, and obliged her ſubjects to mourn for him three years.

CHARLES XII. king of Sweden, and one of the moſt famous warriors the world has produced, was born on the 27th of June, 1682. By the laſt will of his father king Charles XI. the queen dowager Hedwiga Eleonora, of Holſtein Gottorp, was to govern the kingdom jointly with five ſenators, till the young prince her grandſon was eighteen years old; but he was declared of age by the ſtates of the kingdom at fifteen, and crowned on the 24th of December, 1697; on which he immediately finiſhed the treaty of Ryſwic, begun by his father. But Frederick Auguſtus, king of Poland and elector of Saxony, Frederick IV. king of Denmark, and Peter Alexiowitz, czar of Muſcovy, thinking to take advantage of his youth, entered into an alliance againſt him, and formed the project of attacking him on every ſide. The firſt effect of this ſecret enterprize fell on the duke of Holſtein, the king of Sweden's brother-in-law, againſt whom the king of Denmark committed ſome hoſtilities. England, Holland, and the princes of Holſtein being no leſs obliged than Sweden, by the treaty concluded at Altena, in 1689, to ſupport the duke of Holſtein, propoſed at firſt the expedient of a negociation; but the king of Sweden ſeeing, by the length of the conferences held on this ſubject, that the king of Denmark only ſought to gain time to put himſelf in a condition to act with open force, detached five thouſand men to Pomerania, where, being joined by the troops of Lunenburg, they paſſed the Elbe in order to defend Holſtein; while he himſelf reſolved to command the Swediſh fleet, compoſed of thirty-nine ſhips of the line; to which the Engliſh and Dutch added thirty men of war. Immediately after this junction he ſailed to attack the Daniſh fleet which fled, and took ſhelter in the port of Copenhagen: when the king ſeeing it impoſſible to force them out, reſolved to carry the war into the very heart of Denmark, and beſiege the capital by land, while his fleet blocked it up by ſea. He diſembarked with five thouſand men, and he himſelf leaping into the water, followed by his troops, carried the poſt of Humblebeck in ſpight of the reſiſtance of the enemy. Having garriſoned that poſt, he ſent ſeveral veſſels to Landſcroon to bring the reſt of his army, with his heavy artillery, and at length landed in the iſland of Zealand; when the king of Denmark being alarmed at this progreſs, demanded and concluded a peace with Holſtein, which he had ſo long eluded, on the 18th of Auguſt, 1700, and ſubmitted to the conditions preſcribed him by the ſovereigns who were the guarantees of the treaty of Altena. Charles XII. had already given orders for his troops to enter into winter quarters, when he received advice that Narva, where Horne was governor, was beſieged by an army of one hundred thouſand Muſcovites; on which he immediately changed his deſign, and reſolved to march againſt the Czar, in ſpight of the rigour of the ſeaſon. He landed at Pernau, in Livonia, with a part of his troops, while the reſt landed at Revel, and as ſoon as he had aſſembled them to the number of eight thouſand men, marched directly to Nerva, forced the defile of Pyhajaggi, and arrived on the 30th of November at the enemy's camp, which was intrenched and fortified, before the city, and attacking the enemy, gained that aſtoniſhing victory which has immortalized his name. Thirty thouſand Muſcovites were killed on the ſpot, or drowned; twenty thouſand begged for quarter, and the reſt were either taken priſoners or diſperſed. This victory coſt the conqueror only two thouſand men, killed and wounded. The Muſcovites were forced to evacuate the provinces they had invaded, and the king of Sweden ſpent the winter at Lais, where magazines had been prepared for him.

The following ſpring, 1701, after having intruſted general Schlippenbach with the defence of Livonia, he marched directly to Riga, againſt the Saxons, who were intrenched on the banks of the Duna, and paſſing that river with his army in boats, he drove them from their poſts, and gained a complete victory. Charles followed his conqueſts to the diet of Poland, where he cauſed the throne to be declared vacant. All the efforts of king Auguſtus were ineffectual, his troops were every where beaten by the Swedes and he himſelf narrowly eſcaped being taken priſoner at Cracow. The king of Sweden cauſed Staniſlaus Leſzinſki to be choſen king of Poland, and after his having rendered himſelf maſter of the greateſt part of the electorate of Saxony, obliged Auguſtus to reſign the kingdom of Poland, and to acknowledge king Staniſlaus. The articles of this treaty were ratified by both parties, and the peace publiſhed both in the king of Sweden's camp, and at Leipſick and Dreſden, on the 24th of November, 1706. All Europe learnt, with aſtoniſhment, the ſucceſs of ſuch an important enterprize, and admired the diſintereſtedneſs of the king of Sweden, who made no demands for enlarging his dominions, and deſired no other advantage from his victories, but the vain glory of having obtained them.

Charles XII. having thus reduced the kings of Denmark and Sweden, declared war againſt Peter the Great, czar of Muſcovy. He at firſt obtained great advantages over him, and won a vaſt number of victories, by which he obliged the Muſcovites to abandon Poland; after which he purſued them into Muſcovy, but at length was entirely defeated, at the famous battle of Pultowa, in which he was wounded in the foot, and loſt eight thouſand men; and general Lewenhaupt, with eighteen thouſand men of the Swediſh forces, were three days after obliged to ſurrender themſelves to prince Minzikow, the czar's general. This battle was fought on the 8th of July, 1709, by two of the moſt famous monarchs in the univerſe; Charles XII. rendered illuſtrious by an uninterrupted courſe of victories, from which he obtained the name of Invincible, and Peter Alexiowitz, who juſtly deſerved the name of Great, and immortalized himſelf not only by his victories, but by civilizing his ſubjects, and introducing arts and ſciences into his dominions. Charles XII. after having loſt in one day the fruit of ſo many years labour, and ſuch a number of battles, was carried off with the greateſt difficulty. He paſſed the Boryſthenes, retired at length to Oczakow, and from thence to Bender. He was there joined by one thouſand five hundred Wallachians, and eighteen thouſand Swedes, among whom were three generals, ſix colonels, and a great number of officers. The grand ſeignor ſent him forty thouſand Tartars to ſerve him for an eſcort, till he reached a place of ſafety; but being informed that ſome of the officers of the Turks and Tartars were gained over by his enemy, and intended to deliver him up to the Muſcovites, he built a houſe near Bender, and formed intrenchments about it. He was at length preſſed to leave Turky, and when no arguments could prevail, his houſe was attacked by the Tartars, on the 11th of February, 1713, when he performed the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour; but the building being ſet on fire, and having received two or three ſlight wounds, he was obliged to ſurrender, when being conducted to Bender, the ſeraſkier and kham of the Tartars received him with very great reſpect, and excuſed themſelves, by ſaying that they had been deceived by a forged order from the grand ſeignor. The king of Sweden was at length conducted to Adrianople with an eſcort. The grand ſeignor gave him audience, and promiſed to make good the loſſes he had ſuſtained. In ſhort, after having ſtaid above five years in the dominions of the Turks, he ſet out on his return, on the firſt of October, 1714, and having diſguiſed himſelf, croſſed Wallachia, Tranſilvania, Hungary, Germany, and arrived on the 22d of November, at Stralſund, in which journey he was followed only by three perſons. He was conducted to general Duker, who immediately knew him; but his affairs were greatly altered. King Auguſtus had remounted the throne of Poland. Sweden had loſt ſeveral provinces, and was without trade, without money, without credit, and without troops. The old veterans were either killed or priſoners in the moſt diſtant parts of Ruſſia. Such was the deplorable ſtate in which Charles found Sweden at his return. The next day he viſited the fortifications of Stralſund, but neither his preſence nor valour could now preſerve them. The kings of Denmark and Pruſſia took the iſle of Rugen, on the 17th of November, 1715, and Stralſund on the 22d of December following. After this loſs Charles entered Norway, with an army of twenty thouſand men, and undertook the ſiege of Frederickſhall; but as he was viewing the fortifications, he was killed by a ball fired at random, on the 12th of December, 1718, aged thirty-ſeven.

This prince, who was the terror of the North, was tall and ſlender, of a fair complexion, with blue eyes, light hair, a robuſt conſtitution, and a noble and graceful air, but to the laſt degree negligent in his perſon and dreſs. He ſpoke little, but what he ſaid was generally juſt, had an affable and engaging behaviour, and an agreeable and ſprightly humour, eſteeming merit, and rewarding valour even in his enemies; he was the ſame in proſperity and in diſgrace, always intrepid, and capable of ſuffering the greateſt hardſhips. With theſe qualities this prince was raſh, obſtinate, and ſo ambitious of the title of a conqueror, that, to obtain it, he madly ſacrificed the treaſure and the blood of his ſubjects.

His long wars depopulated his country, and reduced Sweden to the moſt unhappy ſituation.

CHARLES MARTEL, mayor of the palace, an illuſtrious French general, was the ſon of Pepin Heriſtal. He defeated Rainfroy, mayor of the palace to king Chilperic II. and ſeized the government of France in 718. From his martial diſpoſition he obtained the name of Martel, and indeed he was almoſt conſtantly in arms. He conquered the Saxons, Germans, Bavarians, Noricians, and the Saracens, commanded by Abderamus; at length he made himſelf maſter of Burgundy and Provence, and died at Ceſſi on the Oiſe, on the 22d of October, 741.

CHARLES of France, count of Valois and Alençon, ſurnamed the Defender of the Church, was the youngeſt ſon of king Philip the Bold, and was born in 1270. It was ſaid of him, that he was the ſon of a king, the brother of a king, the uncle of a king, and the father of a king, without ever being a king himſelf. This prince made a ſucceſsful war in Guienne, Flanders, and Italy, and died at Nogent, on the 6th of November, 1325.

CHARLES of France, king of Naples and Sicily, was the ſon of Lewis VIII. king of France, and the brother of St. Lewis. He was born in 1220, and followed St. Lewis into the Levant in 1248. At his return he received the inveſtiture of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, gained a bloody battle over Mainfroy in 1266, in which that prince was killed, and another, two years after, over Conradin, duke of Suabia, who was taken priſoner with his couſin Frederick, both of whom Charles cauſed to be beheaded. This prince was at the ſiege of Tunis, in 1270. At his return from thence the princes of Italy conceived a jealouſy againſt him, and the Sicilians, enraged at his having ſtripped John, lord of the iſle of Procida, of his poſſeſſions, revolted, and had the cruelty to maſſacre all the French on Eaſter Sunday, 1282, at the hour of veſpers, which circumſtance has given to this maſſacre the name of the Sicilian Veſpers. Charles died at Foggia, in Apulia, on the 7th of January, 1285.

CHARLES, duke of Bourbon, and conſtable of France, was born on the 27th of February, 1489. He gave early proofs of his valour, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Italy and Burgundy. Francis I. made him conſtable of France on the 10th of January, 1515, when he gained great honour at the battle of Marignan, and the conqueſt of the Milaneſe. Afterwards quarrelling with Louiſa of Savoy, the mother of Francis I. on the ſubject of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Bourbon, he treated with the emperor Charles V. and took up arms againſt the French king. He entered Provence in 1524, and ſerved the following year at the battle of Pavia, where Francis I. was made priſoner. He at length had the command of Charles the Fifth's army, and was killed at the ſiege of Rome, in mounting firſt to the aſſault, on the 6th of May, 1527.

CHARLES of Bourbon, cardinal, archbiſhop of Roan, and legate of Avignon, was the ſon of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, and was born in 1523. He was declared king of France by the chiefs of the league, after the death of Henry III. in order to exclude his nephew, Henry IV. from the crown, and took the name of Henry X. He died at Fontenai-le-Comte, on the 9th of May, 1590.

He ought not to be confounded with the cardinal of Bourbon, his nephew, who died in 1494.

CHARLES, duke of Burgundy, ſurnamed the Bold, the Warrior, and the Raſh, was the ſon of Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, and Iſabella of Portugal. He was born at Dijon, on the 10th of November, 1433, and ſucceeded his father in 1467. A mutual averſion ſubſiſted between him and Lewis XI. king of France, which was formed during the time that this laſt prince, when dauphin, was at the court of Philip the Good. This mutual hatred was a continual ſource of enterprizes undertaken againſt each other, that occaſioned great calamities. They made war only to croſs each other's intereſt, and they had no other end in concluding a peace but to lay ſnares for each other.

Of

Of all the wars and ſieges in which the duke engaged, none is more remarkable than that of Beavais. For in a general aſſault, the men in the city being upon the point of being routed, the women, headed by one Jane Hachete, performed wonders in repelling the duke's army, by throwing of ſtones, wild fire, melted lead, and boiling roſin. On which account, it is ſaid, that there is a proceſſion on the 10th of July, which was the day when the ſiege was raiſed, and in this proceſſion the women walk firſt, and the men after. He defeated the Leaguers at the battle of St. Tron, but loſt the battles of Granſon, and at Morat was defeated by the Swiſs; after which, it is ſaid, that a church was built near the place of the bones of the Burgundians that fell in that memorable battle. He, however, employed himſelf in acts of juſtice, of which the following is a remarkable inſtance. A very brave captain of his father, duke Philip the Good, having obtained, as a reward of his ſervices, the government of a place, fell in love with a beautiful lady, at whoſe houſe he lodged, and revealing his paſſion, endeavoured to engage her affections, by ſwearing that the affair ſhould be kept an inviolable ſecret, and that ſhe might depend on his conſtancy: but ſhe anſwered, that her conſcience would not permit her to violate her conjugal faith, and that he ought to conſider the ſacred laws of hoſpitality, and provide for his pleaſures in a lawful way. This anſwer ſerving only to inflame his paſſion, he offered her a large ſum of money, and promiſed the lady that ſhe ſhould appear much more ſplendid than any of her neighbours or relations, and that he would procure her huſband an advantageous employment. His promiſes not making any impreſſion upon her, he tried another method of attack. He impriſoned her huſband, under the pretence of his being a rebel; and when ſhe had recourſe to him, as the only means of ſaving the life of her huſband, he anſwered, that the crime was evident, and that he could not diſpenſe with making him ſubmit to a capital puniſhment, unleſs the duke's favour ſhould interpoſe. "But I promiſe to procure "this, added he, provided you will grant me the favour I "have ſo often aſked in vain." This propoſal made her bluſh, and burſt into tears, and raiſed ſuch a conflict in her mind between her compaſſion for her huſband and her virtue, as deprived her of the uſe of ſpeech; when taking advantage of this miſerable ſtate of irreſolution, he gratified his luſt. She, after this, called upon him from time to time, to fulfil his promiſe; but he made uſe of a thouſand falſities, and at laſt ordered her huſband's head to be ſecretly cut off in priſon; then giving her a paper, told her that he would be immediately releaſed, on her preſenting it to the jaylor. She haſted to the priſon, but there found that her huſband had juſt died by the hands of the executioner. The ſight of that dreadful object filled her with grief and rage; but ſoon recovering herſelf, ſhe returned to the governor, whom ſhe loaded with all the reproaches her indignation could ſuggeſt. He alledged an hundred excuſes, offered to marry her, and promiſed her a noble fortune. She rejected theſe offers, and related the whole affair to ſome of her relations, who adviſed her to wait the arrival of duke Charles, in order to demand juſtice of him. This ſhe did; and the prince having had proofs of the governor's crime, commanded him to marry the widow. She ſhewed a reluctance to it, which could not be ſurmounted but by the ſtrongeſt ſollicitations. However, the marriage contract was at laſt drawn up: the lady was to inherit all the eſtate of the huſband, if he died before her, without children. They proceeded according to the uſual forms to the nuptial bleſſing, and then the duke aſked the woman whether ſhe was contented, who anſwered "Yes." "But I, replied he, am not." He then ſent the governor to priſon, and two hours after ordered him to be beheaded in the ſame chamber where the firſt huſband had loſt his head.

Charles was killed at the ſiege of Nancy, on the 5th of January, 1477, aged forty-ſix.

CHARLES I. duke of Lorrain, was born at Laon, in 953, and paid homage for his dominions to his couſin, the emperor Otho II. which ſo enraged the French nobility, that, on the death of Lewis the Lazy, they, by an aſſembly of the ſtates, in 987, deprived him of his right to the crown of France, and ſet Hugh Capet on the throne. Charles endeavoured, in vain, to make good his claim by force of arms; he was taken priſoner at Laon, on the 2d of April, 991, and ſhut up in a tower at Orleans, where he died three years after.

CHARLES II. duke of Lorrain, was the ſon of John, duke of Lorrain, who was poiſoned at Paris, on the 27th of Septemberg, 1382, and Sophia of Wirtemburg. He ſignalized himſelf in ſeveral battles, was conſtable of France in 1418, and died in 1430.

CHARLES IV. the ſon of Francis, count of Vaudemont, and grandſon of Charles III. duke of Lorrain, was a generous, brave, enterprizing, but unhappy and inconſtant prince. Lewis XIII. made himſelf maſter of his dominions, and reſtored them to him again. Charles at length entered into a league with the Spaniards, who, in 1654, arreſted him at Bruſſels, and conducted him to the citadel of Antwerp, and from thence to Toledo, from whence he did not return till the year 1659. Three years after he concluded a treaty with Lewis XIV. by which he ceded his dominions to that prince upon advantageous conditions; but ſcarce was he returned to his duchy, when he repented of what he had done, and from that time was inceſſantly raiſing diſturbances in France. The French king took poſſeſſion of Lorrain in 1670, and Charles retired into Germany. M. de Turenne defeated him at Sintſheim, in 1674, and he, in his turn, defeated the arrier-ban of Anjou, and the marſhal de Crequi, whom he beſieged and took priſoner in Treves. He died near Birkenfeldt in 1675, in about the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age.

CHARLES V. duke of Lorrain, and one of the greateſt captains of his time, was the ſecond ſon of duke Francis, and the princeſs Nicola of Lorrain. He was born at Vienna, on the 3d of Auguſt, 1643, and after the peace of the Pyrenees went to Paris, where the French king firſt propoſed his marrying the princeſs de Montpenſier, and then mademoiſelle de Nemours; but neither of theſe marriages being completed, he went to the emperor, and having entered into his ſervice, continued firmly attached to him all the reſt of his life. Charles V. ſignaliſed himſelf againſt the Turks at the paſſage of Raab, and was general of the cavalry ſent by the emperor againſt the malecontent Hungarians. In 1674 he was one of the candidates for the crown of Poland, but not ſucceeding, he went into Flanders, where he behaved with great bravery at the battle of Senef. After the death of his uncle, Charles IV. he took the title of duke of Lorrain, and ſerved againſt France. In 1678 he married the queen dowager of Poland, and returning to Vienna, was made generaliſſimo of the Imperial army againſt the Turks, from whom he obtained many ſignal victories, took from them ſeveral important places, and died at Weltz, in Auſtria, on the 18th of April, 1690, aged forty-ſeven.

CHARLES, of Lorrain, duke of Mayenne, peer, admiral, and great chamberlain of France, was the ſecond ſon of Francis of Lorrain, duke of Guiſe, and Anne d'Eſt, and was born on the 26th of March, 1554. He ſignalized himſelf in ſeveral battles, and commanded the army againſt the Proteſtants. After the death of his brothers, who were killed at the ſtates of Blois in 1588, he was declared chief of the league, and took the title of lieutenant-general of the ſtate and crown of France. Henry IV. defeated him in ſeveral battles, and gave him a favourable reception, when he ſubmitted to him in 1599; after which time the duke ſerved that prince with fidelity, and died at Soiſſons, on the 3d of October, 1611.

CHARLES EMANUEL, duke of Savoy, ſurnamed the Great, was born at the caſtle of Rivoli, on the 12th of January, 1562. He gave proofs of his courage and conduct in ſeveral ſieges and battles; but his ambition involved him in many inconveniencies, and drew upon him the hatred of his neighbours. He was a learned and ingenious prince, a friend to men of letters, and paſſed for one of the greateſt generals in his time. He was ſo impenetrable in his deſigns, that it was commonly ſaid that his heart was more inacceſſible than his country. This great man died at Savillan, on the 26th of July, 1630, aged ſeventy-eight.

He ought not to be confounded with Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, who died in 1675.

CHARLES the Warrior, duke of Savoy, the ſon of Amadeus IX. and the brother of Philibert I. whom he ſucceeded in 1482, was a benificent, wiſe, virtuous, affable, and liberal prince. He underwent many difficulties in the beginning of his reign, which made him take for his deviſe a ſun riſing from a tempeſt, with theſe words, Non tamen inde minus. He married Blanch of Montferrat, the daughter of William Paleologus VI. marquis of Montferrat, by whom he had a ſon, who ſucceeded him. It was expected that Charles the Warrior would have had a long and glorious reign, but he died on the 13th of March, 1489, at twenty-one years of age. It was thought that the marquis de Saluces, whom he had vanquiſhed, and whoſe country he had ſubdued, had cauſed him to be poiſoned.

There have been ſeveral other princes of the name of Charles.

CHARLES CAPE, a promontory of Virginia, in North America, which makes the north ſide of the ſtrait, at the entrance of Cheſapeak bay. Lat. 37. 12.

CHARLES CAPE, a promontory of North America, on the ſouth weſt part of the ſtrait, entering into Hudſon's Bay, Lat. 62. 40.

CHARLES TOWN, the capital of South Carolina, in North America, ſeated on a peninſula, formed by Aſhley and Cooper rivers, the former of which is navigable for ſhips twenty twenty miles. It is a commodious and ſafe harbour, and the town is as well built as moſt in America, but it was deſtroyed by fire in 1740. It is a place of good trade, and there are annually a great number of ſhips loaded there with rice, ſkins, pitch, and tar. They have ſuffered frequently by inundations and unhealthy ſeaſons, and yet Carolina is one of the beſt colonies of Great Britain. They have lately begun to breed ſilk-worms, and to cultivate indigo. Long. 79. 12. W. Lat. 32. 20. N.

CHARLES TOWN, in New England, in North America, is both a market and county town, and has a pretty large church. The market place is a large ſquare by the ſide of a river; it is well ſupplied with fleſh and fiſh, and has two long ſtreets which lead down to it. It is ſeated near Boſton, being only ſeparated from it by the harbour, and is near half as large. Long. 71. 30. W. Lat. 42. 5. N.

CHARLES FORT, in the county of Cork, and the province of Munſter, in Ireland, is ſeated at the entrance of Kinſale harbour. Long. 8. 20. W. Lat. 52. 13 N.

CHARLEVAL (JOHN LEWIS FAUCON DE RIS, lord of) the friend of Sarraſin and Scarron, was a polite French writer, both in verſe and proſe. He died in 1688, and left a Collection of Letters, and his Poems.

CHARLEVILLE, a handſome town of France, in Champagne, and in the diſtrict of Rethelois. The ſtreets are as ſtrait as a line, of an equal height, and covered with ſlate. The ſquare is magnificent, and in the middle of it is a very handſome fountain. It is ſeated on the river Meuſe, near Meziers, from which it is ſeparated only by a bridge and a cauſeway. It is fifteen miles north-weſt of Sedan, and one hundred and fifteen north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 37. E. Lat. 40. 50. N.

CHARLEY, a town of Lancaſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, and three fairs, on May 5, and Auguſt 20, for horned cattle, and on September 5, for toys and ſmall wares. It is ſeated near the ſpring head of a brook or rivulet, called Chor, not far from the river Yarrow. It is but a ſmall town, and yet its market is well furniſhed with yarn and proviſions. It is ten miles north-weſt of Manchester, eight north of Warrington, and two hundred and one north-north-weſt of London. Long 2. 35. W. Lat. 53. 40. N.

CHARLIER (JOHN) a famous doctor of the Sorbonne, more known by the name of Gerſon, a village in the dioceſe of Rheims, where he was born, on the 14th of December, 1363. He aſſiſted at the councils of Piſa and Conſtance; of which laſt he was, in a manner, both the ſoul and tongue. At length, fearing the indignation of the duke of Burgundy, who had cauſed the duke of Orleans to be aſſaſſinated, he retired to Lyons, where he died, on the 12th of July, 1429, aged ſixty-ſix. The beſt edition of his works is that of Dupin, in 1706, in five volumes, folio.

CHARLIEU, a town of France, in the dioceſe of Maçon, on the frontiers of Beaujolois and Burgundy, near the river Loire. Long. 4. 5. E. Lat. 46. 15. N.

CHARLTON (WALTER) a very learned phyſician, and one of the moſt univerſal ſcholars of his time, was born at Shipton Mallet, February 2, 1619, and educated at Oxford, where, in February, 1642, he was created doctor of phyſic, and was ſoon after made phyſician to king Charles I. Upon the declining of the king's affairs he retired to London, where he practiſed phyſic. He wrote, 1. The Darkneſs of Atheiſm diſpelled by the Light of Nature. 2. The Errors of Phyſicians concerning Defluxions. 3. The natural Hiſtory of Nutrition, Life, and voluntary Motion. 4. Phyſico-Anatomical Diſſertations upon the Animal Œconomy. 5. Epicurus his Morals. 6. The Immortality of the human Soul demonſtrated by Reaſons natural. 7. A Treatiſe of Stonehenge, in which he endeavours to prove it a Daniſh monument; and many other works. He died in the latter end of the year 1707, in the eighty-eighth year of his age.

CHARMES, a town of Lorrain, ſeated on the Moſelle, with a very handſome bridge, eight miles eaſt of Mirecourt, and fifteen ſouth of Nancy. Long. 6. 25. E. Lat. 48. 18. N.

CHARMOIS (MARTIN DE) ſieur de Laure, an eminent encourager of the arts in France, was ſecretary to the marſhal de Schomberg, and colonel of the regiment of Swiſs guards, yet loved the arts of ſculpture and painting ſo paſſionately, that he became a great maſter of the theory of both; and could perform in the one and the other with facility, to the ſatisfaction of the beſt judges, though he was by profeſſion neither painter nor ſculptor. He had ſuch an idea of painting, that he could not endure to ſee able painters oppreſſed by the hard uſage of ſome head-maſters; and often took them from their oppreſſors, that they might with more freedom exerciſe thoſe arts, that are of all others the moſt free; and employed all his credit to deliver the art out of the languiſhing condition to which it was then reduced in France. He aſſembled the moſt ſkilful of the profeſſion, and formed a ſociety, of whom the twelve eldeſt painters were to be the governors, and himſelf the director. Thus he laid the foundation of the famous academy of painting, eſtabliſhed by Lewis XIV.

CHAROLLES, a town of Burgundy, capital of the Charolois, ſeated on the river Reconce, twenty-eight miles north-weſt of Macon. Long. 4. 8. E. Lat. 46. 25. N.

CHAROLOIS, a ſmall diſtrict in Burgundy, of which Charolles and Parcy are the only conſiderable towns.

CHARON, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Erebus and Nox, whoſe office was to ferry the ſouls of the deceaſed over the waters of Acheron, for which each ſoul was to pay a piece of money. For this reaſon the Pagans had a cuſtom of putting a piece of money into the mouth of the dead, in order that they might have ſomething to pay Charon for their paſſage.

Charon is repreſented as a ſquallid old man, meanly dreſſed, with a buſhy grey beard, and of a moroſe diſpoſition. For the origin of this fable, ſee ELYSIAN FIELDS.

CHARONDAS, a celebrated legiſlator of the Thurians, and a native of Catanea in Sicily. He forbad any perſons appearing armed in the public aſſemblies of the nation; but one day, forgetting himſelf, and going thither in haſte, without thinking of his ſword; he was no ſooner made to obſerve his miſtake, than he ran it through his body. This happened about four hundred and forty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra.

CHAROST, a town of France, in Berry, with the title of a duchy. It is ſeated on the river Arnon, thirteen miles from Bourges, and eight north-eaſt of Iſoudun. Long. 2. 15. E. Lat. 46. 56. N.

CHAROUX, a town of France, in the Bourbonnois, ſeated on an eminence, near the river Sioulle. It has two pariſhes, which are in different dioceſes. Long. 3. 15. E. Lat. 46. 10. N.

CHARPENTIER (FRANCIS) a good antiquarian and critic, and a learned writer, of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Paris, on the 15th of February, 1620. He was admitted into the French academy in 1651, and at length into that of inſcriptions and belles lettres. His principal works are, 1. The Life of Socrates. 2. A Diſcourſe on the Eſtabliſhment of a French Eaſt India Company. 3. The Excellence of the French Language, &c. He died on the 22d of April, 1702, aged eighty-two.

CHARRON (PETER) the author of a book intitled Wiſdom, which gained him great reputation, was born, at Paris, in the year 1541. After being advocate in the parliament of Paris for five or ſix years, he applied himſelf to divinity, and became ſo great a preacher, that the biſhops of ſeveral dioceſes offered him the higheſt dignities in their gift. He died at Paris, ſuddenly in the ſtreet, November 16, 1603.

CHARTIER (ALAIN). See ALAIN.

CHARTRES, a conſiderable town of France, the capital of Chartrain and Beauce, with the title of a duchy. It is ſeated on the river Eure, which divides it into two parts, the largeſt of which is built on a hill, with ſtrait ſtreets, well peopled. The cathedral church is a fine ſtructure, adorned with two ſteeples of curious workmanſhip; inſomuch that it is a common ſaying, if you would have a complete church in all parts, you muſt take the choir of that of Beauvais, the nave of Amiens, the front and great gate of Rheims, the towers of Paris, and ſteeples of Chartres. There is a repreſentation round the choir of the life and actions of our Saviour, which ſkilful ſculptors ſay is exceeding well done. Under the cathedral there is another church, that contains ſeveral chapels. Theſe being under ground, that of the Virgin Mary has a great many ſilver lamps, chandeliers, and other ſilver ornaments. Beſides the pariſh churches, there are ſeveral convents for men and women. The public walk is by the ſide of the quay, along the river Eure, where the church of St. Julian is to be ſeen, which is built on an arch over the river: this runs through beautiful meadows, which render the abbey of Jehoſaphat a charming place. It is forty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 29. E. Lat. 48. 27. N.

CHARTREUSE (GRAND) a celebrated monaſtery of France, ſeated in Dauphiny, nine miles from Grenoble. It is the capital of all the convents of this order, becauſe St. Bruno, as it is ſaid, retired to a rugged mountain near this place, called the Chartreuſe, about the year 1086. The hermitage is now in a hilly field, about three quarters of a mile long, and about two or three hundred paces broad, almoſt ſurrounded with mountains full of fir trees, which ſerve for walls to this field, at the entrance of which the abbey is erected. The abbey church is wainſcotted, and inlaid in a moſt curious manner. There are ſeveral handſome apartments for particular uſes, and the chapel where the novices make their profeſſion is very finely ornamented. From theſe apartments their is a deſcent to a large hall, adorned with ſeveral pictures, that repreſent the principal Chartreuſes of Europe. This abbey was built at different times, without without any regard to uniformity, for which reaſon you muſt always aſcend or deſcend to go from one part to another. Going from hence to the place where St. Bruno lived, you paſs along a rugged valley, ſurrounded with rocks and inacceſſible mountains, from which ſeveral ſtreams deſcend, which uniting into a rivulet, ſerve to turn ſeveral mills and machines, for the uſe of the monks. Some ſerve to hammer iron, ſome to turn grinding-ſtones, and to ſaw boards, for they are all workmen in their turns, and are conſtantly employed in enlarging the monaſtery. Others are buſied in painting, ſculpture, and engraving for the embelliſhment of the ſtructure. The chapel is at the extremity of the valley, and is full of fine paintings; and St. Bruno is ſo well repreſented before a croſs, that, at ten paces diſtance, you would take him to be a living man. The general of the order reſides in the Chartreuſe, and after he is choſen, he muſt never ſtir our. The monks are forbid to talk to each other, except on the days of Recreation. Long. 5. 48. E. Lat. 45. 20. N.

CHARYBDIS, in fabulous hiſtory, a female robber, who, ſtealing Hercules's oxen, Jupiter changed her into a whirlpool, on the coaſt of Sicily.

CHASTEAU, a town of France, in Anjou, in the dioceſe of Angers. Long. 0 23. E. Lat. 47. 40. N.

CHASTEL (John) the ſon of a woollen-draper at Paris, attempted to kill Henry IV. Dec. 27, 1594. This prince had that day returned from a journey to Paris, and was in the chamber of his miſtreſs Gabriella d' Eſtrée, and as he was going to embrace Montigni, he was ſtruck in his under lip with a knife, which broke one of his teeth. John Chaſtel, who intended to have cut his throat, was then but eighteen or nineteen years old, he had no ſooner given the blow, but he dropped his knife, and hid himſelf in the crowd. Every body ſtood amazed, being puzzled whom to charge with the villainy, and he had liked to have eſcaped, but ſomebody happened to caſt an eye upon him, and he was taken at a venture, his wild look betraying him. The king commanded the captain of his guards, who had ſeized him, to let him go, ſaying, that he pardoned him. But hearing that he was a diſciple of the Jeſuits, he cried out, "Muſt then the Jeſuits be convicted from my own "mouth?" This parricide being carried to priſon, was tried and convicted. He gloried in his crime, as a moſt meritorious act, that was to atone for his being guilty of ſodomy and other vices. He was condemned to make honourable amends before the chief door of the church of Paris, holding in his hand a lighted wax taper of two pounds weight, and there to declare, on his knees, that he had wickedly and treacherouſly attempted to commit this moſt inhuman and abominable murder; and that having been taught a falſe and damnable doctrine, he had ſaid on his trial, that it was lawful to kill the king, and that king Henry IV. now reigning, was not a member of the church, till he had obtained the pope's approbation, of which he repents, and begs pardon of God, the king, and the court. This done, he was to be carried in a tumbrel to the place of execution, and there to have the fleſh of his arms and thighs torn off with red hot pincers, and his right hand, in which he was to hold the knife with which he endeavoured to commit the murder, cut off; afterwards his body to be drawn and quartered by four horſes pulling ſeveral ways, and his members and corpſe to be thrown into the fire, and burnt to aſhes, and the aſhes thrown up into the air. This ſentence was executed Dec. 29, 1594, and by the ſame decree all the Jeſuits were baniſhed out of France. The father of Chaſtel was alſo ordered to be baniſhed, and his houſe to be pulled down to the ground. On the place where it ſtood a pillar was erected, and the decree of parliament exhibited on the four ſides of the baſe, in letters of gold. Ten years after, when the Jeſuits again got footing in France, it was pulled down.

CHASTELAIN (George) in Latin Caſtellanus, a Flemiſh gentleman, educated in the family of the duke of Burgundy. He wrote in French, 1. CHATEL (Peter du). See Castellanus.

CHATEL (Tanneguy du) a gentleman of Brittany, and one of the greateſt commanders in the fifteenth century, went into England, when it was invaded by the French, in 1404, to revenge the death of his elder brother, where he committed great ravages. He afterwards commanded in Italy the army of Lewis of Anjou, king of Sicily, and, in 1410, defeated the army of Ladiſlaus, king of Naples. At his return to France he was made chamberlain to the French king, provoſt of Paris, and marſhal of Guienne, for Lewis the dauphin of France. He was guilty of the murder of the duke of Burgundy, and the dauphin of Auvergne, the laſt of whom he killed in the king's preſence, and in full council, for which he was obliged to retire from court. He died in Provence in 1449.

He ought not to be confounded with Tonneguy du Chatel, his nephew, viſcount of Belliere, who was in great credit with the French kings Charles VII. and Lewis XI. and was killed at the ſiege of Bouchain, in 1477.

Chatel (John). See Chastel.

Chatel Chalon, a town of France, in the FrancheCompté, remarkable for the abbey of Benedictine monks. Long. 5. 25. E. Lat 46. 50. N.

CHATELET (Paul Hay, lord of) a gentleman of an antient family in Brittany, and one of the forty of the French Academy, was advocate-general to the parliament of Rennes, and afterwards maſter of the requeſts and counſellor of ſtate. The court entruſted him with ſeveral important commiſſions, but refuſing to be one of the judges at the trial of the marſhal de Marillac, he was put in priſon, but was ſoon after releaſed. He wrote ſeveral works, both in verſe and and proſe, and died on the 6th of April, 1636, aged forty-three.

CHATELET (GABRIELLA AMELIA DE BRETEUIL, marchioneſs du) eſteemed by the French the honour of her ſex and of this age, was born in 1706. From her tender youth ſhe was fond of reading good authors in ſeveral languages. Taſſo and Milton were as familiar to her as Virgil, and never was ear more ſenſible of the harmony of numbers. She was endowed with ſingular eloquence, yet her mind had a particular turn for the moſt abſtract ſciences, and ſhe gave up herſelf entirely to the ſtudy of mathematics. Among her works, the firſt ſhe publiſhed was an explication of Leibnitz's Philoſophy, under the title of Inſtitutions de Phyſique, octavo; the preliminary diſcourſe to which is a maſter-piece of reaſon and eloquence. She afterwards publiſhed a Treatiſe on the Nature of Fire, octavo; and a Tranſlation from the Latin, and a Commentary on Newton's Philoſophy, under the title Principes Mathematique de la Philoſophie naturelle; and this is eſteemed her maſter-piece. She died in 1749, at forty-three years of age.

CHATELLERAUT, a town of France, in Poitou, with the title of a duchy, has a very agreeable ſituation on the river Vienne, over which there is a handſome bridge. It is twenty-three miles north-weſt of Poitiers, thirty-five from Tours, and one hundred and ſixty-eight ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 38. E. Lat. 46. 34. N.

CHATHAM, a ſea-port town of Kent, joining to Rocheſter, and ſeated on the river Medway. It is the principal ſtation of the royal navy, and is furniſhed with ſtores ſufficient to fit out the largeſt fleet. The mouth of the river is defended by the fort at Sheerneſs, and other ſtrong places; beſides, Chatham itſelf is ſtrongly fortified, ſo that the royal navy is in no danger of an inſult either by land or water. It principally conſiſts of one ſtreet, near three miles in length, and contains about three thouſand inhabitants. It has a church, a chapel of eaſe, and a ſhip uſed for a church by ſailors. The rope houſes and the repoſitories of all ſorts of naval ſtores are in the dock yard, as are alſo the commiſſioner's houſe, and thoſe of all the other officers, which are beautiful modern buildings. Upon an eminence adjoining to the dock yard is a new and regular village, called Brompton, chiefly inhabited by ſhip-wrights and artificers, employed in the dock and navy. Near the church is a handſome ſtructure, commonly called the hill-houſe, which is the pay-office; and the office of ordnance is alſo near the church, where there are large and commodious ſtore-houſes and wharfs, for the reception of guns, and other artillery belonging to the men of war, which are here laid up, and preſerved in a moſt exact and regular order. There is likewiſe a fine and large workhouſe for maintaining and employing the poor; as alſo two ancient hoſpitals, formerly deſigned for the reception of perſons afflicted with the leproſy, and for the aged and maimed mariners and ſhip-wrights. Between Chatham and Rocheſter is the victualling-office, a large and commodious building, deſigned for victualling the ſhips in the harbour. Chatham has a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, May 15, and September 19, for horſes, bullocks, and all ſorts of commodities. It is ſixteen miles north-north weſt of Canterbury; forty-one on the ſame point from Dover, and thirty eaſt-ſouth-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 30. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

CHATILLON (GAUCHER, lord of) accompanied king Philip Auguſtus in his expedition to the Holy Land, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Acre, in 1191. At his return he was made ſeneſchal of Burgundy, and butler of Champagne. He was with the French king at the conqueſt of Normandy, in 1203 and 1204, and at length took the title of count of St. Paul, his wife being heireſs to that earldom. He followed the count of Montfort into Languedoc, againſt the Albigenſes; had the command of the French army in Flanders; took Tournay; gave proofs of his courage at the battle of Bouvines, in 1214; marched againſt the Albigenſes in 1219, and died the ſame year.

CHATILLON (ODET DE). See COLIGNY.

CHATILLON, a poet. See CASTIGLIONI.

CHAUCER (GEOFFREY) the father of Engliſh poetry, and the moſt eminent of the Engliſh poets of his time, was born in the year 1328, and educated at Cambridge, from whence he removed, to complete his ſtudies at Oxford. He afterwards travelled, and at his return entered himſelf in the Inner Temple, where he ſtudied the municipal laws of England. Being taken notice of at court, he became ſucceſſively page to king Edward III. gentleman of the privy council, and ſhield-bearer to the king, who alſo granted him ſeveral other favours, by which means he became exceeding rich, having almoſt one thouſand pounds per annum, a vaſt eſtate for thoſe times. He ſided with the duke of Lancaſter, who had been the chief inſtrument of his riſe, and eſpouſed the party of Wickliffe, when ſome commotions being raiſed in the city of London, he was obliged to fly to Hainault, whence his neceſſities forced him to return to England, where he was ſeized by the king's order, and impriſoned: but at laſt he made a frank confeſſion of the whole affair, which, though it expoſed him to the reſentment of the people, procured his pardon. He did not for ſome time recover the ſhock which this gave him; and his circumſtances being reduced to the loweſt degree of poverty, and his intereſt at court ruined, he retired to Woodſtock, to enjoy the calm pleaſures of a ſtudious ſafety; but the duke of Lancaſter at laſt ſurmounting his troubles, and marrying Chaucer's wife's ſiſter, our poet's ſon became allied to moſt of the nobility, and to ſeveral of the kings of England. And now the ſun began again to ſhine upon him with an evening ray; for he had ſome grants conferred upon him by the king, but was deprived of them again at the Revolution in favour of Henry IV. ſon of the duke of Lancaſter; but while he was endeavouring to recover freſh grants, he died, on the 25th of October, 1400. That general applauſe with which his writings were received in his life time, and the high honours that were paid him after his death, have ſtamped ſuch a mark of authority upon his works, as has ſaved the greateſt part of them from that oblivion which has covered the performances of the reſt of the moſt celebrated authors of his time. The moſt admired of his poems are, his Knight's Tale, and his Canterbury Tales.

CHAVEZ, or CHIAVEZ, a ſtrong town of Portugal, and capital of the province Tra-los-Montes. It is well fortified, and incloſed with a double wall, has a caſtle within the town, and a fort without. It has always a conſiderable garriſon, and is the place of reſidence of the governor and treaſurer general. It has a great many ancient monuments, particularly a pillar with the names of all the towns of note in the province. It is ſeated at the foot of the mountains, thirty-eight miles weſt of Braganza. Long. 7. 10. W. Lat. 41. 45. N.

CHAUL, a town of the Eaſt Indies, on the coaſt of Malabar, in the province of Blagana, and kingdom of Viſapour. Its river affords a good harbour for ſmall veſſels. The town is fortified, and ſo is the iſland on the ſouth ſide of the harbour. It had formerly a good trade, but is now miſerably poor. It was taken by the Portugueſe in 1507, to whom it ſtill belongs. It is fifteen miles ſouth of Bombay, and five miles from the ſea. Long. 72. 45. E. Lat. 18. 30. N.

CHAULIEU (WILLIAM AMFRYE DE) abbé d'Aumale, and one of the moſt polite and ingenious of the French poets, was born in 1639, and died at Paris, on the 27th of June, 1720, aged eighty-four. The moſt complete edition of his poems, is that printed in two volumes, octavo, in 1733.

CHAUMONT, a town of France, in Champagne, and in the diſtrict of Baſſigni, of which it is the capital. It is ſeated on a mountain near the river Marne, eighteen miles ſouth of Joinville, fifty-three ſouth-eaſt of Troyes, and one hundred and forty-two ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 15. E. Lat. 48. 6. N.

CHAUNY, a town of France, in Picardy, ſeated on the river Oiſe, twenty-miles eaſt of Noyon, and ſixty-eight north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 17. E. Lat. 49. 37. N.

CHAUVEAU (FRANCIS) an able engraver, who particularly excelled in deſigning. He died in 1674.

CHAUVIN (STEPHEN) a celebrated miniſter of the reformed religion, born at Niſmes, left France at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and retired to Rotterdam, where he began a new Journal des Sçavans, and afterwards removing to Berlin, continued it there three years. He met with a good reception at Berlin, where he was made profeſſor of philoſophy, and diſcharged that office with much honour and reputation. His principal work is a Philoſophical phical Dictionary, in Latin, which he publiſhed at Rotterdam, in 1692; and gave a new edition of it, much augmented, at Leuwarden, in 1713, folio. He died in 1725, at eighty-five years of age.

CHAZELLES (John Matthew de) a learned mathematician, born at Lyons, on the 24th of July, 1657. He at length became profeſſor of hydrography, at Marſeilles, and was the firſt who thought it poſſible to manage gallies upon the Ocean; which ſucceeded. He was afterwards engineer of the French fleets, and travelled into Greece and Egypt. It was he who meaſured the pyramids, and found that the four ſides of the largeſt of them were exactly expoſed to the four cardinal points of the heavens. He became a member of the academy of ſciences at Paris, in 1695, and died at Marſeilles, on the 6th of January, 1710. He wrote a many obſervations that are of very great uſe, eſpecially in geography.

CHEADLE, a town in Staffordſhire, with a market on Saturdays. The fairs are on Holy Thurſday, for horned cattle; and Auguſt 21, for horſes and horned cattle. It is ſeated in the moſt fruitful part of the moor lands; however, it is but a poor place, and the market is ſmall. It is ſixteen miles north-by-eaſt of Stafford, fourteen eaſt of Newcaſtle, and one hundred and forty-five north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 0. W. Lat. 53. 2. N.

CHEASAPEAK Bay, in North America. The entrance is between Cape Henry and Cape Charles, and it runs up three hundred miles between Virginia and Maryland. It is navigable almoſt all the way for large ſhips, and has ſeveral navigable rivers which fall into it; by means of which, ſhips go up to the very doors of the planters to take in their lading of tobacco, and other goods.

CHEBRECHIN, a town of Poland, in the province of Ruſſia and Palatinate, of Belſkow. It is ſeated on the declivity of a hill, and the river Wierpi waters its walls, and afterwards falls into the river Bog. The Jews there are very rich. This province produces a great deal of wax. This town is fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Tourobin. Long. 23. 51. E. Lat. 50. 35. N.

CHEDERLES, among the Turks, is the ſame with St. George among the Chriſtians. He was a great hero, who ſlew a furious dragon, and delivered a maid expoſed to that imaginary creature. They add, that after having wandered a long time in unknown countries, he at length arrived at the banks of a river, the water whereof rendered thoſe who drank of it immortal: that this river is perpetually covered with thick darkneſs, and that it has been ſeen by nobody ſince Chederles. Both the hero and his horſe being become immortal, by drinking of the water of that river; they add, that he ranges through the world, loves battles, and aſſiſts the warriors who have the juſteſt cauſe, of whatever religion they are of.

CHEDORLAOMER, king of Elam, and one of the firſt conquerors, reigned about the one thouſand nine hundred and twenty-fifth years before the Chriſtian æra. He ſubdued the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Bela, who ſerved him twelve years. At length, Bera, king of Sodom, with four other kings, rebelled; on which he marched againſt them, defeated them, and took a great number of priſoners, among whom was Lot, the nephew of Abraham; but that patriarch attacking Chedorlaomer by ſurprize, defeated and ſlew him; reſcued Lot, and took all the ſpoils.

CHEGFORD, a town of Devonſhire, which had formerly a market, now diſuſed; but it has four fairs, viz. on March 25, May 4, September 29, and October 29, for cattle. It has at preſent no more than eighty houſes; however the church is a handſome ſtructure, and contains two or three fine tombs. It is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Exeter, and one hundred and eighty-ſeven weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 3. 57. E. Lat. 50. 40. N.

CHEKE (Sir John) a learned and ingenious writer in the ſixteenth century, was born at Cambridge, June 16, 1514, and educated in that univerſity, of which he was afterwards choſen Greek lecturer and Greek orator. In 1544 he was ſent for to court, and made tutor for the Latin tongue, jointly with Sir Anthony Cooke, to prince Edward. When that prince came to the throne he was elected provoſt of King's college, Cambridge, and in 1550, chief gentleman of the king's privy-chamber. In 1551 his majeſty conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and the next year he was made chamberlain of the exchequer for life. In 1553 he was conſtituted clerk of the council, and ſoon after one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. He was afterwards ſecretary to lady Jane Grey; but upon queen Mary's acceſſion to the throne he was committed to the Tower, and ſtripped of almoſt his whole ſubſiſtence, however, the year following he obtained the queen's pardon, with leave to travel; but his behaviour abroad offending the popiſh zealots in England, he was way-laid between Bruſſels and Antwerp, blindfolded, bound, and thrown into a waggon, then conveyed to the neareſt harbour, put on board a ſhip under hatches, and brought to the Tower of London, where he was committed cloſe priſoner, and being reduced to the dreadful alternative, either to embrace popery or burn, he ſunk under the trial, and made a public recantation; but his remorſe ſat ſo heavy upon his mind, that he pined away, and died September 13, 1557, aged forty-three. He wrote 1. A Latin Tranſlation of ſeveral of St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies, and of the Engliſh Communion Book. 2. The Hurt of Sedition to a Commonwealth. 3. De Pronuntiatione Græcæ; and ſeveral other works.

CHELM, a town of Red Ruſſia, in Poland, capital of the palatinate of Chelm. It has a wooden citadel, and a Greek biſhop. It has been often ravaged by the Muſcovites and Tartars, which has rendered it a poor place. It is ſixty five miles ſouth-eaſt of Warſaw. Long. 23. 29. E. Lat. 51. 10. N.

CHELMSFORD, the county town of Eſſex, with a good corn market on Fridays. It is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Can and Chelm, over which it has a bridge. The aſſizes and county ſeſſions are held here, and it ſends two members to parliament. The fairs are May 12, and November 12, for cattle. It is twenty-two miles weſt-ſouth-weſt of Colcheſter, forty-three ſouth-eaſt-by-ſouth of St. Edmund's Bury; twenty-ſeven ſouth-eaſt by-ſouth of Saffron-Walden; twenty three north eaſt of Graveſend, and twenty-nine eaſt north-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 20. E. Lat. 51. 40 N.

CHELONIS, daughter of Leonidas, and wife of Cleombrotus, king of Lacedæmon, rendered herſelf famous by her virtue and magnanimity on the following occaſions. There aroſe at Lacedæmon ſuch a formidable faction againſt Leonidas, in behalf of Cleombrotus, that the former was obliged to take ſanctuary in a temple, and the latter was raiſed to the throne. Chelonis was ſo far from taking a ſhare in her huſband's good fortune, that ſhe retired to the ſame temple with her father, where they both appeared in the mortified poſture uſual to thoſe who fled to ſuch ſanctuaries. Leonidas was, ſome time after, permitted to retire to Tegea, whither Chelonis, his inſeparable companion in his misfortunes, followed him. At length Cleombrotus was, in his turn, forced to take ſanctuary in a temple, and Leonidas was reſtored to the throne; but then Chelonis left her father, and went to meet her huſband. Leonidas went with an armed force to the ſanctuary where his ſon-in-law had ſheltered himſelf, and with paſſionate heat upbraided him with the injuries he had received from him; with the loſs of his crown, and his baniſhment. Cleombrotus had nothing to anſwer; but his ſpouſe did it for him, and ſpoke in ſuch moving terms, proteſting at the ſame time that ſhe would die before her huſband, if her prayers and tears proved unſucceſsful, that ſhe ſaved his life, and obtained leave for him to go to ſuch place as he ſhould chuſe; and then, notwithſtanding the intreaties of the king her father, went with her huſband into baniſhment.

CHELSEA, a fine village of Middleſex, ſeated on the river Thames, a mile weſt of Weſtminſter. It has a magnificent hoſpital for ſuperannuated and diſabled ſoldiers, accommodated with all the neceſſary offices, and adorned with ſpacious walks and gardens. Ranelagh-houſe and gardens have been much reſorted to in the ſummer ſeaſon by the beau monde, and was once the rivals of Vauxhall.

CHELTENHAM, a town in Glouceſterſhire, with a market on Thurſday. It is in the road from Glouceſter to Winchcomb, and has been much frequented on account of its medicinal waters, which are thought to be of the ſame nature as thoſe at Scarborough. The fairs are the ſecond Thurſday in April for all ſorts of cattle; on Holy Thurſday for the ſame; and Auguſt 5, for lambs. It is nine miles north-eaſt of Glouceſter; thirty-eight ſouth-weſt of Warwick, and one hundred weſt-by-north of London. Long. 2. 8. W. Lat. 51. 40. N.

CHEMINAIS (Timoleon) a very famous preacher among the Jeſuits, born at Paris on the third of January, 1652. He acquired great reputation, and died on the 15th of September, 1689, aged thirty-nine. He was the author of three volumes of Sermons, and a work intitled Pious Sentiments.

CHEMNITZ (Martin) in Latin Chemnitius, a famous Lutheran divine, the diſciple of Melancthon, was born at Britzen, in Brandenburg, in 1522, and was employed in ſeveral important negociations by the princes of the ſame communion. He died on the 8th of April 1589, aged ſixty-four. His principal work is The Examen of the Council of Trent, in Latin.

CHENCHRIUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of the nymph Pryene, who during the chaſe was accidentally ſhot by Diana. On which his mother bewailed him ſo much that ſhe was turned into a fountain.

CHENSI, or Shensi, a province in China, contains eight cities of the firſt rank, and one hundred and ſix of the ſecond cond and third, beſides forts on the great wall, cloſe to which it lies. The air is temperate, and the inhabitants civil to ſtrangers. The overflowing of the rivers render it fruitful, and yet it yields but little rice. They ſay there are gold mines, which are not permitted to be opened. However there are great quantities of rhubarb, honey, wax, muſk, cinnabar, coal-mines, and a ſoft ſtone, of which they make veſſels, ſuppoſed to be an antidote againſt poiſon. Stags and deer are very numerous, as well as bears, wild bulls, and an animal reſembling a tyger, with a curious ſpotted ſkin. The muſk goat or deer is likewiſe in this province; and a creature with a woolly coat, and a very long tail, the fleſh of which is ſaid to be very good. Their bats are as large as hens, and are eaten by the Chineſe. The bird called the golden fowl is very beautiful. The inhabitants make a ſtuff of wool and goat's hair, which is converted into ſhirts for winter. There is a great variety of fine flowers, for which we want names. In the diſtrict of Yenngan there are mountains which yield petroleum, which they burn in lamps: as alſo ſable ſkins, and other furs, with marble of all ſorts. The diſtrict of Tong-tſiang is well cultivated, and well watered with rivers and brooks. Han-tchong is ſurrounded with high mountains and foreſts, which ſerve as bulwarks. There is a way to this city, which one hundred thouſand men were employed in making. They levelled ſome mountains, and made bridges between others, erecting pillars in the vallies to ſupport them. The other principal cities are not worth mentioning, for they are all built in the ſame manner, and therefore have ſcarcely any thing that diſtinguiſhes one from another, except the ſituation, as will be ſeen under the article of China.

CHEPSTOW, a town in Monmouthſhire, with a market on Saturdays for corn and hogs. It is ſeated in a bottom, on the river Wye, near its confluence with the Severn, and was formerly walled, and had a ſtrong caſtle, erected on a high rock by the ſide of the river Wye, a great part of which is yet ſtanding. There is a bridge over the river, where the tide riſes ſix fathoms, and to which ſhips may come. It is now much decayed from what it formerly was. The fairs are Friday in Witſun week, for horned cattle; Saturday before June 20, for wool; Auguſt 1, and the Friday ſevennight after St. Luke's day, and October 18, for horned cattle. It is eighteen miles north of Briſtol; fourteen ſouth of Monmouth; eighty-ſeven ſouth of Shrewſbury, and one hundred and thirty-two weſt-by-north of London. Long. 2. 36. W. Lat. 51. 40. N.

CHERASCO, a ſtrong town of Italy, the capital of a territory of the ſame name, with a ſtrong citadel, and is ſubject to the king of Sardinia. It is ſeated on a mountain, near the confluence of the rivers Sture and Tanaro, eighteen miles north-eaſt of Coni; twenty-three ſouth-eaſt of Turin, and twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Pignerol. Long. 7. 55. E. Lat. 44. 35. N.

CHERBOURG, a maritime town of France in Normandy, with a harbour, and an abbey of the Auguſtine order. It is thirty-eight miles north of Coutances, and one hundred and eighty-eight north-weſt of Paris. Near this place the confederate fleet, commanded by admiral Ruſſel, obtained a victory over that of the French, and burnt twenty of their men of war. Long. 1. 40. W. Lat. 49. 38. N.

CHERESOUL, CHIRASOUL, or SHAHRZUL, the capital of Curdiſtan, in Aſiatic Turky, is ſeated on the river Capros, over which there is a ſtone bridge of nineteen arches. It is the reſidence of a Turkiſh beglerbeg, who has twenty ſangiacks under his juriſdiction; and has ſomewhat very ſingular in its ſtructure, for all the houſes are cut out of a rock. Some of theſe have twenty ſteps up to the doors, which are nothing elſe but a ſtone like a mill-ſtone, moved backwards and forwards to open or ſhut up the entrance. Below the houſes are other rooms like cellars, likewiſe cut into the rock, which ſerve to houſe their cattle. It is one hundred and fifty miles north of Bagdat. Long. 45. 15. E. Lat. 36. N.

CHERILUS, a celebrated Greek poet, born at Samos, was the friend of Herodotus. He wrote a poem on the victory the Athenians obtained over Xerxes; which the Athenians ſo much admired, that they gave him a piece of gold for every line; and ordered that his poems ſhould be recited with thoſe of Homer. The fragments that remain of this poet are extremely beautiful, and make us regret the loſs of his works.

CHERON (ELIZABETH SOPHIA) a lady celebrated for her ſkill in muſic, poetry, and painting, was the daughter of Henry Cheron, a painter, and was born at Paris. She was educated in the proteſtant religion, which was that of her father; but at laſt embraced the doctrines of popery. M. Le Brun cauſed her to be made a member of the royal academy of painting and ſculpture. She learnt Hebrew, that ſhe might the better enter into the ſenſe of the Pſalms and Canticles, a tranſlation of which ſhe afterwards publiſhed in French verſe, in two volumes, octavo, adorned with plates; and ſhe alſo publiſhed ſeveral other pieces of poetry. She married M. le Hay, the French king's engineer, and died at Paris, on the 3d of September, 1711, aged ſixty-three.

CHERON (LOUIS) a painter, in the reign of king William, was born at Paris, in 1660, and was the ſon of Henry Cheron, an enamel painter, and brother of the above Elizabeth Sophia Cheron. After viſiting Italy, he came to England, on account of his religion, in 1695, and was employed at the duke of Montague's, at Boughton, at Burleigh, and at Chatſworth, where he painted the ſides of the gallery. He had before fallen into diſeſteem, when he painted at Montague-houſe, where he was much ſurpaſſed by Baptiſt, Rouſſeau, and La Foſſe; on which he turned to painting ſmall hiſtories; but his beſt employment was deſigning for the painters and engravers, and few books appeared at that time, with plates, but from his drawings. He alſo etched ſeveral of his own deſigns. Some time before his death he ſold his drawings from Raphael, and his academic figures, to the earl of Derby, for a large ſum. He was a man of a fair character, and died of an apoplexy, in 1713.

CHERSO, an iſland in the gulph of Venice, with a town of the ſame name, near Croatia. It belongs to the Venetians. The air is good, and the country, though ſtony, produces cattle, wine, oil, and excellent honey. Long. 15. 10. E. Lat. 44. 8. N.

CHERTSEY, a town in Surry, with a market on Wedneſdays. Its fairs are on the firſt Monday in Lent, for horſes, cattle, and hops; May 14, for horſes and cattle; Auguſt 6, and September 25, for horſes, cattle, and hogs. It is ſeated in a moiſt ſoil, not far from the river Thames, over which there is a bridge, and there was formerly a ſmall monaſtery near it, where Henry VI. was interred; but afterwards removed to Windſor. It is ten miles weſt of Kingſton, thirteen north-by-eaſt of Guilford, and twenty-two weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 0. 20. W. Lat. 51. 25. N.

CHERWEL, a river that has its ſource in Northamptonſhire, and running ſouth from thence, paſſes by Banbury, through Oxfordſhire, to the city of Oxford, where it falls into the Iſis.

CHERZ, a town of Poland, in Maſova, fifteen miles from Warſaw. Long. 21. 43. E. Lat. 51. 58. N.

CHESEAUX (JOHN PHILIP DE LOYS DE) member of the academies of ſciences of Paris and Gottingen, and of the Royal Society of London, was one of the moſt able philoſophers, and moſt learned men of the eighteenth century. He was born at Lauſanne, in 1718, and was the grandſon of the celebrated Crouſaz. At ſeventeen years of age he compoſed a Treatiſe on the Force of Gun-powder, and another on the Motion of the Air in the Propagation of Sounds. In the year 1744 he publiſhed Obſervations on the Comet which appeared in the preceding year. In 1747 and 1748 he compoſed for a young nobleman The Elements of Coſmography and Aſtronomy, which are maſterpieces with reſpect to clearneſs and preciſion. A ſhort time before his death, which happened at Paris, in 1751, he publiſhed in octavo, Critical Diſſertations on the prophetical Parts of the Holy Scriptures. He left ſeveral manuſcripts on various ſubjects, which have not yet been printed.

CHESHAM, a town in Buckinghamſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. It has three fairs, held on April 21, July 22, and September 28, for cattle. It is twelve miles north-by-eaſt of Maidenhead, thirty-three ſouth-eaſt of Buckingham, and twenty-nine weſt-by-north of London. Long. 0. 34. W. Lat. 51. 36. N.

CHESHIRE, is bounded on the north by Lancaſhire, from which it is parted by the river Merſey; on the north-eaſt corner by Yorkſhire, on the eaſt by Staffordſhire and Derbyſhire, on the ſouth by Shropſhire and the river Dee, on the weſt by Denbighſhire and Flintſhire, and on the north-weſt by St. George's Channel, where it forms a kind of peninſula. It is forty-five miles in length, and twenty-five in breadth, containing eleven market towns, beſides Cheſter; one hundred and twenty-five pariſhes and villages, whereof eighty-ſeven only have churches; the reſt are chapelries. The market-towns are Nantwich, Middlewich, Northwich, Macclesfield, Congleton, Frodſham, Stockport, Sandbich, Altringham, Malpas, and Knotsford. It is a county palatine, and ſtill enjoys ſome of its ancient privileges, it having the palatine courts for the adminiſtration of juſtice kept at Cheſter. It ſends four members to parliament, two for the county, and two for the city. The rivers are the Dee, which riſing from two fountains in North Wales, firſt runs eaſt, and then north to Cheſter, where it is two miles over at the quay, and from thence proceeds to the ſea. The Weaver riſes in Shropſhire, and running a courſe from ſouth to north, about eighteen miles, miles, makes an angle at Northwich, and then turns weſtward, and falls in the æſtuary of Merſey. The Merſey, as obſerved above, is the northern boundary of the county, and falls into the ſea. The Dee abounds with ſalmon and trouts.

The air of this county is healthy, and the country level, except on the borders of Staffordſhire and Derbyſhire, where it is hilly. The moſt remarkable woods are thoſe near Delamere and Macclesfield. The ſoil is generally fruitful, and the farmers keep it in heart by manuring it with marl, of which they have two ſorts, white and red. The vaſt quantity of cheeſe made in this county, is a proof that there is a great deal of paſture land, wherein they keep their cows. The moſſy parts ſupply the inhabitants with turf for firing, and in digging for this they find fir-trees, which being ſplit into ſplinters, ſerve the poor people inſtead of candles. There are likewiſe meres, lakes, and pools, in which there are carp, tench, bream, eels, &c.

The chief commodities are cheeſe, ſalt, and mill-ſtones. The ſalt is made from the water of ſalt ſprings, at the Wiches. About Stockport is found the ſtone called the belemnites, or thunderbolt, and at Wiral, ox-eyes, thus named from their being of that ſhape.

CHESNE (Andrew du) a French hiſtorian, and one of the moſt learned men in the ſeventeenth century, was born in 1584. He wrote, 1. A Hiſtory of the Popes. 2. An Hiſtory of England. 3. An Enquiry into the Antiquities of the Towns of France. 4. An Hiſtory of the Cardinals. 5. A Bibliotheca of the Authors who have written the Hiſtory and Topography of France, &c. He was cruſhed to death by a cart, in going from Paris to his country-houſe at Verriere, on the 30th of March, 1640, aged fifty-four.

Chesne (Joseph du) in Latin, Quercetus, ſieur de la Violette, counſellor and phyſician to the French king, was the ſon of the former, and became famous for his ſkill in chemiſtry. He wrote, in Latin, 1. An Apology for the Chemiſts; and in French, 2. A Treatiſe on the Manner of healing Wounds made by an Arquebus; and other works. He died at Paris, in the year 1609.

CHESTER, the capital city of the county of the ſame name, is of a quadrangular form, and is ſurrounded with a wall, with four gates towards the four cardinal points. It is in compaſs, excluding the ſuburbs, about two miles, and contains nine pariſh churches, beſides the cathedral. The caſtle ſtands on the ſouth ſide of the city, on a riſing ground, and is a noble and ſtately building, having a tower bearing the name of Julius Cæſar, and a hall where the palatine court and aſſizes are kept, twice a year, with commodious rooms for the reception and lodging of the judges of aſſize; as alſo a convenient hall for the princes exchequer court, a priſon for the county, an office for the prothonotory, with rooms for keeping records, and for the officers and ſervants. The principal ſtreets are adorned with piazzas, or rows, as the inhabitants call them, under which there are ſhops, and through which one may walk dry in rainy weather. The city is governed by a mayor, two ſheriffs, twenty-four aldermen, a town clerk, &c. and ſends two members to parliament. It has a handſome waterhouſe by the bridge, which helps to ſupply the city with water, and two markets, on Wedneſdays and Saturdays. It has three fairs, one on the laſt Thurſday in February, for cattle; and the other two on July 5, and October 10, for Iriſh linen cloth, hardware, drapery goods, Manchester manufactures, hops, and cattle. This laſt is frequented by tradeſmen from London and Dublin. This city and Holyhead are the two great thoroughfares for Ireland. It is one hundred and eighty-two miles north-weſt from London, one hundred and ſeven weſt-ſouth-weſt from York, and one hundred and forty-five north from Briſtol. Long. 3. 0. W. Lat. 53. 11. N.

Chester, a town of North America, in Penſylvania, the capital of the county of Cheſter. It is ſeated on the river Delaware, where it is three miles over, and has a good harbour, which will admit veſſels of any burthen. There are about one hundred houſes, with a court-houſe and a priſon; as alſo a church dedicated to St. Paul, where the ſervice of the church of England is performed. Long. 74. 7. W. Lat. 40. 15. N.

CHESTERFIELD, a town of Derbyſhire, with a market on Saturdays; is pleaſantly ſeated between two rivulets, the Ibber and the Rother, on the ſouth ſide of a hill, in a fertile ſoil. It is governed by a mayor and aldermen. It has ſeven fairs; thoſe on January 25, February 28, April 3, May 4, and July 4, are for cattle, horſes, and pedlars ware. That on September 25, is for cheeſe, onions, and pedlars ware; and that on November 25, is for cattle, ſheep, and pedlars ware. The houſes are chiefly built with rough ſtone, and covered with ſlate. It has a large handſome church, in which are ſeveral monuments; a free-ſchool for the education of youth, and alms-houſes for the relief of the poor. It had formerly two markets; but that on Tueſdays is diſuſed, and the market on Saturdays is conſiderable for corn, lead, and all country commodities. It is twenty-four miles north of Derby, forty-ſix ſouth-eaſt of Mancheſter, and one hundred and forty-ſeven north-north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 25. W. Lat. 53. 20. N.

CHEVILLIER (Andrew) a learned doctor, and librarian of the Sorbonne, was born at Pontoiſe, in 1636. It is remarkable that his piety was equal to his learning; and that he was ſo charitable, that he robbed himſelf to cloathe the poor, and frequently ſold his books to aſſiſt them. He died on the 8th of April, 1700, aged ſixty-four. He wrote, 1. The Origin of Printing at Paris, in quarto. 2. A Latin Diſſertation on the Council of Chalcedon; and other works.

CHEVREAU (Urban) a learned writer, born at Lundun, on the 20th of April, 1613. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his youth by his knowledge of the belles lettres, and became ſecretary of ſtate to queen Chriſtina, of Sweden. Several German princes invited him to their courts, and Charles Lewis, the elector palatine, retained him under the title of counſellor. After the death of that prince he returned to France, and became preceptor to the duke of Maine. At length, retiring to Lundun, he died there, on the 15th of February, 1701, aged eighty-eight. He was the author of ſeveral books, and amongſt others, of an Univerſal Hiſtory, which has been often reprinted.

CHIABRERA (Gabriel) one of the moſt fruitful and ingenious of the Italian poets, juſtly eſteemed the Pindar of Italy, was born at Savona, on the 18th of June, 1552, and went to ſtudy at Rome. The Italian princes, and Urban VIII. gave him public marks of their eſteem. He wrote a great number of poems; his lyric verſes are moſt admired. He died at Savona, on the 14th of October, 1638, in the eighty-ſeventh year of his age.

CHIAMETLAN, a maritime province of Mexico, in North America, with a town of the ſame name. The ſoil is fruitful, and there are ſilver mines, and a conſiderable quantity of honey and wax. St. Sebaſtian is the capital.

CHIAPA, a province of the audience of Guatimala, in North America; is between thoſe of Guaxapa, Tobaſco, Jucatan, Vera Paz, and Soconuſco. It is inhabited by three tribes of Indians, who live a-part. The Spaniards look upon it as the pooreſt province in all North America, becauſe there are no mines of ſilver nor gold. However, it abounds in all things neceſſary for life, as fruit, cattle, and game, as well as gums, balſams, and a great variety of uſeful trees. Some of the ſnakes are curiouſly ſtreaked with red, black, and white, and are twenty feet long. There is alſo a curious green bird, with a long tail, which is much valued by the Indians on that account. Some authors ſay there are lions, but we can affirm from the beſt authority that there is no ſuch beaſt in all America. The river Grialva, which croſſes it, ſupplies the inhabitants with a great number of fiſh. There are alſo ſugar, cocoa-nuts, tobacco, cotton, ſilk, and cochineal. The Indians have a great many towns and villages, and the chief towns are the Spaniſh Chiapa, and the Indian Chiapa.

Chiapa el Real, or Spaniſh Chiapa, is a town of Mexico, in a province of the ſame name. It is but ſmall, and yet has ſeveral convents of men and women. It is a biſhop's ſee, and the ſeat of the governor. The trade conſiſts in cocoa, cotton, and ſugar. All the inhabitants pretend to be gentlemen, but their manners by no means correſpond with their pretended extraction. Long. 98. 35. W. Lat. 16. 20. N.

Chiapa de los Indios, or Indian Chiapa, is a large town, ſeated on the river Grialva, or Pabaſco, which is as broad here as the Thames at London. It is the largeſt town the Indians have in Mexico, and the moſt civilized, they having had privileges conferred on them, and exemptions from ſlavery. They have the power of chuſing their own magiſtrates, and their governor may wear a ſword. They are a ſort of Chriſtians, and in conſequence of that have churches and cloyſters. Some reckon four thouſand families of Indians. They have a great many boats in the river, whereon they often act ſea-fights and ſieges. In and about the town they have often bull-baiting, horſe-races, Spaniſh dancing, muſic, and plays: and when they have a mind to feaſt, they call in the prieſt and friars, and think they cannot ſpend too much upon them. In the neighbourhood there are many farms, well ſtocked with cattle, and plantations of ſugar. The days here are exceeding hot, but the evenings are cool, and then they walk in the gardens, and by the river ſide. All ſorts of European cattle breed in theſe parts to admiration. The Indians here are the beſt mechanics of all America. Long. 98. 5. W. Lat. 15. 6. N.

CHIARENZA, a port town, ſeated on the north-weſt coaſt of the Morea, oppoſite the iſland of Zant, in the Mediterranean, ſubject to the Turks. It was ruined in the laſt wars. Long. 21. 15. E. Lat. 37. 35. N.

CHIARI (Joseph) a celebrated painter, born at Rome, in 1654, was the diſciple of Carlo Maratti, and adorned the churches and palaces of Rome with a great number of fine paintings. He died of an apoplexy in that city, in 1727, at ſeventy-three years of age.

Chiari, a town of Italy, in the province of Breſcia, and territory of Venice, ſeven miles weſt of Breſcia, and twenty-ſeven eaſt of Milan Here the Imperialiſts gained a victory over the French, in 1701. Long. 18. 18. E. Lat. 45. 30. N.

CHIAVENNA, a territory, or county of Swiſſerland, ſubject to the Griſons. It is bounded on the weſt and north by the League of the Griſons, and by Cadea; on the eaſt by the Valteline, and on the ſouth by the Milaneſe, and is divided into three diſtricts, of which Chiavenna is the firſt. This is an ancient and handſome town, ſeated on the banks of the river Maira, at the foot of the mountains, in a plain full of excellent vineyards. The air is ſoft and pure, except when the ſouth wind blows, which paſſes over the lake Comos, and loads the air with moiſt, groſs, unhealthy vapours. It is populous, well-built, and has ſeveral handſome houſes. It is adorned with ſeveral churches, a palace for the governor, and a fine cuſtom-houſe. Formerly it had ſtrong walls, which have been ruined long ſince. There was likewiſe a ſtrong fortreſs, which has been demoliſhed by the Griſons, with all the reſt in the country, in the year 1536. Within the ancient compaſs of the walls there are ſix churches, and three without. It carries on a great trade, and is much frequented. The governor ſent by the Griſons has the title of commiſſary, and has full power in civil and criminal cauſes. The inhabitants have the government of their police, which is in the hands of fourteen perſons, choſen every year, and generally by lot. There are likewiſe military officers for the whole county, who have one thouſand choſen men under their command.

The whole country of Chiavenna is ſeated among high mountains, which are in the neighbourhood of the capital, and are divided by three vallies, that in which the city ſtands being in the centre. The inhabitants make grottoes in the mountains, ten or twelve feet in depth, where they keep their wine as cool all the ſummer as if it was mixed with ice. Before theſe grottoes they build little ſummer-houſes, where they go in the evening to enjoy the coolneſs of the air. Theſe grottoes likewiſe ſerve for barometers, for before rain the ſtones are as moiſt as if they were in a ſweat. The lake of Chiavenna is two miles in diameter, and of an oval form. It is about two miles diſtant from the city, where they carry the goods which are to be tranſported on the lake Como. The other diſtricts are Oleurs and St. Jacomo.

In the mountains of Chiavenna there are mines of ſtone, of which they make pots and kettles, and all ſorts of ſtone ware, even to cups and ſaucers. It is of a blackiſh green colour, and never breaks over the hotteſt fire. Theſe veſſels are in great eſteem, not only in Lombardy, but all over Italy. This country in general comes near to the beauty and fruitfulneſs of Italy. It produces all ſorts of corn; the trees bear excellent fruit; the vineyards produce good wine; the mountains feed cattle and ſheep, and have plenty of game, of an exquiſite taſte. Likewiſe the lake and the river Adda ſupply the inhabitants with abundance of delicate fiſh. In the vineyards, between the vines, they ſow wheat, rye, or ſome other grain; when this is got in they ſow millet, or Turkey corn; and then after this is cut down they ſow turneps: yet, after all this care, the land does not produce corn enough for all the inhabitants, which obliges them to barter wine for corn. However, when it is a good year for cheſnuts, the want of corn is not then perceived, becauſe the peaſants then live upon them. The wine is very good, and brings in moſt money, which is no wonder, as the vines produce bunches, many of which conſiſt of four hundred and ſixty grapes. The eſtabliſhed religion is the Roman Catholic, the profeſſors of which have near two hundred pariſh churches. The longitude of the town of Chiavenna is 9. 29. E. Lat. 46. 15. N.

CHICHESTER, the capital city of the county of Suſſex, is ſurrounded with a wall, which has four gates, anſwering to the four cardinal points, from which run two ſtreets, that croſs one another in the middle and form a ſquare, where the market is kept, and where there is a fine ſtone piazza, built by biſhop Read. The ſpace between the weſt and ſouth gates is taken up with the cathedral church and the biſhop's palace. The church itſelf is not large, but it is neat, and has a high ſpire of good workmanſhip placed on the middle. It has five pariſh churches, and is ſeated on the little river Lavant, which waſhes it on all ſides except the north. This city would have been in a much more flouriſhing condition if it had been built by the ſea ſide; however the inhabitants have endeavoured to ſupply this defect in ſome meaſure by cutting a canal from the city down into the bay. It had a caſtle, which was afterwards converted into a monaſtery, which is now demoliſhed. It is governed by a mayor, a recorder, fourteen aldermen, and a common council, and out of the aldermen four juſtices of the peace are choſen. It has two weekly markets, on Wedneſdays and Saturdays; and every other Wedneſday there is a market for cattle. It has five fairs, thoſe on May 3, Whit-Monday, and Auguſt 5, are for horſes and horned cattle; that on October 10, for horned cattle; and that on October 20, for horſes and horned cattle. It ſends two members to parliament, and is famous for lobſters. It is thirty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Wincheſter, ſixty-three ſouth weſt of London; and eighty-one ſouth by-eaſt of Oxford. Long. 0. 59. W. Lat. 50. 50 N.

Chichester (New) a port town of North America, in Penſylvania, ſeated on the river Delaware, below Cheſter, and contains about a hundred houſes.

Chichester (Arthur) a brave officer in the ſixteenth century, was born at Ralegh, near Barnſtable, in the county of Devon. In his youth he was guilty of great extravagance, to ſupport which he robbed one of queen Elizabeth's purveyors, who were but little better than robbers themſelves, and, to avoid being proſecuted for that crime, fled into France, where he behaved with ſuch bravery and conduct, that his fame reached the queen's ears, on which ſhe pardoned him, ſent for him home, and employed him againſt the rebels in Ireland, where he gained ſuch reputation, that in the year 1604 he was made lord deputy of that kingdom; and in 1612 was advanced to the dignity of baron of Belfaſt. During his government, the Iriſh began to aſſimulate themſelves to the manners and cuſtoms of the Engliſh, and the harp was firſt marſhalled with the Britiſh arms. In 1614 king James I. appointed him lord high treaſurer of Ireland, and afterwards recalling him, appointed him ambaſſador to the palatinate, and ſome time after to the emperor. He died in 1625.

CHICHLEY, or Chichely (Henry) archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reigns of king Henry V. and VI. was born of an obſcure family at Higham Ferrars in Northamptonſhire, and took the degree of doctor in the civil and canon law at Oxford. He was next chaplain to Robert Medford biſhop of Saliſbury, who, about the year 1402, preferred him to the archdeaconry of Saliſbury; from which he roſe, after ſeveral promotions, to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury, in 1414; and in a parliament held the ſame year at Leiceſter, he artfully perſuaded Henry V. to aſſert his title to the crown of France, which he thought would find ſufficient employment for his ambitious and active ſpirit, and divert him from his purpoſe of diſſolving the abbies. He was the firſt who ordered the proctors of the court of arches to wear the ſame habit in court that bachelors of arts do in the univerſities. He was a very liberal benefactor to the univerſity of Oxford, and to the church of Canterbury; contributed largely to the building of Croydon church and Rocheſter bridge; and erected an hoſpital for the poor at Higham Ferrers. He died on the 12th of April 1443.

CHIDLEIGH, or Chudleigh, a town in Devonſhire, with a market on Saturdays, ſeated on the river Teing. Its fairs are on June 11, for ſheep, and on St. Matthew's day for horned cattle. It is nine miles ſouth-by-weſt of Exeter, and one hundred and eighty-two weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 4. 5. W. Lat. 50. 30. N.

CHIELEFA, a ſtrong place of Turky in Europe, in the Morea. It was taken by the Venetians in 1685, but the Turks retook it afterwards with all the Morea. It is three quarters of a mile from the gulph of Coron. Long. 22. 21. E. Lat 26. 50. N.

CHIETI, a town of Italy in the kingdom of Naples in the Hither Abruzzo, ſeated on a mountain near the river Peſcara, about five miles from the gulph of Venice: it is a large place, the capital of the province, and an archbiſhop's ſee. It is eight miles ſouth-weſt of Peſcara, and fifteen north-weſt of Arſamo. Long. 14. 13. E. Lat. 42. 22. N.

CHIGI. See Alexander VII.

CHILDEBERT I. the ſon of Clovis and St. Clotilda, was king of Paris in 511. He joined his brothers Clodomir and Clotaire againſt Sigiſmund; and at length made war on Amalaric king of the Viſigoths, who had treated ill his wife Clotilda, Childebert's ſiſter, when Amalaric being overcome, was aſſaſſinated by his own men in 531. Childebert two years after joined with Clotaire and Theodebert againſt Gondemar, whom they entirely routed; and by this defeat, and the death of that prince, a period was put to the kingdom of Burgundy, which was divided amongſt the conquerors. Childebert made a ſecond expedition into Spain in 543, but was defeated at the ſiege of Saragoſſa. He died at Paris, without male iſſue, on the 23d of December 558.

Childebert II. the ſon of Sigebert and Brunehant, ſucceeded his father, who was king of Auſtraſia in 575. He made war on Chilperic and Gontran, and at length marched into Italy againſt the Lombards. At the death of his uncle uncle Gontran, who had adopted him, he, in 593, joined the kingdoms of Orleans and Burgundy, and part of that of Paris to Auſtraſia. Two years after he defeated the Varnes, a people of Germany, and put an end to their kingdom. He died in 596 at twenty-ſix years of age, leaving the kingdom of Burgundy to his ſon Thierri, and the kingdom of Auſtraſia to his other ſon Theodebert.

CHILDEBERT III. ſurnamed the Juſt, was the ſon of Thierri I. king of France, and ſucceeded his father in 695. He had however only the name of a king, all authority being in the hands of Pepin. He died in 711, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Dagobert III.

CHILDEBRAND, the ſon of Pepin the Fat, and the brother of Charles Martel, was, according to ſome authors, the ſtock from whence the third race of the kings of France ſprung. He had frequently the command of the troops under Charles Martel.

CHILDERIC I. the ſon and ſucceſſor of Meroveus, king of France in the fifth century.

CHILDERIC II. the youngeſt ſon of Clovis II. was king of Auſtraſia in 660, and of all France in 670. He governed happily while Leger, biſhop of Autun, was at the head of affairs; but as ſoon as he ceaſed to follow the advice of that prelate, rendered himſelf odious to his ſubjects. He was aſſaſſinated in the foreſt of Livri in 673, and the twenty-fourth year of his age, by Bodilon, a French lord, whom he had cauſed to be whipped.

CHILDERIC III. the ſon of Thierri de Chelles, was proclaimed king in a part of France governed by Pepin in 742. He had only the name of a king, and was the laſt of the firſt race of the French ſovereigns. He was dethroned by Pepin, who in 750 cauſed him to be ſhut up in a monaſtery. He had a ſon, who was alſo confined in a monaſtery, and educated in obſcurity.

CHILI, a large country of South America, lying along the South Sea. It is bounded by Peru on the north, by the province of La Plata on the eaſt, by Patagonia on the ſouth, and by the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, on the weſt. Don Diego Almagro, a Spaniard, was the firſt who took poſſeſſion of this country in 1535, by entering it from Peru with an armed force. But it was not entirely conquered till 1640, when the inhabitants ſubmitted to the crown of Spain. Some have ſaid that this country is called Chili from its being very cold, pretending that this word ſignifies as much in the language of the country. But this cannot be true of the vallies, where the air is very temperate. However the mountains, called by the Spaniards Sierra Nivada, or the ſnowy mountains, and which make part of the Cordiliera, are ſo exceſſive cold, that men and beaſts have been killed by it, and preſerved from putrefaction. The ſoil is more or leſs fruitful, as it approaches nearer or recedes from the equator; and the coaſts are annoyed with very fierce winds.

This country is divided into three parts, and theſe again into thirteen juriſdictions. The diſtrict of Chili, properly ſo called, extends from the river Copiapo to that of Maule; and here there are greater heats than in Europe. The ſecond or imperial diſtrict reaches from the Maule to that of Gallegos, and its climate reſembles that of Spain. The proximity of the mountains on one ſide, and of the ſea on the other, render it more cool than it would be otherwiſe. But it is hot enough to be one of the beſt countries in America. The valley of Copiapo is ſo fruitful, that one grain of corn generally produces three hundred; and thoſe of Guaſco and Coquimbo are as good. That of Chili, properly ſo called, is ſo rich, that it beſtows its name on the whole country. In ſhort, the country ſeated between the mountains and the ſea, for the goodneſs of the ſoil and climate, ſurpaſſes moſt countries in Europe, with this difference, that the ſeaſons are oppoſite, that is to ſay, when it is ſpring and ſummer in Chili it is autumn and winter in Europe, and the contrary. But in the vallies the heat and cold are not ſo exceſſive as they are in our parts of the world, eſpecially from thirty-ſix degrees of latitude till about forty-five. Thunder is ſeldom or never heard there, except at a great diſtance, nor are there any ſtorms of hail in the ſpring. Beſides, it never rains, except two or three days in the winter, after which the ſky becomes ſerene, without the leaſt cloud. Beſides, this country is not infeſted with venemous creatures or beaſts of prey. There is indeed an animal which the Spaniards call a lion, but it has neither the main, tail, ſize, nor colour of a lion properly ſo called. They are ſmall, and hide themſelves in the woods, running away at the ſight of a man. They ſometimes venture to attack a ſheep, but when the ſhepherd appears they get off as faſt as they can.

Their ſpring begins about the middle of our Auguſt, and continues till the middle of November; and the ſummer holds till the middle of February. Autumn laſts till the middle of May, and winter till the middle of Auguſt. During this laſt ſeaſon the trees are deprived of their leaves, and the ground is covered with a hoar froſt, which diſappears when the ſun is two hours high. There is no ſnow in the vallies, but a large quantity falls on the mountains, which melting in the ſummer, runs down into the vallies, and renders them very fruitful. In the ſpring the fields are covered with fine flowers of various kinds. There are a great many medicinal herbs, which are uſeful for the cure of various diſeaſes; but the Indians are very ſhy in diſcovering their virtues. The fruits and ſeeds brought from Europe thrive here very well, and the former are in ſuch plenty, that they may be had for gathering, except ſtrawberries, which are cultivaled, and are of a very large ſize. Wheat, oats, and Indian corn ſcarce ever miſs. The horned cattle brought from Europe breed ſo faſt in the rich paſtures, that their fleſh is little minded; inſomuch that they only ſalt the ſurloins and the tongues to ſend to Peru, with the ſuet and the hides, which is a conſiderable part of their trade. The woods are full of cocoa-trees for ſeveral leagues together; and they have almonds, olives, cumin ſeed, aniſeed, flax, ambergriſe, pitch, and ſuch a quantity of ſilk graſs, that they make ropes for ſhips of it for all the veſſels on the South Sea. But it muſt be obſerved that the olives, almonds, &c. have been brought from Europe as well as the cattle. They have mines of lead and quickſilver, which they do not work, perhaps becauſe the Peruvians have enough of this laſt of their own to refine their ſilver. There are mines of gold in different parts of the country, but they are not opened, becauſe they find gold enough mixed with the ſand or earth, which they need only waſh to obtain it. Sometimes indeed they find veins of gold, which they trace acroſs the rocks, to the no ſmall advantage of the diſcoverer. The ſilver mines are neglected, becauſe the charge of working them is great, and they require mills to grind the ore to powder, and quickſilver to refine it afterwards. However the copper mines are not neglected, for the bells of Peru, and large pieces of cannon are made of the copper had from this country.

The moſt remarkable animals on theſe mountains are the pecary, a ſort of hogs, with the navel on their backs, and which are to be met with in vaſts herds, with a leader in the front. While he is alive it is dangerous to attack them, but when he is killed they all diſperſe. The wild goat, which has hair as ſoft as ſilk, and which makes excellent hats. The guanacoes, which in ſhape are like camels, and have wool like a ſheep, for which reaſon they are called by that name. But it would be more proper to term them camel-ſheep.

The Spaniards have divided this country into three provinces or diſtricts. The biſhoprick of Imperial, that of St. Jago, and that of Cuijo or Chicuto. This laſt is beyond the mountains. Theſe are ſo named from the principal town in each, which with the reſt worth notice may be found in their proper places. The governor of this country depends on the viceroy of Peru, and St. Jago is the capital city.

CHILLINGWORTH (WILLIAM) a learned writer and divine, born at Oxford in October 1602, and educated at Trinity-college in that univerſity. By the arts and inſinuations of the famous Jeſuit John Fiſher, he embraced the Romiſh religion, and retired to the Jeſuits college at Douay; but Dr. Laud, then biſhop of London, who was his godfather, correſponding with him by letters, and preſſing him with ſeveral arguments againſt the doctrines and practices of the Romaniſts, he ſaw his error, and returned to Oxford. Some years after he was promoted to the chancellorſhip of Saliſbury, with the prebend of Brixworth in Northamptonſhire annexed. He was zealouſly attached to the royal party, and in Auguſt 1643 was preſent in king Charles the Firſt's army at the ſiege of Glouceſter, where he adviſed and directed the making certain engines for aſſaulting the town. Soon after having accompanied the the lord Hopton, general of the king's forces in the weſt, to Arundel caſtle in Suſſex, and chuſing to repoſe himſelf in that garriſon on account of an indiſpoſition, he was there taken priſoner on the 9th of December 1643, by the parliament forces, under the command of Sir William Waller, who obliged the caſtle to ſurrender. But his illneſs increaſing, he obtained leave to be conveyed to Chicheſter, where he was lodged at the biſhop's palace, and after a ſhort ſickneſs died in January 1643-4. He publiſhed an excellent work, intitled The Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe Way to Salvation. 2. A Tract in Defence of Epiſcopacy. 3. Nine Sermons; and other pieces.

CHILO, a celebrated Greek philoſopher, and one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, was one of the Ephori of Sparta, the place of his birth, about the five hundred and fifty-ſixth year before the Chriſtan æra. He was accuſtomed to ſay, that there were three things very difficult, "To keep a "ſecret; to know how beſt to employ our time; and to "ſuffer injuries without murmuring." According to Pliny, it was he who cauſed the ſhort ſentence, Know thyſelf, thyſelf, to be written in letters of gold, in the temple of Delphos. It is ſaid that Chilo died with joy, while embracing his ſon, who had been crowned at the Olympic games.

CHILOE, an iſland lying near the coaſt of Chili, in South America, under the forty-third degree of ſouth latitude. It is the chief of an archipelago of forty iſlands, and its principal town is Caſtro. It rains here almoſt all the year, inſomuch that nothing but Indian corn, or ſome ſuch grain, that requires but little heat to ripen it, can ever ripen. The root called papas is larger here than in any other part, and is the principal food of the inhabitants. They have excellent ſhell-fiſh, very good wild-fowl, hogs, ſheep, and beeves. As alſo a great deal of honey and wax. They carry on a trade with Peru and Chili, whither they ſend boards of cedar, of which they have vaſt foreſts, of a prodigious extent.

CHILPERIC I. the ſon of Clotaire I. was king of Soiſſons, in 563. In 567 he married Galſuinda, the daughter of Athanagilde, king of the Viſigoths, and afterwards put her to death, in order to marry Fredegonde, with whom he was in love: but Brunehault, the ſiſter of his firſt queen, revenged her death. She perſuaded Sigebert, her huſband, and Gontran, to take up arms againſt Chilperic, who in that war loſt a part of his dominions. This prince was almoſt always at war with his brothers. He was aſſaſſinated at Chelles, as he was returning from hunting, by order of his wife Fredegonde, and Landri her lover, in the year 584, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Clotaire.

CHILPERIC II. firſt called Daniel, was the ſon of Childeric II. He ſucceeded Dagobert III. king of France, in 716, when he took the name of Chilperic. Raiufroy, mayor of the palace, put him at the head of the troops againſt Charles Martel, but he was defeated, and obliged to acknowledge Charles Martel as his mayor of the palace. Chilperic died at Noyon, in 720, and was ſucceeded by Thieri of Chelles, the ſon of Dagobert III.

CHIMAY, a town of the French Netherlands, the capital of the territory of the ſame name, in the province of Hainault; it is ſeated on the river Blanche, ten miles from Marienburg, and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Maubege. Long. 4. 17. E. Lat. 50. 30. N.

CHIMÆRA, a port town of Turky, in Europe, ſeated at the entrance of the gulph of Venice, in the province of Epirus. The mountains called Chimæra are near this place, and ſeparate Theſſaly from Epirus. The town, or rather village, ſtands on a craggy rock, with precipices on all ſides. There are five or ſix more towns on the ſame coaſt in alliance with this, which refuſe to pay head-money to the Turks. For when they are attacked by ſea, they retire into inacceſſible mountains, with their flocks; and when they are attacked by land, the paſſages are ſo narrow that they can defeat a whole army, only by rolling ſtones on their heads. They are of the Greek religion, under the archbiſhop of Janina, in Theſſaly, which is at the diſtance of two days journey. They are ſaid to be good ſoldiers, and dextrous thieves. They make nothing of ſelling Chriſtians to the Turks for ſlaves, and Turks to the Chriſtians. It is ſixteen miles north of the iſland of Corſu. Long. 20. 38. E. Lat. 40. 10. N.

CHIMÆRA, in fabulous hiſtory, a monſter in Lycia, with the fore part like a lion, the middle like a goat, and the tail like a ſerpent. It was killed by Bellerophon.

Some mythologiſts imagine, that the Chimæra was a mountain in Cilicia, whoſe ſummit was infeſted with lions, the middle over-run with goats, and the bottom peſtered with ſerpents. Others ſuppoſe the Chimæra to be a pyrate ſhip, whoſe ſtern bore the figure of a lion, her middle that of a goat, and her prow that of a ſerpent.

CHIMLEIGH, or CHUMLEIGH, a town in Devonſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays, and a fair on Auguſt 2, for cattle. It is ſeated on the river Dert, which encompaſſes three parts of it. It is but a ſmall place, and the market is inconſiderable. It is twenty-one miles north north-weſt of Exeter, ſeventeen ſouth-ſouth-eaſt of Barnſtable, and one hundred and ninety-three weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 4. 5. W. Lat 51. 0. N.

CHINA, a very large empire, in Aſia, and the moſt eaſtern on that continent. It is bounded on the north by part of Weſtern Tartary, from which it is ſeparated by a prodigious wall, on the weſt by Thibet and Ava, on the eaſt by the Ocean, and on the ſouth by the Chineſe Sea, Laos, and Tong-king, or Tonquin. It is about one thouſand two hundred and ſeventy-one miles from north to ſouth, and one thouſand one hundred and forty from eaſt to weſt. It is divided into fifteen provinces; thoſe of Chenſi, Chanſi, and Petcheli, lie by the ſide of the famous wall that ſeparates China from Tartary. Thoſe of Chantong, Kiangnan, Tchekiang, and Fokien, are ſituated on the coaſt of the Eaſtern Sea. Thoſe of Quangtong, Quangſi, Yunnan, and Setchuen, are the bounds of the eaſt and weſt; and the middle is occupied by Honan, Huguang, Koeitchou, and Kiangſi.

With regard to the ſoil, there is no part of China can be ſaid to be barren; and ſome are ſo fruitful that they bear crops twice a year: though many places owe their fertility to the indefatigable toil of the huſbandmen. However, the mountains are ſo numerous, that with all their care and diligence, they have ſcarce grain enough for the vaſt multitudes of inhabitants. The mountainous provinces are Yunnan, Koeitcheou, Setchuen, and Fokien; as alſo the weſt part of Tche Kiang, and the inland parts of Quangtong and Quangſi. The province of Kiangnan has all the great diſtrict of Hceitcheou, full of exceeding high mountains, which are almoſt uninhabitable. It is alſo the ſame with regard to three parts in four of the provinces of Chenſi and Chanſi.

Near the great river of Kiangſi is ſituated the moſt beautiful part of the whole empire; nothing can be more delightful than thoſe ſpacious plains, which are ſo ſmooth and level, that they ſeem to be the effect of art rather than nature. They abound with cities and large towns, which have the advantage of an infinite number of canals, whoſe water is clear and excellent, and the navigation on them ſafe and pleaſant. Nor is it a ſmall addition to the pleaſure, to behold the vaſt variety of ſtately barks which are continually paſſing backwards and forwards. The fields are cultivated with a care and labour, of which none but the Chineſe are capable. And they are ſo fruitful withal, that in ſeveral places they yield rice twice a year, and frequently wheat and other grain between the two crops.

They have variety of fruit trees, but are not ſo careful of their cultivation as we in Europe; beſides which, they have many unknown in theſe parts. The fig-tree, ſo called by the Portugueſe, is tall, and ſpreads its boughs like a walnut tree. The leaves are large, and of a lively green, which changes in autumn to an agreeable red; the fruit is of the ſize of a middling apple, which when ripe is of a bright yellow. Beſides the lemons, oranges, and citrons, which were many years ago brought into Europe, they have the litchi, of the ſize of a date, which when dry becomes wrinkled, like common prunes. The long-yen, or dragon's-eye, is round, with a yellowiſh rind, a white pulp, and a tartiſh taſte. They have a fruit ſomewhat like an olive, which they cauſe to fall off the tree by boring a hole in the body of it, and then ſtopping it up. They have a ſort of pepper uſed by the common people only, which is ſo hot, that they can employ nothing but the outſide. Another tree produces a fruit like peas, which have the pod, ſhape, and taſte, all like them. It is tall, with ſpreading branches. The varniſh tree is low, with a whitiſh bark, and a leaf like a cherry-tree. The gum which drops from it is the varniſh ſo highly eſteemed by artificers. Another ſort of varniſh is ſqueezed from the nut of a tree exactly like the walnut-tree. It is uſed to preſerve wood from the bad effects of rain. They have both poiſonous qualities. The tallow-tree is as high as a cherry-tree: when the fruit is ripe it opens in the middle, and diſcovers a pulp like tallow, of which they make candles. The white-wax-tree is not ſo tall as the former, and has a whitiſh bark. The wax is made by a worm, which fixes to the leaves, and forms a comb much ſmaller than the honey-comb. It is hard and bright, and of greater value than bees wax. The bamboe is common in the Eaſt Indies, and is mentioned only on account of the uſe they put it to, which is the making of paper. For when it is very old, they boil it to a paſte, and make paper with it of different kinds. The timber of the tree called nanmon is uſed in all ſtructures, which they intend ſhould laſt a long while. Another wood is of a reddiſh black, with beautiful veins. This ſerves to make cabinets. The iron wood for ſtrength, firmneſs, and weight, gives place to none. The tree is as large as an oak, and ſerves the Chineſe to make anchors with.

Tea of every kind is well known in Europe. The green tea grows on a mountain of Kiangnan, in the latitude of twenty-nine degrees fifty-eight minutes. The ſhrub on which it grows would run up to the height of ſeven or eight feet, if not prevented; but as they gather none but the leaves of young trees, they are renewed every four or five years. The flower is white, with five petala placed in a ring, which, falling off, leave a berry like a nut, not ill taſted. The bohea tea grows on a mountain in the province of Fokien, in twenty-ſeven degrees forty-eight minutes of latitude. Its ſoil is light whitiſh and ſandy, and the tree differs from the former in having the leaves more ſhort, round, and of a browniſh colour. The firſt tender leaves of this ſhrub are reſerved for the emperor's uſe, and for preſents. The flowers of this tea are of an exceſſive price. There are other ſorts of tea which ſeem to derive their difference from the ſoil in which they grow.

Another tree bears a fruit which yields an excellent oil. It is not unlike the bohea tea ſhrub, but larger. The flowering trees trees and ſhrubs are very numerous, as well odoriferous as otherwiſe. The principal medicinal plant brought to us is rhubarb, which grows in the provinces of Setchuen and Chenſi. This root is whitiſh within when freſh, but when dry it aſſumes the colour that we ſee it of. The ginſeng, of which the Jeſuits told ſuch wonders, is now found in Maryland, and is ſent into the Weſt Indies. But, after trial, I can find nothing of its extraordinary virtues ſo much boaſted of.

The animals of the mountains are not well known; however, the Chineſe talk of a man-ape, which we ſuppoſe is only a large baboon. They have likewiſe their man-bear, and their ſtag-horſe, of which we know nothing but the names. Their parrots are like thoſe of America; but the golden-fowl is an extraordinary bird. The plumage is of a very bright red and yellow, with a fine tuft on the head. There is a great variety of colours in the wings, and the tail is very prettily ſhaded. The fleſh is more delicious than that of a pheaſant, inſomuch that there is no bird in thoſe parts more deſirable than this. Their birds of prey have nothing very uncommon. They have very large butterflies, of a wonderful beauty, which never fly about but in the night.

It is ſaid that they have mines of ſilver and gold, but they are not opened. However, they have mines of iron, copper, tin, and coals; but what the Jeſuits call white tin, is what is known in England by the name of zinc, and is only a ſemi-metal. Beſides theſe they have lapis lazuli, a ſort of jaſper, ſmall rubies, rock-cryſtal, and quarries of marble. But they make no other uſe of this laſt than to build bridges and triumphal arches; and theſe they adorn with the figures of men, birds, and feſtoons of flowers. The pillars of them are very inartificial, without chapiters and cornices.

The bridges are ſupported by large ſtone piers, capable of reſiſting the rapidity of the ſtream, and bearing the weight of the arches, which are wide enough for large veſſels to paſs through. The moſt remarkable of theſe is erected over an arm of the ſea, and is ſupported by two hundred and fifty-two ſtrong piers; all the ſtones are of the ſame ſize, as well thoſe which are laid from pier to pier, as thoſe which are croſsways; inſomuch that it is difficult to conceive how ſtones of ſuch an enormous bulk could be placed in the manner they are, or even raiſed on the high piers on which they lie.

The great river Yang-tſe-kiang traverſes China from weſt to eaſt, and is joined by the Pe-ho, which runs from Peking towards the ſouth, through the famous artificial canal, by which means there is a communication maintained between the remoteſt provinces. Where there is no danger of damaging the grand canal, there are ſmall ones cut into it, for the more eaſy carriage of all ſorts of commodities, which render the number of boats and veſſels ſo great, that it is ſcarce conceivable.

In China there are one hundred and ſeventy-three tribunals or juriſdictions, immediately ſubject to the general officers and governors of every province; as alſo one thouſand four hundred and eight inferior tribunals or ſubaltern juriſdictions, which depend immediately on the officers called Tchi Fou. The officers of all kinds are choſen and preferred according to their proficiency in the ſciences, which are chiefly morality, hiſtory, and aſtronomy, wherein they take their degrees, ſo that in ſome ſort it may be called a government of literati or learned men.

The number of the Chineſe is reckoned to be ſixty millions, beſides women and children under twenty years old, beſides thirteen thouſand ſix hundred and forty-ſeven civil magiſtrates, and ninety thouſand literati, out of which the magiſtrates are choſen. Likewiſe there are one million of Mahommedans, eighteen thouſand five hundred and twenty military magiſtrates, one million of pagan prieſts, monks, and nuns, and ſeven hundred thouſand ſoldiers, that are not reckoned into the number. If you will believe the Jeſuits there is not ſuch another people in the world as the Chineſe for good nature, honeſty, and civility; but experience has ſhewn the contrary in ſeveral inſtances; and I think the character given of them by Mr. Walter in commodore, late lord, Anſon's Voyage, will beſt ſhow what theſe people really are. "That the Chineſe, ſays the "writer, are a very ingenious and induſtrious people, is "ſufficiently evinced from the great number of curious ma"nufactures eſtabliſhed among them, and which are "eagerly ſought for by the moſt diſtant nations; but tho' "their ſkill in the handycraft arts ſeems to be the moſt va"luable qualification of theſe people, yet their talents "therein are only of the ſecond rate kind; for they are "much out-done by the Japaneſe, in thoſe manufactures "which are common to both countries; and they are, in "numerous inſtances, incapable of rivalling the mechanic "dexterity of the Europeans. Indeed, their principal ex"cellency ſeems to be imitation; and they accordingly la"bour under that poverty of genius which conſtantly at"tends all ſervile imitators. This is moſt conſpicuous in "works that require great truth and accuracy, as in clocks; "watches, fire-arms, &c. For in all theſe, though they "can copy the different parts, and can form ſome reſem"blance of the whole, yet they never could arrive at ſuch "a juſtneſs in their fabric, as was neceſſary to produce the "deſired effect. If we paſs from thoſe employed in ma"nufactures to artiſts of a ſuperior claſs, as painters, ſta"tuaries, &c. in theſe matters they ſeem to be ſtill more "defective; their painters, though very numerous, and "in great eſteem, rarely ſucceeding in the drawing and "colouring of human figures, or in the grouping of large "compoſitions; and though in flowers and birds their "performances are much more admired, yet even in theſe "ſome part of their merit is rather to be imputed to the na"tive brightneſs and excellency of their colours, than to the "ſkill of the painter; ſince it is very unuſual to ſee the "light and ſhade juſtly and naturally handled, or to find "that eaſe and grace in the drawing, which are to be met "with in the works of European artiſts. In ſhort, there is "a ſtiffneſs and minuteneſs in moſt of the Chineſe pro"ductions which are extremely diſpleaſing; and it may "perhaps be truly aſſerted, that theſe defects in their arts "are entirely owing to the peculiar turn of the people, "among whom nothing great or ſpirited is to be met "with.

"If we examine the Chineſe literature (taking our accounts "from the writers who have endeavoured to repreſent it in "the moſt favourable light) we ſhall find that on this head "their obſtinacy and abſurdity are moſt wonderful; ſince, "though for many ages they have been ſurrounded by na"tions, to whom the uſe of letters was very familiar, yet "they, the Chineſe alone, have hitherto neglected to avail "themſelves of that almoſt divine invention, and have con"tinued to adhere to the rude and inartificial method of re"preſenting words by arbitrary marks; a method which "neceſſarily renders the number of their characters too "great for human memory to manage, makes writing an "art that requires prodigious application, and in which "no man can be otherwiſe than partially ſkilled; whilſt "all reading, and underſtanding what is written, is at"tended with infinite obſcurity and confuſion; as the con"nexion between theſe marks and the words they repre"ſent cannot be retained in books, but muſt be delivered "from age to age by oral tradition. And how uncertain "this muſt prove in ſuch a complicated ſubject is ſuffi"ciently obvious, to thoſe who have attended to the varia"tion which all verbal relations undergo, when they are "tranſmitted through three or four hands only.

"However, we are told by many of the miſſionaris, that "though the ſkill of the Chineſe in ſcience is confeſſedly "much inferior to that of the Europeans; yet the morality "and juſtice taught and practiſed by them are moſt exem"plary; ſo that, from the deſcription given by ſome of "theſe good fathers, one ſhould be induced to believe, "that the whole empire was a well governed affectionate "family; where the only conteſts were, who ſhould exert "the moſt humanity and ſocial virtue. But our preceding "relation of the magiſtrates, merchants, and tradeſmen at "Canton, ſufficiently refutes the Jeſuitical fictions. Be"ſides, as to their theories of morality, if we may judge "from the ſpecimens exhibited in the works of the miſſion"aries, we ſhall find them frequently employed in recom"mending ridiculous attachments to certain frivolous "points, inſtead of diſcuſſing the proper criterion of hu"man actions, and regulating the general conduct of man"kind to one another, on reaſonable and equitable prin"ciples. Indeed, the only pretenſions of the Chineſe to a "more refined morality than their neighbours, is founded, "not on their integrity and beneficence, but ſolely on the "affected evenneſs of their demeanor, and their conſtant "attention to ſuppreſs all ſymptoms of paſſion and violence. "But it muſt be conſidered that hypocriſy and fraud are "not leſs miſchievous to the general intereſts of mankind, "than impetuoſity and vehemence of temper: ſince theſe, "though uſually liable to the imputation of imprudence, "do not exclude ſincerity, benevolence, reſolution, nor "many other laudable qualities. And, perhaps, if this "matter was examined to the bottom, it would appear "that the calm and patient turn of the Chineſe, which diſ"tinguiſhes this nation from all others, is in reality the "ſource of the moſt exceptionable part of their character; "for it has been often obſerved by thoſe who have attended "to the nature of mankind, that it is difficult to curb the "more robuſt and violent paſſions, without augmenting "at the ſame time the force of the ſelfiſh ones; ſo that the "timidity, diſſimulation, and diſhoneſty of the Chineſe, "may, in ſome ſort, be owing to the compoſure and ex"ternal decency ſo univerſally prevailing in that empire.

"With regard to the government, it is plain from their "tranſactions with Mr. Anſon, that their magiſtrates are "corrupt, their people thieviſh, and their tribunals venal.

" Nor is the conſtitution of the empire, or the general or" der of the ſtate, leſs liable to exception; ſince that form
" of government which does not in the firſt place provide " for the ſecurity of the public, againſt the enterprizes of " foreign powers, is certainly a moſt defective inſtitution;
" and yet this populous, this rich, this extenſive country,
" ſo pompouſly celebrated for its refined wiſdom and po" licy, was conquered about an age ſince, by a handful of " Tartars; and even now, through the cowardice of the " inhabitants, and the want of proper military regulations,
" it continues expoſed, not only to the attempt of any po-
" tent ſtate, but to the ravages of every petty invader."

The Chineſe are generally of a moderate ſtature, and are fond of corpulency; have broad faces, black hair, thin beards, ſmall black eyes, and ſhort noſes. They formerly wore their own hair, tyed in a bundle on the top of their heads; but the Tartars, to their great mortification, will not now permit them to wear more than one lock. Their complexion is tawny in the ſouth parts, but in the north they are tolerably clear. The women are remarkable for their little feet, which are made ſo by being bound hard when children, and thus kept from growing. The men wear a cap on their heads, in ſhape like a bell, which does not come ſo low as their ears; and on their bodies a veſt tyed with a ſaſh, over which they put a looſe gown, with wide ſhort ſleeves, which does not hang ſo low as the veſt. On their legs they have ſilk boots, quilted with cotton. In the ſouthern parts, when they are at home, they throw off all their dreſs but a pair of drawers, and appear as naked as the common people about the ſtreets. The women have nothing on their heads, but wear their hair in a roll, faſtened with a bodkin; the reſt is divided into two locks, which fall down on the neck. They wear a veſt and gown as the men do, but the ſleeves are very wide and long. They have embroidered ſilk ſhoes, in which they ſtrangely hobble along, which prevents their gadding abroad. The men wear fans when they appear abroad.

Their language has not the leaſt affinity with any other; for, contrary to all others in the world, it conſiſts only of monoſyllables. They have no letters, but have a peculiar mark or character for every word; theſe are about eighty thouſand in number, and have different ſignifications according as they are pronounced.

Their forms of ſalutation are very ceremonious, as well as their viſits, and would be thought very diſagreeable and tedious in theſe parts of the world; and yet they never pull off their caps, for they reckon it a great indecency to ſhow their head. The Tartars, when they marry, are all for high blood, at leaſt they will not take a wife beneath themſelves, but the Chineſe value nothing ſo much as beauty. They both have, or may have, more wives than one, and they make great feaſting when one of them is taken home.

Their common diet is rice, pulſe, roots, and garden-ſtuff, and as for animals there are none that come amiſs, nor do they ſcruple, but are rather fond of any creature that dies naturally. Dogs are eſteemed as a great dainty, and they have butchers that deal in dogs-fleſh only. Horſe-fleſh is alſo very much liked, which is no wonder, ſince they have ſo many Tartars among them, who were always famous for uſing that diet. Cats, ſnakes, rats, frogs, &c. when they can get them, go down very freely. They uſe neither cloth, napkins, knives, forks, or ſpoons, but two little ebony or other wooden ſticks, with which they take up their meat very dextrouſly. At an entertainment every perſon almoſt has a little lacquered table to himſelf, in which is ſet his meat and rice, in little china diſhes and ſaucers; however, ſometimes they make uſe of plate. Tea is their principal liquor, for wine they have none, though the country abounds in fine grapes. But they have ſtrong liquors made with rice and wheat. Their meat is generally eaten cold, and their liquors drank hot.

The prevailing religion is idolatry or paganiſm, of which there are three ſects; the firſt is that of Li Laokum, who lived, as they affirm, above five hundred years before Chriſt. He taught that God was corporeal, and had many ſubordinate deities under his government. The ſecond ſect is that of the learned, who are the diſciples of the ſo much celebrated Confucius, who left many admirable precepts of morality, and inſtructed the people in philoſophy. He ſpeaks of God as of a moſt pure and perfect principle, the fountain and eſſence of all beings; and though we are told he prohibited idolatry, he has temples and images erected to him, and is worſhiped with the profoundeſt adoration. There is a third ſect much more numerous than either of the former, who worſhip the idol Fo, whom they ſtyle the only god of the world. This idol was imported from India, about thirty-two years after the death of our Saviour. His prieſts, the Bonzes, teach ſeveral moral precepts; and that there is a ſtate of rewards and puniſhments after this life. They alſo teach that it is unlawful to kill any living creature, or to drink wine. They live in a great deal of ſeeming ſanctity, and perform voluntary penances, ſome of which ſeem to be very ſevere and dangerous. They likewiſe exhort the people to build temples, to entertain and nouriſh the prieſts, to perform the penances which they enjoin, and threaten them if they fail in obſerving theſe precepts, with the greateſt torments after death, or that their ſoul ſhall animate ſome vile animal, or beaſt of burthen. They have ſome thouſands of idols in the temples, beſides a great number in all public buildings, in the ſtreets, ſhips, and other places. However, ſome of the Chineſe deſpiſe them, and affirm they are incapable of doing either good or harm. The government requires a profound ſubmiſſion of children to their parents; which is ſo ſtrictly obſerved, that they even make ſtatues of their anceſtors, and worſhip them in their houſes. They are likewiſe enjoined by law to ſhow a great deal of civility one to another, which renders them great formaliſts, and lays the foundation of much hypocriſy.

The emperor being a deſcendant of the Tartars, follows the idolatry of this nation, which does not differ much from that of the Chineſe, except that they worſhip a living man, whom they ſtyle the Great Lama. They give him the name of the Eternal Father, and the whole nation of Thibet, as well as the Eaſtern Tartars, have a great veneration for him. He is ſhewn in a dark place in his palace, by the light of lamps. This country abounds with idol temples, which ſtand without the city gates, or in ſolitary places, where travellers are accommodated by the prieſts with lodging and proviſions. Near every temple generally ſtands a tower, erected in memory of ſome ſaint or hero.

The Jeſuits who ſurveyed the empire, ſay there are one thouſand five hundred and eighty-one cities, whereof one hundred and ſeventy-three are of the firſt rank, two hundred and thirty-five of the ſecond, and one thouſand one hundred and ſeventy-three of the third, beſides innumerable leſſer towns and villages, many as large as cities; two thouſand eight hundred and twenty-one fortified places and citadels, beſides three thouſand forts on both ſides the great wall, and three thouſand towers for the watch and centuries. All the cities throughout the empire are nearly alike, being chiefly ſquare, and ſurrounded with high walls with towers, and ſometimes ſurrounded with ditches. There are likewiſe towers within the walls, ſometimes nine ſtories high; triumphal arches in the ſtreets, and idol temples; as alſo ſtructures, erected to the memory of famous men, and of thoſe who have done important ſervices to the ſtate. Add to theſe ſome pretty large ſquares, and long ſtreets, with houſes on each ſide, which are only a ground floor, with ſhops, adorned with china ware and japanned work. Before the door is a pedeſtal, on which is fixed a board ſeven or eight feet high, either painted or gilt, and contains the names of the goods which are ſold within. Joining to this is a long pole, with a ſign on the top, or ſomething intended for one, but not at all like ours, for they are only ſlight diſtinctions of different forms. This double row of poles make a colonnade, the perſpective of which is pretty enough.

The trade of China conſiſts in gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, porcelain or China ware, ſilks, cotton, ſpice, rhubarb, and other goods, teas, varniſhed works, and the like. The trade of the provinces between each other is ſo very great, that they ſtand in little need of foreign commerce.

The great wall is a very remarkable work, and is ſaid to be built near two thouſand years ago, to prevent the inva-ſions of the Tartars. It is one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy miles long, from twenty to twenty-five feet high, and broad enough for five or ſix horſemen to travel on a breaſt. The other public works are the great canal, which extends nine hundred miles, quite through the empire, from Canton to Peking, and is crowded with a vaſt number of barks and boats. They reckon three hundred and thirty-one remarkable bridges, one thouſand one hundred and fifty-nine towers and triumphal arches, erected to the memory of kings and eminent men; two hundred and ſeventy-two famous libraries, ſeven hundred and nine built in honour of their anceſtors, ſix hundred and eighty-eight ſepulchres, of ſingular architecture; thirty-two palaces of the viceroys; and thirteen thouſand ſix hundred and forty-ſeven of the magiſtrates and officers.

With regard to their funerals, people of condition cauſe their tombs to be built, and their coffins to be provided in their life-time; and there are few families of note that have not particular burying places, whither they are brought, though they die at never ſo great a diſtance from home. But they are never buried within the walls of a city, nor is the corpſe of a perſon who dies in the country ever ſuffered to be brought into a town. The ſepulchres of great men are generally built in mountains and ſolitary places, far from towns, and are often ſtately ſtructures, that appear at a diſtance like palaces.

CHINCHURA, a Dutch factory in India, ſeated on the Ganges. It is large, and is ſurrounded with high brick walls, walls, and the factors have a great many good houſes, ſtanding pleaſantly on the river ſide, with each a pretty garden. Chinchura is a mile in length, and as much in breadth, and is wholly under the government of the Dutch. It is well inhabited both by the natives and Armenians.

CHINEY, a town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, on the confines of the biſhoprick of Liege, ſeated on the river Semoy, twelve miles ſouth-eaſt of Namur. Long. 5. 2. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

CHINILADAN, king of Aſſyria, ſucceeded Saoſduchin, about the ſix hundred and ſixty-ſeventh year before the birth of Chriſt. He defeated and killed Phraortes; but Cyaxares, the ſon and ſucceſſor of that prince, beſieged Nineveh, when, as he was upon the point of taking it, Chiniladan burnt himſelf in his palace, about the ſix hundred and twenty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra.

Some authors confound Chiniladan with Sardanapalis; but others, with the appearance of greater probability, think him the ſame as Nebuchodonoſer.

CHINON, a town of France, in the territory of Touraine, ſeated on the river Vienne, in a fertile and agreeable country, ten miles north of Richlieu, twenty-three ſouth-weſt of Tours, and one hundred and fifty ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 18. E. Lat. 47. 12. N.

CHIONE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Dædalion, Being careſſed both by Apollo and Mercury, ſhe bore twins. Philamon the ſon of Apollo, who became a famous muſician, and Autolycus the ſon of Mercury, who was a ſkilful juggler or cheat: but boaſting of her ſhame, and preferring the ſuppoſed honour of being miſtreſs to two deities to the modeſty of Diana, that goddeſs pierced her tongue with an arrow.

CHIOURLIC, a town of Romania, in Turky in Europe, with a Greek biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a river of the ſame name, between Adrianople and Conſtantinople, fifty miles north-weſt of the former, and ſixty-three ſouth-eaſt of the latter. Long. 27. 47. E. Lat. 41. 18. N.

Long. 2. 20. W. Lat 51. 53. N.

CHIRAC (PETER) a celebrated French phyſician, born at Conques in Rouergue in 1650. He was an only ſon; but the fortune of his parents being very ſmall, he reſolved to become a prieſt, thinking that ſtation abſolutely neceſſary for his ſupport; and went to Montpellier to continue his ſtudies. M. Chicoineau, chancellor and judge of that univerſity in the year 1678, entruſted him with the education of his two ſons, and at length engaged him to apply to medicine, from his conſidering him, even at that time, an able phyſician, and that his genius was bent for that ſtudy. Chirac became a member of that faculty at Montpellier, and taught there during five years the different branches of phyſic. He at length began to practiſe, and took for his model M. Barbeyrac, who then held the firſt rank among the phyſicians of Montpellier. In 1692 he was phyſician to the army in Roufillon. Some years after he became profeſſor of Medicine at Montpellier, and had two diſputes which made great noiſe; one on the acid of the blood, with M. Vieuſſens, a celebrated phyſician of Montpellier; and the other on the ſtructure of the hair, with M. Sorazzi, an Italian phyſician. In 1706 he accompanied the duke of Orleans into Italy, and the next year into Spain. At his return he ſettled at Paris, and was immediately much ſought after, though there was nothing in his exterior form, or in his diſcourſe, of what frequently brings phyſicians into buſineſs. M. Homberg dying in 1715, Chirac became firſt phyſician to the duke of Orleans, regent of the kingdom. The next year he was made a free aſſociate of the academy of ſciences, and in 1718 became ſuperintendant of the king's gardens. In 1728 the king granted him letters of nobility; and in 1730 the place of his firſt phyſician. He died on the eleventh of March, 1732, at eighty-two years of age, after having declared that he ſhould not recover from his diſeaſe. Chirac was extremely well ſkilled in anatomy, and left thirty-thouſand livres to the univerſity of Montpellier, for founding two chairs for that ſcience. He alſo ſet a great value on ſurgery, and ſometimes practiſed it himſelf. He acquired great honour by the cure of the epidemical diſeaſe, which prevailed at Rochefort, under the name of the Malady of Sion. The duke of Orleans being dangerouſly wounded in the wriſt, at the ſiege of Turin, was on the point of loſing his arm; but M. Chirac imagined that it might be ſaved by putting it into the mineral waters of Balaruc, on which they were inſtantly ſent for, and this ſimple remedy produced a perfect and ſpeedy cure. Chirac has given a hiſtory of this caſe in a long diſſertation, in form of a theſis upon wounds, which is the only work he is known to have printed.

CHIRLANDAIO (DOMENICO) of Florence, was at firſt a goldſmith, but employing himſelf more in deſigning than in working at his trade, at length applied himſelf entirely to painting, and became a great maſter. His reputation, however is not ſo much fixed by his own works, as by his having Michael Angelo for his diſciple. He died in 1493, at forty-four years of age, and had three ſons, who were all painters, viz. David, Benedict, and Rhodolph.

CHIRON, in fabulous hiſtory, a famous centaur, who was the ſon of Saturn and Phillyris, lived in the mountains, and delighted in hunting; where obtaining the knowledge of the virtues of plants, he became one of the greateſt phyſicians of his time. He taught this ſcience to Eſculapius, and was afterwards governor to Achilles, whom he fed with the marrow of lions and wild boars, in order to render him ſtrong and courageous. But being wounded by Hercules with an arrow, which he by accident dropt upon his foot, he begged of the gods to put an end to his life, on which Jupiter placed him in the heavens, where he forms one of the ſigns of the zodiac, under the name of Sagittarius.

CHITOR, a province of the empire of the mogul, is ſeated between Malvay and Guzur, and had formerly its own rajas, a ſort of kings. Chitor, its capital town, is almoſt ruined, but it has a good caſtle, which is a priſon for great men who have committed any flight crime. Long. 75. 58. E. Lat. 23. 30. N.

CHIVAS, a ſtrong town in Piedmont, ſubject to the king of Sardinia, was taken by the French in 1705, but the allies retook it the next year. It is ſeated ſo advantageouſly on the river Po, that the maſter of it has the key of Turin and Lombardy. It is thirteen miles north-eaſt of Turin. Lat. 45. 3. N.

CHIUSI, a town of Tuſcany in the Sienneſe, with a biſhop's ſee. It is but poorly peopled, on account of its bad air. Long. 13. 12. E. Lat. 43. 0. N.

CHOCZIM or CHOTZIM, a town of Moldavia, on the river Nieſter, near the frontiers of Poland. It is remarkable for two victories which the Poles gained over the Turks near this place. The firſt was in 1621, and the ſecond in 1674. It was beſieged by thirty thouſand Ruſſians in 1739, who took it, though there was a garriſon of nineteen thouſand men, but was reſtored back by treaty. It is well fortified, has ſeveral mines and eighty pieces of cannon. It is now in the hands of the Ruſſians. Long. 27. 15. E Lat 48. 50. N.

CHOISEUL (CÆSAR DE) duke, peer, and marſhal of France, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral ſieges and battles: was made marſhal of France in 1645. gained the battle of Trancheron in 1648, and that of Rethel in 1650. He died at Paris on the 23d of December 1675.

CHOISEUL (GILBERT) a learned French biſhop in the ſeventeenth century. He was received doctor of the Sorbonne in 1640, and nominated to the biſhopric of Comminges in 1644. When he in a little time changed the face of his dio-dioceſe, by promoting piety and morality; and applied himſelf with indefatigable induſtry to the inſtruction of the people, and removing the wants of the poor. In 1670 he obtained the biſhopric of Tournai, where he was not leſs beloved by the people than at Comminges. He had a great concern in the eccleſiaſtical affairs of his time, and wrote ſeveral books, the principal of which is intitled Memoires touchant la Religion, in three volumes, duodecimo. He died at Paris, in 1689, at ſeventy-ſix years of age.

CHOISI (FRANCIS TIMOLEON DE) dean of the cathedral of Bayeux, and one of the forty of the French academy, was born at Paris on the 16th of April 1644. In 1685 he was ſent with the chevalier de Chaumont to the king of Siam, and was ordained prieſt in the Indies by the apoſtolical vicar. He wrote a great number of works, in a polite, florid, and eaſy ſtyle; the principal of which are, 1 Four Dialogues on the Immortality of the Soul, &c. an excellent work, which he compoſed in conjunction with M. Dangeau. 2. An Account of a Voyage to Siam. 3. An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in eleven volumes quarto. 4. The Life of David, with an Interpretation of the Pſalms. 5. The Life of Solomon; thoſe of St. Lewis, king John, Charles V. Charles VI. &c. He died at Paris on the ſecond of of October, 1724, aged eighty one.

CHOLET, a town of France in Anjou, ſeated on the river Maine with a good caſtle. It is thirty miles from Angers, and one hundred and ſeventy-five ſouth-weſt from Paris. Long. 1. 5. E. Lat. 47. 10. N.

CHONAD, a town of Hungary, with a biſhop's ſee, ſeated on the river Meriſh, thirteen miles eaſt of Segedon. It is ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. Long. 21. 19. E. Lat. 46. 22. N.

CHOPIN (RENE) a famous civilian born at Bailleul in Anjou in 1537. He was advocate in the parliament of Paris, where he pleaded for a long time with reputation. He at laſt ſhut himſelf up in his cloſet, and compoſed many works, which have been collected together, and printed in ſix volumes folio. He died at Paris on the third of February 1606.

CHORASAN, a northern province of Perſia, ſeated in part to the eaſt of the Caſpian Sea. It is about three hundred and ſixty miles long, and three hundred broad. The chief towns are Heri, or Herat, a large and populous place towards Segeſtan, on the river Heri; Niſhabar, a great city with a ſtrong caſtle, where the Turky ſtones are found; Thus, or Meſhad, a large town, lately deſtroyed by the Uſbeck Tartars; Sarkhas, Neſa, Maru Shahian, and Amu on the river Gihon.

CHOCQUET (LEWIS) a famous French poet, lived towards the middle of the fifteenth century, and was the author of a very extraordinary work, in which the revelation of St. John is put into French verſe, in the dramatic way.

CHORGES, a town of France, in Dauphiné. It was burnt by the duke of Savoy in 1692. It is ten miles eaſt of Gap. Long. 6. 35. Lat. 44. 35. N.

CHORIER (NICHOLAS) a famous advocate in the parliament of Grenob'e, was born at Vienne, in Dauphiné in 1609, and died at Grenoble on the 14th of Auguſt 1692, aged eighty three. He publiſhed a general hiſtory of Dauphiné, in two volumes folio, and many other works.

CHOSROES I. ſurnamed the Great, king of Perſia, ſucceeded Cabades, his father, in 531. He concluded a peace with the Romans, but broke it three years after, when he ravaged Meſopotamia and Syria; burnt Antioch, and would have ſerved Apamia in the ſame manner, if Thomas, who was biſhop of that city, had not by his prudence prevented him. Some time after he was conſtrained to raiſe the ſiege of Edeſſa, which did not prevent his obtaining great advantages over Juſtinian and Juſtin; but afterwards being defeated, and his treaſures plundered, he died with vexation in the year 579, and was ſucceeded by Hormiſdas.

CHOSROES II. a famous king of Perſia, aſcended the throne in 591, on his father Homiſdas being confined in priſon by his ſubjects. Choſroes treated him at firſt with humanity; but at length exaſperated at his menaces, inhumanly cauſed him to be caned to death. The Perſians, offended at this cruel parricide, obliged him to ſeek his ſafety in flight, when not knowing where to go, he ſuffered his horſe to carry him whither he pleaſed, on which he went to a city belonging to the Romans. The emperor Mauritius received him very kindly, and reſtored him again to his kingdom. After that emperor's death Choſroes marched againſt Phocas, his murderer, ravaged all the Eaſt, and and made himſelf maſter of Phœnicia, Paleſtine, Armenia, and Cappadocia. He refuſed a peace to the emperor Heraclius, who, in 610, had put Phocas to death; he took Jeruſalem in 615, and afterwards paſſed into Africa, conquered Lybia and Egypt, and rendered himſelf maſter of Carthage. Heraclius a ſecond time demanded a peace, which Choſroes refuſed to grant him on any other condition, but that he and his people ſhould forſake the Chriſtian religion. At this demand, the emperor being filled with indignation, reſumed his courage, marched againſt him in 622, defeated, and put him to flight. In ſhort, Siroes, his eldeſt ſon, whom he had deprived of the crown, to give it to his younger brother, put him in priſon, and ſuffered him to die of hunger, in the year 628.

Choſroes was fond of learning, and learned men; and made a great progreſs in philoſophy. It is ſaid that he was better acquainted with Ariſtotle, than Demoſthenes was with Thucidydes.

CHOUET (JOHN ROBERT) a learned philoſopher, and one of the moſt celebrated magiſtrates of Geneva, where he was born; was the firſt who taught Des Cartes's philoſophy at Saumur. He was recalled to Geneva in 1669, where he taught with application, and at length became counſellor and ſecretary of ſtate, and compoſed a hiſtory of that republic. He died on the 17th of September, 1731, aged eighty-nine. His works have not yet been printed.

CHOWARAZM, a country in Aſia, bounded on the ſouth by the province of Chorаſan, in Perſia, on the north by part of Great Tartary, on the weſt by the Caſpian ſea, and on the eaſt by Bokaria. It is four hundred and forty miles long from ſouth to north, and three hundred and forty from eaſt to weſt. It conſiſts moſtly of wide extended plains, ſome of which are barren, but others afford excellent paſture. In ſome parts there are vines, of which they make good wine. The country was full of good towns before it fell into the hands of the Tartars. The chief rivers are the Amou or Gihon, the Khieſe, and the Sire or Sihun, which fall into the lake Aral. All the former geographers ſuppoſed theſe rivers entered into the Caſpian ſea. Urgentz or Kornani was formerly the capital, but is now greatly reduced. It was four miles in circumference, and was ſurrounded with mud walls, and the houſes were made of clay or earth. The great ſtreet, in which the bazar or market ſtands, is covered over as in the other towns in theſe parts. There is no graſs hereabouts, but a ſort of heath, on which the cattle feed. The Tartars in the diſtrict of this town live in the open fields, roving about from place to place for conveniency of paſture to feed their camels, horſes, and ſheep. They have no bread, but live upon fleſh, chiefly that of horſes, and they drink mare's milk, which they manage ſo as to render it intoxicating. The other towns are Chajuk, Kaht, Haſaraſb, and Wazir, which are now wretched places. Mangiſlave is a ſecure port, on the north-eaſt of the Caſpian ſea.

Beſides the people already mentioned, called Turkomans, there are the Sarts, who are the ancient inhabitants, and live by their cattle and huſbandry; as alſo the Uſbecks, who ſubſiſt upon rapine and plunder. Chowarazm was a kingdom, but at preſent it is a province to Perſia, if it was not loſt during the late troubles. Their religion is the Mahommedan, if they have any at all, for it is obſerved in a very looſe manner.

CHRAMNE, the natural ſon of Clotaire I. revolted againſt his father, and made a league with the count of Brittany; but Clotaire gave him battle, defeated him, and burnt this rebellious ſon, with his family, in a cabin where they had ſheltered themſelves, in the year 560.

CHRETIEN, or CHRISTIAN (FLORENT) in Latin, Quintus Septimus Florens Chriſtianus, a learned writer, in the ſixteenth century, born at Orleans. He took the name of Quintus from his being his father's fifth child, and Septimus from his being born in the ſeventh month of his mother's pregnancy. He underſtood the languages, was well verſed in polite learning, and was made preceptor to Henry IV. whom he educated in the proteſtant religion. He wrote ſeveral works in verſe and proſe, and died in 1596, aged fifty-ſix.

CHRISTCHURCH, a town in Hampſhire, with a market on Mondays, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Avon and Stour, near the ſea. It is governed by a mayor, aldermen, a recorder, and common-council, and ſends two members to parliament. The fairs are on the Thurſday after Trinity-Sunday and October 17, for horſes and bullocks. It is thirty miles ſouth-weſt of Wincheſter, and one hundred and three weſt ſouth-weſt from London. Long. 2. 0. W. Lat. 50. 46. N.

CHRISTIANA, a province of Norway, in the province of Aggerhuys, ſeated near the ſea, at a ſmall diſtance from the caſtle of Aggerhuys, and near a good caſtle which defends it. The Swedes once became maſters of the town, but they could not take the caſtle. The principal court of juſtice for the whole kingdom is kept here, and it is likewiſe a biſhop's ſee. It is one hundred miles north of Gottenburg, and ſubject to Denmark. Long. 10. 15. E. Lat. 59. 50. N.

CHRISTIANSTADT, a town of Sweden, ſeated on the frontiers between Bleking and Schorren. It was declared to belong to the latter, in 1719. It is a very fine town, with a magnificent church, handſome bridges, and a cuſtomcuſtom-houſe: but its fortifications are fallen to ruin. It was built by the Danes, but ceded to the Swedes in 1660. The port is ten miles from the town, near Ahuys. Long. 14. 30. E. Lat. 56. 2. N.

CHRISTIERN, or CHRISTIAN I. king of Denmark, originally count of Oldenburg, was advanced to the throne by the ſtates of Denmark, on the death of Chriſtopher of Bavaria, in 1448, and immediately laid claim to the crowns of Sweden and Norway, but his pretenſions to the former were oppoſed with great courage and reſolution by the great marſhal Canutſon, who awakening the ancient averſion of the Swedes to the Daniſh government, the royal dignity was conferred upon him, to reward the zeal he had ſhewn for the intereſt of his country; but diſobliging the Swediſh biſhops, they took arms againſt him, and cauſed Chriſtiern I. to be proclaimed king of Sweden, in Stockholm. This occaſioned a war, which laſted ſeveral years, and which ended in Chriſtiern's being excluded from the crown of Sweden, and the reſtoration of Canutſon. Chriſtiern was admired by the Danes for his prudence and humility, and died in 1481.

CHRISTIERN, or CHRISTIAN II. king of Denmark, ſurnamed the Cruel, and the Nero of the North, was born in 1481, and ſucceeded John his father in 1513. He was of a ſullen, fierce, and untractable temper; his courage ſeemed to proceed from an ungovernable fury, and he appeared only to make war that he might feed his eyes with the bloody horrors of death. He attempted, but without ſucceſs, to recover Greenland, which his predeceſſors had loſt. He at length aſpired to the throne of Sweden, which was then governed by Steno, under the title of adminiſtrator, who, oppoſing the biſhops on account of their taking arms in defence of Chriſtiern, they cauſed him to be excommunicated. In 1581 Chriſtiern inveſted Stockholm, but was obliged to raiſe the ſiege; after which, his fleet being detained by contrary winds, a mortality broke out amongſt the ſoldiers on board, and the want of proviſions was ſo great, that the king himſelf was in danger of periſhing. To deliver himſelf from ſo miſerable a condition, he ſent to propoſe a truce for ſome days, with the adminiſtrator, and to inſinuate that this truce might be changed to an eternal peace between the two nations; but though the adminiſtrator knew that he might eaſily complete his victory by ſtarving the enemy, he inſtantly conſented to the truce, and generouſly ſent boats laden with proviſions, for the uſe of the king and navy. Chriſtiern now finding that the adminiſtrator was extremely deſirous of a peace, hoped to have an opportunity of ſeizing his perſon; and pretending to be overcome by his generoſity, propoſed an interview on board the fleet, in order to treat about a peace; but finding that the ſenate would not permit the adminiſtrator to hazard his ſafety by going on board, he propoſed an interview in the city of Stockholm, offering to repair thither with ſome of his council, provided Guſtavus and ſix other lords, whom he mentioned, ſhould be delivered as hoſtages for the ſecurity of his perſon, to which the ſenate conſented. But Guſtavus and the other hoſtages no ſooner appeared on the ſhore, than they were encompaſſed by a conſiderable number of officers, who advanced to ſalute them, and ſurrounded by ſoldiers in the diſguiſe of mariners, when the admiral importunately perſuading them to go in his boat to ſalute the king before he landed, they finding that it would be better to comply than make an uſeleſs reſiſtance, went on board, but no ſooner appeared before the king, than he ordered them to be arreſted, and ſent word to the adminiſtrator, that he would cauſe them to be beheaded as rebels and excommunicated perſons, if he would not immediately conſent to his demands. Steno, incenſed at this treachery, manned all the boats and ſhips in the harbour; and the noblemen in the city leaped into the firſt boats they could meet with, reſolving to attack the Daniſh men of war, and either to releaſe the hoſtages, or periſh in the attempt; but the wind ſuddenly changing, Chriſtiern ſet ſail with the hoſtages, and arriving in Denmark, threw them into priſon. In 1519, Otho, the Daniſh general, invaded Sweden with a powerful army, when coming to an engagement, the adminiſtrator was mortally wounded, which ſo diſcouraged his army, that Otho obtained a complete victory, and ſoon after over-ran Sweden. The general then, by the aſſiſtance of the archbiſhop, procured an aſſembly of the ſtates, conſiſting of ſuch perſons as were already engaged in the Daniſh intereſt, and promiſed, in the name of the king his maſter, that the laws and privileges of the kingdom ſhould be preſerved and maintained; and that Guſtavus and the other priſoners ſhould be delivered without ranſom; after which, the archbiſhop conferred the title of king of Sweden upon Chriſtiern. The next ſpring, Chriſtiern arriving in Sweden, ratified the above treaty, and then laying ſiege to Stockholm, which was defended by the adminiſtrator's widow, with an heroic reſolution, till it was reduced to the laſt extremity, induced her to ſurrender, by promiſing that her eſtate ſhould be preſerved entire; that ſhe ſhould enjoy the ſame dignity and honours as during the life of her huſband; that the priſoners on both ſides ſhould be releaſed without ranſom; and that the inhabitants of Stockholm ſhould continue in the poſſeſſion of all their privileges. On the 4th of November, 1520, the king was crowned in that city, and ſwore that he would inviolably preſerve the laws, privileges, and cuſtoms of the nation; and afterwards invited all the lords to a magnificent feaſt; but on the third day, the archbiſhop of Upſal, accompanied by his creatures, by the king's deſire, appeared before him in a full meeting of the ſtates, and publickly demanded juſtice againſt the deceaſed adminiſtrator, and all the ſenators and lords of the kingdom who had injured him; on which the ſenators, biſhops, and all the Swediſh lords and gentlemen that were in the caſtle were arreſted. On the 8th of November, theſe illuſtrious victims marched out in diſmal pomp, and were led to their executions. The biſhops ſuffered firſt, and afterwards Eric, Guſtavus's father, the conſuls and magiſtrates of Stockholm, and ninety-four lords. Then, imagining that Guſtavus, who had eſcaped from him, might be hid in ſome houſe in the city, he reſolved to confound the innocent with the guilty, and inſtantly expoſed the town to the fury of his ſoldiers, who, after murdering all that came in their way, broke into the principal houſes, under the pretence of ſearching for Guſtavus and the reſt of the proſcribed lords; ſtabbing citizens in the arms of their wives, plundering their houſes, and raviſhing their wives and daughters. He afterwards iſſued an order that no perſon ſhould preſume to bury any of the bodies upon pain of death; but a few days after, the ſtench of their putrefaction induced him to order them to be carried out of the city and burnt. Chriſtiern then ſeized all the treaſures of the adminiſtrator's widow, and ſent her to Denmark with the reſt of the Swediſh ladies, whoſe huſbands periſhed in the above maſſacre; and after ſetting a price upon Guſtavus's head, returned to Denmark, leaving orders with his troops to ſurpriſe and maſſacre many of the lords in their caſtles, who had no other crime laid to their charge but their being diſtinguiſhed by their birth, their courage, or their wealth.

Chriſtiern now diſpoſed of the lives and fortunes of his Daniſh ſubjects as he pleaſed, and loaded the Danes with inſupportable taxes and impoſitions, to carry on the war againſt Guſtavus, who made a rapid progreſs in recovering the liberty of his country, till the Danes being unable to bear longer the inſufferable yoke of his tyranny, all the ſtates of the kingdom entered into a ſecret treaty with Frederick of Oldenburgh, duke of Holſtein, the king's uncle, whom they invited to accept of the crown, and depoſed Chriſtiern, who ſaved himſelf by an ignominious flight, accompanied by the queen, the princes his children, and his miſtreſs, with whom he eſcaped into Germany, where he ſtayed till the year 1531, and then ſailed from Holland, with about ten thouſand men, of different nations, for the coaſt of Norway; but met in his voyage with a terrible ſtorm, which diſperſed his fleet, and with much difficulty arrived in 1532, in the bay of Bahuys. At firſt he obtained ſome advantages, but king Frederick ſending a fleet after him, burnt all his ſhips, and he was ſoon after obliged to ſurrender himſelf priſoner to the Daniſh general. On his being brought to Copenhagen, king Frederick cauſed him to be carried to the caſtle of Sonderburg, where he lay in priſon till his death, which happened on the 25th of January, 1559, in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age.

CHRISTIERN, or CHRISTIAN III. king of Denmark, ſucceeded Frederick his father, in 1535. He introduced Lutheraniſm into his dominions; baniſhed the popiſh biſhops, founded the college of Copenhagen, and collected a fine library. He was fond of ſtudy, and protected learned men. He governed with mildneſs, and died on the firſt of January, 1559, aged fifty-ſix, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Frederick II.

CHRISTIERN, or CHRISTIAN IV. king of Denmark, and brother to Anne, the queen of James I. aſcended the throne in 1588, after the death of his father Frederick II. He came to England in 1606, where he was treated with all poſſible magnificence. In 1614 he paid king James I. a ſecond viſit. He made war on the Swedes, and in 1625 was choſen head of the proteſtant league againſt the emperor, for the re-eſtabliſhment of the elector Palatine. In 1618 he ſent a fleet to the iſle of Ceylon, in the Eaſt Indies, which returned richly laden with ſpices. This was the firſt fleet that ever ſailed from Denmark to that part of the world. This prince, after he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a number of glorious actions, died on the 28th of February, 1648, aged ſeventy-one.

Chriſtiern his ſon was elected king of Denmark during his father's life, but died on the ſecond of June, 1647, on which account, moſt hiſtorians do not place him in the number of the kings of Denmark.

CHRISTIERN or CHRISTIAN V. or VI. ſucceeded his father Frederic III. who died in 1670. He entered into an alliance with the German princes, and declared war againſt the Swedes; but though he was a courageous, as well as an enterpriſing prince, they defeated his troops on ſeveral occaſions. He died on the fourth of September 1699.

CHRISTINA, queen of Sweden, illuſtrious for her wit, learning, and her affection for learned men, was the daughter of Guſtavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, and Maria Eleonora of Brandenburg, and was born on the eighth of February 1626. She ſucceeded to her father's dominions in 1633, and governed with wiſdom. She however at length abdicated the crown in favour of Charles Guſtavus, count Palatine, her couſin-german, on the ſixteenth of June 1654. She then went into Flanders, and from thence to Rome, where ſhe embraced the Romiſh religion; ſhe afterwards went to France, where ſhe obtained the admiration of the learned; but returning to Rome in 1658, fixed her abode there, and died on the nineteenth of April 1689, aged ſixty-three.

This princeſs had a lively and penetrating genius, a maſculine air, large features, and a form a little irregular. She was generous, affable, and of a free and open behaviour. She was a woman of uncommon learning, for ſhe underſtood ſeveral languages, and was a perfect miſtreſs in the belles lettres. It is ſaid that ſhe made the ſtudy of the Greek tongue her diverſion at her leiſure hours; and that the reading of this language and others did not keep her from her ſerious ſtudies; ſo ſhe called, among others, Tacitus's Hiſtory, ſome pages of which ſhe conſtantly read every day. In a letter ſhe wrote to Mr. Bayle, ſhe directed him to ſend her all the curious books that ſhould be publiſhed in Latin, French, Spaniſh, or Italian, on whatever ſubject or ſcience, provided they were worthy of being looked into.

CHRISTOPHER (St.) according to the common opinion, ſuffered martyrdom in Lycia, during the perſecution of Decius in 254. People in the age of ignorance imagined that whoever had a ſight of an image of this ſaint, would neither die ſuddenly, nor by accident; whence he was repreſented of a prodigious ſize, bearing the infant Jeſus on his ſhoulders, and placed at the front of cathedrals, or the entrance of churches, that every body might the more eaſily ſee him.

CHRISTOPHER's (St.) commonly called St. KITT's, is one of the Caribee Iſlands in the Weſt Indies. It was diſcovered by Chriſtopher Columbus, who gave it his own name. The Engliſh and French ſettled in this iſland much about the ſame time, that is in 1623, and enjoyed it jointly, though they had each been maſters of it in their turn, till 1713, when it was ceded to the Engliſh by the treaty of Utrecht. The air is exceeding hot, but pleaſant, pure, and healthful, having now and then ſome cool breezes. It has high mountains, with dreadful rocks, and thick woods between them. The ſoil is light and ſandy, and produces ſugar canes, tobacco, cotton, ginger, and ſeveral ſorts of fruit. Some parts of it have ſprings, and hot-baths, while others are ſcarce of water. The ſoil of the mountains is of a ſulphurous compoſition, and over-run with trees, ſuch as palmettoes, cotton-trees, guaiacum, and other ſorts unknown to us. There were no trees like ours before they were carried thither and planted. They have Indian corn, pine-apples, plaintains, prickle-pears, and two ſorts of pepper. They have ſilk cotton as ſoft as down, and another ſort more coarſe. As alſo maſtick, locuſt-trees, gourds, muſk-melons, the manchinel-tree, whoſe apples are poiſon; the fruit called pengrones, papaws, the caſſava root, potatoes, and ſmall hard nuts, which grow near the ground. The ſalt pond is very remarkable, for in extreme hot weather the water is evaporated, and a ſalt is left, which has the appearance of rock cryſtal. They make a great deal of ſugar, beſides ten thouſand hogſheads of rum one year with another.

The animals are in general the ſame as in the other Caribbee Iſlands, except the rocket, a ſort of lizard. The ſkin of this looks like a withered leaf, with yellow and blue ſpots. It has ſparkling eyes, and always holds up its head, which is in perpetual motion. The tail turns towards its back with a circle and a half. It puts out its tongue when purſued. Their peculiar birds are the Oroonoko eagle, and the craw-fowl. The feathers of the former are of a light grey, curiouſly diverſified with black ſpots, and the ends of the wings and tail are yellow. It attacks the birds with crooked beaks and large talons flying, which are his prey. The craw-fowl is aſh-coloured, and as big as a large duck: it has a great head, little eyes, a ſhort neck, and under it a craw, which will hold two gallons of water. It lives on fiſh, which it watches for, ſitting on trees on the ſhore.

The number of the inhabitants are computed at eight thouſand whites, and eighteen thouſand blacks. The white creoles have a good complexion, are well made, and have no crooked or naturally deformed perſon among them. Their houſes are built with cedar wood, and painted on the outſide to preſerve them from the weather. Their gardens are adorned with walks, and groves of orange and lemon trees. There are ſeveral forts and batteries in this iſland, and a militia, conſiſting of one regiment of foot, a troop of horſe, and another of dragoons, making in all one thouſand three hundred and forty men. They have four pariſhes on the north ſide, and as many on the ſouth, in each of which there is a handſome wainſcotted church with pews. The wood is generally of a very agreeable colour and ſmell. The chief town is Baſſe Terre, in which the houſes are built of brick, free-ſtone, and timber, with a town-houſe, an hoſpital, and a large church. The caſtle or palace is on the eaſt ſide of a high mountain, ſhaded with great trees, about a mile and a quarter from the ſea: it is built with brick and free-ſtone, three ſtories high, and has fine apartments wainſcotted with cedar. There is a long walk of orange and lemon trees which leads to the court before it; as alſo a chapel on one ſide, and on the other great ſtone ciſterns, into which water is brought by pipes under ground. Between the caſtle and the mountains there is a fine ſtately garden, which produces fine flowers and plants of all ſorts, and is adorned with a fountain. It was built by the French.

In the woods there is a great number of cabbage-trees, and ſwarms of monkeys, which venture out in the night to ſteal potatoes and other proviſions. At the top of the Conorrhee hills there is a plain about three hundred yards wide, ending at the verge of a vaſt deep cavity, about a mile in circumference, containing veins of ſulphur, from which ariſes a continual ſteam. At the bottom are two or three round holes, called the devil's coppers, each about three feet in diameter. A furlong to the ſouth-eaſt is a large rocky hill, which is the higheſt land in the iſland. It ſtands in the middle of the chain of hills, which run from the weſt almoſt to the ſalt-pond hills. This iſland is twenty-five miles long, and ſeven broad. Long. 62. 32 E. Lat. 17. 36. N.

CHRISTOPHERSON (JOHN) a learned biſhop of Chicheſter in the ſixteenth century, was born at Lancaſter, and advanced to that ſee by queen Mary, on account of his attachment to the popiſh religion. He tranſlated from the Greek into Latin Philo Judæus, and alſo the eccleſiaſtical hiſtories of Euſebius, Theodoret, Sozomen, Socrates, and Evagrius; but his tranſlations are very defective. He died in December 1558, and bequeathed his library, which was a very good one, to Trinity-college in Cambridge.

CHRISTOPHORUS (ANGELUS) a Greek author of the ſeventeenth century, who wrote a curious work intitled The preſent State of the Greek Church, which has been tranſlated into Latin, and ſeveral times reprinted.

CHROMACIUS (St.) a pious and learned biſhop of Aquilea in the fourth century, who zealouſly defended Rufinus and St. John Chryſoſtom, and was the friend of St. Ambroſe and St. Jerome. He died before the year 412.

CHRYSEIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Chryſes, prieſt of Apollo, is more known by this patronymic, than by her true name Aſtynome. She was taken by Achilles, when he ſacked Lyrneſſus, and ſome other places in the neighbourhood of Troy; and was the wife of the king of that country. Agamemnon taking a great fancy to her, retained her for himſelf, and was ſo far from granting the requeſt of the good old Chryſes, who came to demand her back, attired in his ſacerdotal ornaments, and furniſhed with a conſiderable ranſom, that he repulſed him in a very unworthy manner. On which Chryſes beſought Apollo to revenge him, and was heard; the peſtilence began to rage in the Grecian army, and ceaſed not till Chryſeis, according to the advice of the ſoothſayer Calchus, was ſent back to her father.

CHRYSIPPUS, natural ſon of Pelops, was of incomparable beauty. Laius became paſſionately in love with him, and carried him away by force; but he was purſued with ſuch ſpeed, that his prey was taken from him, and himſelf brought priſoner to Pelops, who forgave him. Pelops being fonder of Chryſippus than of his legitimate children, his wife Hippodamia exhorted two of her ſons, named Atreus and Thyeſtes, to take away his life; but they refuſing to commit this act of cruelty, ſhe took Laius's ſword, while he ſlept, and made uſe of it to diſpatch Chryſippus. This ſword made the ſuſpicion fall upon Laius; but Chryſippus before he expired had time to clear him.

CHRYSIPPUS, a Stoic philoſopher, was born at Solos in Cilicia, and ſtudied under Cleanthes the ſucceſſor of Zeno. He wrote many books, ſeveral of which related to logic. All his works, we are told, amounted to ſeven hundred and five books, which treated on almoſt every ſubject. He repreſented Jupiter as the only immortal god, and yet wrote a book on his amours with Juno. He died about the two hundred and ſeventh year before the Chriſtian æra, at above eighty years of age.

CHRYSIS, prieſteſs of Juno at Argos, was, by her negligence, the occaſion of that goddeſs's temple being burnt to the ground. She had ſet a lamp too near the ſacred ornaments, ments, which took fire; as ſhe ſlept ſo ſound as not to awake time enough to prevent the conſequences of that accident, the temple was entirely conſumed, and ſome ſay that ſhe herſelf periſhed in the flames.

CHRYSOLANUS (Peter) a learned archbiſhop of Milan in the twelfth century. He wrote a diſcourſe addreſſed to Alexis Comnenus, relating to the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt, againſt the ſentiments of the Greeks on that ſubject.

CHRYSOLOLOGUS. See Peter Chrysologus.

CHRYSOLORAS (Emanuel) a learned Greek of Conſtantinople, and one of the principal reſtorers of polite learning. He lived in the fifteenth century, and was ſent into Europe by the emperor of the Eaſt to implore the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtian princes. He afterwards taught at Florence, Venice, Pavia, and Rome, and died at Conſtantinople on the fifteenth of April 1415, aged forty-ſeven. He wrote a Greek Grammar, and ſome other ſmall pieces.

CHRYSOSTOM (St. John) a celebrated patriarch of Conſtantinople, and one of the moſt admired fathers of the Chriſtian church, was born of a noble family at Antioch, about the year 347. He ſtudied rhetoric under Libanius, and philoſophy under Andragathus; after which he ſpent ſome time in ſolitude in the mountains near Antioch, but the auſterities he endured having impaired his health, he returned to Antioch, where he was ordained deacon by Meletius. Flavian, Meletius's ſucceſſor, raiſed him to the office of preſbyter five years after, when he diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo greatly by his eloquence, that he obtained the ſurname of Chryſoſtom or Golden Mouth. Nectarius patriarch of Conſtantinople, dying in 397, St. Chryſoſtom, whoſe fame was ſpread throughout the whole empire, was choſen in his room by the unanimous conſent of both the clergy and the people. The emperor Arcadius confirmed this election, and cauſed him to leave Antioch privately, where the people were very unwilling to part with him. He was ordained biſhop on the twenty-ſixth of February, 398, when he obained an order from the emperor againſt the Eunomians and Montaniſts; reformed the abuſes which ſubſiſted amongſt his clergy; retrenched a great part of the expences in which his predeceſſors had lived, in order to enable him to feed the poor and build hoſpitals; and preached with the utmoſt zeal againſt the pride, luxury, and avarice of the great: but this liberty offending Eutropius, the emperor's favourite, the empreſs Eudoxa, and a part of the clergy, a ſynod was held againſt him in 403, in which he was depoſed and baniſhed into Bithynia. It is ſaid, that the day after his baniſhment there was ſuch a terrible earthquake and ſtorm of hail at Conſtantinople, that the people conſidered them as the effects of the divine vengeance; and the empreſs herſelf was ſo terrified, that ſhe entreated the emperor to recal the holy biſhop: this requeſt being complied with, the people no ſooner heard of his approach, than they ran in crowds to meet him, and conducted him into the city as in triumph. He then continued to diſcharge the duties of his miniſtry for eight months; but a ſilver ſtatue of the empreſs being erected near the great church, called St. Sophia, and the noiſe made at the dedication of this ſtatue diſturbing divine ſervice, St. Chryſoſtom exclaimed with ſuch warmth againſt theſe proceedings, that Eudoxa, provoked at the liberties he took, cauſed him to be baniſhed a ſecond time, and ſent to Cucuſus, a city in Arminia; and ſome time after he was carried to Arbiſſa; but as they were afterwards removing him from thence to Pityus, on the Black Sea, he was obliged to ſuffer ſuch inconveniencies and fatigue, that he died by the way, on the fourteenth of September 407, aged ſixty.

St. Chryſoſtom's works are wrote with an elegance and beauty of expreſſion not be found in any other of the fathers; the beſt editions of them are that of Henry Savill, in 1613, in eight volumes folio, all in Greek; and that of Commelin and Fronton du Duc, in Greek and Latin, in ten volumes folio. Montfaucon has alſo given an edition of them in Greek and Latin with notes.

CHTHONIA, χθονια, in Grecian antiquity, an anniverſary day, kept by the Hermonians, in honour of Ceres, ſurnamed Chthonia, either from her being the goddeſs of the earth, which is called in Greek χθων, or from a damſel of that name whom Ceres carried from Argolis to Hermione, where ſhe dedicated a temple to the goddeſs. Pauſanias ſays this feſtival was thus celebrated every ſummer; a proceſſion was made to the temple by the prieſts and magiſtrates, followed by a crowd of men and women. The boys alſo made a ſolemn proceſſion in honour of the goddeſs, cloathed in white apparel, wearing upon their heads crowns of the flower hyacinth, in memory of the untimely death of Hyacinthus. Theſe were followed by perſons dragging an untamed heifer, faſt bound, to the temple, which having entered, ſhe was let looſe, and the gates of the temple ſhut. Then four old women, who had been left within, and were armed with ſcythes, purſued the heifer, and diſpatched her by cutting her throat. The doors being then opened, a ſecond heifer was put into the temple, and afterwards a third, and then a fourth, all which the old women killed in the ſame manner.

CHUBB (Thomas) called by Mr. Pope the great phænomenon of Wiltſhire, was born at Eaſt Harnham, a ſmall village near Saliſbury, on Michaelmas-day, 1679, but his father, who was a maltſter, dying while he was very young, his mother was unable to give him any other education than reading and writing. He was at length put apprentice to a glover in Saliſbury, and afterwards continued for ſome time journeyman to his maſter; but having weak eyes, a tallow-chandler, who was his intimate friend, gave him a ſhare in his buſineſs. Thus he obtained a comfortable ſubſiſtence; and being fond of reading, he employed all his leiſure hours in acquiring a conſiderable knowledge in mathematics, geography, and other branches of ſcience; but divinity was his favourite ſtudy. At length the controverſy upon the Trinity being carried on with great warmth by Dr. Clarke and Dr. Waterland, he wrote his firſt piece, intitled The Supremacy of the Father aſſerted; which ſhewing great talents in reaſoning, and extraordinary perſpicuity in writing, introduced him to the acquaintance of many gentlemen of diſtinguiſhed rank; and the late Sir Joſeph Jekyl, maſter of the rolls, took him into his family, in order to enjoy the pleaſure of his converſation: but, fond of contemplation, he did not continue many years with Sir Joſeph, though it is ſaid he was offered a genteel allowance; but retiring to his friends at Saliſbury, ſpent his time in reading and writing; yet though he lived free from labour, he took a pleaſure in aſſiſting at the trade, which on the death of his partner, had devolved on a nephew, and was to the laſt period of his life a coadjutor in it. He wrote many works, and at his death, which happened at Saliſbury, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, left two volumes of poſthumous works, by which it appears that he had the unhappineſs to diſbelieve the authority of revelation; but notwithſtanding the licentiouſneſs of his ſentiments, he was remarkable for the regularity of his life, and the regard he paid to the duties of morality.

CHUDLEIGH (Lady Mary) diſtinguiſhed by her poetic talents, was the daughter of Richard Lee, of Winſloder in the county of Devon, Eſq. and was born in 1656. She was at length married to Sir George Chudleigh, bart. by whom ſhe had ſeveral children. The death of one of theſe induced her to give vent to her grief in a poem intitled Lucinda and Mariſſa. She afterwards wrote ſeveral other poems, which have been printed together in one volume; and in 1710 publiſhed a volume of Eſſays in verſe and proſe, which ſhe dedicated to her royal highneſs the princeſs Sophia, electreſs of Brunſwick, who in return honoured her with a polite epiſtle in French. She wrote two tragedies, two Operas, a Maſque, ſome of Lucian's Dialogues tranſlated into verſe, ſeveral Poems, &c. which though never printed, are preſerved in her family. This amiable lady, who was diſtinguiſhed by her virtue, as well as her genius, died in 1710, in the fifty-fifth year of her age.

CHURCHILL (Sir Winston) the father of the great duke of Marlborough, a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed loyalty, in the reign of king Charles II. was deſcended from an ancient and honourable family in Dorſetſhire, and was born, according to ſome authors, at Wooton Glanvile in that county, in the year 1610, and educated at St. John's college at Oxford. He engaged in the cauſe of his unfortunate ſovereign Charles I. for which he ſuffered ſeverely in his fortune, and having married while young, Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir John Drake, of Aſhe in Devonſhire, ſhe was forced to ſeek a refuge in her father's houſe, when Mr. Churchill's misfortunes left him none that he could call his own, and there moſt of his children were born. However, after the Reſtoration, his affairs wore another aſpect; he removed to his ſeat at Minthorn in Dorſetſhire, was elected a burgeſs to ſerve in parliament for the borough of Weymouth; and, in 1669, his majeſty was pleaſed to confer on him the honour of kinghthood. The next year he was made one of the commiſſioners of claims in Ireland, and upon his return from thence, was conſtituted one of the clerks comptrollers of the green-cloth: but writing a kind of political eſſay upon the Hiſtory of England, which gave great offence to the parliament, he was, in 1678, diſmiſſed from his poſt, but was ſoon reſtored to it again; and having lived to ſee his eldeſt ſurviving ſon raiſed to the peerage, and the reſt of his children in a fair way to promotion, died on the 26th of March 1688, and was interred in the pariſh church of St. Martin in the Fields, London.

Churchill (John) duke of Marlborough, and prince of the holy Roman empire, one of the ableſt ſtateſmen, greateſt generals, and moſt illuſtrious heroes that this or any other nation has produced. He was the ſon of the former, and was born at Aſhe in Devonſhire, on Midſummer-day, 1650. His father carried him very early to court, where the beauty of his perſon, the pregnancy of his parts, and the modeſty of his behaviour, recommended him, when but twelve years of age, to the notice of the duke of York, who made him his page, and about the year 1666 he had a pair of colours. His firſt opportunity of ſhewing his courage was at Tangier, then in our hands and beſieged by the Moors. In 1672 the duke of Monmouth commanding a body of Engliſh auxiliaries in the ſervice of France, Mr. Churchill attended him, was ſoon made captain of grenadiers in the duke's own regiment, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that famous campaign againſt the Dutch in a moſt glorious manner. The laurels he brought from France very juſtly entitled him to preferment at home; his majeſty therefore made him lieutenant-colonel, and the duke made him gentleman of his bed-chamber, and ſoon after maſter of the robes. In 1682 he was created baron of Eymouth in Scotland, and colonel of the third troop of guards; and in 1685 king James created him a peer of England, by the title of baron Churchill of Sandridge, in the county of Hertford. And being lieutenant general of the king's forces, he the ſame year defeated the duke of Monmouth's army, and took him priſoner. But on his royal maſter's attempting to overturn the laws and the eſtabliſhed religion of England, he went over to the prince of Orange, without taking any of the forces with him, leaving a letter for the king, expreſſing the reaſons of his conduct. During the reign of king William, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions; was raiſed to ſeveral conſiderable poſts of honour, and was made earl of Marlborough; but in the height of his favour he was ſuddenly diſgraced; ſtript of all his employments, and committed to the Tower for high treaſon, on the evidence of ſome profligate perſons confined in Newgate for their crimes; but their forgeries and perjuries being fully detected, he was reſtored to favour. King William recalled him to take his ſeat in his privy-council, and on the 19th of June 1698, appointed him governor to the duke of Glouceſter, with this extraordinary compliment, "My lord, "make him but what you are, and my nephew will be all "I wiſh to ſee him." He was after this three times appointed one of the lords juſtices, during that king's abſence. King William alſo appointed him general of foot, and commander in chief of a body of troops he ſent into Holland, and the ſame month created him ambaſſadour extraordinary to the States General; and a little before his death he recommended his lordſhip to the princeſs of Denmark, as the propereſt perſon to be entruſted with an army, that was to protect the liberties of Europe.

About a week after king William's death, the earl of Marlborough was made knight of the garter, and ſoon after declared captain-general of all her majeſty's forces, and immediately ſent over to the Hague with the ſame character as before; when, though his ſtay in Holland was ſhort, the ſtates not only concurred in all that he propoſed, but, of their own motion, declared him captain-general alſo of their forces, with an appointment of one hundred thouſand florins per annum, and left to him the rank of ſettling the general officers. War being declared againſt France and Spain on the fourth of May 1702, the earl of Marlborough marched into Flanders, and in the firſt campaign made himſelf maſter of the caſtles of Gavenbroeck and Woerts, the towns of Venlo, Ruremond, and Stevenſwaert, together with the city and citadel of Liege, which laſt was taken ſword in hand. But at the end of the campaign, his lordſhip, in his paſſage by water, was taken priſoner by a party of thirty Frenchmen from the enemy's garriſon at Gueldres, when by an admirable preſence of mind, he ſhewed them an old paſs belonging to his brother, which he happened to have in his pocket, and diſcovered ſo little concern, that he was ſuffered to proceed, and arrived at the Hague when every body were in the utmoſt conſternation on the news of what had befallen him. On his return to England he received the thanks of both houſes of parliament, and was created duke of Marlborough.

The next year he inveſted and took Bonn, Limburgh, and Gueldres, and the campaign being over, his grace went to Duſſeldorp, to meet the late emperor, then ſtyled Charles III. king of Spain, who made him a preſent of a very rich ſword from his ſide. And that prince coming to England, he preſented to him the Spaniſh merchants, and procured for them the ſtrongeſt aſſurance of protection and favour the king could give.

The following year, viz. 1704, he forced the enemy's entrenchments at Schuilenberg, and obliged them to fly with precipitation, after the loſs of at leaſt one third of their troops. On this occaſion the emperor wrote him a letter of thanks with his own hand, and offered him the title of a prince of the empire, which he modeſtly declined, till the queen afterwards commanded him to accept of it. On the ſecond of Auguſt he gained the glorious battle of Hochſtet, in which thirteen thouſand men, among which was marſhal Tallard, with twelve hundred officers were made priſoners, and fourteen thouſand men killed or drowned, beſides a vaſt number that were loſt in their precipitate retreat. After this glorious action, by which the empire was ſaved, and the whole electorate of Bavaria conquered, his grace purſued the French till he forced them to repaſs the Rhine: he then took poſſeſſion of Homberg, Treves, &c. had the pleaſure of ſeeing prince Lewis of Baden take Landau; and then making a tour to Berlin, he by a ſhort negotiation ſuſpended the diſputes between the king of Pruſſia and the Dutch. On the 14th of December he arrived in England, laden with the trophies of his victories, bringing with him marſhal Tallard, and twenty-ſix other officers of diſtinction, and alſo one hundred and twenty-one ſtandards, and one hundred and ſeventy nine colours, which, by the queen's order, were hung up in Weſtminſter-hall. He received the ſolemn thanks of both houſes of parliament, and Mr. Addiſon celebrated the noble exploits of that ſummer in his Campaign.

The next ſummer, through the negligence of the allies, and the obſtinacy of the Dutch deputies, the French recovered Huy, and laid ſiege to Liege; but his grace by a quick march raiſed the ſiege of the citadel of Liege, recovered Huy, and forced the French lines. Then making a tour to Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover, the new emperor Joſeph made him a preſent of the principality of Mindelheim. In 1706 his grace gained the battle of Ramillies, in which fifty pieces of cannon were taken, and one hundred and twenty ſtandards and colours. Louvain, Bruſſels, Mechlin, Ghent, and Bruges, ſubmitted to king Charles III. of Spain without a ſtroke; Oudenard ſurrendered upon the firſt ſummons; Antwerp followed this example, and in the the ſpace of a fortnight the duke reduced all Brabant. He laid ſiege to Oſtend, and took it; he alſo beſieged and took the ſtrong fortreſs of Menin, Dendermonde, and Aeth. The next campaign the duke was unable to bring the French to an engagement; but in 1708, he gained the battle of Oudenard, in which four thouſand of the French were killed, and ſeven thouſand taken priſoners, with above one hundred ſtandards and colours; the cities of Liſle and Ghent were alſo taken. The next year his grace took Tournay, and the famous battle of Malplaquet was fought, in which, after a bloody engagement, the French were entirely defeated, and this victory was ſucceeded by the ſurrender of Mons.

In ſhort, after theſe, and ſeveral other inſtances of the moſt admirable conduct, by which Lewis XIV. was humbled, and all Europe aſtoniſhed at his grace's amazing progreſs; after having received all public teſtimonies of his merit, and after Blenheim houſe was built as a monument of his glory, his grace, upon the change of the miniſtry, was again diſgraced, ſtripped of his employments, and charged with applying the public money to his own uſe. He vindicated himſelf with temper, and then went abroad; but returned after the queen's death, and was reſtored to his poſts. To ſum up his character, he was the moſt accompliſhed courtier of his time, an able ſtateſman, and a conſummate general. He gained every battle he fought, and had the better of all the great generals that were employed againſt him. This illuſtrious commander died at Windſor-lodge, on the 16th of June 1722, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, leaving four daughters, upon whom in ſucceſſion his honours were entailed.

CHURCHILL (CHARLES) a celebrated ſatiriſt, was the ſon of Mr. Charles Churchill, curate and lecturer of St. John's, Weſtminſter, and was educated in Weſtminſter-ſchool, where we are told, that having one day an exerciſe to make, which he did not perform at the appointed time, his maſter reproached his ſtupidity, and chaſtiſed him with ſome ſeverity, on which he the next day brought his exerciſe finiſhed in ſuch a manner, that he received the public thanks of all the maſters. He was afterwards refuſed admittance into the univerſity of Oxford, to which he was ſent by his father, for want of a proper ſkill in the learned languages, on which he was again ſent to Weſtminſter-ſchool, where, at ſeventeen years of age, he contracted an intimacy with a lady, to whom he was married, and their mutual regard for each other continued for ſeveral years. At the uſual age of going into orders, Mr. Churchill was ordained by the late biſhop of London, and obtained a ſmall curacy in Wales of thirty pounds a year. Thither he carried his wife; they took a ſmall houſe, and he paſſed through the duties of his ſtation with aſſiduity and chearfulneſs. Happy had it been for him had he continued there to enjoy the fruits of piety, peace, and ſimplicity of manners. He was beloved and eſteemed by his pariſhioners, and though his ſermons were rather above the level of his audience, they were commended and followed; but endeavouring to advance his fortune, by keeping a cyder cellar, it involved him in difficulties which obliged him to leave Wales and come to London, where his father dying ſoon after, he ſtepped into the church, in in which his father had officiated, and, in order to improve his income, which ſcarcely produced an hundred pounds a year, he taught young ladies to read and write Engliſh at a boarding-ſchool, kept by Mrs. Dennis, where he behaved with that decency and proper decorum which became his profeſſion. His method of living, however, bearing no proportion to his income, he contracted ſeveral debts in the city, which, being unable to pay, a jail, the terror of indigent genius, ſeemed ready to complete his misfortunes; but from this ſtate of wretchedneſs he was relieved by the benevolence of Mr. Lloyd, father to the poet of that name. Mean while Mr. Lloyd, the ſon, wrote a poetical epiſtle called the Actor, which being read and approved by the public, gave the author a diſtinguiſhed place among the writers of his age; and this induced Mr. Churchill to write the Roſciad, which was received with great applauſe; and it being aſcribed to a combination of wits, the ſecond edition appeared with his name. His next performance was his Apology to the Critical Reviewers, which alſo received the public favour. But while his writings thus amuſed the town, it was diſguſted by his actions. He now quitted his wife, reſigned his gown, commenced a complete man of the town, drank, frequented ſtews, and, giddy with applauſe, ſeemed to think his talents a ſufficient atonement for all his follies. He now wrote a poem called Night, which was ſoon followed by the Ghoſt; but theſe laſt had not the rapid ſale he expected; but his Prophecy of Famine ſoon made him ample amends. This was followed by his Gotham, Independence, the Times, &c. but going to Boulogne, on a viſit to Mr. Wilkes, he was there attacked by a milliary fever, which carried him off in a few days. After his death, his poems were collected and printed together, in two volumes, octavo.

CHURCHIL Fort, ſituated on the eaſt of Hudſon's Bay in Britiſh Canada, in America. Long. 96. 15. E. Lat. 60. 0. N.

CHURCH-Stretton, a town of Shropſhire, with a market on Thurſdays. Its fairs are May 14, and September 24, for horned cattle, horſes, and ſheep. It is fourteen miles ſouth of Shreſbury, and one hundred and fifty-ſeven north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 40. W. Lat. 52. 35. N.

CHURCHYARD (Thomas) a poet who flouriſhed in the reigns of Henry VIII. Edward VI. queen Mary, and Elizabeth, was born at Shrewſbury, and inherited a fortune which he ſoon exhauſted on a fruitleſs attendance on the court, by which he only gained the favour of being retained a domeſtic in the family of lord Surry, when, by his lordſhip's encouragement, he commenced poet. Upon his lordſhip's death, he betook himſelf to arms; was in many engagements, and was frequently wounded: he was alſo twice made priſoner, and redeemed by the charity of two noble ladies. It is ſuppoſed that he died in about the eleventh year of queen Elizabeth. He publiſhed twelve pieces, which he afterwards printed together in one volume, under the title of Churchyard's Chips; and alſo the Tragedy of Thomas Moubray duke of Norfolk.

CHUSISTAN, a province of the kingdom of Perſia in Aſia, bounded on the weſt by Irac Arabi, on the eaſt by Farſiſtan; on the north by Irac Agemi; and on the ſouth by the gulph of Baſra. The capital town is Suſter.

CIACONIUS (Alphonso) a Dominican Friar, who was born at Baëça in the ſixteenth century, and aroſe to be titular patriarch of Alexandria. He wrote a conſiderable number of books, the principal of which is intitled Vitæ & Geſta Romanorum Pontificum & Cardinalium. This work with its continuation has been printed at Rome in four volumes folio. He died at Rome 1599.

He ought not to be confounded with Peter Ciaconius, a learned Spaniſh prieſt, born at Toledo in 1525, who was employed with Clavius in correcting the Calendar, and wrote notes on Arnobius, Tertullian, and ſeveral other authors. He died at Rome in 1581.

CIALIS, a kingdom of Aſia in independent Tartary, bounded on the north by the kingdom of Eluth; on the eaſt by ſandy deſarts; on the ſouth by Great Thibet; and on the weſt by Turkiſtan, from which it is ſeparated by the mountains of Imaus.

CIAMPA, a country of Aſia, in the Indies, bounded on the eaſt and ſouth by the Eaſtern ſea, on the north by the deſert of Cochin-China, and on the weſt by the river Cambodia. It is ſubject to Siam.

CIAMPINI (John Justin) a learned writer of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Rome, in 1633, and applied himſelf to the buſineſs of the apoſtolic chancery. His brother, who was ſecretary of the ſecret briefs, procured him two conſiderable poſts, the one maſter of the briefs of favour, and the other prefect of the briefs of juſtice. Theſe poſts did not prevent Ciampini's cultivating polite literature, antiquities, philoſophy, and other ſciences; but his principal ſtudy was that of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and it was by his means that an academy was founded at Rome, in 1671, for that part of hiſtory. In 1677 he eſtabliſhed, under the protection of the queen of Sweden, an academy of natural hiſtory and mathematics, which ſoon became celebrated; and in 1691 he was received into the academy of the Arcadians. He wrote many works in Latin and Italian, the principal are, 1. Conjecturæ de perpetuo Azymorum Uſu in Eccleſia Latina, vel ſaltem Romana. 2. De incombuſtibili Lino Diſſert. 3. De ſacris Ædificiis à Conſtantino Magno conſtructis Synopſis hiſtorica, in folio. He died in 1698.

CIBBER (Caius Gabriel) a celebrated ſtatuary, was a native of Holſtein, and came into England a little before the Reſtoration, and in a few years became ſo eminent, that he was appointed ſtatuary and carver to king Chares the Second's cloſet. Moſt of the ſtatues of the kings in the Royal Exchange are of his hand; but theſe are greatly inferior to the figures of Raving and Melancholy Madneſs, before the hoſpital of Bethlem, which are his capital performances. He did two of the baſs-reliefs on the pedeſtal of the monument, and ſeveral good pieces of ſculpture at Chatſworth. He built the Daniſh church in London, where he lies buried with his ſecond wife, who was deſcended from the family of Colley, in Rutlandſhire, and brought her huſband a fortune of ſix thouſand pounds. This lady was the mother of our late laureat, the ſubject of the following article.

Cibber (Colley) eſq. poet laureat, and a celebrated dramatic writer and comedian, was the ſon of Caius Gabriel Cibber, and was born at London, on the 6th of November, 1671. He was ſent to the free-ſchool of Grantham, in Lincolnſhire, and was preparing to go to one of the univerſities, in order to qualify himſelf for the church, when, in the year 1688, he was induced to take arms in favour of the prince of Orange, under the duke of Devonſhire. Soon after he betook himſelf to the ſtage; but was full three quarters of a year before he obtained ten ſhillings a week, which, with the aſſiſtance of food and raiment at his father's, rendered him, he ſays, the happieſt of mortals. The firſt part in which he appeared with ſucceſs was the chaplain in the Orphan; he then obtained applauſe in the part of lord Touchwood, in Congreve's Double Dealer; and next in the part of Fondlewife in the Old Bachelor. He was not however advanced in the manner he had reaſon to expect, and therefore, that he might appear in a new rank of diſtinction, he wrote his firſt play, called Love's laſt Shift, which was acted in 1695, wherein he performed the part of ſir Novelty Faſhion, and from thence forward was allowed to excel all other actors in parts of that caſt. From thence forward he applied himſelf to the writing of plays, and "it is obſervable," ſays he, "that my muſe and my "ſpouſe were equally prolific; that the one was ſeldom "the mother of a child, but in the ſame year the other "made me the father of a play. I think we had a dozen "of each ſort between us; of both which kinds ſome died "in their infancy, and near an equal number of each "were alive when I quitted the theatre." The plays which he himſelf obſerves met with an early death, were his tragedies, which indeed did not deſerve to live; but his comedies are filled with true humour, and, in general, abound with good ſenſe and wit, without ribaldry and indecency. Of all his plays, the Nonjurer, which was acted in 1717, was of moſt importance to the public and to himſelf; it rendered him the butt of all the enemies of the government, and by laying the foundation of a miſunderſtanding between him and Mr. Pope, at length raiſed him to be the hero of the Dunciad; even writers of the pooreſt abilities endeavoured to become witty at his expence, and Colley was the laughing ſtock of every blockhead. However, king George I. to whom he dedicated it, ordered him two hundred pounds, and from the merit of this performance, he, in 1730, became poet laureat; a poſt which he enjoyed till his death, though his ſlender poetical abilities by no means qualified him for the taſk of writing odes. He died in the year 1744. Thoſe of his plays he himſelf thought worth preſerving, he publiſhed, in two volumes, quarto. He alſo wrote an Apology for the Life of Colley Cibber, and ſome pamphlets.

Cibber (Theophilus) was the ſon of the former, and was born on the day of the violent and diſtructive ſtorm, in 1703. He was educated at Wincheſter-ſchool, and ſoon after his leaving it, came on the ſtage, where his father's character as an actor, and his power as being one of the managers of the theatre royal, enabled Theophilus to appear with advantage, and he ſoon attained a conſiderable ſhare of the public favour. However, his perſon was far from pleaſing, the features of his face were rather diſguſting, and his voice had the ſame ſhrill treble, but without the muſical harmony of his father's; yet the quickneſs of his parts, the vivacity in his manner, and a kind of effrontery, well adapted to the characters he repreſented, amply counterbalanced theſe deficiences, and ſeemed to promiſe him eaſe, affluence, and reputation; but his total want of all œconomy, and all principle, over-clouded his brighteſt proſpects; and his life was a continued ſcene of extravagance, perplexity, and diſtreſs, till the winter of 1757, when Mr. Sheridan engaged him to go over to Dublin. On this expedition, he embarked at Park-Gate with Mr. Maddox, the celebrated wire-dancer, who had been engaged to perform on the ſame theatre. They went on board the Dublin Trader, ſome time in the month of October, but the veſſel was driven by the high winds, frequent at that time of the year in St. George's Channel, on the coaſt of Scotland, where it was caſt away, and unhappily every perſon in it loſt; for though the paſſengers were extremely numerous, not one eſcaped. Indeed, ſcarce any veſtige of the ſhip remained, to point out where it had been wrecked, except a box, containing books and papers that were known to be Mr. Cibber's, and were caſt on the weſtern coaſt of Scotland. Thus fell the unhappy Theophilus Cibber, whoſe life was begun, purſued, and ended in a ſtorm. As a writer he publiſhed, 1. ſome Appeals to the Public. 2. An Account of the Lives of the Poets of Great Britain and Ireland, in five volumes, duodecimo. Other perſons were employed in writing theſe Lives, but he himſelf corrected and improved them, adding ſome circumſtances that were not generally known. In the dramatic way he altered three pieces for the ſtage, and produced one of his own. Theſe were Shakeſpeare's Romeo and Juliet; Henry VI. Patty and Peggy, a ballad opera; and the Lover of Comedy. For other particulars in his life, ſee the next article.

CIBBER (Mrs. SUSANNA MARIA) one of the beſt actreſſes that ever appeared on the Engliſh ſtage, was the daughter of Mr. Arne, an upholſterer, in Covent-Garden, and the ſiſter of Dr. Arne, celebrated for his muſical compoſitions. Her firſt appearance on the ſtage was as a ſinger, in which the ſweetneſs of her voice rendered her very conſpicuous. When in this ſituation ſhe became the ſecond wife of the above Theophilus Cibber, contrary to the inclinations of his father, who had entertained hopes of ſettling him in a more reputable and advantageous ſituation than the ſtage; but the amiable deportment of his daughter-in-law, and the felicity in which they at firſt lived, induced him to forgive and take them into favour. One day, at a rehearſal, his ſon happening to mention that ſhe might one day be brought on in ſpeaking parts, as well as a ſinger, Colley deſired ſhe might ſpeak before him. To this the ſon agreed; and on her repeating a part of a tragdy, he was ſurprized at finding ſuch a variety of powers united. Her voice was perfectly muſical; her expreſſion ſtrong and pathetic, at pleaſure; and her figure graceful. He therefore readily undertook to cultivate thoſe talents, and taught her at home for ſome time, with great application. On her firſt appearance on the ſtage, which was in the character of Zara, the audience were both delighted and aſtoniſhed, and her ſalary was inſtantly raiſed from thirty ſhillings to three pounds a week. But the tranquility of her family was far from being rendered permanent by her ſucceſs. Her huſband, who was at once luxurious and prodigal, formed the baſe and unmanly reſolution of ſacrificing her honour to the gratification of his pride and extravagance. With this view he cemented the cloſeſt friendſhip with a gentleman, whom he introduced to his wife, recommended to her, gave him frequent interviews, and even, as if by accident, ſaw them put in the ſame bed. Thus Mrs. Cibber, aſſailed on every ſide, by her huſband's perſuaſions, the worthleſſneſs of his heart, the indigence to which his prodigality reduced her, and by the inſinuations and pleaſing addreſs of her lover, after reſiſting him for ſome time, at laſt conſented, and yielded up her perſon, and with it her heart. By this means her huſband found his finances recruited, and appeared no leſs pleaſed than they; but he had ſtill a ſecret motive of ſatisfaction, and ſoon after began a ſuit for criminal converſation, laying his damages at five thouſand pounds; but the jury puniſhed theſe acts of baſeneſs, by giving him only ten pounds coſt, which was not ſufficient to reimburſe him the fortieth part of his expences. From that time Mrs. Cibber lived entirely with the gentleman, but continued on the ſtage with the ſame applauſe, and beſides her excellence as an actreſs, ſhe rendered into Engliſh, a piece called the Oracle. She died of a rupture in one of the coats of her ſtomach.

CIBOLA, a country of North America, to the north of New Mexico. It is inhabited by ſavages who have ſeveral towns. It abounds in Indian corn, pitch, ſalt, a ſort of tygers and bears. Some call it New Granada.

CICERO (MARCUS TULLIUS) a celebrated Roman orator, and one of the greateſt men in his time, was born at Arpino, in the one hundred and ſixteenth year before the birth of Chriſt. Marcus Tullius, his father, took great care of his education, and ſent him to ſtudy at Rome, where he learnt the Greek language from his infancy, and diſcovered an extraordinary capacity for the ſtudy of the ſciences, and the management of buſineſs. On his appearing at the bar, he declaimed with ſuch vehemence againſt Sylla's party, that he was obliged to retire into Greece to avoid the effects of his reſentment. He there ſtudied under the moſt celebrated orators and philoſophers, and diſcovered ſuch eloquence in an oration he pronounced at Rhodes, that Apollonius Molon, his maſter, cried, that "he deplored "the misfortune of Greece, which, after being conquered "by the Roman arms, was going to be ſurpaſſed by his "diſciple in eloquence." At his return to Rome he married Terentia, by whom he had one ſon, named Tullius, and a daughter called Tullia; but he afterwards repudiated her, and married Popilia, who was young, handſome, and very rich. Cicero was queſtor and governor of Sicily, in the ſeventy-fifth year before the Chriſtian æra; and at his return to Rome obtained the poſt of Ædile, when he condemned Verres to make ſatisfaction for the acts of violence he had committed in Sicily. Cicero was at length prætor, and was conſul with Caius Antonius, in the ſixty-third year before Chriſt. During his conſulſhip he diſcovered Cataline's conſpiracy, for which he merited the name of Father of his Country. However, through the means of Clodius, he was baniſhed ſome time after; but, at the ſolicitation of Pompey, was recalled the following year, when he was made pro-conſul of Cilicia. During the civil wars, Cicero followed Pompey's party, but after the death of that great man, he meanly ſtooped to make uſe of the baſeſt flattery, in order to become reconciled to Cæſar; and this was perhaps the moſt diſhonourable incident in his life. Though he was Brutus's intimate friend, he had no concern in the conſpiracy againſt Cæſar, becauſe it was concealed from him. After that emperor's death he ſided with Auguſtus; but Anthony, againſt whom Cicero had written his Philippics, being made triumvir, cauſed him to be murdered, as he was flying in his litter towards the ſea of Cajete, in the forty-third year before the Chriſtian æra. The murderer was one Popilius Lenas, whoſe life Cicero had ſaved in a cauſe in which he was accuſed of having killed his father. This man cut off his head and right hand, which he carried to Mark Anthony, who hung them up in the roſtra. Even Auguſtus conſented to his death, though Cicero had been of great ſervice to him.

Cicero's works, which are the models of eloquence, are commonly divided into four parts. The books which treat on oratory are in the firſt; his orations in the ſecond; his epiſtles in the third; and his philoſophical works in the fourth. The abbé d'Olivet has printed a fine edition of them, in nine volumes, quarto. His Life has been written by Dr. Middleton, of Cambridge, and by M. Morabin.

CICLUT, a fortreſs in Dalmatia, taken from the Turks by the Venetians, in 1692. It is five miles ſouth-weſt of Narenta, and forty north of Raguſa. Long. 17. 40. E. Lat. 45. 20. N.

CILLEY, a diſtrict of the circle of Auſtria, in Lower Stiria. The capital town is Cilley, which is tolerably handſome, and has a caſtle built on a rock. It is remarkable for its antiquities, and is ſeated on the river Saan, twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Laubach. Long. 15. 45. E. Lat. 46. 28. N.

CID (the) one of the greateſt generals in the eleventh century, whoſe original name was Roderigo Dias de Bivar. He ſignalized himſelf by his valour againſt the Moors of Spain, whom he defeated in ſeveral battles, and took from them Valencia, and ſeveral other important places; but quarrelling with count Gomez de Gormas, with whoſe daughter Chimena he was paſſionately in love, and who returned his affection, he killed him in a duel; when the death of her father threw Chimena into the moſt dreadful perplexity; her love however got the better of her reſentment, and ſhe entreated king Ferdinand to oblige the Cid to marry her; ſhe being unable to find any other method of drying up her tears. The Cid died about the year 1098.

CIGNANI (CARLO) an able Italian painter, was born at Bologna, in 1628, and was the diſciple of Albani. He was eſteemed by pope Clement XI. who nominated him prince of the academy of Bologna, and loaded him with favours. Cignani died at Forli, in 1719. The cupola of la Madona del Fuoco at Forli, in which he repreſented Paradiſe, is an admirable work. His principal pictures are at Rome, Bologna, and Forli. There is a noli me tangere of his in the royal palace at Paris, which is an excellent piece.

CIMABUE (GIOVANNI) who revived the art of painting in Italy, was deſcended from a noble family, and was born at Florence, in the year 1240. Being ſent to ſchool in order to obtain a learned education; inſtead of minding his books, he ſpent all his time in drawing figures of men, horſes, and the like. At that time, the ſenate of Florence having ſent for painters out of Greece, Cimabue eloped from ſchool, and ſpent whole days in ſeeing them work, which his father perceiving, agreed with thoſe Greeks to take him under their care, and he ſoon excelled his maſters in deſigning and colouring, and gave a ſtrength and freedom to his his works which they could never attain. Though but little acquainted with the art of managing his lights and ſhades, he laid the foundation of future improvement, and obtained the name of the Father of the firſt age, or infancy of modern painting. Painting in oil not being then diſcovered, he performed all his works in freſco, and in diſtemper. Having finiſhed a picture of our lady, which was the largeſt that had been ſeen in thoſe days, for the church of Sancta Maria Novella, it created ſuch ſurprize and admiration, that it was carried from his houſe to the church in ſolemn proceſſion, with trumpets ſounding before it. Cimabue was alſo an excellent architect. He died at ſixty years of age, and left many diſciples, among whom was Ghiotto, who proved an excellent maſter.

CIMON, the ſon of that Miltiades who vanquiſhed the Perſians in the famous battle of Marathon, and one of the moſt celebrated of the Athenian generals, was caſt into the ſame priſon in which Miltiades died, in order to oblige him to pay the fine inflicted on the deceaſed. Others ſay, that he voluntary ſacrificed his liberty to obtain the permiſſion to bury his father. However, a rich man, named Callias, being in love with Elpinice, his wife, offered to pay Cimon's debts, if he would give her up to him; but though Cimon rejected the propoſal, Elpinice declared ſhe would not ſuffer the ſon of Miltiades to die in priſon, and that ſince ſhe could prevent it, by eſpouſing Callias, who offered to marry her, ſhe was reſolved to do it. Afterwards Cimon ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Salamis, and became ſo agreeable to the Athenians, that they ſoon advanced him to the moſt conſiderable poſts. He defeated the Perſians and Thracians near the river Strymon. He conquered the Cyprian and Phœnician fleets, compoſed of two hundred ſail; and the ſame day gained a victory by land over the king of Perſia's army. He ſome time after made himſelf maſter of the iſles of Scyros and Thaſos, but was at length baniſhed, through the intrigues of Pericles and Ephialthes. However he was ſoon recalled, and declared commander of the Grecian fleet, when he took effectual meaſures for ſubduing the iſle of Cyprus and Egypt; but died at the ſiege of Citium, in the four hundred and forty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra. Never was general more generous and charitable to the poor. Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos have written his life.

CINALOA, a country of North America, on the eaſtern ſhore of the Californian gulph. The air is very healthy, and this diſtrict abounds with Indian corn, fruit, pulſe, and cotton. The natives are robuſt, and addicted to war.

CINCINATUS (Lutius Quinctius) a celebrated Roman, diſinherited his ſon for being frequently reprimanded by the cenſors, and was taken from the plough in order to be created dictator, in the four hundred and fifty eighth year before the Chriſtian æra, when the army, under the conſul Marcus Manutius, was on the point of having their intrenchments forced by the Æqui and Volſci. Cincinatus conquered the enemy, made them paſs under the yoke, and after having obtained a triumph, returned to the plough.

CINEAS, miniſter and favourite of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, was born in Theſſaly. During the war in Italy, Pyrrhus ſent him to Rome, to treat of a peace; and at his return, aſking him what he thought of the Roman ſenate. "It "ſeemed to me," he replied, "like an aſſembly of kings." This Cineas abridged Æneas, the Tactitian's book on the Defence of Places. Caſaubon has publiſhed this Abridgment, with a Latin verſion, and M. de Beauſobre has given a French tranſlation of it, with commentaries.

CINNA (Lucius Cornelius) a famous Roman conſul, in the eighty-ſeventh year before the birth of Chriſt, made a law for recalling all who were baniſhed; which Octavius, his colleague, who was one of Sylla's party, oppoſed, and drove him out of Rome; but Cinna ſoon returned with Marius, Sertorius, and the ſlaves to whom he promiſed liberty; when he killed Octavius, and rendered himſelf maſter of Mount Janiculus; but as he was juſt ready to make war on Sylla, he was ſtoned to death by his own army, on account of his cruelty, in the eighty-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra.

CINNAMUS (John) a Greek hiſtorian, of the twelfth century, who wrote a Hiſtory of the Reigns of John and Emanuel Comnenus, an edition of which has been printed at the Louvre, with learned notes by M. du Cange.

CINQUE Ports, towns ſeated on the coaſts of Kent and Suſſex, viz. Haſtings, Dover, Hithe, Romney, and Sandwich. They are under the government of the conſtable of Dover-caſtle, and had large privileges granted them on account of their fitting out ſhips for defence of the coaſt againſt Franee; but the ſea is now retired ſome diſtance from Romney and Sandwich.

CINTRA, a cape and mountain of Portugal, in the province of Eſtramadura, uſually called the rock of Liſbon. It is ſeated on the north ſide of the entrance of the river Tagus or Tajo. Long. 10. 15. W. Lat. 39. 0. N.

CINUS, or Cynus, a famous civilian, was of Piſtoia, and nobly deſcended. He wrote a Commentary on the Code, and on ſome parts of the Digeſts. He was alſo famous for his Italian poems, and is ranked among the firſt who began to add graces to the Tuſcan lyric poetry. He died at Bologna, in 1336.

CINYRAS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Aſſyria, according to certain writers; and of Cyprus, according to others; was famous for his begetting Adonis, on his own daughter Myrrha. This inceſt was involuntary with regard to Cinyras, who no ſooner knew that it was his daughter, than he endeavoured to murder her, but being prevented, would have laid violent hands on himſelf. Cinyras was to have furniſhed the Greeks with proviſions during the ſiege of Troy, but broke his promiſe; on which Agamemnon loaded him with imprecations, and the Greeks afterwards poſſeſſed themſelves of the iſland of Cyprus, and drove him out of it. According to ſome, he loſt his life by diſputing the prize of muſic with Apollo. He is ſuppoſed to live about one thouſand one hundred and ſeventy years before the Chriſtian æra.

CIOFANI (Hercules) a learned writer, in the ſixteenth century, was born at Sulmona, in Italy, and wrote Obſervations on Ovid's Metamorphoſes, which are much eſteemed.

CIOLEK (Erasmus) in Latin, Vitellius, biſhop of Ploczko, in Poland, was born at Cracow, of low and baſe extraction; but what he wanted in birth was largely compenſated by the penetration of his genius, by his wiſdom, his erudition, and eloquence. He was nominated to the biſhoprick of Ploczko in 1504, and was employed in ſeveral embaſſies to the emperor Maximilian I. and to the pope, and died at Rome, in the year 1521.

CIOTAT, a maritime town of France, in Provence, in the viguery of Aix. It is a trading place, well peopled, and famous for its muſcadine wines. Long. 5. 30. W. Lat. 43. 10. N.

CIPIERRE (Philibert de Marcilli, lord of) was a native of Maconnais, a country in Burgundy, and gave ſuch proofs of his courage and prudence, in the ſervice of Henry II. both in France and Italy, that this prince appointed him governor of the duke of Orleans, his ſecond ſon, who was afterwards Charles IX. king of France. It is ſaid, that had not others depraved the excellent education he had beſtowed on that young prince, he would have made him a great monarch. He died at Liege, in September, 1565.

CIR, a village of France, in the dioceſe of Chartres, about two miles from Verſailles, remarkable for a religious ſociety of nuns, founded by Lewis XIV. who are obliged to take care of the education of two hundred and fifty young girls, who are of noble families, up to the fourth generation on the father's ſide. They are not admitted before the age of ſeven, nor above that of twelve, nor can they ſtay there any longer than till they are twenty years and three months old. The houſe is magnificent, and well deſigned.

CIRCASSIA, a country of Aſia, between the ſea of Azoph and the Caſpian ſea, on the eaſt and weſt; as alſo between the two rivers Don and Volga; with Mengrelia and Dagheſtan on the ſouth. There is another country, called by the Turks Cara Cherkes, that is Black Circaſſia, which lies to the weſt of the former, between the Black ſea and the ſea of Azoph, and the inhabitants are a different people from the former. They are a ſort of Tartars, but are neither ſubject nor tributary to the Turks. The air is unhealthy, cold, and moiſt, and there are frequent fogs, which has gained it the name of Black. It produces no corn, nor any thing elſe of conſequence, for which reaſon the Turks never thought it worth while to conquer it. Beſides, they have ſuch an opinion of the diſpoſition of the inhabitants, that they never trade with them but with arms in their hands. They bring them neceſſaries, with which they purchaſe ſlaves of both ſexes, and of all ages, as well as the ſkins of the animals caught in the mountains. Theſe people are no better than ſavages, though they formerly pretended to be Chriſtians. At preſent they have no religion, unleſs you will call ſome ſuperſtitious cuſtoms by that name, derived both from Chriſtianity and Mahommedaniſm. They live in wretched wooden huts, and go almoſt naked. They are always at enmity with each other, for thoſe which are ſtrongeſt will take others priſoners, to ſell them to the Turks or Tartars.

Circaſſia, properly ſo called, belongs partly to the Turks, and partly to the Ruſſians. The natives are of a yellowiſh complexion, but not ſo broad faced as the Nogaian Tartars. Their hair is black and long, but they ſhave the middle of their heads, from the forehead to the neck, about the breadth of an inch, only they leave a little lock on the crown, which falls down behind. They ſpeak the Muſcovite as well as the Tartarian language. Their outward gar-garments are a little ſhort cloak, of coarſe cloth, or ſheep-ſkin, which will not cover their whole bodies, and therefore they turn them towards the weather when it blows or rains. Their women are handſome, and have a good complexion; their hair hangs down in two treſſes on each ſide their faces, which are never covered. They wear a black cap on their heads, covered with a piece of fine cotton, or wrought linen, which they tie under their chin. In the ſummer they wear only a ſmock, which is open down to their navels. About their necks they wear amber beads, ſhells, and copper necklaces. The men are not jealous, but freely leave ſtrangers with their wives, ſome ſay out of complaiſance, and add that the women are exceeding free, and will let them take any liberty but the laſt favour of all. They are mighty fond of examining the dreſs of all ſtrangers, and will invite men to their houſes, to be at liberty to toy with them as long as they pleaſe. They may marry ſeveral wives, and when the man dies, the brother is obliged to take them for his. When the widow has no brother-in-law to take her home, ſhe wears a blown ox-bladder hanging behind on her neck, and is dreſſed in cotton, or any coloured ſtuff, according to her own fancy.

Their religion is pagan, if they have any at all; for they have neither Bible, nor Alcoran, nor prieſts, nor churches, only they offer ſacrifices, eſpecially on the feſtival of St. Elias. They uſe circumciſion, and when one of their principal men dies, the relations and friends, both men and women, meet in the fields to ſacrifice an he-goat, which they firſt flea alive, and then place his ſkin on the top of a long pole. Then they perform the ceremonies of boiling and roaſting the fleſh, which they afterwards eat: as ſoon as the feaſt is ended, the men riſe and worſhip the ſkin, after which the women withdraw, and the men drink boſa, a ſort of ſpirituous liquor, till they are intoxicated, and then they generally quarrel and fight. The ſkin remains on the pole till another great perſon dies, and then it is changed with the ſame ceremonies.

In 1739 theſe people were reſtored to their liberty by a peace concluded between the Ruſſians and the Turks, in which it was agreed that this country ſhould ſerve as a barrier between them both, without depending on either.

CIRCE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Phœbus, by Perſis, and a famous ſorcereſs. She poiſoned her huſband, the king of the Sarmatæ, for which ſhe was expelled the kingdom, and fled to a promontory on the coaſt of Tuſcany, which afterwards took her name. There ſhe fell in love with Glaucus, who preferring Scylla to her, ſhe changed her into a ſea-monſter. She alſo transformed Picus, king of the Latins, into a woodpecker: and Ulyſſes being caſt away on her coaſt, ſhe received him kindly, but transformed his companions into ſwine and other beaſts. But Ulyſſes was preſerved by Mercury, who gave him the herb moly to ſecure him from her enchantments, and ordered him, when ſhe attempted to touch him with her wand, to draw his ſword, and make her ſwear by the river Styx, that ſhe would uſe him as a friend, otherwiſe he would kill her.

Mythologiſts obſerve, that Circe is a lively image of ſenſual pleaſure, which degrades the man and changes him into a brute. But it is maintained, that the original of this fable was the Egyptian Iſis, whoſe Horus, or attending image, every month aſſumed ſome different form; as the body of a man, with the heads of a lion, dog, ſerpent, or tortoiſe; to which the Egyptians gave the name Circe or Ænigma.

CIRCENSIAN GAMES, Circenſes ludi, in Roman antiquity, were the combats exhibited in the Circus, in imitation of the Olympic games of Greece. The feaſts of the Romans were generally accompanied with Circenſian games; and the magiſtrates and other officers of that republic, frequently preſented the people with them, in order to procure their favour. The principal Circenſian-games were held for five days, and began on the 15th of September; there were then ſix kinds of games exhibited; the firſt being wreſtling, and fighting with ſwords, ſtaves, and pikes; the ſecond was foot-races; the third, leaping; the fourth, diſci, or quoits, arrows, and the ceſtus; the fifth was horſe-races; and the ſixth chariot-races, with two or four horſes.

CIRCUS, in antiquity, a piece of ground ſurrounded by a large building, of a round or oval form, erected by the antients to exhibit ſhews to the people. The Roman Circus was encompaſſed by a very large oblong edifice, arched at one end, adorned with porticos, and furniſhed with ranges of ſeats for the convenience of the ſpectators. In the middle was an eminence, with poſts at each end, where the racers ſtarted, and concluded the race; and between theſe poſts was a row of obeliſks and ſtatues.

There were ſeveral of theſe Circi in Rome, as thoſe of Flaminius, Nero, Caracalla, and Severus; but the moſt remarkable was the Circus Maximus, firſt built by Tarquinius Priſcus, which contained four acres, with ſeats for a hundred and fifty thouſand men. The edifice was beautified and enlarged by ſucceeding princes, ſo as to contain in their proper ſeats two hundred and ſixty thouſand ſpectators. For the games exhibited in the Circus ſee CIRCENSIAN GAMES.

CIRENCESTER, an ancient town in Glouceſterſhire, with two markets on Mondays and Fridays. It was ſtrongly fortified with walls and a caſtle, in the times of the Romans; for the ruins of the walls and ſtreet are, or were, lately to be ſeen in the adjacent meadows, where many Roman coins, chequered pavements, and inſcriptions on marble have been found. Two of the Roman conſular ways, croſs each other at this town. The foſſe-way, which comes from Scotland, paſſes through this county and town to Totneſs in Devonſhire. The other, called Irmin-ſtreet, comes from Glouſter, and runs along to Southampton. Not many years ago they diſcovered, by digging in a meadow near the town, an ancient building under ground, fifty feet long, forty broad, and four high, ſupported by a hundred brick pillars, curiouſly inlaid with ſtones of various colours, ſuppoſed to have been a Roman bath. Cirenceſter has now but one church, in the windows of which are the remains of very valuable painted glaſs. The town is governed by two high-conſtables, and fourteen wards-men, who govern ſeven diſtinct wards, and it ſends two members to parliament. It has a free-ſchool, a charity-ſchool, with ſeveral almshouſes. The fairs are on Eaſter Tueſday, July 18, and November 8, for cattle, ſheep, horſes, wool, oil, and leather. It is ſeated on the river Churn, thirty-ſix miles north-eaſt of Briſtol, and eighty-eight weſt by north of London. Long. 0. 2. W. Lat. 51. 42. N.

CIRENZA, a city of Naples, capital of the Baſilicate, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It was formerly a conſiderable place, but is now of ſmall conſequence. It is ſeated on the river Brandano, at the foot of the Appenine mountains, thirty-five miles eaſt of Conza, fifty ſouth-weſt of Bari, thirteen ſouth-eaſt of Venuſa, and ninety-eight eaſt of Naples. Long. 16. 44. E. Lat. 40. 48. N.

CIRO-FERRI, an excellent Italian painter and architect, was born at Rome, in the year 1614, and was the diſciple of Peter de Cortona, whoſe deſigns he imitated with ſuch exactneſs, that it is difficult to diſtinguiſh them. He was eſteemed by pope Alexander VII. and his three ſucceſſors, and died at Rome in 1689. He is cenſured for not ſufficiently animating and varying his characters.

CISSUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a youth who was greatly eſteemed by Bacchus; but ſporting with the ſatyrs he was accidentally killed; upon which Bacchus changed him into the plant ivy, which became in a peculiar manner conſecrated to him.

CITADELLA, the capital town in the iſland of Minorca, in the Mediterranean, with a new harbour. This, with the whole iſland, were taken by general Stanhope and the confederate fleet, in 1708, and ceded to Great Britain by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713; but it was taken by the French, after a brave defence, in 1756, and reſtored by the peace. It is twenty-ſeven miles weſt of Port Mahon. Long. 3. 30. E. Lat. 39. 58. N.

CITTA-DI-CASTELLO, a town of Italy, with a biſhop's ſee. It is pretty ſtrong, well peopled, and ſeated on the Tiber, twenty-ſeven miles ſouth-weſt of Urbino, twenty-five north-weſt of Perugio, and one hundred north of Rome. Long. 12. 18 E. Lat. 43. 28. N.

CITTA NUOVA, a maritime town of Italy, in Iſtria, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſixty miles eaſt of Venice. Long. 15. 0. E. Lat. 43. 12. N.

CIVIC CROWN, in Roman antiquity, a crown or wreath compoſed of an oak bough, given to any ſoldier who ſaved the life of a citizen in an engagement. This was accounted more honourable than any other crown; and he who obtained it, was not only excuſed from all troubleſome duties in his own perſon, but procured the ſame privilege for his father and grandfather. He had the peculiar honour when he came to any of the public ſhews, of having the whole company, as well the ſenate as the people, ſhew their reſpect, by riſing up as ſoon as they ſaw him enter; and of taking his place, upon theſe occaſions, among the ſenators.

CIVIDAD DE LAS PALMAS, the capital of the iſland of Canary, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in the ſouth-ſouth-eaſt part of the iſland, about five miles from the ſea, where the ſhips anchor. It is defended by a ſorry caſtle, which ſtands on a mountain. The town is about three miles in compaſs, and contains about twelve thouſand inhabitants. The houſes are well built, though they are but one ſtory high, and are all terraſſed on the top. In the day-time, there is hardly any perſon to be ſeen in the ſtreets. In this place is kept the tribunal of the inquiſition, and the ſovereign council, which is the ſupreme court of judicature in all the Canary iſlands. Here are four religious houſes; two for monks, and two for nuns. It is ſubject to Spain. Long. 14. 35. W. Lat. 28. 0. N.

CIVIDAD REAL, a town of Spain in New Caſtile, and capital of La Mancha. It is a little agreeable town, and is pretty well peopled. It is ſeated low, in the middle of a plain, and is noted for dreſſing leather for gloves. The parts about it produce wine, corn, cattle, honey, and game in abundance. It is three miles from the river Guadiana, and when there is an inundation of that river, the water ſometimes comes up to the very walls. It is thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Calatrava, and ninety ſouth of Madrid. Long. 4. 15. W. Lat. 39. 2. N.

CIVIDAD RODERIGO, a ſtrong city of Spain, in the kingdom of Leon, with a biſhop's ſee. It was taken by the Portugueſe, in 1706; but they loſt it again in four days time. It is ſeated in a champaign country, on the river Aguada, one hundred and fifteen miles weſt of Madrid, and forty ſouth-weſt of Salamanca. Long. 6. 52. W. Lat. 40. 38. N.

CIVIDAL DI FRIULI, a town of Italy, in Friuli, and in the territories of Venice. It is ſeated on the river Natiſona, eight miles north-eaſt of Udina. Long. 13. 25. E. Lat. 46. 15. N.

CIVITA DI PINNA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Abruzzo, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated near the river Sabino, twenty-five miles north of Aquila, and ten weſt of Chieti. Long. 14 3. E. Lat 42. 25. N.

CIVITA VECCHIA, a maritime town of Italy, in the Patrimony of St. Peter, fortified by pope Urban VIII. It has an arſenal and a harbour, where the pope's gallies generally lie; but the air is very unhealthy. It is thirty-five miles north weſt of Rome, and thirty-five north-eaſt of Caſtro. It has been lately made a free port. Long. 12. 10. E. Lat. 42. 5. N.

CIVOLI, or CIGOLI, (LEWIS) an Italian painter, whoſe family-name was Cardi, was born at the caſtle of Cigoli, in Tuſcany, in the year 1559. He divided his time between painting, poetry, and muſic; and was received into the academy de la Cruſca, and into that of Florence. Civoli played admirably well on his lute; but being one day reproached with taking more pleaſure in playing on that inſtrument than in finiſhing his pictures, he broke it to pieces. His Ecce Homo, which he performed as a trial of ſkill with Barochio and Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, was judged better than thoſe executed by thoſe two painters. He excelled in deſigning, and was employed by the popes and princes of his time. He died at Rome, in the year 1613.

CLACKMANAN, a town of Scotland, and capital of a ſmall ſhire of the ſame name. It is ſeated on the north ſhore of the river Forth, twenty miles north of Edinburgh. Robert Bruce, king of Scotland formerly reſided here. Long. 3. 36. W. Lat. 56. 15 N.

CLAGENFURT, a ſtrong and regular town of Germany, capital of Lower Carinthia. It is of a ſquare figure, and all the ſtreets as ſtrait as a line. The ramparts are ſo large, that ſix coaches may go on them a-breaſt. The fineſt buildings are the prince's palace, the hotel of the bailiff, the town-houſe and the Jeſuit's college. It belongs to the houſe of Auſtria, and is ſeated eight miles ſouth-weſt of Weit, and one hundred and fifty ſouth-weſt of Vienna. Long. 14. 20. W. Lat. 46. 50. N.

CLAGETT (NICOLAS) an eminent divine, born at Canterbury, about the year 1607. He was educated at Oxford; and about the year 1636, became vicar of Melbourne, in Dorſetſhire; and ſome years after, was elected preacher, at St. Mary's church, in St. Edmund's Bury, Suffolk. He was held in great veneration for his improving way of preaching, and for his ſingular piety. He publiſhed The Abuſes of God's Grace diſcovered; and died Sept. 12, 1663.

CLAGETT (WILLIAM) D. D. a valuable and learned divine, was the eldeſt ſon of the former, and was born at St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk, Sept. 14, 1646. He was educated at Cambridge, and commenced doctor of divinity in 1683. He preached for ſeven years at his native town, and was afterwards preacher at Gray's Inn, beſides which employment, he had afterwards the rectory of Farnham Royal, in Buckinghamſhire, was lecturer of St. Michael Baſſiſhaw, and chaplain in ordinary to his majeſty. He wrote, 1. A Diſcourſe concerning the Operations of the Spirit. 2. An Anſwer to the Diſſenters Objections againſt the Common Prayer. 3. Several Treatiſes againſt the Doctrines of Popery; and other works. There are alſo four volumes of his poſthumous ſermons. He died March 28, 1688.

CLAGETT (NICOLAS) D. D. a learned divine, brother to the former, was born in the year 1654, and educated at Cambridge. He was elected preacher at St. Mary's, in St. Edmund's Bury, in 1680, and in this ſtation continued near forty-ſix years. In 1683, he was inſtituted to the rectory of Thurlo Parva; in 1693, was collated to the archdeaconry of Sudbury; in 1704, he commenced doctor of divinity; and in 1707, he was alſo inſtituted into the rectory of Hitcham, in Suffolk. He publiſhed, 1. Truth defended, and Boldneſs in Error rebuked, in Anſwer to Mr. Whiſton's Accompliſhment of Scripture Prophecies. 2. A Perſuaſive to an ingenuous Trial of Opinions in Religion; and three Sermons. He died Jan. 27, 1726 7, in the ſeventy-third year of his age.

CLAIRA (St.) an abbeſs, born at Aſſiſio, in the duchy of Spoleto, in Italy, in 1193. She put herſelf under the conduct of St. Francis, who gave her the church of St. Damian, where ſhe eſtabliſhed a convent, of which ſhe was abbeſs. She died in 1253, and was canonized a ſhort time after, by pope Alexander IV.

The nuns of the order of St. Claira are divided into Damianiſts and Urbaniſts. The firſt follow the rule given to St. Claira by St. Francis; but the others have ſeveral mitigations, and follow the regulations allowed by Urban IV.

CLANS, in hiſtory, and particularly in that of Scotland. The nations which over ran Europe were originally divided into many ſmall tribes; and when they came to parcel out the lands which they had conquered, it was natural for every chieftain to beſtow a portion, in the firſt place, upon thoſe of his own tribe or family. Theſe all held their lands of him; and as the ſafety of each individual depended on the general union, theſe ſmall ſocieties clung together, and were diſtinguiſhed by ſome common appellation, either patronymical, or local, long before the introduction of ſurnames, or enſigns memorial. But when theſe became common, the deſcendants and relations of every chieftain aſſumed the ſame name and arms with him; other vaſſals were proud to imitate their example; and by degrees they were communicated to all thoſe who held of the ſame ſuperior. Thus clanſhips were formed; and, in a generation or two, that conſanguinity, which was at firſt in a great meaſure imaginary, was believed to be real. An artificial union was converted into a natural one; men willingly followed a leader, whom they regarded both as the ſuperior of their lands, and the chief of their blood, and ſerved him not only with the fidelity of vaſſals, but the affection of friends. In the other feudal kingdoms, we may obſerve ſuch unions as we have deſcribed, imperfectly formed; but in Scotland, whether they were the production of chance, or the effect of policy, or ſtrengthened by their preſerving their genealogies both genuine and fabulous, clanſhips were univerſal. Such a confederacy might be overcome; it could not be broken; and no change of manners or government has been able, in ſome parts of the kingdom, to diſſolve aſſociations which are founded upon prejudices ſo natural to the human mind. How formidable were nobles at the head of followers, who, counting that cauſe juſt and honourable which their chief approved, were ever ready to take the field at his command, and to ſacrifice their lives in defence of his perſon or of his fame? Againſt ſuch men a king contended with great diſadvantage; and that cold ſervice, which money purchaſes, or authority extorts, was not an equal match for their ardour and zeal. Robertſon's Hiſtory of Scotland.

CLARA (ST) a ſmall iſland of the South Sea, ſeated near the bay of Guaiaquil, in Peru, ſixty-three miles from cape Blanco. Long. 80. 20. W. Lat. 3 30. S.

CLARE, a town in Suffolk, with a market on Fridays. It is a poor dirty place, but has a handſome church. The fairs are on Eaſter Tueſday, and July 26, for toys. It is fourteen miles ſouth of Bury, ſeventeen ſouth-eaſt of Cambridge, and fifty-ſix ſouth by-eaſt of London. Long 0. 37. E. Lat. 52. 15. N.

CLARE, a town of Ireland, capital of the county of Clare, in the province of Connaught. It is ſeventeen miles north-weſt of Limerick. Long. 9. 5. W. Lat 52. 40 N.

CLARENDON (earl of). See HYDE.

CLARENZA, formerly a conſiderable town of the Morea, but is now almoſt ruined. Long. 21. 41. E. Lat. 37. 55. N.

CLARIUS, or CLARIO, (ISIDORE, a learned divine in the ſixteenth century, born at the caſtle of Chiaria, near Breſſe. He was preſent at the council of Trent; and Paul III. gave him the biſhoprick of Fuligno, where he died in 1555. He wrote ſeveral works, the principal of which are a Treatiſe on the Correction of the Text of the Vulgate, and Notes on the difficult Paſſages in the Bible.

CLARKE (SAMUEL) D. D. a preacher and writer of conſiderable note in the reign of king Charles II. was, during the Interregnum, and at the time of the ejection, miniſter of St. Bennet Fink, in London. In November, 1660, he, in the name of the Preſbyterian miniſters, preſented an addreſs of thanks to the king, for his declaration for liberty of conſcience. He was one of the commiſſioners of the Savoy, and behaved, on that occaſion, with great prudence and moderation. He ſometimes attended the church as an hearer and communicant, and was much eſteemed by all that knew him for his great probity and induſtry. The moſt valuable of his numerous works are ſaid to be his Lives of the Puritan Divines and other Perſons of Note, twenty-two of which are printed with his Martyrology; the reſt are in his Lives of ſundry eminent Perſons in this latter Age, folio, and in his Marrow of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in folio and quarto. He died on the 25th of December, 1680.

CLARKE (SAMUEL) the ſon of the former, was fellow of Pembroke-hall, in Cambridge, but was ejected from his fellowſhip for refuſing to take the engagements, as he was alſo afterwards from his rectory of Grendon, in Buckinghamſhire. He applied himſelf early to the ſtudy of the Scriptures, and his Annotations on the Bible, printed together with the ſacred text, is highly commended by Dr. Owen, Mr. Baxter, and Dr. Calamy, and has been an excellent fund for ſome modern commentators, who have republiſhed a great part of it, with very little alteration. He died on the 24th of February, 1700-1, in the ſeventy-fifth year of his age.

CLARKE (Dr. SAMUEL) a very learned and eminent divine, born at Norwich, Oct. 11, 1675, and educated at Cambridge, where he greatly contributed, by his excellent Tranſlation of, and Notes upon, Rohault's Phyſics, to the eſtabliſhment of the Newtonian Philoſophy. Having taken holy orders, he became chaplain to Dr. John Moore, biſhop of Norwich, who gave him the rectory of Drayton, near Norwich, and procured for him a pariſh in that city. In 1704 and 1705 he preached Mr. Boyle's Lectures on the evidences of natural and revealed religion, and choſe for his ſubject the being and attributes of God. In 1706 he obtained the rectory of St. Bennet Paul's Wharf, in London; he was ſoon after made chaplain in ordinary to queen Anne, and, in the year 1709, was preſented to the rectory of St. James's, Weſtminſter, from which time he left off his cuſtom of preaching without notes, and took the degree of doctor of divinity at Cambridge. In 1712 he publiſhed his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, which engaged him in a warm controverſy. Complaint was made of this book in the lower houſe of convocation; but the affair ſoon ended, upon the members of the upper houſe declaring themſelves ſatisfied with the explanations delivered in to them by the author on the ſubject of the complaint. He alſo publiſhed three practical Eſſays on Baptiſm, Confirmation, and Repentance; a Paraphraſe on the Goſpels; a Tranſlation of Sir Iſaac Newton's Optics into elegant Latin; a beautiful edition of Cæſar's Commentaries; the twelve firſt books of Homer's Iliad, in quarto, and ſeveral other works. After his death were publiſhed his Expoſition of the Church Catechiſm, and ten volumes of Sermons. This great divine died on the 17th of June, 1729. Dr. Clarke was remarkable for his great ſkill in the three learned languages, in mathematics, and mechanics. A ſweet, eaſy, modeſt, inoffenſive, obliging behaviour adorned all his actions, and no paſſion, vanity, inſolence, or oſtentation, appeared either in what he wrote or ſaid. His piety was manly and unaffected, and his charity as extenſive as the whole rational creation.

CLARKSON (DAVID) an eminent divine, who was fellow of Clare-hall, in Cambridge, and had the honour of inſtructing archbiſhop Tillotſon, one of the greateſt, and one of the beſt men this kingdom has produced. He was a man of uncommon learning and abilities, and of ſingular modeſty and humility. His ſermons are eſteemed judicious, but the moſt noted of his works is that intitled, No Evidence of Dioceſean Epiſcopacy in the Primitive Times, quarto, in anſwer to Dr. Stillingfleet.

CLARUS (JULIUS) a native of Alexandria, in the Milaneſe, and of a patrician family, was born January 6, 1525. He publiſhed part of a great work, entitled Receptarum Sententiarum, and died April 13, 1575.

CLAUBERGE (JOHN) a learned profeſſor of philoſophy and divinity, at Duiſburg, was born at Solingen, on the 24th of February, 1622. He travelled into Holland, France, and England, and in each country obtained the eſteem of the learned. The elector of Brandenburg gave him public teſtimonies of his eſteem. He died on the 31ſt of January, 1665. His works were printed at Amſterdam, in two volumes, quarto.

CLAUDE of Lorrain, a celebrated landſcape painter, was born in the year 1600, and proving extremely dull, was put apprentice to a paſtry-cook. He afterwards went to Rome, where he was hired by Auguſtius Traſſo to grind his colours, dreſs his proviſions, and do all his houſhold drudgery, for Auguſtius kept no other ſervant. From this maſter, he, with great difficulty, learnt perſpective, and the elements of deſigning. His ſoul now enlarged itſelf, and his eagerneſs to obtain perfection made him continue, from morning till night, in the open fields, on the banks of the Tiber, taking all his leſſons from nature, by which means he attained the higheſt degree of perfection in landſcape painting, and became univerſally admired for his agreeable invention, the delicacy of his colouring, the pleaſing variety and tenderneſs of his tints, his artful diſtribution of his lights and ſhadows, and the harmony of his compoſitions. He was employed by pope Urban VIII. and many of the Italian princes, in adorning their palaces, and died in 1682, in the eighty-ſecond year of his age.

CLAUDE (JOHN) an eminent Proteſtant miniſter of the church of Paris, was born at Sauvetat, in Agenois, in the year 1619. He was ſucceſſively miniſter of ſeveral congregations in France, and occaſioned a famous diſpute by writing a little book againſt the perpetuity of the catholic church. He was baniſhed by the edict of Nantz, and died in Holland, on the 12th of January, 1687.

CLAUDE, a town of France, in the Franche Comté, with a biſhop's ſee. The cathedral church is a fine ſtructure. A great number of pilgrims flock thither to viſit the relics of St. Claude. It is ſeated on the rivulet, fifteen miles north-weſt of Geneva, and fifty-eight ſouth of Beſançon. Long. 6. 0. E. Lat. 46. 20. N.

CLAUDIA, a veſtal virgin at Rome, who being ſuſpected of unchaſtity, is ſaid to have cleared herſelf from that imputation in the following manner: the image of Cybele being brought out of Phrygia to Rome in a barge, and it happening to ſtick ſo faſt in the river Tyber that it could not be moved, ſhe tying her girdle, the badge of chaſtity, to the barge, drew it along to the city, which a thouſand men were unable to do.

CLAUDIAN, a Latin poet under Theodoſius and his ſons, flouriſhed in the fourth century, and is thought to have more of Virgil in his ſtyle than all the other imitators of that poet. The beſt edition of his works is that of Heinſius, junior. That of Barthius is alſo eſteemed.

CLAUDIUS (APPIUS) a Roman decemvir, well known by the death of Virginia. See VIRGINIA.

CLAUDIUS, or TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS DRUSUS, emperor of Rome, was the ſon of Druſus, ſecond ſon of Livia, daughter of Auguſtus, and nephew to Tiberius. He was born at Lyons in the tenth year before the Chriſtian æra. During his youth he was ſo weak in body and mind, that his mother when ſhe would deſcribe a very ſtupid perſon, uſed to ſay, that "he was as great a fool as her Clau-"dius." This prince was conſul in the year 37; but acquitted himſelf ſo ill in the diſcharge of that important office, that he rendered himſelf deſpicable in the eyes of the people: but afterwards hiding himſelf, that he might eſcape the aſſaſſins of Caligula, he was diſcovered by a ſoldier, who ſaluted him emperor. Scarce was he mounted on the throne, when he took particular care to furniſh the city of Rome with proviſions, which, joined to the contempt he ſhewed for grandeur, gained him the love of the people. He puniſhed Chereas, baniſhed Seneca, and put to death Julia, the ſiſter of Caligula. He would not ſuffer any perſon who was ignorant of the Latin tongue to poſſeſs an employment, yet had a great value for the Greek language, and even ſpoke it when he himſelf anſwered the ambaſſadors in the ſenate. In his time the Moors were conquered, and their country reduced to two Roman provinces. The Britons rebelling, Claudius came into this iſland, and having reduced its inhabitants, obtained a triumph in the year 44. But at length he ſuffered himſelf to be governed by his freedmen, and the moſt vile and deſpicable perſons, who diſhonoured the empire by baniſhments, maſſacres, and the moſt infamous vices.

This prince was four times married. Meſſalina, his third wife, was a monſter of luſt and debauchery; and young Agrippina, his neice and fourth wife, poiſoned him in the year 54, though he had adopted Nero, the ſon of that princeſs, to the prejudice of his ſon Britannicus. Claudius invented three letters, and compoſed ſome works, which are loſt.

CLAUDIUS II. (AURELIUS) ſurnamed Gothicus, ſignalized himſelf by his courage and prudence under the reigns of Valerian and Julian, and on the death of the latter was declared emperor, in 268. He put to death Aureolus, the murderer of Galienus; defeated the Germans, and in 269 marched againſt the Goths, who ravaged the empire with an army of three hundred thouſand men, which he at firſt harraſſed, and the next year entirely defeated; but a contagious diſeaſe, which had ſpread through that vaſt army, was caught by the Romans, and the emperor himſelf died of it a ſhort time after, aged ſifty ſix.

Pollio ſays that this prince had the moderation of Auguſtus, the virtue of Trajan, and the piety of Antoninus.

CLAUDIUS MARIUS VICTOR, or VICTORINUS, a rhetorician and poet, born at Marſeilles. He wrote a kind of Commentary on the book of Geneſis, in hexameter verſe, and an Epiſtle addreſſed to the abbot Salomon on the corruption of manners in his time, and died in 445.

CLAVIUS (CHRISTOPHER) a German Jeſuit, born at Bamberg, excelled in the knowledge of the mathematics, and being ſent to Rome, was conſidered as the Euclid of that age. In 1581 he was employed by pope Gregory XIII in reforming the Roman Calendar, in which he acquitted himſelf very well; he afterwards defended the new calendar againſt thoſe who criticized it, particularly againſt Sca-liger. He died at Rome on the ſixth of February 1612, aged ſeventy-five. His works have been printed in five volumes folio, the principal of which is his Commentary on Euclid's Elements.

CLAUSENBURGH, a large city of Tranſylvania, near the confines of Hungary, ſeated on the little river Samos. It has a conſiderable trade, and is defended by a good fortreſs, and is very populous, becauſe the free exerciſe of all religions is allowed. The Jeſuits have an univerſity, and the Reformed a fine college here; but they have been obliged to give up the cathedral to the Roman catholics. Within the city there is an old caſtle, where the ſtates generally hold their aſſemblies. It is thirty-eight miles north-weſt of Weiſſemburg, fifty-five eaſt of Waradin, and two hundred and ſixty eaſt-by-ſouth of Vienna. Long. 23. 5. E. Lat. 47. 14. N.

CLEANTHES, a celebrated Greek philoſopher, of the ſect of the Stoics, was the ſon of Phanias, and the diſciple of Zeno, two hundred and forty years before the Chriſtian æra. He was a native of the town of Aſſon in Epirus, and gained his living by drawing water in the night, in order to obtain leiſure for ſtudy in the day. The judges of the Areopagus, not knowing how he ſubſiſted, ſent for him, and having aſked him what profeſſion he followed at Athens, he brought before them a woman for whom he kneaded bread, and a gardener for whom he worked, and on their teſtimonies he was diſcharged: the judges would then have made him a preſent, but he refuſed to accept it. Cleanthes ſucceeded Zeno, and had for his diſciples king Antigonus and Chryſippus, who was his ſucceſſor. It is ſaid that he voluntarily died of hunger in the ſeventieth year of his age. He compoſed ſeveral works, of which there are only a few fragments remaining.

CLEARCHUS, a famous Spartan, who being ſent to Byzantium to ſettle the domeſtic commotions which broke out there, obtained the ſupreme power, and ſoon after filled the city with blood and ſlaughter. The Lacedæmonians recalling him, he refuſed to obey them, which obliged them to ſend troops againſt him, when being defeated, he retired into Ionia to Cyrus the Younger, brother to Artaxerxes, king of Perſia, four hundred and three years before the birth of Chriſt. That young prince gave Clearchus the command of the Grecian troops in his pay; but two years after Cyrus loſt his life in the battle of Cunaxa, againſt his brother Artaxerxes. Clearchus was one of the chiefs who commanded the ten thouſand Greeks who fought for Cyrus, but was ſeized in his retreat, and put to death by the order of Artaxerxes.

He ought not to be confounded with Clearchus the tyrant of Heraclea, who was aſſaſſinated at the feaſt of Bacchus, in the three hundred and fifty-third year before the Chriſtian æra; or with Clearchus of Soli, a famous Peripatetic philoſopher, who was the diſciple of Ariſtotle, and is frequently mentioned in ancient authors.

CLEEVE (Joas Van) or Sotto Cleeff, an induſtrious painter of Antwerp. His colouring was good, and his figures round and fleſhy. He came to England in the reign of queen Mary, expecting great prices for his pictures from king Philip, who was making a collection; but Titian arriving at the ſame time, Philip was ſo much charmed with the beauties of the Venetian maſter, as to overlook the labours of the Fleming. Cleeve had been before intoxicated with the excellence of his own performances, and at this diſappointment grew quite frantic, painted his own cloaths, and ſpoiled his own pictures. His portrait, and that of his wife, done by himſelf, were purchaſed by king Charles I. who had alſo of this maſter a picture of Mars and Venus; and James II. had of his painting the Judgment of Paris, and the Birth of Chriſt with angels. He is ſuppoſed to have died in the wretched condition above-mentioned.

CLELIA, one of the young Roman women given as an hoſtage to Porſenna, who beſieged Rome about the five hundred and ſeventh year before the Chriſtian æra, in order to reſtore the Tarquins. It is ſaid, that having deceived her guards, ſhe eſcaped from the enemy's camp during the night, and croſſed the Tiber, but was ſent back to Porſenna, who demanded her by his ambaſſadors; but that prince admiring her virtue, permitted her to return to Rome with her companions. The ſenate erected an equeſtrian ſtatue of her in the market-place.

CLEMANGIS, or Claminges (Nicholas de) a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, was born in Clemangis, a village in the dioceſe of Chalons. He wrote ſeveral pieces in Latin, and died in 1430. His works were printed at Leyden, in 1713, in quarto.

CLEMENCY, in Pagan mythology, was repreſented as a goddeſs, with a branch of laurel in one hand, and a lance in the other, to ſhew that mildneſs and mercy properly belonged to victorious warriors. She had a temple at Athens; and at Rome a temple was dedicated to the Clemency of Cæſar, which was built by a decree of the ſenate, after the death of that emperor. And both the Greeks and Romans gave the name of aſſylum to the temples each had erected to this goddeſs, who is repreſented by Claudian as the guardian of the world.

CLEMENS (Titus Flavius) alſo called Clemens Alexandinus, a learned father of the church; who, after he had ſtudied in Greece, Italy, and the Eaſt, renounced the errors of paganiſm, and in 190 became preſbyter and catechiſt of Alexandria. St. Clemens acquitted himſelf worthily of this important office, and wrote ſeveral learned works, of which there are only three conſiderable ones remaining: 1. An Exhortation to the Pagans. 2. The Schoolmaſter, in which he lays down a regular plan of duty for the Chriſtian convert: and 3. The Stromates, in which he treats of the myſteries of religion. Beſides theſe works, there are preſerved ſome of his pieces of a ſmaller kind; as an Homily upon theſe words, What rich man can be ſaved? which was firſt printed at Paris, in 1672, and afterwards at Oxford, in 1683, with ſome other fragments in Greek and Latin. All theſe have been printed in the latter editions of his works: the beſt of which is that publiſhed in two volumes folio, by Dr. Potter, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in 1715. St. Clemens died about the year 220.

Clemens (Romanus) or Clement I. (St.) biſhop of Rome, ſucceeded Anacletus, about the year 90. He was the diſciple and coadjutor of the apoſtles. He governed the church with great wiſdom, and died about the year 100. He wrote an epiſtle to the Corinthians; and there have been attributed to him a ſecond epiſtle, Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, and other works, that are now generally allowed to have been written after his time. He was ſucceeded by Evariſtus.

Clement II. a Saxon, was biſhop of Bamberg, and was elected pope at the council of Sutri, in 1046. He died on the ſeventh of October, 1047, and was ſucceeded by Damaſus II.

Clement III. a Roman, was elected pope after the death of Gregory VIII. on the 6th of January 1188, and died on the the 25th of March 1191, after his having publiſhed a cruſade againſt the Saracens. He was ſucceeded by Celeſtine III.

Clement IV. a Frenchman, was firſt a ſoldier, and afterwards ſtudied with ſuch ſucceſs, that he paſſed for one of the ableſt civilians of his time: but his wife dying, he turned prieſt; and, after ſeveral preferments, was cardinal biſhop, and the pope's legate in England. He was elected pope at Perouſa, on the 15th of February, 1265, and died at Viterbo on the 29th of November, 1268. He wrote ſeveral works.

Clement V. a Frenchman, whoſe original name was Bertrand de Gouth. Benedict XI. dying in 1304, Bertrand was elected pope at Perouſa, on the 5th of June 1305; and the ceremony of his coronation was performed at Lyons, on the 10th of November following, when a wall, overloaded with people who had got upon it, fell down, and killed John II. duke of Brittany, wounded the French king, and beat the tiara off the pope's head. This accident was conſidered as a preſage of the misfortunes with which Chriſtendom, and particularly Italy were afflicted, during this pontificate. Clement V. was the firſt pope who reſided at Avignon. He cauſed the collection of the Conſtitutions to be made, which are diſtinguiſhed by the name of Clementines, and died at Roquemaure, on the Rhone, in 1314. He was ſucceeded by John XXII.

Clement VI. a native of Limoſin, whoſe name was Peter Roger, was choſen pope after the death of Benedict XII. on the 13th of May 1342. He ordered the jubilee to be kept every fiftieth year, and died at Avignon on the 6th of December 1352. He was learned, and was remarkable for his prodigious memory. Petrarch, who was his cotemporary, gives him a great eloguim. He was ſucceeded by Innocent VI.

Clement VII. before called Julius de Medicis, was elected pope in 1523, after the death of Adrian VI. He received a famous embaſſy from the king of Ethiopia; entered into an alliance with France and the Venetians, againſt the emperor Charles V. and was beſieged in Rome by that prince's army, which obliged him to ſave himſelf by making his eſcape in diſguiſe; but, being afterwards taken priſoner, he let his beard grow during the ſeven months of his captivity, and would never after cut it off. In ſhort he concluded a peace with the emperor, in 1529, excommunicated Henry VIII. king of England, and died on the 26th of September, 1534.

He ought not to be confounded with Robert of Geneva, a perſon of great merit, who after the election of Urban VI. was choſen pope at Fundi, on the 21ſt of September 1378, by ſeveral cardinals, who pretended that they were not free in the election of Urban VI. Robert took the name of Clement VII. retired to Avignon, and was acknowledged by France and Spain. His election cauſed a great ſchiſm in the the Weſtern church, which did not end till fifty years after, when it was terminated by the abdication of the anti-pope Clement VIII. in 1429, who acknowledged Martin V.

CLEMENT VIII. before called Hippolytus Aldrobrandin, was born at Fano, and was elected pope after the death of Innocent IX. on the 30th of January, 1591. He ſtrove to make piety and knowledge flouriſh in the church; condemned duels; and gave abſolution to Henry IV. of France. He rewarded men of merit and learning; and made Baronius, Bellarmin, Tolet, d'Oſſat, du Perron, and ſeveral other great men cardinals. He died on the 3d of March, 1605, aged ſixty-nine, and was ſucceeded by Leo XI.

CLEMENT IX. before called Julius Roſpig'ioſi, was elected pope after the death of Alexander VII. on the 20th of June, 1667. He zealouſly endeavoured to unite the Chriſtian princes, and to procure aſſiſtance for the Venetians, againſt the Turks, who had beſieged Candia; but not being able to prevent the loſs of that important place, he died with vexation, on the 9th of December, 1669, aged ſeventy-one, and was ſucceeded by Clement X.

CLEMENT X. or EMILIUS ALTERI, was choſen pope after the death of Clement IX. on the 29th of April, 1670. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his humility, and diſcovered, during his pontificate, a mild, tranquil, and pacific ſpirit. He died on the 22d of July, 1676, aged eighty-ſix, and was ſucceeded by Innocent XI.

CLEMENT XI. or JOHN FRANCIS ALBANI, was elected pope after the death of Innocent XII. on the 20th of November, 1700. He aſſiſted the poor; confirmed the condemnation of the five famous propoſitions of Janſenius, by the bull Vineam Domini Sabaoth; condemned the ſuperſtitious practices of ſome of the miſſionaries of China, and gave the conſtitution Unigenitus, againſt an hundred and one propoſitions extracted from father Queſnel's Moral Reflections on the New Teſtament. He wrote ſome Homilies and other works, which are printed in two volumes, folio, and died on the 19th of March, 1721, aged ſeventy-two. He was ſucceeded by Innocent XIII.

CLEMENT XII. or LAURENCE CORSINI, was born at Florence, of a noble and ancient family, on the 7th of April, 1652, and was elected pope on the 12th of July, 1730, after the death of Benedict XIII. He eaſed the people under his government by diminiſhing their taxes; puniſhed thoſe who had behaved ill in their poſts under the laſt pontificate, and governed the church with wiſdom and tranquility. He died on the 6th of February, 1740, aged eighty-eight, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Proſper Lambertini, who took the name of Benedict XIV.

CLEMENT (MARGARET) a very accompliſhed lady, was born in the year 1508, and being nearly related to ſir Thomas More, was carefully educated with his daughters in the learned languages, and in moſt of the liberal ſciences, in which ſhe made great progreſs. She correſponded with the celebrated Eraſmus, who commends her epiſtles for their good ſenſe and chaſte Latin. About the year 1531, ſhe was married to her learned tutor, whoſe nuptials were celebrated by a copy of Latin verſes, wrote by Leland. She afterwards left England, with her huſband, Dr. Clement, and ſettled at Mecklin, where ſhe died on the 6th of July 1570.

CLEMENT (JAMES) a Dominican monk, born at the village of Sorbon, near Sens, was educated in the convent of Dominicans in that town, and, at the age of twenty-two years, aſſaſſinated king Henry III. of France at St. Cloud, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1589.

CLENARD (NICHOLAS) a celebrated grammarian in the ſixteenth century, was born at Dieſt, and after having taught humanity at Louvain, travelled into France, Spain, Portugal, and Africa. He wrote in Latin 1. Letters relating to his Travels, which are very curious and ſcarce. 2. A Greek Grammar, which has been reviſed and corrected by many grammarians; and other works. He died at Grenoble in 1542.

CLEOBULUS, the ſon of Evagoras, and one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, was born at Lindus, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and good ſenſe. He loved the ſciences, and particularly deteſted inſincerity and ingratitude. He adviſed the people "to do good to their friends, "in order to preſerve them; and to their enemies, to make "them their friends." He died about the five hundred and ſixtieth year before the Chriſtian æra, and left a daughter named Cleobulina, who was celebrated for the delicacy of her wit, the ſolidity of her judgment, and the ſweetneſs of her temper. She had an heroic courage, and wrote very ingenious ænigmas, which were admired by the Egyptians.

CLEOBURY, a town in Shropſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. The fairs are May 2, and October 27, for horned cattle, ſheep, and hogs. It is twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Shrewſbury, one hundred and thirty-five weſt-by-north of London. Long. 2. 29. W. Lat. 52. 27. N.

CLEOFIS, or CLEOPHIS, an Indian queen, who being diſpoſſeſſed of her dominions by Alexander the Great, was reſtored to them upon her conſenting to yield herſelf to his embraces; and thus ſhe preſerved by her incontinence a throne, which ſhe was not able to ſupport by her courage. From that time ſhe was called the Royal Strumpet. The ſon ſhe brought to Alexander was called by his name, and was king of India. This queen lived three hundred and twenty years before the Chriſtian æra.

CLEOMBROTUS, a famous king of Sparta, who was killed in the battle of Leuctra, which was won by Epaminondas in the three hundred and ſeventy-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra.

He ought not to be confounded with the philoſopher Cleombrotus, a native of Ambracia, who precipitated himſelf into the ſea, after his having read Plato on the immortality of the ſoul.

CLEOMENES, the name of three kings of Sparta. The firſt conquered the Argians; delivered the Athenians from the tyranny of the Piſiſtrades; puniſhed the Eginetæ, and died about the four hundred and eightieth year before the birth of Chriſt. The ſecond ſucceeded his brother Ageſipolis in the three hundred and ſeventieth year before Chriſt, and had a peaceable reign of thirty-four years. Cleomenes III. the ſecond ſon of Leonidas, mounted the throne in the two hundred and thirtieth year before Chriſt: he put a period to the troubles of Sparta; divided the lands; aboliſhed debts; gave the privilege of citizens to foreigners, and reſtored the ancient Lacedæmonian government. He at length defeated the Achaians, but was afterwards conquered by Antigonus the Tutor, in the two hundred and twenty-ſixth year before Chriſt, and retired into Egypt, where Ptolemy Evergetes received him very kindly; but after the death of that prince, Ptolemy Philopater throwing him into priſon, he raiſed a ſedition againſt that prince in which he was killed in the two hundred and nineteenth year before the Chriſtian æra.

CLEONICE, a young lady of Byzantium, who being ſeen by Pauſanias, he ſent for her in order to enjoy her; and her relations knowing his haughty temper, dared not to refuſe him, but ſuffered him to carry her off. The young maiden deſired the ſervants to take away all the lights; but as ſhe was creeping ſoftly in the dark to his bed; ſhe had the misfortune to throw down a lamp, which ſtartled Pauſanias out of his ſleep, and he inſtantly imagining that it was ſome ruffian come to murder him, ſeized his dagger, which lay under his bolſter, and wounded her in ſuch a manner, that ſhe died ſoon after.

CLEONYMUS, ſon to Cleomenes II. king of Sparta, left Lacedæmonia on account of the Spartans devolving the whole royal authority on his half brother Areus, and the contempt ſhewed him by his wife Chelidonis, who was paſſionately in love with Acrotatus, the ſon of king Areus. Tortured with grief and anger, he went and ſolicited Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, to make war on the Lacedæmonians, to which he conſented, but was ſo vigorouſly repulſed in all his attacks, that he was forced to lay aſide his enterprize. We muſt not omit the courage the women ſhewed on this occaſion. A reſolution had been taken to ſhip them off to Crete; but they oppoſed it, and Archidamia coming into the ſenate with a drawn ſword, complained, in the name of all the women, againſt the men, for thinking they could ſurvive the deſtruction of their country. They worked in the night in the trenches, which were expoſed to the enemy. Chelidonis was the only woman who did not ſtir abroad, ſhe keeping always a rope about her neck, in order that ſhe might not be taken alive by her huſband.

CLEOPATRA, ſiſter of Alexander the Great, was a princeſs who had not only a conſiderable intereſt with her brother during his life; but after his death the people ſeemed to imagine that the royal majeſty muſt be preſent on that ſide which ſhe countenanced. Caſſander, Lyſimachus, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and all the other heads of parties were deſirous of having her to wife; for they thought the Macedonians would chuſe him for their maſter whom ſhe ſhould marry, and that by this means they ſhould obtain the empire. Antigonus kept her under a guard in Sardis, and ſhe not loving him, and deſiring to join Ptolemy, endeavoured to make her eſcape. The governor of the city prevented her, and at length, by Antigonus's order, he employed ſome women to put her to death. Antigonus, to avoid the infamy of ſuch a murder, commanded ſome of thoſe women to be executed, and cauſed the princeſs to be interred in a magnificent manner. This happened in the one hundred and eighteenth Olympiad, three hundred years before the Chriſtian æra.

CLEOPATRA, queen of Egppt, famous for her beauty and her lewdneſs, was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes. She obtained the love of Julius Cæſar, by whom ſhe had a ſon, named Cæſareon. After the death of that prince, Mark Anthony marching againſt the Parthians, in the fortieth year year before the Chriſtian æra, ordered Cleopatra to meet him in Cilicia, to anſwer the accuſations formed againſt her, in relation to her having given ſuccours to Brutus. That princeſs, who was not only a great beauty, but was extremely artful, and ſpoke ſeveral languages, reſolved to inſpire Antony with a paſſion for her. She embarked on the river Cydnus, in a veſſel with a gilt ſtern; the ſails of which were of purple, and the oars ſilver; theſe kept time with a concert of muſic; while ſhe herſelf lay under a pavilion of cloth of gold, dreſſed in a magnificent habit. The very evening in which ſhe arrived, ſhe gave an elegant repaſt to Antony, who became ſo diſtractedly in love, that he married her, notwithſtanding his former marriage to Octavia, the ſiſter of Auguſtus. After Antony's defeat and death, Cleopatra being unable to captivate the affections of Auguſtus, and fearing that ſhe ſhould be carried to Rome, to adorn his triumph, cauſed herſelf to be ſtung by an aſp, and died of the wound, in the thirty-ninth year of her age. Auguſtus ordered her a magnificent funeral, and her body, as ſhe deſired, was buried in the ſame tomb with that of Antony.

Thus ended the life of this princeſs, after ſhe had reigned from the death of her father twenty-two years. She was a woman of great parts, notwithſtanding her vices, and ſpoke many languages with the utmoſt facility; for ſhe could converſe with the Ethiopians, Troglodites, Jews, Arabians, Syrians, Medes, and Perſians, without an interpreter; and always anſwered them in their own language. In her death ended the reign of the family of the Ptolomies in Egypt, after it had ſubſiſted from the death of Alexander, two hundred and ninety-four years; for after this, Egypt was reduced to a Roman province, and ſo remained for ſix hundred and ſeventy years, till it was taken from them by the Saracens.

There were ſeveral other queens of Egypt of the name of Cleopatra.

CLEOSTRATUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a young man of Theſſaly, who was choſen by lot to be ſacrificed to a dragon which laid waſte the country; but his friend Meneſtratus pitying the ſeverity of his fate, reſolved to ſave him, or die in the attempt; and arming himſelf, ſlew the dragon, and delivered his friend and country.

CLEOSTRATUS, a celebrated aſtronomer, born at Tenedos, was, according to Pliny, the firſt who diſcovered the ſigns of the zodiac; others ſay that he only diſcovered the ſigns Aries and Sagitarius. He alſo corrected the errors of the Grecian year, about the five hundred and thirty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra.

CLERAC, a town of France, in Agenois, ſeated on the river Lot, eight miles from Agen. It is full of rich merchants, who drive a conſiderable trade in tobacco, wine, and brandy. Long. 0. 33. E. Lat. 44. 28. N.

CLERAMBAULT (LEWIS NICHOLAS) a celebrated French muſician, was born at Paris on the 19th of December, 1676, and became organiſt to the Jacobines at twenty years of age, and afterwards of St. Cyr. Lewis XIV. was much pleaſed at hearing him play little pieces on the harpſichord, and made him ſuperintendant of madam de Maintenon's concerts. Clerambault had a fine genius for muſic, and wrote five books of cantatas, of which that of Orpheus is eſteemed a maſter-piece; and ſeveral motets and pieces of muſic compoſed for particular feaſts. He died at Paris on the 26th of October, 1749, leaving a ſon and two daughters, who both excelled in muſic.

CLERC (JOHN LE) an eminent profeſſor of philoſophy, Hebrew and polite literature at Amſterdam, and one of the moſt learned and laborious critics of his time, was the ſon of Stephen le Clerc, a learned phyſician, profeſſor of Hebrew, and counſellor of ſtate at Geneva, where John was born, on the 19th of March, 1657; and having gone through the uſual forms of ſtudy at Geneva, was ordained there in 1679, and the next year went to Saumur, an academy of great repute. In 1682 he came by the way of Paris to London, in order to learn the Engliſh language. He preached ſeveral times in the French churches at London, and viſited the men of learning: then going to Holland, he entered into a ſtrict friendſhip with the learned Philip Limborch. He was ſoon after invited to return to Geneva, which he accordingly did; but his ſentiments being contrary to thoſe eſtabliſhed by law, he again left his native country, returned to Holland, and in 1684 obtained the profeſſorſhips abovementioned. He wrote, 1. A French Tranſlation of the New Teſtament. 2. A Latin Tranſlation of Dr. Hammond's Annotations. 3. Letters on Inſpiration. 4. A Latin Tranſlation of Stanley's philoſophical Hiſtory. 5. Bibliotheque Univerſelle & Hiſtorique, twenty-ſix volumes, duodecimo. 6. Bibliotheque Choiſie, twenty-ſeven volumes, duodecimo. 7. Bibliotheque Ancienne & Moderne, twenty nine volumes, duodecimo. Treatiſes on Logic, Ontology, Pneumatology, Natural Philoſophy, and ſeveral other works. This celebrated writer was almoſt childiſh, during the five laſt years of his life, and died on the 8th of January, 1736, aged ſeventy-nine. His works abound with good ſenſe and ſound learning, and moſt of them will be valued while liberty and literature maintain their ground in Europe.

CLERC (SEBASTIAN LE) an excellent engraver, and deſigner in ordinary to the French king, was born at Metz, on the 26th of September, 1637. After having learnt to deſign of his father, he applied himſelf to mathematics, and was engineer to the marſhal de la Ferte. He went to Paris in 1665, where he applied himſelf to deſigning and engraving with ſuch ſucceſs, that M. Colbert gave him a penſion of ſix hundred crowns. In 1672 he was admitted into the royal academy of painting and ſculpture; and in 1680 was made profeſſor of geometry and perſpective in the ſame academy. He publiſhed, beſides a great number of deſigns and prints, 1. A Treatiſe on theoretical and practical Geometry, the beſt edition of which is that of 1745, in octavo. 2. A Treatiſe on Architecture, and other works; and died on the 25th of October, 1714, aged ſeventy-eight.

CLERI (PETERMANN) a brave commander, was born at Friburg, in Swiſſerland, in the year 1510, and was raiſed to the rank of captain in the ſervice of Henry II. king of France, after which he became colonel of a Swiſs regiment in the ſervice of Charles IX. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions, and particularly at the battle of Dreux, and was killed on the third of November, 1569, at the battle of Moncoutour, after having performed prodigies of valour at the head of his regiment, which contributed greatly to obtain the victory.

CLERMONT, in Argonne, a town of France, in the Verdunois, one hundred and twenty-ſeven miles north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 9. E. Lat. 49. 34. N.

CLERMONT, a town in the iſle of France, fifteen miles from Beauvais, thirteen from Senlis, and thirty-eight north of Paris. Long. 2. 28. E. Lat. 49. 23. N.

CLERMONT, a city of France, in Auvergne, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on an eminence. The cathedral church is a large ſtructure, with four fine towers, from whence there is an agreeable view of the city. The church of Notre Dame, St. Geneſt's church, the ſeminary, and the Jeſuit's college, are worth ſeeing; as well as the ſquares adorned with fountains, the palace of the preſidial, and the court of aids. Without the city is the abbey of St. Alirye, which is fortified with towers, a caſtle, and other works, and is finely embelliſhed within. Below this there is a bridge, ſixty yards long, and ſixteen broad, over the river Tiritaine, which the inhabitants pretend was made by the petrifying quality of a ſpring. It is fifty-five miles ſouth of Moulins, ſeventy-eight weſt of Lyons, and two hundred and twenty ſouth of Paris. Long. 3. 18. E. Lat. 45. 47. N.

CLERVAL, a town of France, in the Franche Comté, ſeated on the river Doux, belonging to the houſe of Wirtemburg. Long. 5. 57. E. Lat. 46. 35. N.

CLEVELAND, a diſtrict in the north riding of Yorkſhire, from whence the Fitzroys have the title of duke.

CLEVELAND (JOHN) an Engliſh poet, born at Hinkley, in Leiceſterſhire, of which place his father was vicar. He ſtudied at Chriſt's college, Cambridge; and was afterwards elected a fellow of St. John's. Upon the breaking out of the civil war, he was the firſt champion that appeared in verſe for the royal cauſe, for which he was ejected from his fellowſhip; and upon this he retired to the king's head quarters at Oxford, where he wrote ſome ſmart ſatires againſt the parliamentarians. From Oxford he went to the garriſon of Newark, which, at length, ſurrendering by the king's ſpecial command, after he had thrown himſelf into the hands of the Scots; Cleveland was thrown into a jail at Yarmouth, where he remained under all the diſadvantages of poverty and wretchedneſs, till he addreſſed Oliver Cromwell in a petition for liberty, in ſuch pathetic and moving terms, that he obtained his requeſt. He then retired to London, where he died on the 24th of April, 1658. His works, which conſiſt of poems, characters, orations, epiſtles, &c. were printed in octavo, in 1677.

CLEVES, the duchy of, a province of the circle of Weſtphalia, in Germany. It is divided into two parts by the Rhine, and is about forty miles in length from eaſt to weſt, and twenty in breadth from north to ſouth. It is a fine agreeable country, and pretty populous. The towns are, Cleves the capital, Calcar, Gennep, Santen, Orſoy, Bureck, and Greit. Theſe lie on the left ſide the river. On the right, Duysburg, Weſe, Rees, and Emmerick. There have been great conteſts about this duchy, but it now belongs to the king of Pruſſia.

CLEVES, a city of Germany, in the duchy of Cleves, of which it is the capital. It ſtands upon a pleaſant hill, about three miles from the Rhine, with which it communicates, by means of a canal which is large enough for great barges. The caſtle ſtands upon a mountain, and though old is very agreeable. Calviniſts, Lutherans, and Roman Catholicks are all equally tolerated in this place. It is thirteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Nimuegen, ſeventy north-weſt of Cologn, and ſeventy ſouth-eaſt of Amſterdam. Long. 5. 37. E. Lat. 51. 48. N.

CLEYN (Francis) a fine painter, born at Roſtock. He was retained in the ſervice of Chriſtian IV. king of Denmark, but the excellence of his genius induced him to ſearch for better models than he found in that northern climate. He travelled to Italy, where he is ſuppoſed to have learned thoſe beautiful groteſques, in which he afterwards excelled. At Venice he became known to ſir Henry Wotton, and ſir Robert Anſtruther recommended him to prince Charles. He arrived in England while that prince was in Spain, yet was graciouſly received by king James, who mentions that circumſtance in a letter he wrote to the king of Denmark, deſiring leave to detain Cleyn in England, though with a permiſſion to return firſt to Copenhagen, and finiſh a work he had begun there, and promiſing to pay the expence of his journey. This requeſt was granted, and Cleyn returned to England at the end of the ſummer. The king had then juſt given two thouſand pounds towards ſir Francis Crane's new manufacture of tapeſtry at Mortlake. There Cleyn was placed, and gave deſigns both in hiſtory and groteſque, which carried thoſe works to ſingular perfection. Five of the cartoons were ſent thither to be copied by him in tapeſtry. King Charles I. granted him one hundred pounds a year during his life, which he enjoyed till the civil wars. He was not ſolely employed in theſe works; but did ſeveral other things for the king and nobility. At Somerſet-houſe he painted the cieling of a room, with hiſtories and compartments in gold. Bolſover in Nottinghamſhire, Stone-park in Northamptonſhire, and Carew-houſe at Parſon's-green, ſince lord Peterborough's, were ornamented by him; and there is ſtill extant, a beautiful chamber adorned by him at Holland-houſe, with a cieling in groteſque, and ſmall compartments on the chimneys, in the ſtyle, and not unworthy of Parmegiano. He alſo made deſigns for various artiſts, particularly for ſeveral of Hollar's plates to Virgil and Æſop; and there are two ſmall books of foliages from his drawings, and two books for carvers, goldſmiths, &c. Mr. Walpole, from whom we have borrowed this article, obſerves, that it is however uncertain whether theſe, and a few other plates of the ſame kind, are not by his ſon, who had the ſame Chriſtian name, and imitated his father's manner. Beſides his own ſon, he inſtructed Dobſon, and died about 1658.

CLIFF, a town in Northamptonſhire, with a market on Tueſdays. It has a fair on October 29, for cheeſe, home ſpun linen, and turners ware. It is twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Northampton, and eighty-one north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 35. W. Lat. 52. 30. N.

CLIFFORD (George) the third earl of Cumberland, of that noble and ancient family, was born in the year 1558, and educated at Cambridge, where he chiefly applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the mathematics, and became eminent for his ſkill in navigation. Being bent on making foreign diſcoveries, and defeating the ambitious deſigns of the Spaniards, who were preparing their invincible armada, he fitted out at his own charge a ſmall fleet of three ſhips, and a pinnace, in order to annoy the Spaniſh ſettlements in the South Seas, which ſailed from England in 1586. He commanded the Elizabeth Bonaventure, and ſignalized himſelf in a remarkable manner againſt the Spaniſh armada. He afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf by taking a great number of valuable prizes, both in the Weſt Indies and on the coaſt of Spain, in eleven expeditions made for that purpoſe. In 1592 he was elected knight of the garter, and in 1601 was one of the lords that were ſent with forces to reduce the earl of Eſſex to obedience. This noble lord died in London, October 30, 1605.

Clifford (lady Anne) a lady of diſtinguiſhed merit, in the reign of king James I. was the daughter and heireſs of the above George Clifford, earl of Cumberland, and was firſt married to Richard Sackville, earl of Dorſet, a man of merit, whoſe memory was ever dear to her, and whoſe Life ſhe has written. Her ſecond huſband was Philip, earl of Pembroke, a man in every reſpect unworthy of her, from whom ſhe was ſoon parted. She was long regarded as the queen of the North; and her foundations and benefactions ſeem to argue a revenue little leſs than royal. She founded two hoſpitals, and repaired or built ſeven churches and ſix caſtles; among which, that of Pendragon, in Cumberland, ſtill retains a magnificence ſuitable to the dignity of its ancient inhabitant. She died on the 22d of March, 1676.

Clifford (Thomas) lord high treaſurer of England, in the reign of king Charles II. was the ſon of Hugh Clifford, eſq. and was born at Ugbrook, in Devonſhire, Auguſt 1, 1630. He was educated at Oxford, and was twice choſen burgeſs for Totneſs. In 1665 he entered into the navy, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral engagements againſt the Dutch; in conſideration of theſe ſervices, he was made comptroller of the king's houſhold, and ſoon after one of his majeſty's privy council, and one of the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury. In 1670 he became one of the king's cabinet council, known by the name of the Cabal, who contrived to render the king abſolute, to deſtroy the proteſtant religion, and break the triple alliance. In 1672 he was created baron Clifford, of Chudleigh; and having adviſed the king to ſhut up the exchequer, he was, for that important advice, rewarded with the moſt profitable office of lord high treaſurer of England. But his zeal in favour of popery occaſioned his being diſgraced. He reſigned the white ſtaff on the 19th of June, 1673, and in September following died of the ſtone, in the forty-fourth year of his age.

CLINIAS, the father of the celebrated Alcebiades, fought with great bravery in the war againſt Xerxes, and was killed in the battle of Coronea, in which the Athenians defeated the Bœotians, in the four hundred and forty-ſeventh year before the birth of Chriſt.

Atheneas mentions another Clinias, a Pythagorean philoſopher, who was accuſtomed to calm the ſtrong emotions of his anger by playing on a lyre, about the five hundred and twentieth year before the Chriſtian æra.

CLIO, in pagan mythology, the daughter of Jupiter and Mnemoſyne, was the muſe who preſided over hiſtory. She is generally repreſented under the form of a young woman crowned with laurel, holding in her right hand a trumpet, and in her left a book.

CLISSA, a ſtrong fortreſs in Dalmatia, taken by the Venetians from the Turks, in 1684. It is eight miles from Spalatro, and thirty ſouth-eaſt of Sebenico. Long. 17. 50. E. Lat. 43. 26. N.

CLISSON, a town in Britany, ſeated on the river Seure, thirteen miles from Nantes. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 47. 6. N.

CLISTHENES, an Athenian magiſtrate, and the grandfather of Pericles, was the firſt who invented the law of Oſtraciſm, by which thoſe citizens were baniſhed who grew too powerful. He by this means drove the tyrant Hippias from the city, in the five hundred and tenth year before the Chriſtian æra, and thus reſtored the liberty of the republic.

CLITHERO, a borough town in Lancaſhire, with a market on Saturdays, ſeated at the bottom of Pendle Hill, and governed by two bailiffs. It has five fairs, viz. on July 21, for horned cattle and woollen cloth; on March 24, the fourth Sauturday after Michaelmas, September 29, and December 7, for horned cattle, horſes, and woollen cloth. It is thirty miles ſouth of Lancaſter, two hundred and thirteen north-north-weſt of London, and ſends two members to parliament. Long. 1. 59. W. Lat. 53. 46. N.

CLITOMACHUS, an able philoſopher, born at Carthage, quitted his country at forty years of age, and went to Athens, where he became the diſciple and ſucceſſor of Carneades, about the one hundred and fortieth year before the Chriſtian æra. He compoſed many books, but they are all loſt.

CLITUS, brother to Hellanice, Alexander the Great's nurſe, followed that prince in his conqueſts, and ſaved his life by cutting off the hand of Roſaces, which held an ax lifted up to kill him at the paſſage of the Granicus. Alexander, who had a great regard for him, ſome time after invited him to ſupper, when Clitus, at the end of the repaſt, being heated with wine, diminiſhed the exploits of that prince, in order to magnify thoſe of Philip his father; at which Alexander was ſo enraged, that he killed him with his own hand, in the three hundred and twenty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra. Alexander was afterwards ſo afflicted at this mad action, that he attempted his own life.

CLOACA, in Roman antiquity, a common ſewer, cut through the ſeven hills upon which Rome is ſeated, by which the filth of the city was carried away. This was a moſt ſtupendous work; ſeven ſtreams met under ground in the main channel, and flowed with ſuch a rapid current as to carry all before them. This channel was lined and arched with large ſtones, ſo well cemented together, that they continued ſeven hundred years unimpaired, from the time of its being built by Tarquin. There were many ſinks in the city which fell into this common ſewer. The officers appointed to take care of this work were called Curatores Cloacorum urbis.

CLOACINA, in Roman mythology, the goddeſs of jakes and common ſewers.

CLODION, ſurnamed the Hairy, paſſes for the ſecond king of France. It is ſaid that he ſucceeded Pharamond, about the year 428, and rendered himſelf maſter of Tournai, Cambray, and other places. He died about the year 451, and was ſucceeded by Meroveus.

CLODIUS, a famous Roman ſenator, abandoned himſelf to the moſt infamous debauches. He was accuſed of having corcorrupted three of his ſiſters, and of being found diſguiſed in a woman's habit, in a religious ceremony, in which none but women were permitted to appear. On his being made tribune, he baniſhed Cicero; but he being recalled a ſhort time after, revoked what Clodius had done againſt him, and afterwards undertook the defence of Milo, who had killed Clodius in the fifty-third year, before the Chriſtian æra.

CLODOMIR, the ſon of Clovis and Clotilda, king and queen of France, had for his ſhare the kingdom of Orleans. Being joined by his brothers, Thierri, Childebert, and Clotaire, he made war on Sigiſmund, king of Burgundy, conquered him, and put him to death, in 523; but was himſelf killed in a battle fought againſt Gondemar, who became king of Burgundy after the death of Sigiſmund. He left three children by his wife Gonduca, two of whom were murdered by Childebert and Clotaire. Clodoalde, however, eſcaped, and entering a monaſtery, was afterwards known by the name of St. Cloud.

CLOGHER, a city of Ireland, in the county of Tyrone, and province of Ulſter, with a biſhop's ſee. It is twenty miles from Armagh. Long. 7. 30. W. Lat. 54. 16. N.

CLONMEL, a town of Ireland, in the county of Tipperary, and province of Munſter, ſeated on the river Sure, nineteen miles ſouth-eaſt of the town of Tipperary. Long. 8. 2. W. Lat. 52. 15. N.

CLOPINEL, or JOHN DE MEUN, a famous French poet, thus named from his being lame, and a native of Meun on the Loire. He lived about the year 1300, and acquired great reputation by his poetical continuation of the Roſe, compoſed by William Loris. He was alſo the author of a French Tranſlation of Boecius's Books of Conſolation, the Letters of Abelard, and other works.

CLOTAIRE I. king of France, the ſon of Clovis and Clotilda, had for his ſhare the kingdom of Soiſſons. In 523, he joined his brothers, Childebert and Clodomir, againſt Sigiſmund, king of Burgundy. He marched with Thierri againſt the king of Thuringia; and, in 539, made an irruption into the dominions of Childebert, with whom he at length concluded a peace. Clotaire twice defeated the Saxons; and, in 558, became king of all France by the death of Childebert. Two years after, Cramne, his natural ſon, revolted a ſecond time againſt him; but Clotaire having defeated him, burnt him and his whole family in a cabbin, in which they had concealed themſelves. Clotaire died in 562, aged ſixty-four. He had ſix wives, and left four children, who ſucceeded him.

This prince was courageous, liberal, and a great politician; but was, in ſome inſtances, cruel and too ambitious.

The ingenious Dr. Robertſon obſerves, in his Hiſtory of the Reign of the Emperor Charles V. that the French, finding their ſovereigns in poſſeſſion of abſolute power, ſeem to think it a duty incumbent on them to maintain that ſuch unbounded authority belonged to the crown in every period of that monarchy; but that it is impoſſible to conceive two ſtates of civil ſociety more unlike to each other, than that of the French nation under Clovis, and that under Lewis XV. The king, or leader, had the command of ſoldiers, or companions, who followed his ſtandard from choice, not by conſtraint, of which the above excellent hiſtorian has given the cleareſt evidence. An event, related by Gregory of Tours, ſays he, affords the moſt ſtriking proof of the dependance of theſe early French kings, on the ſentiments and inclinations of their people. Clotaire I. having marched at the head of his army, in the year 1553, againſt the Saxons, that people, intimidated at his approach, ſued for peace, and offered to pay a large ſum to the offended monarch. Clotaire was willing to cloſe with what they propoſed; but his army inſiſted to be led forth to battle. The king employed all his eloquence to perſuade them to accept of what the Saxons were ready to pay; the Saxons, in order to ſooth them, increaſed their original offer; the king renewed his ſollicitations; but the army, enraged, ruſhed upon the king, tore his tent to pieces, dragged him out of it, and would have ſlain him on the ſpot, if he had not conſented to lead them inſtantly againſt the enemy.

CLOTAIRE II. ſurnamed the Great, ſucceeded his father Chilperic I. and became king of Soiſſons, in 584, at four years of age. Fredegonda, his mother, fearing the artifices of Brunehaut and the power of Childebert, put him under the protection of Gontran; but after the death of that prince, ſhe herſelf ſupported him againſt Childebert, over whom ſhe obtained a great victory in 593, at Droiſi, a village five leagues from Orleans. It is ſaid, that, before the battle, ſhe cauſed the infant to be ſhewn to the whole army, in order to animate them. Fredegonda dying, Clotaire was defeated, in 597, by Thierri and Theodebert; but at the deceaſe of thoſe princes, Clotaire became king of France, in 613, when he cauſed Brunehaut, with Thierri's children to be murdered. He afterwards, in 627, conquered the Saxons, and, with his own hand, killed Bertoald their king; but died the year after, aged forty-five, and was ſucceeded by his two ſons Dagobert and Charibert.

CLOTAIRE III. king of Burgundy and Neuſtria. After the death of his father Clovis II. in 660, Batilda, his mother, governed with great prudence during his minority; but at length retiring into the monaſtery of Chelles, Ebroin, mayor of the palace, became poſſeſſed of the whole authority, and rendered himſelf deteſtable by his cruelty and injuſtice. Clotaire died without iſſue in 668.

CLOTHO, or CLOTHOS, in fabulous hiſtory, one of the three Parcæ, or Deſtinies, who ſpin the thread of life. She is repreſented holding the ſpindle, dreſſed in a long gown of ſeveral colours, and with a crown on her head, ſet with ſeven ſtars. See PARCÆ.

CLOTILDA, (St.) the daughter of Chilperic, king of Burgundy, was educated by her uncle Gondebaut, and became queen of France by her marriage with Clovis, whom ſhe converted to the Chriſtian religion. After the death of that prince, in 511, Clotilda ſaw with grief a war kindled between her children, and not being able to reconcile them, retired to Tours, where ſhe died in 543.

CLOUD (St.) the ſon of Clodomir, king of Orleans, and the grandſon of Clovis and Clotilda, was educated with his brothers, Theobald and Gontaire, under the care of his mother; but Clotaire, their uncle, invading their dominions, murdered his two brothers, when St. Cloud, eſcaping the ſlaughter, retired into a monaſtery, and received the habit, after which he lived a ſolitary life in Provence, and at length returned to Paris, where he was ordained prieſt by Euſebius. He finiſhed the reſt of his days in a monaſtery, which he had built at a village near Nogent, now called St. Cloud, and died there about the year 560. This monaſtery has been rendered collegiate.

CLOUD, a town of France, five miles from Paris, ſeated on the banks of the river Seine. Here the duke of Orleans has one of the fineſt palaces in Europe, with a wonderful caſcade. Long. 1. 18. E. Lat. 51. 41. N.

CLOVIS I. king of France, and a famous conqueror, ſucceeded his father Childeric, in 481. He conquered Siagrius, the Roman general, near Soiſſons, whom he cauſed to be beheaded; and then made himſelf maſter of Soiſſons, Tongres, Rheims, and all the places the Romans poſſeſſed in Gaul. In 493, Clovis married Clotilda, a princeſs famed for her piety and virtue, to whom he promiſed to embrace the Chriſtian religion. He afterwards marched againſt the Germans, whom he engaged at Tolbiac, near Cologne in 496; but his troops giving way in the midſt of the battle, it is ſaid, that he had recourſe to the God of Clotilda, and made a vow, that if he delivered him from that danger, he would turn Chriſtian; when his ſoldiers inſtantly returning to the charge, obtained a complete victory; after which, Clovis kept his promiſe, and was baptiſed at Rheims, with a great part of his army. He at length extended his conqueſts beyond the Waal and the Rhine, conquered the Armoricans, made war on Gondebaud, gained, in 507, the famous battle of Vouillé, near Poictiers, againſt Alaric, whom he killed with his own hand, ſubdued the country from the Loire to the Pyrenean mountains, and rendered himſelf maſter of Angoulême. Theodoric, however, defeated his army before Arles, in 509. At the report of his extraordinary ſucceſs, Anaſtaſius, emperor of the Eaſt, thought himſelf under an obligation to obtain the friendſhip of Clovis, and therefore, in 510, made him a preſent of the patrician, conſular, and Auguſtian ornaments. The ſame year, Clovis choſe Paris for the capital of his empire; and having treated with great cruelty the princes his relations, and even ſeized their dominions, he died at Paris, in 511, aged forty-five, after a reign of thirty years. Thierri, Clodomir, Childebert, and Clotaire, his four ſons, divided his dominions between them.

CLOVIS II. the ſon of Dagobert, king of Neuſtria and Burgundy, ſucceeded his father in 638, when he continued under the tutelage of his mother, Nantilda, who governed the kingdom in conjunction with the mayors of the palace. This prince was extremely charitable; and there happening a famine, he exhauſted all his treaſures in aſſiſting his ſubjects; and when they were gone, took from St. Dennis's church the plates of gold and ſilver with which his father had covered the tombs of that ſaint and his companions, and diſtributed the money to the poor. He died in 1660, and left three ſons, Thierri, Clotaire III. and Childeric II.

CLOVIS III. the ſon of Thierri III. king of France, reigned five years under the guardianſhip of Pepin Heriſtel, mayor of the palace, who aſſumed the royal authority. Clovis died in 695, aged fourteen.

CLOYNE, a city of Ireland, in the county of Cork, and province of Munſter, with a biſhop's ſee, fifteen miles eaſt of Cork. Long. 8. 0. W. Lat. 51. 40. N.

CLUEN-

CLUENTIUS, a Roman, was accuſed by his mother Soſia of having murdered Oppianicus his father-in-law, fifty-four years before the birth of Chriſt; but Cicero undertook his defence, and, on this occaſion, pronounced in his favour the fine oration Pro Cluentio.

CLUNY, a town of Burgundy, in France, famous for its abbey of Benedictine monks. It is ſeated on the river Groſne, ten miles north-eaſt of Maçon, thirty-three ſouth-eaſt of Autun, thirty-eight ſouth-weſt of Lyons, and one hundred and ſeventy-four ſouth by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 33. E. Lat 46. 24. N.

CLUSE, a town of Savoy, capital of Faſigny, ſeated on the river Arve, twenty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Geneva, twenty north-eaſt of Annecy, and forty north-eaſt of Chamberry. Long. 6. 29. E. Lat. 46. 0. N.

CLUVIER (PHILIP) in Latin Cluverius, a celebrated geographer, born at Dantzic, in 1580. He travelled into Poland, Germany, and the Netherlands, in order to ſtudy law; but being at Leyden, Joſeph Scaliger perſuaded him to apply himſelf to geography. Cluvier followed his advice, and for this purpoſe viſited the greateſt part of the European ſtates. He was well verſed in many languages, and wherever he went obtained illuſtrious friends and protectors. At his return to Leyden, he taught there with great applauſe; and died there, in 1623, aged forty three. He wrote, 1. De tribus Rheni alveis. 2. Germania antiqua. 3. Sicilia antiqua. 4. Italia antiqua. 5. Introductio in univerſam Geographiam. Theſe works are juſtly eſteemed. The beſt edition of his Introduction to Geography is that of 1729, in quarto.

CLYMENE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Oceanus, who being beloved by Apollo, he had by her Phæton, Lampatia, Egle, and Phebe. See PHÆTON.

CLYTEMNESTRA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Leda, whom ſhe brought forth in an egg, which contained both Clytemneſtra and Caſtor. She married Agamemnon; but while that prince was at the ſiege of Troy, ſhe had an amorous intrigue with Ægiſthus, whom ſhe engaged to murder Agamemnon, at his return to his dominions. Her ſon Oreſtes, however, revenged the death of his father by killing Ægiſthus, with his mother Clytemneſtra; but was afterwards haunted by the Furies as long as he lived.

CLYTIE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Orcamus, king of Babylon, who being jealous of the happineſs of her ſiſter Leucothoe, who had been debauched by Apollo, told her father of the amour; but Apollo ſtill ſlighting her, ſhe pined away, continually looking on the ſun, till ſhe became transformed into a ſun-flower.

CLYTORIS, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph debauched by Jupiter in the form of an ant.

COBLENTZ, a city of Germany, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, and archbiſhoprick of Triers, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Rhine and Moſelle. It ſtands in an angle made by the Moſelle, before it falls into the Rhine, in a very pleaſant country, planted with vineyards. It is of a triangular form, two ſides of which are defended by the rivers, and the other by modern fortifications, which render it one of the ſtrongeſt towns in Germany. It is populous and uniform, with well-built houſes and fine ſtreets. The places worth obſerving are the two great churches, the monaſteries, and the elector's palace, where he commonly reſides, ſeated at the foot of a hill, near the caſtle. This caſtle ſtands on a riſing ground, on the other ſide of the river, and commands the whole city. There is a ſtone bridge over the Moſelle, and a bridge of boats over the Rhine. It carries on a trade in wine, wood, corn, and iron. It was formerly an imperial city. It is thirteen miles north-weſt of Naſſau, twenty-eight ſouth-weſt of Bonn, thirty-five north-weſt of Mentz, fifty-five north-eaſt of Treves, and two hundred and forty north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 7. 18. E. Lat. 50. 24 N.

COBURG, a town of Franconia, in Germany, capital of a territory of the ſame name. It is large, well built, and ſeated on the river Jetz. The duke of Saalfeld reſides in the caſtle. Without the city is a citadel, which they call the Fortreſs, which no one is permitted to enter without leave of the prince. There is a private place in it, where things may be kept in ſafety in time of war. There is alſo a room, wherein Martin Luther was concealed in 1630. In the town there is a college founded by Caſimir duke of Saxony, in 1497. It is ſeated on the river Itch, twenty-five miles north of Bamberg, and fifty ſouth-ſouth weſt of Erford. Long. 11. 5. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

COBURG (the principality of) a territory of Germany, in the circle of Franconia, near Henneberg, which, however, is now determined to belong to Upper Saxony. It is ſeated between Henneberg, the biſhoprick of Bamberg, that of Wirtzburg, and Thuringia, and is forty miles in length, and twenty in breadth.

COCCEIUS, or COCK, (JOHN) a famous profeſſor of Hebrew, at Bremen, the place of his birth, and afterwards at Franeker. He at length taught divinity at Leyden, and died there in 1669. He wrote a large Commentary on the Bible, and other works, which have made a great noiſe in Holland, and are printed in ten volumes, folio. His ſingular manner of interpreting the Holy Scriptures raiſed againſt him Voëtius, Deſmarets, and ſeveral other proteſtants. He had nevertheleſs a great number of diſciples, which ſtill ſubſiſt, and are called Cocceians.

COCHEIM, a ſmall town of Germany, in the electorate of Treves, formerly imperial, but now ſubject to the elector. It is ſeated on the river Moſelle, fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Coblentz, and thirty-five north-eaſt of Treves. Long. 6. 56. E. Lat. 50. 12. N.

COCHIN (HENRY) a celebrated advocate in the parliament of Paris, and one of the greateſt orators France has produced, was born at Paris, on the 10th of June, 1687, and died in 1747, aged ſixty. His works are printed in ſeveral volumes, in quarto.

COCHIN, a town in the Eaſt Indies, on the coaſt of Malabar, capital of the kingdom of the ſame name. There are two towns of the ſame name, one firſt built and fortified by the Portugueſe, and Old Cochin, or the Malabar Cochin. The firſt is ſeated on the bank of the great river Koulang, and was about three miles from the ſea; but now the ſea has worn away ſo much of the land, that it is not above one hundred yards diſtant. The river waſhes ſome part of the walls, and there is a canal cut from it which runs to the middle of the city, and paſſes cloſe to the governor's houſe. It had ſtately churches and monaſteries, which were demoliſhed by the Dutch, who contracted the city into a much narrower compaſs, and left but one ſtanding, the ſtones of the reſt being converted into fortifications. It is now about ſix hundred paces long, and two hundred broad, fortified with ſeven large baſtions and curtains, ſo thick that they have planted two rows of large trees on them, to ſerve as a ſhady walk. Some of the ſtreets built by the Portugueſe ſtill remain, and the cathedral is turned into a warehouſe. The governor's houſe is a ſtately ſtructure, and the only one built after the Dutch faſhion. Their garriſon conſiſts of three hundred men, and their flag placed on the top of the old cathedral is ſo high, that it may be ſeen ſeven leagues off. The houſes are covered with narrow tiles, which are faſtened to the laths with hooks. Some make their windows like lattices, others ſay they are of canes, artificially twiſted together, and others again ſay they are of pearl oyſter-ſhells, which they ſhave thin enough to be almoſt tranſparent, uſing them inſtead of glaſs: however, each houſe has a yard and garden, encloſed with thin high walls, but ſtrong, to prevent their overlooking each other.

Malabar Cochin is ſeated higher up, on the banks of the ſame river, where the king of the country has a palace. It is built of bricks and mortar, after the European way, with lofty ſpacious apartments. But the town is built after the Indian faſhion, with very broad ſtreets. However, the houſes are very mean and low, being formed of bamboe canes, and covered with the leaves of cocoa-trees. They have neither upper rooms, nor cellars, nor windows, nor locks to their doors, becauſe they have nothing worth ſtealing. The doors are ſo low that you cannot go in or out of the houſe without ſtooping. This muſt be underſtood in general, for ſome of the houſes of the principal inhabitants are better contrived and fitted up, and are covered with tiles, lead, or copper, being made in all reſpects very convenient. The poor as well as rich have court-yards before their habitations, ſurrounded with high walls and ditches, and one of ſtrong paliſadoes. Theſe court-yards are for the reception of travellers, who eat, drink, and ſleep here. Their pagods are built of ſtone, and they have various kinds of images in their houſes.

The religion of theſe people is pagan; but there are ſome Mahommedans and Chriſtians, as alſo Jews, who have a ſynagogue here. Some fooliſhly pretend theſe laſt were ſent here by Nebuchadnezzar, and that they are of the tribe of Manaſſah, not conſidering that all the people are of a jet-black, and conſequently muſt have the like progenitors, and yet they are of a different race from the original natives of this place, who are only of a duſky olive complexion.

The people of this country eat and drink ſitting croſs-legged on the ground, like taylors. Their cups and ſpoons are made of cocoa-nuts, but the richer ſort have them of metal. Their food is rice, milk, eggs, fruit, fiſh, and fleſh, with ſpices. Their drink is water, and the ſap of the cocoa-trees, which turns to a ſort of wine called toddy. From this they diſtil a ſpirituous liquor, of the ſame ſort as we call Goa arrack. When they drink they do not touch the cup with their lips, but pour it from above into their mouths. A great many eat neither fleſh nor fiſh, but live upon vegetables only. However, they are all fond of opium. The men go quite naked, except a covering for their private parts, and the women have only a piece of cloth wrapt about them, which is not ſo high as their navels, nor ſo low as the middle of their thighs. They both take a particular pride in having long ears, which they lengthen by hanging weights in them to bring them down to their ſhoulders, and ſome are a great deal longer. Theſe they adorn with gold, ſilver, and jewels. The women wear their hair very long, but the men cut theirs ſhort, except one lock on the crown of the head. They are all fond of black teeth; for they ſay it is a ſhame to have them white like thoſe of a dog. Theſe are procured by the continual chewing of betel. They have little or no regard to the chaſtity of their women, nor do they care to marry a maid; for ſhe that has had moſt lovers before-hand, is ſooneſt married. Captain Hamilton affirms, that in the very hot months of April and May they retire nearer the mountains, to a place called Firdalgo, by the ſide of a ſmall, deep, clear river, where they pitch their tents; and as both men and women ſwim very dexterouſly, they go into the water together, where they divert themſelves a long while, with diving, ſwimming, and playing. For a more particular account of this country, ſee MALABAR. Long. 75. 10. E. Lat. 10. 0. N.

COCHINCHINA, a kingdom of India, beyond the Ganges, is bounded on the eaſt by the ſea, on the weſt by Cambodia, on the north by Tonquin, and on the ſouth by Ciampa: it is about four hundred and twenty miles in length, from north to ſouth, and two hundred and ten in breadth, from eaſt to weſt, if we reckon from the Great River, as moſt do, which parts it from Cambodia. It formerly belonged to Tonquin, but is now a kingdom of itſelf. The air is not ſo intemperately hot as in ſome parts, though it lies within the torrid zone; for the ſeaſons may in a ſmall degree be diſtinguiſhed from each other. However, the rainy ſeaſon, which is moſt taken notice of in all theſe parts, happens in September, October, and November; at which times there are great inundations, that often appear unexpectedly, and drown a great many cattle, which the inhabitants ought to have driven to the mountains. Even the rats which infeſt the rice-grounds are forced to betake themſelves to the trees, to which the boys repair in boats, and ſhake them into the water to drown them.

The prodigious quantity of water that falls, though hurtful in ſome reſpects, renders the country exceeding fruitful, and produces a great quantity of rice. The fruits are the ſame as in other parts of India, only they have two or three peculiar to this country. The kan has a rind like a pomegranate, and a ſoft pulp within, of an aromatic taſte. The gnooh, has the outward appearance of a cherry, but a flavour like grapes. The jacca, grows on a tree as tall as a cheſnut-tree, and the fruit is as large as a pompion, with prickles like a jujeb. It is full of broad, flat, round, kernels, with a ſtone in each, which is thrown away. There is another ſort, full of ſtiff pulp, that is very delicious. The birds, beaſts, and fiſhes, are likewiſe the ſame as in the ſouthern parts of the Indies. But they have the ſlimey neſt of a bird like a ſwallow, which is accounted a very great dainty, both here and in ſome parts of China. Silk is ſo plentiful here, that all wear it when it is manufactured, more or leſs, for they are not overburthened with cloaths. Their houſes are of wood, and raiſed high from the ground with ſtrong poſts or pillars, that the people may be ſafe when the waters are out. In the great heats they uſe cane lattices for windows to let in the air, and at other times they ſtop them up with boards. They adorn their houſes with carved work in wood; in making of which they are ingenious enough.

The complexion of the inhabitants is olive; they have little eyes, and flat noſes, and their ſtature is about the middle ſize. They are great imitators of the Chineſe, in ſeeming civility and ceremonies, and the inferiors ſhew great reſpect to their ſuperiors. The better ſort of women go dreſſed in two or three petticoats, and a jacket, with the hair hanging down about their ears; and on the head they have a cap, which comes down pretty low on their faces. They account it a mark of diſtinction never to pair their nails, which ſhews what a ſenſe they have of gentility. The miſſionaries tell us, that the men wear no breeches, but ſwathe themſelves with a whole piece of ſilk, and wear five or ſix ſilk gowns over it. But thoſe that have had no particular reaſon to diſguiſe the truth, affirm, the common people have as little regard for cloaths as the Siameſe; and that the men proſtitute their women to all comers. But here the richer and higher ſort muſt needs be excepted. Theſe fathers acknowledge, that neither men nor women wear either ſhoes or ſtockings; but from the higheſt to the loweſt go bare foot and bare-legged; though ſome have ſoles tied at the bottom of their feet like ſandals.

The food of this country is rice, which they almoſt live upon; for they never touch any thing elſe, till they are pretty well ſatisfied with that. At meals they ſit croſs-legged on the ground, with a low round table before them, and every viſitor has one to himſelf. They have neither knives nor forks, but only two ſmall ſticks, to take up the meat when they have any. Their principal liquor is arrack, and they drink tea between meals like the Chineſe.

Poligamy is lawful, as it is in all the adjacent countries; and the richer the man, the greater his number of wives, for which reaſon, the poorer ſort are often forced to be contented with one. They have a great number of ſea ports; but the inhabitants are not given to trade: however, the Chineſe and Japaneſe frequent them at ſome ſeaſons of the year. As for their religion, writing, printing, and other cuſtoms, they nearly reſemble thoſe of China; but their language is different, though it conſiſts of monoſyllables as well as the Chineſe.

Cacciam is the capital town; beſides which there are Sinuva, Baubon, Baday, and Quehoa. The commodities are gold, ſilver, ſilk, cotton, cinnamen, eagle wood, and calemba-wood. They have iron-wood, which ſerves to make anchors for ſhips. The elephants are ſo large, that the feet of ſome are ten inches in diameter.

COCHLEUS (JOHN) doctor of divinity, canon of Mentz, and of Worms, and dean of our Lady in Francfort, was born at Wendelſtein, in Nuremberg, about the year 1502. He employed himſelf very much in controverſial writings; and alſo wrote a hiſtory of Theodoric, king of the Oſtrogoths. He died at Breſlaw, on the 10th of January 1552, aged ſeventy-three.

COCKBURNE (CATHARINE) a very ingenious lady, diſtinguiſhed by her extraordinary abilities, and her writings; was the daughter of captain David Trotter, (a Scots gentleman, and commander at ſea, in the reign of Charles II.) and was born on the 16th of Auguſt, 1679. She gave early marks of a poetic genius; and, in her ſeventeenth year, wrote the tragedy of Agnes de Caſtro, which, with a poem addreſſed to Mr. Congreve on his Mourning Bride, brought her acquainted with that gentleman. She afterwards publiſhed two other tragedies and a comedy; and on Mr. Dryden's death, joined with ſeveral other ingenious ladies, in paying a tribute to his memory, by publiſhing a volume of their poems, under the title of the Nine Muſes. When but twenty two years of age, ſhe publiſhed a Defence of Mr. Locke's Eſſay on the Human Underſtanding, againſt ſome remarks made upon it by Dr. Burnet of the Charterhouſe; upon which Mr. Locke deſired Mr. King, afterwards lord high chancellor of England, to make her a viſit, and a preſent of books. As ſhe was very early intimate with ſeveral conſiderable popiſh families, ſhe was perſuaded to embrace their religion; but her rational powers gaining ſtrength, ſhe, about the year 1707, left that communion, and the next year was married to Mr. Cockburne, the ſon of Dr. Cockburne, a learned divine of Scotland. She was now for many years diverted from her ſtudies, by attending to the duties of the wife and the mother; but at length her zeal for Mr. Locke's character and writings induced her to vindicate his principles, on the reſurrection of of the ſame body, againſt Dr. Holdſworth. She afterwards wrote ſome pieces on the foundation of moral duty, and moral obligation, which were publiſhed in the Works of the Learned; and drew up with great perſpecuity and elegance her remarks on Dr. Rutherford's Eſſay on the Nature and Obligations of Virtue, in vindication of the contrary principles enforced by Dr. Samuel Clarke. Mrs. Cockburne died in 1749, in her ſeventy-firſt year, and was interred at Long Horſley, near her huſband, who died a year before her.

This accompliſhed lady was in her younger years no leſs diſtinguiſhed by her beauty, than for her extraordinary talents She was ſmall of ſtature, but had a remarkable livelineſs in her eye, and a delicacy of complexion that continued till her death. The collection of her works, lately publiſhed in two volumes, do honour to her ſex; but the merit of her performances will appear more extraordinary, if we conſider the early youth when ſhe wrote ſome of them; the uneaſy ſituation of her fortune, during her whole life, and an interval of near twenty years in the vigour of it ſpent in the cares of a family, without leiſure for reading or contemplation; after which ſhe reſumed her ſtudies, and purſued to the utmoſt limits ſome of the deepeſt enquiries of which the human mind is capable.

COCKER (EDWARD) a famous ſchool-maſter, and one of the improvers of the arts of writing and arithmetic, in the laſt century, was greatly admired for his ſkill. He publiſhed no leſs than fourteen copy-books, engraved by his own hand; he alſo wrote a piece on vulgar and decimal arithmetic, a ſmall Engliſh Dictionary, and a book of ſentences for writing, called Cocker's Morals. He died about the year 1677.

COCKERMOUTH, a town of Cumberland, with a market on Mondays. It is ſeated between two hills, at the confluence of the rivers Derwent and Cocker; the latter of which runs through the town, and divides it into two parts, which communicate by two bridges. On one of the hills the church ſtands, which was rebuilt in 1711; and on the other the caſtle now in ruins. The houſes are built of ſtone, and ſlated, except ſome few, and are ranged into two ſtreets; the one above, in which are the moot-hall, and the market-houſe, which is chiefly uſed for corn; the other is below, where the beaſt-market is kept. It is no corporation; but ſends two members to parliament. The fairs are, the firſt Monday in May for horned cattle, and October 10 for horſes and horned cattle. Its diſtance from Carliſle is twenty-five miles north eaſt, and three hundred north-north-weſt from London. Long. 3. 12. W. Lat. 54. 35. N.

COCYTUS, in fabulous hiſtory, one of the rivers of hell, ſaid to have its name from groaning and lamentation. It was a branch of the river Styx, and, according to Horace, flows with a dull and languid ſtream.

CODOGNO, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Milan and the Lodeſan, near the confluence of the rivers Adda and Po. It is twenty-three miles eaſt of Pavia. Long. 10. 39. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

CODRINGTON (CHRISTOPHER) a brave ſoldier, and a man of great politeneſs and conſiderable learning, was born at Barbadoes, in the year 1668, and educated at Oxford; after which he betook himſelf to the army, and by his merit and courage ſoon recommending himſelf to the favour of king William, was made a captain in the firſt regiment of foot-guards. He was at the ſiege of Namur, in 1695, and, upon the concluſion of the peace of Ryſwick, was made captain-general and governor in chief of the Leeward and Caribbee iſlands. However, in 1701, ſeveral articles were exhibited againſt him to the houſe of commons in England; to which he publiſhed a diſtinct and particular anſwer, and was honourably acquitted of all imputations. In 1703, he ſhewed great bravery at the attack of Guadaloupe; but at laſt he reſigned his government, and lived a ſtudious retired life: for a few years before his death, he chiefly applied himſelf to church-hiſtory and metaphyſics. He died at Barbadoes, on the 7th of April 1710, and was buried there the day following; but his body was afterwards brought over to England, and interred, on the 19th of June 1716, in the chapel of All Souls college, Oxford. By his laſt will, he bequeathed his plantations in Barbadoes, and part of the iſland of Barbuda, to the ſociety for propagating the goſpel in foreign parts; and left a noble legacy to All Souls College, of which he had been a fellow. This legacy conſiſted of his library, which was valued at ſix thouſand pounds, and ten thouſand pounds, to be laid out, ſix thouſand pounds in building a library, and four thouſand pounds in furniſhing it with books. He wrote ſome of the poems in the Muſæ Anglicanæ, printed at London, in 1741.

CODRUS, the ſon of Melanthus, and laſt king of Athens. This prince going to conſult the oracle in relation to the ſucceſs of the Heraclides, who infeſted the Peloponneſus, was told, that the people, whoſe chief ſhould be killed, would remain victorious: on which, putting on the habit of a peaſant, he wounded a ſoldier, and voluntarily loſt his life, about the 1071ſt year before the Chriſtian æra. The Athenians, from their reſpect to this prince, reſolved to have no other king, and therefore choſe the magiſtrates called archons as their governors; and Medon, the ſon of Codrus, was the firſt archon.

CODRUS, a Latin poet, mentioned by Juvenal, was ſo poor, that his indigence become a proverb, Codro pauperior.

COELUS, heaven, in Pagan mythology, the ſon of Æther and Dies, or Air and Day. According to Heſiod, he married Terra, or the Earth, on whom he begat Ourea or the Mountains, the Ocean, &c. but having at length impriſoned the Cyclops, who were alſo his children, his wife, being offended, incited her ſon Saturn to revenge the injury done to his brothers; and, by her aſſiſtance, he bound and caſtrated Cœlus, when the blood that flowed from the wound produced the three furies, the giants, and the wood-nymphs; and the genital parts being thrown into the ſea, impregnated the waters, and formed the goddeſs Venus. This deity was called by the Greeks Uranus.

Lactantius ſays, that Cœlus was a powerful and aſpiring prince, who, affecting to be a god, called himſelf the Son of the Sky; and Diodorus repreſents him as the firſt king of the Atlantades, and ſays, that for his ſkill in aſtronomy, and his extraordinary beneficence to mankind, he was called, the Eternal King of the Univerſe. But it ſeems more rational to conclude, that as Heſiod begins with Chaos, whoſe offspring was Gloomineſs and Night, and that from Night ſprang Air and Day, and from them Cœlus, or Heaven, that the whole is no more than a figurative deſcription of the Creation, obſcured by fiction.

COESFELD, a town of Germany, in Weſtphalia, in the tertory of the biſhoprick of Munſter. It is well fortified, and was the place of reſidence of the biſhops till they became maſters of Munſter. It is ſeated on the river Berkel, twenty-three miles to the weſt of Munſter, and thirty ſouth-eaſt of Grol. Long. 6. 49. E. Lat. 51. 58. N.

COEVORDEN, a very ſtrong town of the United Provinces, in Overyſſel, and one of the chief fortifications erected by the celebrated Cohorn. It is in the form of a pentagon, defended by ſeven baſtions. It is ſurrounded with a large moraſs, and is thirty miles ſouth of Groningen, and thirty-eight north-eaſt of Deventer. Long. 6. 41. E. Lat. 52. 40.

COGLIONI, or COLLIONE, (BARTHOLOMEW) a celebrated captain in the fifteenth century, was born at Bergamo, of a noble family, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his youth by his valour and conduct. The Venetians gave him the command of their troops, and he performed conſiderable ſervices for them. It is ſaid, that he was the firſt who introduced the uſe of artillery in the field. He died in 1475, and the Venetians erected an equeſtrian ſtatue to his memory.

COEVY (PREGENT, lord of) a gentleman of Brittany, diſtinguiſhed himſelf, in the fifteenth century, by his valour and prudence in many ſieges and battles. He was made admiral of France in 1439, and was killed by a cannon-ball at the ſiege of Cherburg, in 1450.

COGNAC, a town of France, in Angoumois. It has a caſtle, and is greatly noted for its fine brandy. It has a very agreeable ſituation on the Charente, eighteen miles eaſt of Saintes, eighteen miles weſt of Angouleme, and two hundred and fifty-five ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 45. 42. N.

COGNI, an ancient city of Turky in Aſia, formerly called Iconium, where a beglerbeg reſides. It was of note in the early ages of Chriſtianity, being then a biſhop's ſee. When the Turks became maſters of it, it was the metropolis of the empire till they got footing in Europe. It is ſeated in a ſpacious fertile plain, near a large freſh water lake, which furniſhes the city with plenty and variety of fiſh. As the town has no river, they bring a ſupply of water from the lake and ſprings in ſuch plenty, that they have it in the ſtreets, houſes, and gardens. The walls are high and ſtrong, and are adorned with one hundred and eight ſtately towers, ſurrounded by a very broad ditch. There are five handſome ſtone gates, adorned with baſſo relievo, and angels holding up a ſun, with inſcriptions in Turkiſh and Arabic. This city is inhabited only by Turks; but in the two ſuburbs there are Jews, Greeks, Armenians, and other ſtrangers. There are ſome very convenient caravanſeras, for the uſe of the caravans and other travellers. Proviſions are here very good and cheap, and their mutton extremely fine. The largeſt moſque ſtands cloſe within the walls, and is remarkable for its bulk, dome, and ſtately minarets or towers. The caſtle which ſtands on the ſouth ſide, and cloſe to the city wall, is ſmall; but is incloſed with good walls, flanked with towers, and ſurrounded with a ditch. The houſes are built of brick, and flat on the top, after the Turkiſh manner. It is one hundred and fifty miles eaſt-by-north of Satalia. Long. 33. 16. E. Lat. 37. 56. N.

COGGESHALL, a town in Eſſex, with a market on Saturdays. It has a fair on Whit-Tueſday, for horſes and toys. Long. 0. 47. E. Lat. 51. 45. N. It is forty-five miles eaſt-by-north from London, and 14 north-eaſt of Chelmsford.

COIGNET (MICHAEL) a learned mathematician, born at Antwerp. He wrote a treatiſe on navigation, which was printed in 1581, and died on the 24th of December 1623.

COHORN (N.) the greateſt engineer Holland has produced. Among his other works, which are eſteemed maſter-pieces of ſkill, he fortified Bergen-op Zoom, which, to the ſurprize of all Europe, was taken by the French, on the 17th of September 1747.

COIMBRA, a city of Spain, capital of the province of Beira, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated at the end of a plain, upon an eminence, whoſe declivity reaches to the banks of the river Mondego. It gives title to a duke, has a tribunal of the inquiſition, and a famous univerſity. There are a great number of churches, monaſteries, and other handſome buildings; the principal of which are, the cathedral, and St. Cruz. The two fineſt convents belong to the Franciſcan monks and the nuns of St. Clara. The college of the univerſity, which was the ſeat of the ancient kings, is a ſtately ſtructure. Likewiſe, the bridge over the Mondego is well contrived, being built with two rows of arches, one upon another, in ſuch a manner that you paſs under cover all the way. The tomb of queen Elizabeth is in the nunnery of St. Clara, on which there is her figure, with a crown on her head. It is encompaſſed with a baluſtrade of ſilver. The Jeſuits had alſo a houſe here, which was one of the largeſt and moſt ſtately belonging to the ſociety. Their church is a fine building. It ſtands in the ſtreet Calzada, which is the fineſt in the city, it being the only level one in it; for all the reſt are rugged, and full of aſcents and deſcents. Behind the univerſity there is an aqueduct, raiſed on high ſtone piers, which brings water into a handſome marble baſon. The country about this city is very pleaſant, being planted with vineyards, which produce excellent wine, and covered with foreſts of olive trees. It is eighty-eight miles ſouth of Braga, ſixty ſouth-by-eaſt of Oporto, and ninety north-eaſt of Liſbon. Long. 8. 57. W. Lat. 40. 10. N

COINTE (Charles le) one of the moſt able hiſtorians of his time, was born at Troyes, on the 4th of November 1611. He publiſhed in Latin the Eccleſiaſtical Annals of France, in eight volumes folio, and died on the 18th of January 1681, aged ſeventy.

COIRE, a city of Swiſſerland, capital of the country of the Griſons, with a biſhop's ſee. It is divided into two parts; the inhabitants of the leaſt are Roman catholics, and thoſe of the other proteſtants. The cathedral, the biſhop's palace, and the houſes where the canons reſide, are in the former. The biſhop has the title of prince of the empire, and has the right of coining money. The city is a juriſdiction diſtinct from the territory, and has its own government and laws. It has five companies of tradeſmen, each of which has two maſters and under-maſters: out of the firſt are choſen two grand-maſters, who preſide over the reſt. Each company chuſes fourteen men, to make up the grand council of ſeventy. From theſe they chuſe the officers and the ſenate, which conſiſts of fifteen perſons, three out of each company. Theſe councils have two burgo-maſters at their head, who preſide in their turns during a year. When criminal affairs are brought before them, they chuſe fifteen more, three out of each company. The preſident of the aſſembly is one of the two bailiffs of the city, who preſide by turns throughout the year. It is ſeated on the river Pleſſus, in a plain abounding in vineyards and all ſorts of game, between mountains, about a mile from the Rhine. It is fifty-five miles ſouth of Conſtance, and fifty-two ſouth-eaſt of Zurich. Long. 9. 17. E. Lat. 46. 50. N.

COKE (Sir Edward) lord-chief-juſtice of England, and one of the moſt eminent lawyers this kingdom has produced, was the ſon of Robert Coke, eſq. and was born at his father's ſeat, at Mileham, in the county of Norfolk, in the year 1549. After ſtudying four years at Cambridge, he removed to Clifford's Inn, and the year after entered a ſtudent in the Inner Temple. In 1572, he was made ſollicitor to queen Elizabeth, and ſoon after was advanced to the poſt of attorney-general. In May 1603, he was knighted by king James, and in November, the ſame year, managed the trial of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, when he exerted ſuch fury and ſcurrility of language againſt that brave man as is ſcarcely to be paralleled, calling him traitor, monſter, viper, and ſpider of hell. The reſentment of the public was ſo great on this occaſion, that it is generally believed that Shakeſpeare, in his Twelfth Night, hints at this ſtrange behaviour. In 1606 he was called to the degree of a ſerjeant; the ſame year he was made chief-juſtice of the Common Pleas, and, in 1613, chief-juſtice of the King's Bench. Theſe high poſts added no ſweetneſs to his temper, and he continued to vent his inſolence and anger while ſeated on the bench; and in particular told Mrs. Turner, who was concerned in the poiſoning of Sir Thomas Overbury, that ſhe was guilty of the ſeven deadly ſins; "ſhe was a whore, "a bawd, a ſorcerer, a witch, a papiſt, a felon, and a "murderer." However, having diſobliged the court, he was, in the year 1616, ſuſpended from his office, and twice appeared on his knees at the council table: but low as he was now fallen, he was at length reſtored to credit and favour. After this, he boldly oppoſed the court in parliament, by taking all occaſions to ſhew, that proclamations againſt the tenor of acts of parliament were void, which occaſioned his being committed to the Tower. In the beginning of the next reign, he was obliged to ſerve the office of ſheriff for the county of Buckingham, and to attend the judges of aſſize, where he had often preſided as lord-chief-juſtice; but this did not prevent his being elected knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks, in the parliament of 1628, where he warmly exerted himſelf for the redreſs of grievances, and boldly argued in defence of liberty, and in ſupport of the privileges of the houſe of commons. At the diſſolution of that parliament, in 1628-9, he retired to his houſe at Stoke Pogeys, in Buckinghamſhire, where he ſpent the remainder of his days in retirement, and died on the 3d of September 1634, in the 86th year of his age. He wrote, 1. A book of Reports; 2. A book of Entries; 3. Inſtitutes of the Laws of England; and other works.

Coke, or Cooke (Sir John) ſecretary of ſtate in the reign of King Charles I. was a younger brother of Sir Francis Coke, and was born at Truſley, in Derbyſhire. In 1580 he was admitted ſcholar of Trinity college, Cambridge, where he was at laſt choſen public profeſſor of rhetoric. He afterwards travelled, and on his return to England lived in the country, as a private gentleman, till he was fifty years of age, when he was admitted to ſeveral employments, and in particular was made maſter of requeſts, and, about the year 1620, ſecretary of ſtate, which office he enjoyed about twenty years, when he was removed to make way for Sir Henry Vane. He died Sept. 8, 1644.

Coke, or Cooke (George) brother to the former, was educated at Pembroke-hall, in Cambridge. He was rector of Bigrave, in Hertfordſhire, and afterwards ſucceſſively biſhop of Briſtol and Hereford. He was involved in the ſame condemnation with the reſt of his brethren the biſhops, for ſubſcribing the proteſt in parliament in preſervation of their privileges, and died in low circumſtances, on the 10th of December 1646.

COKENHAUSEN, a fortreſs of Sweden, ſeated on the river Dwina, in Livonia, fifty miles ſouth-weſt of Riga. It is ſubject to Ruſſia. Long. 25. 5. E. Lat 56. 40. N.

COLBERG, a town of Germany, in the Farther Pomerania, ſubject to the king of Pruſſia. It is ſeated at the mouth of the river Perſante, on the Baltic Sea, and is the capital of the duchy of Caſſubia. It is a ſtrong place, with a fine cathedral, and a good harbour. It carries on a conſiderable trade in ſhalloons and linen cloth. It is ſixty miles north-eaſt of Stetin, and thirty north-eaſt of Camin. Long. 15. 57. E. Lat. 54. 18 N.

COLASSE (Pascal) a French muſician, born at Paris, in 1639, was the diſciple of Lulli, and maſter of muſic of the king's chapel. He compoſed a great number of operas, which did him honour; that of Thetis and Peleus paſſed for his maſter-piece. He alſo compoſed many other pieces of muſic. Colaſſe had the folly to ſquander away his fortune and health in ſearch of the philoſopher's ſtone, and died at Verſailles, in 1709.

COLBERT (John Baptist) marquis of Seignelai, and one of the greateſt men France has produced, was born at Paris, on the 31ſt of Auguſt 1619. He had the entire confidence of cardinal Mazarine, who, at his death, recommended him to Lewis XIV. That prince made him counſellor of ſtate, comptroller-general of the finances, ſuperintendant of the royal buildings, and ſecretary and miniſter of ſtate. M. Colbert diſcharged the duties of all theſe important poſts with indefatigable application, a ſteady fidelity, and a capacity, of which there are but few examples. His methodical regularity, his zeal for the glory of his prince, and his ſuperior views, extended to each part of the government. He reeſtabliſhed the finances, the navy, and commerce, cauſed the principal front of the Louvre to be built, and a number of other noble edifices, that are ſtill the monuments of his good taſte. He invited into France the fineſt painters and ſculptors, and the moſt able mathematicians, animated the arts and ſciences, and made them flouriſh, rewarded men of learning even in foreign countries, and eſtabliſhed and protected the academies. In ſhort, this miniſter was wiſe, active, attentive to the intereſts of his prince, to the happineſs of the people, to the progreſs of the arts and manufactures, and mindful of every thing capable of contributing to the glory and advantage of France. This truly great man died at Paris, on the 6th of September 1683, aged ſixty-four.

Colbert (John Baptist) marquis of Seignelai, and eldeſt ſon of the former, was born at Paris, in 1651. He followed the ſteps of his father, was miniſter and ſecretary of ſtate, and raiſed the navy and trade of France to the greateſt perfection; he protected the arts and ſciences; and died on the 3d of November 1690, aged thirty-nine.

Colbert (John Baptist) marquis of Torey, was of the ſame family as the former, and born on the 19th of September, 1665. He was ſent envoy-extraordinary into Portugal, Denmark, and England, and at laſt became miniſter and ſecretary of ſtate in the department of foreign affairs, ſuperintendant of the poſts, and counſellor to the council of the regency, during the minority of Lewis XV. The ſucceſs of the important and difficult negociations with which he was charged, with the reputation and eſteem he acquired in France, are proofs of his great abilities, and his zeal for the ſervice of the king and the honour of France. He died at Paris, on the 2d of September, 1746, at eighty-one years of age, leaving an excellent Hiſtory of the Reign of Lewis XIV. which has been lately printed.

The ſame family has produced ſeveral other great men.

COLCHESTER, a large town in Eſſex, with a good market on Wedneſdays and Saturdays. It is a place of great antiquity, and was encompaſſed with a wall, which had ſix gates, three poſterns, and nine watch-towers; but they are now demoliſhed, except ſome parts of the walls and gates, and a great part of the walls of the caſtle, which are ſtill ſtanding. It was a corporation, governed by a mayor, aldermen, a recorder, a town-clerk, &c. but they have forfeited their charter, which they are very ſollicitous to have reſtored. They had fifteen churches; but there is now only about half the number within the walls, and two without. Beſides, part of the abbey, dedicated to St. John, is now turned into a private houſe. Colcheſter ſtands on the declivity of a hill, and the river Coln runs on the north and eaſt ſide of it, on which boats and ſmall veſſels can ſail almoſt up to the town, which is a very great advantage. There is a large manufacture carried carried on in bays, and this place is alſo noted for candied eryngo roots and barrelled oyſters. It is about two miles in circumference, and ſends two members to parliament. The fair on Whit-Tueſday is kept by wholeſale taylors; that on June 24, is for horſes; that on July 23, is for cattle and horſes; and that on October 20, is for cattle, horſes, cheeſe, butter, and toys. It is eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Ipſwich, and fifty-one eaſt-north-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 2. E. Lat. 51. 55. N.

COLDINGUEN, a town of Denmark, in North-Jutland, and dioceſe of Ripen, near the frontiers of the duchy of Slefwick. It is built on an eminence from whence a fine country may be diſcovered, full of all ſorts of game. Through this town all the horſes, cows, and oxen paſs, that are ſent from North-Jutland into Germany, the duty for which brings in a large ſum to the king. It is fifty miles ſouth-by-eaſt of Wiburg, thirty-eight ſouth-weſt of Arrhus, and twenty-five north-eaſt of Ripen. Long. 9. 55. E. Lat. 55. 35. N.

COLE, (Henry) a perſon of conſiderable learning in the ſixteenth century; was born at Godſhill, in the iſle of Wight, and educated at Oxford, where he ſtudied the civil law; after which he travelled into Italy, and perfected himſelf in his ſtudies at Padua. He, on his return to England, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by acknowledging king Henry VIII. as ſupreme head of the church; by his preaching up the doctrines of the Reformation in the reign of Edward VI. by his becoming again a zealous catholic in the reign of queen Mary, and his being one of the catholic divines who diſputed publickly at Weſtminſter with the proteſtant miniſters, when Elizabeth was about to ſettle a reformation in the church of England. During theſe reigns he enjoyed conſiderable dignities in the church, and was vicar-general of the ſpiritualities under cardinal Pole; but he was at laſt ſtripped of his preferments, fined and impriſoned. He died in or near Wood-ſtreet-compter, London, in December 1579.

COLE, (William) the moſt famous botaniſt of his time, was born at Adderbury in Oxfordſhire, about the year 1626, and ſtudied at Merton college in Oxford. He at length removed to Putney, near London, and publiſhed The Art of Simpling, and Adam in Eden, or Nature's Paradiſe. Upon the reſtoration of king Charles II. he was made ſecretary to Dr. Duppa, biſhop of Wincheſter, but died two years after, at about thirty-ſeven years of age.

COLEFORD, a town of Glouceſterſhire, with a market on Fridays. Their fairs are on June 20, for wool, and November 24, for horned cattle and cheeſe. It is ſixteen miles ſouth of Glouceſter, and one hundred and twenty-two weſt-by-north from London. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 51. 45. N.

COLERAIN, a large town of Ireland, in the county of Londonderry, and province of Ulſter, ſituated on the river Bann, five miles ſouth of the ſea, and twenty-five north of Londonderry. Long. 7. 2. W. Lat. 55. 10. N.

COLES, (Eliſha) author of the Latin dictionary; was born in Northamptonſhire about the year 1640, and educated at Oxford, after which, coming to London, he taught Latin to youth, and Engliſh to foreigners; at length he became one of the uſhers of merchant-taylors ſchool, which place he afterwards left, and withdrew into Ireland, from whence he never returned. He alſo wrote, 1. The complete Engliſh School-maſter; 2. A Method of writing Short-hand; 3. An Engliſh Dictionary; 4. Nolens Volens, or you ſhall make Latin whether you will or no; and ſome other works.

COLESHILL, a town in Warwickſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. The fairs are on Shrove Monday for horſes; on May 6, for horſes and cattle; and on October 2, for all ſorts of cattle. It is fifteen miles north of Warwick, one hundred and four miles weſt of London, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Litchfield, and eleven north-weſt of Coventry. Long. 1. 35. W. Lat. 52. 36. N.

COLET, (Sir Henry) twice lord mayor of London, was a younger ſon of Robert Colet, eſq. of Wendover, in Bucks; and being bred a mercer in London, acquired great wealth. In 1477, he was one of the ſheriffs of London; and, in the beginning of the reign of Henry VII. was elected lord mayor of London, and ſoon after knighted. He aſſerted the ancient privilege of naming a ſheriff, by the ceremony of drinking to him; and drank to John Percival, his carver, whom he immediately ordered to cover his head, and ſit down at the table, where he was waiting. Seven years after he had ſerved that high office, Sir Henry was called to it again in 1495, which gave him an opportunity of ſhewing his loyalty, prudence, and courage, by preſerving the peace and fidelity of the city, when an army of rebels from Cornwall had marched as far as Blackheath, in their way to London. He cauſed a man to be ſet in the pillory for ſelling adulterated wines. In the ſame year an affair happened, in which, to pleaſe the court, he ſeems to have deprived the common-council of one of their privileges: a treaty of peace and intercourſe was concluded between England and Flanders; and it was then cuſtomary on theſe occaſions, not only for the reſpective princes, but for the chief trading cities and towns, to bind themſelves under their common ſeals. London being the chief on the part of England, a draught was prepared for the city ſeal, but the common-council would not agree to its being affixed to it; and, though the miniſters of ſtate came to Guild-hall to perſuade them to it, they deſired a reſpite of ſix days, in which time they would give their reaſons in writing, to be laid before the king and council; which was granted; though it was afterwards agreed by the miniſtry, that inſtead of the body of the city, the mayor alone ſhould give his perſonal ſecurity, and with this he complied. He died in 1510, and was buried at Stepney, where his monument is ſtill to be ſeen.

Colet, (Dr. John) A very learned divine, and founder of St. Paul's ſchool, London; was the eldeſt ſon of the above Sir Henry Colet, knight, and was born in that city in the year 1466. He was educated at Oxford, after which he travelled; but before he went abroad, and when he was only two years ſtanding in the univerſity, he was inſtituted to the rectory of Denington in Suffolk. At his return, he was promoted to ſeveral benefices in the church, was made doctor of divinity, and at length dean of St. Paul's, in which cathedral he procured a ſettlement for a lecture three days in every week. He publiſhed, 1. Rudimenta Grammatices; 2. The Conſtruction of the Eight Parts of Speech; 3. Daily Devotions; 4. Epiſtolæ ad Eraſmum; 5. Several Sermons; and other works which ſtill remain in manuſcript. He died September 16, 1519.

COLIGNI, (Francis de) lord of Andelot, deſcended from one of the moſt noble families in France, was a younger ſon of Gaſpard de Coligni, marſhal of France, and Louiſa de Montmorenci. He was born at Chatillon-ſur-Loing on the 18th of April, 1521, and in 1555, was made colonel of the infantry, on his brother, the admiral, laying down his commiſſion. He had much wit and vivacity, was enterpriſing, indefatigable, and a great warrior. Having embraced Calviniſm, he made uſe of all his abilities in the defence of thoſe proteſtants; took up arms againſt the French king; ſignalized himſelf during the civil wars in ſeveral ſieges and battles, and died at Saintes in 1569.

Coligni, (Gaspard de) brother to the former, was admiral of France, and one of the greateſt commanders of his time. He was born on the 16th of February, 1516, and ſignalized himſelf from his youth, under the reigns of Francis I. and Henry II. He at length became colonel of the infantry, and admiral of France, when he contributed to the victory gained at Renti, and reſtored military diſcipline. King Henry II. entruſted him with the management of ſeveral important affairs; however, after the death of that prince, he embraced the proteſtant religion, and became, in a manner, the head of that party. He openly declared againſt the houſe of Guiſe, and formed ſo powerful a party, that it was thought he would have overturned the French monarchy. In 1562, he loſt the battle of Dreux; but rallying his forces, he ſeized ſeveral towns. He alſo loſt the battle of St. Dennis, in which his uncle, the conſtable De Montmorenci, who commanded the popiſh army, was killed. After the battles of Jarnac and Moncontour, in which he was worſted, a peace was concluded in 1571, when Charles IX. gave him 100,000 livres, and conferred on him other favours. Coligni afterwards retired to his ſeat at Chantillon-ſur-Loing; but coming to court at the marriage of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. he was ſhot at from a window with an arquebuſs, and dangerouſly wounded, and ſome days after was murdered at the bloody maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day, Sunday the 24th of Auguſt, 1572, when his body being thrown out of the window, was expoſed for three days to the fury of the populace, and at laſt hung on the gallows of Montfaucon; from whence it was taken down by the conſtable Montmorenci, and interred at Chantilli.

Coligni, (Odet de) cardinal of Chatillon, archbiſhop of Toulouſe, and biſhop of Beauvais, was brother to the former, and was born on the tenth of July 1515. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his extraordinary abilities, and love of learning. However, embracing the proteſtant religion, and marrying, he was ſtripped of the purple, and at length died in England on the 14th of February, 1571, where he was poiſoned by his valet de chambre.

Coligni, (Gaspard de) lieutenant-general of foot, and marſhal of France, was the ſon of Francis de Coligni, admiral of Guienne, and Margaret d'Ailli, and was born on the 26th of July, 1584. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral ſieges and battles, and died on the 4th of January, 1646.

COLIMA, a large rich town of North America, in Mexico, capital of a valley of the ſame name, which is very fruitful and agreeable, and produces abundance of cocoa-nuts. Long. 106. 35. W. Lat. 18. 10. N.

COLIOURE, a ſmall but ancient and ſtrong town of France, in Rouſillon, at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains, with a ſmall harbour. It is ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Perpignan, and three hundred and fifty ſouth of Paris. Long. 3. 10. E. Lat. 42. 32. N.

COLISEUM, or COLISÆUM, in Roman antiquity, an oval amphitheatre, erected by Veſpaſian, in which were ſtatues repreſenting all the provinces of the empire, and in the middle ſtood that of Rome, holding a golden apple in her hand. This ſtructure was erected in the city of Rome, and was ſo large that it would contain near one hundred thouſand ſpectators.

COLLATINUS (LUCIUS TARQUINIUS) a Roman conſul, of the royal family of the Tarquins, who having married Lucretia, was very laviſh in his praiſes of her beauty to Sextus, one of Tarquin's ſons, and took him to his houſe that he might ſee her. Sextus was ſtruck with admiration at her charms, and having paid her a viſit in the night, during the abſence of her huſband, had the brutality to raviſh her; on which Lucretia killed herſelf. The Tarquins being on this account driven from Rome, Collatinus and Brutus were made conſuls, in the five hundred and ninth year before the Chriſtian æra; but Collatinus was ſoon depoſed, on account of the hatred of the people to the royal family, and the favour he ſhewed to thoſe who had been detected in a conſpiracy to reſtore Tarquin.

COLLE, a town of Tuſcany, in Tuſcany, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ten miles north-weſt of Sienna. Long. 11. 10. E. Lat. 43. 24. N.

COLLEONI (BARTHOLOMEW). See COGLIONI.

COLLETET (WILLIAM) a French poet, born at Paris, on the 12th of March, 1598, was advocate to the council, and one of the forty members of the French academy. Cardinal de Richlieu, and Seguier, the chancellor, gave him public marks of their eſteem, as well as Francis de Harlay, archbiſhop of Paris, and ſeveral other illuſtrious perſons, from whom he received conſiderable preſents. There are ſeveral of his works in verſe and proſe. He died on the 10th of February, 1659. Boileau mentions Francis Colletet, his ſon, with contempt.

COLLIER (JEREMY) ſon of Jeremy Collier, was born at Stow Qui, in Cambridgeſhire, and educated in the univerſity of Cambridge. Having entered into prieſt's orders he became chaplain to the counteſs dowager of Dorſet, from whence he removed to a ſmall rectory at Ampton, near St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk; which he at length reſigned, and coming to London in 1685, was made lecturer at Gray's Inn; but at the Revolution was obliged to reſign it, becauſe his conſcience would not permit him to take the oaths to king William. He wrote many pieces in defence of his ſentiments; particularly againſt complying with the change of government; againſt taking the oaths to king William; and on the independency of church power. This conduct fixed the eyes of the government upon him, ſo that going down with one Mr. Newman to Romney Marſh, they were apprehended, on a ſuſpicion that they were either endeavouring to ſend intelligence to, or were labouring to receive it from, the other ſide of the water, and, being brought up to London, were committed to the Gate-houſe; but were ſoon after diſcharged. Some years after, ſir John Freind and ſir William Perkins were condemned for being concerned in the aſſaſſination plot, when Mr. Collier, with Mr. Cook and Mr. Snat, both clergymen of his own opinion, attended thoſe unhappy perſons at the place of execution, where Mr. Collier ſolemnly abſolved the former, as Mr. Cook did the latter, and all three joined in the impoſition of hands upon them both. This was juſtly conſidered as an high inſult upon the civil and eccleſiaſtical government, and therefore, a proſecution being begun againſt them, Mr. Cook and Mr. Snat were committed to Newgate, but were afterwards releaſed without being brought to a trial; while Mr. Collier abſconding, was outlawed, under which incapacity he remained as long as he lived. On the other hand, both the archbiſhops, and ten of their ſuffragans, publiſhed a ſtrong declaration of their ſenſe of this ſcandalous proceeding; an anſwer to which, Mr. Collier wrote with his uſual warmth; and after that, ſeveral other pieces in juſtification of his own and his brethren's conduct in that affair. Mr. Collier alſo wrote, 1. Eſſays upon Moral Subjects, three volumes. 2. A ſhort View of the Immorality and Profaneneſs of the Engliſh Stage. 3. An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great Britain, two volumes, folio. 4. The hiſtorical, geographical, genealogical, and poetical Dictionary, four volumes, folio, and ſome other works. He died on the 26th of April, 1726, in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age. He was an ingenious, learned, and religious man, and was greatly eſteemed for his integrity and exemplary life.

COLLINGS (JOHN) D. D. one of the commiſſioners of the Savoy Conference, in the reign of king Charles II. was educated at Emanuel college, in Cambridge, and was forty years a miniſter at Norwich. He was a man of various learning, and greatly eſteemed for his humanity and exemplary life. He publiſhed many ſermons and books of practical divinity and controverſy, among which is his Weavers Pocket-book, or Weaving ſpiritualized, octavo, a work adapted to the place where he lived, which has been long famous for the manufacture of ſtuffs. He had alſo a conſiderable hand in the Annotations on the Bible, in two volumes, folio, begun and carried on by Mr. Matthew Poole, and which go under his name. He died in 1690, aged ſixty-ſeven.

COLLINS (ANTHONY) eſq. a famous ſceptical writer, born at Heſton, in the county of Middleſex, June 21, 1676. He received his firſt education at Eton college, from whence he removed to King's college in Cambridge. He afterwards came up to London, and was admitted a ſtudent in the Temple, but not reliſhing the ſtudy of the law, he ſoon abandoned it. He held a correſpondence with Mr. Le Clerc and Mr. Locke, who had a great eſteem for him; but though a perſon of a very amiable character, he had the unhappineſs to diſbelieve the Chriſtian revelation. In 1715 he acted as a juſtice of the peace for the county of Eſſex, as he had formerly done for the county of Middleſex and liberty of Weſtminſter. In 1718 he was choſen treaſurer for the county of Eſſex; and this important truſt he diſcharged to the entire ſatisfaction of the inhabitants. He died of the ſtone, December the 13th, 1729, and was interred in Oxford chapel. His works are numerous, and very ingenious. The principal are, 1. An Eſſay concerning the Uſe of Reaſon in Propoſitions, the Evidence whereof depends upon human Teſtimony. 2. Some Conſiderations concerning the Trinity. 3. Prieſtcraft in Perfection. 4. A Vindication of the divine Attributes. 5. A Diſcourſe of Free-Thinking. 6. A philoſophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty; and other works.

COLLINS (JOHN) a perſon of conſiderable note among the learned, and author of ſeveral works, was born at Wood-Eaton, near Oxford, March 5, 1624. He employed ſome part of his younger years as clerk to one of the clerks of the kitchen to prince Charles, and during the civil wars went to ſea for ſeven years. Upon his return he took up the profeſſion of an accomptant; was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and wrote, 1. An Introduction to Merchants Accompts. 2. A Queſtion of Mortgage, ſtated according to Simple Intereſt. 3. Geometrical Dialling, and other pieces. He carried on a literary correſpondence with Mr. Iſaac Newton, and all the great philoſophers of that age, and died November 10, 1683.

COL[illegible] (FRANCIS) a learned doctor of Milan, in the ſeventeenth century, much known by his book De Animabus Paganorum, in two volumes, quarto, a very curious, learned, and ſcarce work. He alſo wrote a treatiſe De Sanguine Chriſti, in quarto.

COLLINS (WILLIAM) an admirable poet, was born at Chicheſter, about the year 1724. He received his claſſical education at Wincheſter, after which he ſtudied at New college, in Oxford; was admitted a commoner of King's college in the ſame univerſity, and was at length elected a demy of Magdalen college. While at Oxford he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry, and publiſhed his Oriental Eclogues, after which he came to London. He was naturally poſſeſſed of an ear for all the varieties of harmony and modulation; his heart was ſuſceptible of the fineſt feelings of tenderneſs and humanity, and was particularly carried away by that high enthuſiaſm which gives to imagination its ſtrongeſt colouring; and he was at once capable of ſoothing the ear with the melody of his numbers, of influencing the paſſions by the force of the pathos, and of gratifying the fancy by the luxury of deſcription. With theſe powers he attempted lyric poetry, and in 1746 publiſhed his Odes, deſcriptive and allegorical; but the ſale of this work being not at all anſwerable to its merit, he burnt his remaining copies with his own hand. Being a man of a liberal ſpirit, and of a ſmall fortune, his pecuniary reſources were unhappily ſoon exhauſted, and his life became a miſerable example of neceſſity, indolence, and diſſipation. He projected books which he was well able to execute, and became in idea an hiſtorian, a critic, and a dramatic poet; but wanted the means and encouragement to carry theſe ideas into execution. Day ſucceeded day, for the ſupport of which he had made no proviſion. Thoſe relations who were in a capacity to have ſupplied his wants, with-held their hands, and he was obliged to ſubſiſt, either by the repeated contributions of a friend, or the generoſity of a caſual ſual acquaintance. His ſpirits became oppreſſed, and he ſunk into a ſullen deſpondence. While in this gloomy ſtate of mind, his uncle colonel Martin died, and left him a conſiderable fortune; but this favour had been deferred too long; for he had loſt all capacity of enjoying it: he had been ſo long harraſſed by anxiety and diſtreſs, that he fell into a nervous diſorder, which at length reduced the fineſt underſtanding to the moſt deplorable childiſhneſs. In the firſt ſtages of this diſorder, he endeavoured to relieve himſelf by travelling, and paſſed into France; but the growing malady obliged him to return, and having continued, with ſhort intervals, in this pitiable ſtate till the year 1756, he died, in the arms of his ſiſter. The ingenious Mr. Langhorne has publiſhed his poetical works, with Memoirs of the Author, in one volume, duodecimo, and to that gentleman we are obliged for the above particulars.

COLLINSON (PETER) an eminent and very ingenious naturaliſt, and antiquarian of the preſent century. He diſcovered, while a youth, a particular attachment to natural hiſtory: inſects and their ſeveral metamorphoſes employed many of thoſe hours which are moſtly ſpent by others in very different purſuits. Plants likewiſe engaged his attention, and he began early to make a collection of dried ſpecimens. He became acquainted with the moſt eminent naturaliſts of his time; the doctors Durham, Woodward, Dale, Lloyd, and ſir Hans Sloane, were among his friends. In 1728 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and was one of its moſt diligent and uſeful members, not only in ſupplying them with many curious obſervations of his own; but in promoting and preſerving a moſt extenſive correſpondence with learned and ingenious foreigners, in all countries, and on every uſeful ſubject. He acquainted the learned and ingenious in diſtant parts of the globe, with diſcoveries and improvements in natural hiſtory in this country, and received the like information from the moſt eminent perſons in almoſt every other. As he was a merchant, he traded chiefly to North America and the Weſt Indies, and obtained a particular knowledge, not only of the natural hiſtory and produce of all our ſettlements, but of all the European colonies in the New World. The quantities of new ſeeds he received from America, not only ſupplied his own garden with every thing that was curious in that part of the world; but furniſhed him with the means of procuring others in exchange, from other parts of the globe. He had ſome correſpondents in almoſt every nation in Europe; ſome in Aſia, and even at Pekin, who all tranſmitted to him the moſt valuable ſeeds they could collect; in return for the treaſures of America. Hence the great Linnæus, when he reſided in England, contracted an intimate friendſhip with him, which was reciprocally encreaſed by a multitude of good offices, and continued till the laſt, without any diminution.

He took much pains to excite a taſte in the Americans for natural hiſtory, and prompted them to purſue ſuch improvements as would be equally beneficial to themſelves, and to their mother country. He urged to ſuch of them as viſited him, the neceſſity of cultivating flax, hemp, wine, ſilk, and other products. He would preſs the Virginians to bethink themſelves in time of a more permanent ſtaple, than a plant whoſe conſumption only depends on cuſtom and caprice, and this cuſtom daily declining. "Vines," ſaid he, "will thrive well in your country; but imitate "nature in their cultivation; do not keep them cloſe to the "ground, as we are forced to do in this and other northern "European climates, for the ſake of a little more ſun and "heat to ripen the grape; your ſummer heats exceed as "much as ours fall ſhort; allow them therefore longer "ſtems; let them be trained to, and ſupported by trees, "and hide their fruit among the foliage, as in the warmer "parts of Europe."

His converſation was chearful and entertaining, and his acquaintance was much deſired by thoſe who were ſtudious in cultivating rural improvements. This ſecured him the intimate friendſhip of ſome of the moſt eminent perſonages in this kingdom. With ſome of theſe he frequently ſpent a few days at their ſeats in the neighbourhood of London, imparting many advantageous hints, with regard to the improvements they were deſigning, ſhewing the different methods of cultivation; what ſoil, what aſpect beſt ſuited different plants and trees; how beſt to cover incurable defects, and how to improve beauties. He was the firſt who introduced the great variety of ſeeds and ſhrubs, which are now the principal ornaments of every garden; and it was owing to his indefatigable induſtry that ſo many perſons of the firſt diſtinction are now enabled to behold groves, tranſported from the Weſtern continent, flouriſhing ſo luxuriouſly in their ſeveral domains, as if they were already become indigenous to Britain.

Beſides his attachment to natural hiſtory, he was very converſant in the antiquities of his own country; he being a member of the Society of Antiquarians from its inſtitution, and he frequently ſupplied them with many curious articles of intelligence, and obſervations, reſpecting both our own and other countries.

His perſon was rather ſhort than tall; he had a pleaſing and ſocial aſpect; was of a temper open and communicative, capable of feeling for diſtreſs, and ready to relieve and ſympathiſe. Excepting ſome attacks of the gout, he enjoyed, in general, perfect health, and great equality of ſpirits; bearing thoſe trials which are incident to man with fortitude and reſignation. In ſuch a courſe he arrived at his ſeventy-fifth year, when, being on a viſit to lord Petre, in Eſſex, for whom he had a ſingular regard, he was ſeized with a total ſuppreſſion of urine, which baffling every attempt to relieve it, proved fatal, on the 11th of Auguſt, 1768.

COLMAR, the capital of Alſace, ſeated near the river Ill, is the place of reſidence of the ſupreme council of the province. It has ſeveral privileges, and Lutheraniſm is tolerated here. It contains eight hundred houſes, one thouſand and ſeventy-two families, and about ſeven thouſand four hundred and forty-two inhabitants. It is ten miles weſt of Briſach, twenty-five ſouth-by-weſt of Straſburg, and two hundred and forty-two eaſt of Paris. Long. 7. 16. E. Lat. 48. 5. N.

COLMARS, a town of France, in Provence, and the dioceſe of Senes. It is near the Alps, twenty miles north-weſt of Glandeve. Long. 6. 25. E. Lat. 44. 17. N.

COLMOGOROD, a city of the Ruſſian Empire, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is an open town, ſeated on the river Dwina, thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Archangel. Long. 40. 50. E. Lat. 64. 10. N.

COLOCHINA, a town of Turky, in Europe, in the Morea, ſeated on a gulph of the ſame name, ten miles north of Cerigo. Long. 23. 2 E. Lat. 36. 32. N.

COLOCZA, a town of Hungary, ſeated on the Danube, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It was formerly a conſiderable place, but is now very poor. It was taken by the Turks in 1686, but the Imperialiſts retook it. It is twenty miles ſouth of Buda. Long. 19. 42. E. Lat. 46. 33. N.

COLOGNE (the archbiſhoprick or dioceſe of) is one of the ſtates that compoſe the electoral circle of the Rhine, in Germany. It is bounded on the north by the duchy of Cleves and Gueldres, on the weſt by that of Juliers, on the ſouth by the archbiſhoprick of Cleves, and on the eaſt by the duchy of Berg, from which it is almoſt wholly ſeparated by the Rhine. This country is very fruitful in corn and wine, which the inhabitants diſpoſe of by embarking it on the Rhine, it extending about ſeventy miles along that river; but it is not above ten in breadth. It is divided into the Higher and Lower Dioceſe, the Higher Dioceſe contains that part which lies above Cologne, wherein is Bonne, the capital town of this electorate, and where the elector reſides; beſides which there are Leichnich, Andernach, Bruyl, Zulich, and Kerpen. The Lower Dioceſe is on the other ſide of Cologne, and contains the towns of Zonz, Neuys, Heizarwart, Kempen, Rhynberg, and Alpen. The city of Cologne and county of Meurs, though within the dioceſe of Cologne, do not belong to it; for Cologne is a free city, and Meurs belongs to the houſe of Naſſau-Orange; but, by way of recompence, the elector has conſiderable poſſeſſions in Weſtphalia, which they call the Domain. It contains the duchy of Weſtphalia and the county of Rechlinchuſen. This prelate is one of the electors of the empire, and holds alternately with that of Treves, the ſecond or third rank in the electoral college. He is arch-chancellor of the empire in Italy, which dignity was very important when the emperors were maſters of Italy; but now it is next to nothing. When the emperors were crowned at Aix la Chapelle, the archbiſhop of Cologne, performed the ceremony, which cauſed him to pretend to the ſame right elſewhere; but he was oppoſed by the archbiſhop of Mentz, which occaſioned an order, that they ſhould each of them have that honour in their own dioceſe, but if it was done elſewhere, they ſhould perform it alternately. The archbiſhop of Cologne is elected by the chapter in that city, which is the moſt illuſtrious in all Germany. They are all princes or counts, except eight doctors, who have no occaſion to prove their nobility.

COLOGNE, an ancient city of Germany, capital of the electorate of that name. It is called, in Latin, Colonia Agrippina, becauſe it was built by the wife of the emperor Claudius, and the mother of Nero. It had likewiſe the name of Colonia Ubiorum, becauſe the Ubii inhabited this country on the Lower Rhine. It is one of the moſt conſiderable cities of the empire, and is ſeated in the center of the archbiſhoprick; but it is not ſubject to the elector, being an imperial or hanſeatic town. The citizens will not permit the elector to keep a court there; and if he comes there, they will not allow him a great train of followers, nor yet to ſtay there any conſiderable time. But, on the other hand, the elector will not permit them to have any juriſdiction without out the walls of the city, insomuch, that they are, as it were, shut up within their own walls, they not having a place to execute their criminals out of the city.

This city is in the form of an half-moon, surrounded with walls, flanked with towers, and encompassed with ditches. It depends on the circle of Westphalia, who take care to defend it in time of war. However, in these conjunctures, they take some troops of their allies into their service, of which they make a garrison. It has nineteen parishes, thirty-seven convents, and as many churches as there are days in the year. This last circumstance is related by the German writers; but, whether it be true or not, we are certain, that it is uncommon to see so many steeples at once appear to travellers when they draw nigh this city. There are some protestants living here; but they are obliged to go to Melheim, in the duchy of Berg, near three miles from the city, to perform their devotions.

The town-house is a large Gothic building, in which, among other things, is a large room full of bows, arrows, cross-bows, quivers, bucklers, and other ancient arms. The suburb beyond the Rhine is inhabited by Jews, and governed by the elector. The cathedral church was never finished, which is a pity, considering how well it was begun. They have a great number of relics; and, among the rest, pretend to have the bodies of the three kings, who came out of the East to worship our Saviour, which were brought from Milan, in 1162. They pretend likewise, that eleven thousand virgins were massacred here, in their return from a journey which they made from England to Rome, in the year 237. This fable is owing to an inscription misunderstood. There is a famous university here, that has great privileges, and has sometimes a thousand students.

The Jesuits church is a very fine building, with capitals of a modern invention; and the elector's palace is a handsome structure. The streets are large, and well paved in the middle of the town, where there are two spacious market-places. The government consists of six burgo-masters, seven aldermen, and one hundred and fifty common-councilmen. These last are elected by the trading companies of the city, and the aldermen by the archbishop; but only two of the burgo-masters are regents annually by turns; likewise no more than fifty of the common-council are allowed to act in one year. The number of ecclesiastics is very great, and yet the city is but thinly peopled, considering its extent; for there are not only vacant spaces, but three hundred acres planted with vines, and most of the houses belonging to the canons and prebends have large gardens and vineyards. It is seated in a plain, on the west bank of the Rhine, eighteen miles east of Juliers, seventy-five north-by-east of Treves, fifty-eight south-west of Munster, eighty-five north-by-west of Mentz, and four hundred and sixty north-west of Vienna. COLOGNE (PETER of) in Dutch Van Ceulen, a native of Ghent, was pastor of Metz in the sixteenth century, and had a great share in the friendship of Calvin and Theodore Beza. He translated, out of the German into French, a treatise entitled, The Conformity and Harmony between the Holy Scriptures, as well as the antient and uncorrupt Fathers of the Church, &c. concerning the Lord's Supper; and also another Treatise on the true and natural Meaning of the words, This is my Body.

COLOMIES (PAUL) in Latin Colomesius, cultivated the study of polite literature with great application. He was born at Rochelle, but left France before the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled in England. He published, 1. Gallia Orientalis. 2. Theologorum Presbyterianorum Icon. 3. Tertullian's Exhortation to the Martyrs, translated into French. 4. Epigrams and Madrigals, in French; and other works. He died at London, on the 30th of January, 1692.

COLOMMIERS, a town of France, in La Brie, seated on the river Morin, thirty-three miles east from Paris, and ten from Meaux, in a fertile country. Long. 3. 25. E. Lat. 48. 48. N.

COLOMNA (FABIO) a very learned botanist, who was born at Naples, about the year 1567. He became skilled in the languages, in music, designing, painting, and the mathematics, and died about the middle of the seventeenth century. He wrote, 1. Φυτοβάσανος, seu Plantarum aliquot (ac Piscium) Historia. 2. Minus cognitarum rariorumque Stirpium Εκφρασις; itemque de aquatilibus aliisque nonnullis Animalibus Libellus; and other works.

COLONI (ADAM) an eminent painter, was born at Rotterdam, but lived many years in England, and became famous for small figures in rural pieces; for his country-wakes, cattle, fire-pieces, &c. He copied many of Bassan's pictures, particularly those in the royal collection, and died in London, in 1585, at the age of 51.

COLONI (HENRY ADRIAN) the son of the former, was instructed by his father, and by his brother-in-law Vandiest; and became a good draughtsman. He frequently painted the small figures in Vandiest's landscapes, which received no small addition of beauty from his hand, especially when he imitated the manner of Salvator Rosa. He was a person of a lively imagination, and painted very quick; but died in 1701, at thirty-three years of age.

COLONIA (DOMINIC DE) a learned Jesuit, born at Aix, on the 15th of August, 1660, distinguished himself by his skill in polite literature and history. He taught in the city of Lyons, and wrote a considerable number of books, the principal of which are: 1. A Treatise on Rhetoric, in Latin. 2. The Christian Religion, authorised by the Testimony of the antient Pagan Authors: and, 3. A Literary History of the City of Lyons. He died on the 12th of September, 1741, aged eighty-two.

COLONNA (GILES) also called Giles of Rome, or Ægidius de Roma, was general of the Augustin monks, archbishop of Bourges, and one of the most learned divines in the thirteenth century. He studied at Paris, under St. Thomas of Aquinas, and distinguished himself in such a manner, that he obtained the surname of the Profound Doctor. Philip the Bald made him preceptor to his son Philip the Fair, whom he educated with care, and wrote for his use a treatise de Regimine Principium. He also published several other works, and died at Avignon, on the 22d of December, 1316.

COLONNA (JOHN) a famous cardinal, was legate of the Christian army against the Saracens, and contributed greatly to the taking of Damieta in 1219. However, being taken some time after by the Saracens, they condemned him to be sawn in sunder; but being surprised at his intrepidity, they gave him his liberty; after which he returned into Italy, when Gregory XI. gave him the command of his army: he took several places, and died in 1244, after his having founded the hospital de Lateran.

COLONNA (JOHN) a native of Rome, and a Dominican; was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Messina, and appointed legate and governor of Tauromínium, by pope Alexander IV. in the year 1255. He wrote a chronicle, which he entitled Mare Historiarum, i. e. the Sea of Histories, and which extended from Adam to 1250. There have been other famous men of the name of John Colonna.

COLONNA (JAMES) a cardinal who was in great credit with several popes; but at length the whole family rose against Boniface VIII. and, to secure themselves from the effects of his vengeance, retired to Nepi, which was under the government of John Colonna, one of their relations. Boniface published a crusade against them, and laid siege to Nepi; when that city being reduced to extremities, they threw themselves into Palestrina, which was commanded by Sciarra Colonna, one of their cousins. The pope then went and besieged Palestrina, whence the Colonnas escaped in disguise: however Boniface having made himself master of the city, he entirely demolished it: deprived James and Peter, one of his cousins, of the cardinalship; excommunicated Sciarra Colonna, and set a price on their heads. Sciarra was soon after taken at sea by pirates, who put him in chains, and carried him to Marseilles; but Philip the Fair set him at liberty; and in 1303, sent him with William Nogaret to Italy, where they surprised Boniface VIII. at Anagnia, who died soon after of vexation. His successor Benedict XI. restored the Colonnas; and they were in great credit under Clement V. and John XXII. James died in 1318.

COLONNA (MARK ANTONY) a great commander, who signalized himself in the wars of Italy, chiefly against the French; but a peace being concluded in 1516, Francis I. king of France, drew him over to his party, and received considerable services from him. He was killed in 1522, at at the siege of Milan, by the discharge of a culverin, which Prosper Colonna, his uncle, had pointed against him, without knowing him.

COLONNA (MARK ANTONY) duke of Palliano, great constable of Naples, and viceroy of Sicily, commanded the forces of Spain, and acquired an extraordinary reputation by his conduct and bravery; particularly at the famous battle of Lepanto, against the Turks. He died in Spain on the first of August, 1585.

COLONNA (FABRICIO) a great commander; was the son of Edward Colonna, duke of Amalfi, and became the irreconcileable enemy of the house of Ursini. The king of Naples nominated him constable; and Charles V. continued him in possession of that important post. Fabrico commanded the vanguard at the battle of Ravenna, in 1512, where he was taken prisoner; but Alfonso, duke of Ferrara, set him at liberty; and in return for this favour, Fabricio performed some signal services for that duke, against pope Julius II. He died in 1520.

COLONNA (FREDERIC) duke of Tagliacotti, prince of Butero, constable of the kingdom of Naples, and viceroy of that of Valencia, was educated at Madrid, and performed signal services for Philip IV. He acquired great reputation by his courage, courage, probity, and moderation, and died on the 21ſt of September, 1641, aged forty.

COLONNA (POMPEY) a famous cardinal, who firſt took the profeſſion of arms, for which he had a great inclination; and at length embracing the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic, became biſhop of Reti, and poſſeſſed of ſeveral abbies; but diſagreeing with Julius II. that pope removed him from all his dignities; but Leo X. reſtored him to them again, and in 1517 created him cardinal. Clement VII. being elected pope after Adrian VI. quarrelled with cardinal Colonna, which occaſioned Rome's being twice taken. This pope diveſted him of the purple and all his benefices, but being ſeized at the caſtle of St. Angelo, had recourſe to him, on which the cardinal gave him his liberty, and the pope on his ſide reſtored him to his former dignities, and loaded him with favours. Colonna was at length viceroy of Naples, and died on the twenty-eighth of June 1532, aged fifty-three. He was fond of magnificence, was of a liberal ſpirit, and the patron of learned men. He compoſed a a poem De Laudibus Mulierum, in honour of Victoria Colonna, marchioneſs of Peſcara, an illuſtrious and virtuous lady, who excelled in poetry, and died in 1541.

COLORNO, a town of Italy, in the Parmeſan, near the river Po, eight miles from Parma. The duke of Parma has a pleaſure-houſe here, which is one of the moſt delightful places in all Italy for the beauty of its gardens. Long. 10. 50. E. Lat. 44. 54. N.

COLSTON (EDWARD) a gentleman diſtinguiſhed by his benevolence and unbounded charities, was the eldeſt ſon of William Colſton, eſq. a Spaniſh merchant in Briſtol, where he was born on the ſecond of November 1636. He was brought up to trade, and reſiding ſome time in Spain, prodigiouſly increaſed the large fortune he obtained from his parents. He built St. Michael's alms-houſe in Briſtol, and endowed it with land, amounting to above two hundred and eighty pounds a-year. He alſo erected a charity-ſchool, which he endowed for the cloathing and inſtructing of forty boys. He founded the hoſpital of St. Auguſtin, for a hundred boys, at the expence of about eleven thouſand pounds. He gave upwards of two thouſand pounds in occaſional charities and benefactions to churches and charity-ſchools, all within the city of Briſtol, with ſeveral other benefactions to that his native place. He likewiſe gave ſix thouſand pounds for the augmentation of ſixty ſmall livings. He gave two thouſand pounds to St. Bartholemew's hoſpital in London, and the ſame ſum to Chriſt's hoſpital; and to the hoſpitals of St. Thomas and Bethlehem five hundred pounds each. He built an alms houſe for ſix poor people at Shene in Surry; and gave many other public charities, which we have not room to mention. Moſt of theſe ſums he gave in his life-time; and it is ſaid that his private charities were, for many years together, nearly equal to his public ones. He died on the eleventh of October 1721, at almoſt eighty-five years of age.

COLUMB (ST.) a town in Cornwall, with a market on Thurſdays, and two fairs, on Thurſday after November 13, and Thurſday after Midlent Sunday, for horſes, oxen, ſheep, and a few hops. It is ſituated on the top of a hill, at the foot of which runs a river, which at a ſmall diſtance falls into the ſea. At this town the juſtices of the peace for the ſouth diviſion of the county generally meet. It conſiſts of about one hundred houſes, and is fourteen miles north-eaſt of Truro, eight ſouth-weſt of Padſtow, and two hundred and fifty weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 12. 12. Lat. 50. 30.

COLUMBO, a handſome pleaſant ſtrong town on the weſt coaſt of the iſland of Ceylon, in the Eaſt Indies, with a good citadel, and three forts. The Dutch took it from the Portugueſe in 1656, after a long ſiege. Long. 81. 0. E. Lat. 7. 5. N.

COLUMBUS (CHRISTOPHER) a celebrated navigator, and the firſt who diſcovered America, was the ſon of a woolcomber, and was born in 1442, at Cogureto, a village in the territories of Genoa. Having concluded from his obſervations that there were habitable countries to the weſt of Europe, he reſolved, if poſſible, to go and diſcover them. For this purpoſe he addreſſed himſelf to ſeveral princes, who treated his enterprize as romantic and viſionary; but at length Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Caſtile, granted him three veſſels, with which he ſet ſail from the port of Palos in Andaluſia, in 1492. The ſailors, terrified at loſing ſight of land, and at his proceeding forwards in a boundleſs ocean, gave themſelves up for loſt; they were however ſometimes encouraged by ſeeing birds flying from the weſt, and ruſhes floating in the water. Columbus was however forced to uſe both threats and entreaties to engage them to proceed; and they were ready to throw him overboard and then to return, when they diſcovered an iſland called Guanihana, on which they landed with great joy, and gave it the name of St. Salvador. Columbus gave the inhabitants bread, wine, ſweat-meats, and toys, by which he gained their affections. Then ſailing from thence, he diſcovered other iſlands, and, among the reſt, Cuba and Hiſpaniola, in which laſt iſland the cacique, or chief, permitted him to build a wooden fort, in which he left thirty-eight Spaniards, and returned to give an account of the happy ſucceſs of his firſt attempt to the king of Caſtile. He was received with the higheſt marks of favour. Their majeſties, to do him honour, ordered the royal throne to be placed in public, on which they ſeated themſelves with prince John, under a canopy of cloth of gold, while Columbus ſat in a chair by their ſide, and gave them an account of his voyages, his diſcoveries, and his hopes of finding ſtill more extenſive countries, ſhewing them ſome of the inhabitants of this new world, as they appeared in their native countries, and ſpecimens of the curioſities he had brought with him. When he had done, their majeſties aroſe, and then kneeling, with their hands lifted up, and with tears in their eyes, returned thanks to God, which was immediately followed by the choiriſters of the royal chapel ſinging Te Deum. The king then enobled him and his poſterity, and in 1493 ſent him back in quality of admiral, with ſeventeen ſhips, and fifteen hundred men. In this ſecond voyage he diſcovered many other iſlands, and in particular Jamaica and Guadaloupe. He afterwards ſailed on two other voyages to America, in which he made many other diſcoveries, and formed ſettlements, treating the natives of the countries he viſited with the utmoſt humanity. But endeavouring to reſtrain the cruelty and avarice of the Spaniards at Hiſpaniola, complaints were made againſt him, and both he and his brother returned from his third voyage loaded with irons. The king however excuſed this ungenerous treatment, by aſſuring him that it was done without his orders, and he was not only releaſed, but reſtored to favour. In all theſe four voyages he barely ſaw the continent; but then he beheld both parts of it, with the iſthmus by which they are united, and left behind him ſchemes for extending theſe diſcoveries. He died in Spain in May 1506, aged ſixty-four, and by the king's order was magnificently interred in the cathedral of Seville, where a monument is erected to his memory, with this inſcription:

A Caſtilia, ya Leon,
Nuevo Mundo dio Colon.

In Engliſh,

To Caſtile and Leon
Columbus gave a New World.

Ferdinand his ſon embraced the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic; he wrote his father's life, and left his valuable library to the church of Seville.

COLUMELLA (LUCIUS JUNIUS MODERATUS) a Roman philoſopher, who was a native of Cadiz, and lived under the emperor Claudius about the year 42. He wrote a book on agriculture, intitled De Re ruſtica, and another De Arboribus.

COLOMEY, a town of Red Ruſſia in Poland, ſeated on the river Pruth, towards the confines of Moldavia, about thirty-eight miles from Haliez, and ſixty-three ſouth of Leopol. This town has been very ill treated by the Coſſacks, inſomuch that it is now inconſiderable, though there are ſeveral mines of ſalt in its diſtrict. Long. 16. 25. E. Lat. 48. 45. N.

COLUMNA, a town of the Ruſſian empire, in the duchy of Moſcow, with an archbiſhop's ſee, is ſeated on the river Occa. It is ſurrounded with a wall, and is forty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Moſcow. Long. 40. 27. E. Lat. 54. 50. N.

COLUMPTON, a town in Devonſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, on May 1, and October 28, for cattle. It is ſeated on the river Columb, twelve miles north of Exeter, and one hundred and ſixty-ſix weſt of London. Long. 3. 10. W. Lat. 50. 50 N.

COLURI, a Grecian iſland in the gulph of Engia. The principal village, which bears the ſame name, is at the bottom of the harbour, which is one of the fineſt in the world, being ſeven or eight miles long, and three broad. This village contains about two hundred poor wretched houſes. Their commodities are wheat, barley, pitch, fiſh, charcoal, ſponges, and aſhes, which they carry to Athens. The iſland is about fifty miles in circumference, was formerly called Salamis, the kingdom of Ajax, ſo remarkable in Homer. It has but another village, and a convent of calloyers, called Mitropoli. Long. 24. 5. E. Lat. 38. 0. N.

COM, or KOM, a city of Perſia in Irac Agemi, ſeated in a plain by the ſide of a river, about a mile and a half from the mountain Elwena. It is ſurrounded with a ditch and walls flanked with towers, which are half ruined, but there are fine gardens all round it. One of the beſt of theſe contains the monument of Ruſtan Can, a prince of the race of the kings of Georgia, who turned Mahommedan for the ſake of governing that kingdom. This is the moſt common walk of the populace of Com. There are two fine keys on the river ſide, which run the whole length of the city.

This city is conſiderable, being very populous, and is ſaid to contain fifteen hundred houſes. All the buildings, as well private houſes, as palaces and caravanſeras, are fine and elegant, conſidering the manner of the country. But the bazar, the maidan, and the other public ſtructures, which have all ſtore-houſes, galleries, and rooms for the merchants, as well for foreigners as Perſians, are the nobleſt in all theſe parts. But the Indians have a particular place for their habitation and trade. The artificers, eſpecially thoſe that weave ſilks and gold and ſilver brocades, all work in open places, where they may be ſeen by any one. However the principal commodity is ſoap, which is the beſt in all Perſia; the inhabitants are likewiſe famous for their ſword blades, and their earthen ware, as well white as variniſhed. They have ſeveral beautiful moſques, but the grandeſt is that wherein two of the late kings of Perſia lie interred. The worſt thing belonging to this city is the exceſſive heats in ſummer, when the river dwindles to a ſmall brook. But at the time of the thaw in winter it overflows its banks ſo much, as ſometimes to carry away a great number of houſes. Proviſions are in plenty and cheap. They have melons, which are greatly valued for their agreeable ſmell; and a ſort of cucumbers that are two feet long, and as thick as a man's arm. The ground hereabouts is very fit for tillage, and produces all ſorts of grain, beſides cotton in abundance. This city has ſuffered greatly in the late wars. Long. 49. 20. E. Lat. 34. 0. N.

COMACHIO, a town of Italy in the Ferrareſe, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in a moraſs, where the air is ſo bad that it is almoſt deſerted, only the fiſhermen keep their ground. It is twenty miles from Ravenna, and twenty-ſix ſouth-eaſt of Ferrara. Long. 12. 55. E Lat. 44. 45. N.

COMBABUS, a young nobleman of exquiſite beauty at the court of the king of Syria, who being appointed by that monarch to accompany hisqueen Stratonice in a long journey in order to build a temple in honour of Juno, made uſe of all his moſt powerful entreaties to prevent it; and finding theſe were in vain, bewailed the wretchedneſs of his condition, by which he thought himſelf expoſed either to loſe his life or his manhood, and after venting the deepeſt ſighs, lopped off certain affairs, which ſhall be nameleſs, and then enbalming them, put them in a box, which he ſealed up. The time of his ſetting out being come, he gave the box to the king before a great number of people, begging him to keep it till his return, declaring that it contained a treaſure more valuable than ſilver and gold, on which the king ſet his ſeal upon it, and ordered the maſters of his wardrobe to keep it. The queen was three years in her journey, and, as Combabus had foreſeen, fell deſperately in love with him; and after having endeavoured in vain to ſtifle her paſſion, had at laſt recourſe to the bottle, which inſpired her with the boldneſs to make a declaration. He then endeavoured to bring her to reaſon, but ſhe threatening to lay violent hands on herſelf, he declared that it was not in his power to ſatisfy her, and made her an eye-witneſs of his impoteney; but though ſhe was not now ſo diſtractedly fond of him, ſhe ſtill loved him, and would always be in his company. In the mean time the king being informed of what was doing, recalled Combabus, who returned to court without the leaſt apprehenſions. He was thrown into priſon immediately upon his arrival; ſoon after the king had him brought into his apartment, where he accuſed him of adultery, and there were ſome witneſſes who depoſed that they had ſeen him lie with the queen. However Combabus made no anſwer till he was carrying to execution, when he cried, that he ſhould be put to death, not for having defiled the king's bed, but becauſe his majeſty would not return him the box which he had put into his hands at his leaving the kingdom. His majeſty hearing this, ordered the box to be brought, and the ſeal being broke, the innocence of Combabus appeared, and he himſelf told the reaſons which had prompted him to emaſculate himſelf. The king now embraced him, ſeemed grieved at his misfortune, puniſhed his accuſers, and beſtowed mighty poſſeſſions on him. He returned to ſuperintend the building of Juno's temple, and by the king's order a ſtatue of braſs, repreſenting Combabus, was placed in the temple to do him honour. A female air was given to it, though it had a male habit. Nevertheleſs we are told that merely out of compaſſion to the women Combabus laid aſide the dreſs of his ſex. The exact time in which theſe events happened is not certainly known.

COMBER, or CUMBER (THOMAS) an eminent divine, born at Weſtram in Kent, in the year 1645, was educated at Cambridge, created doctor of divinity, and after ſeveral preferments in the church, was made dean of Durham. He was chaplain to Anne princeſs of Denmark, and to king William and queen Mary. He was author of ſeveral works, viz. 1. A ſcholaſtical Hiſtory of the primitive and general Uſe of Liturgies. 2. A Companion to the Temple. 3. A Companion to the Altar. 4. A brief Diſcourſe upon the Offices of Baptiſm, Catechiſm, and Confirmation. 5. A Diſcourſe on the occaſional Offices in the Common Prayer. 6. A Diſcourſe upon the Manner of making Biſhops, Prieſts, and Deacons. 7. Short Diſcourſes upon the whole Common Prayer; and Roman Forgeries in the Councils during the firſt four centuries. He died November 25, 1699, in the fifty-fifth year of his age.

COMBEFIS (FRANCIS) a learned French Dominican, born at Marmande, in the province of Guienne, in 1605, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the works he publiſhed, which were 1. An Addition to the Bibliotheca Patrum, in three volumes folio. 2. A Bibliotheca Patrum for the Uſe of Preachers, in eight volumes folio. 3. The Works of St. Amphilochius, St. Methodus, St. Andrew of Crete, and many other Opuſcula of the Greek Fathers. He publiſhed ſeveral other works, and died at Paris on the twenty-third of March 1679, aged ſeventy-four.

COMENIUS (JOHN AMOS) a grammarian and proteſtant divine, was born in Moravia, March 28, 1592, and was juſtly eſteemed the greateſt ſchool-maſter of the age. He was employed in the inſtruction of youth in ſeveral countries, and in the latter part of his life ſettled at Amſterdam. In 1641 he came to England, by deſire of the parliament, to reform the method of education; but that aſſembly was too much employed in the reformation of government to attend to that of learning. His Orbis Senſualium Pictus, or a Picture and Nomenclature of all the chief Things in the World, and of Men and Employments therein, is an excellent book of its kind. He gained great reputation by a work intitled Janua Linguarum reſerata, i. e. The Gate of Languages unlocked; this book was tranſlated not only into twelve European languages, but alſo into Arabic, Turkiſh, Perſian, and the Mogul. He alſo publiſhed A new Method of inſtructing Youth. He was however an enthuſiaſtic viſionary, and collected with prodigious care the chimeras of one Kotterus, thoſe of Chriſtina Poniatovia, and of Drabicius, and publiſhed them, with remarks of his own, at Amſterdam, where he died November 15, 1671.

COMETEAU. a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Satz. It has a fine town-houſe, and is ſeated on a rivulet, in a very fruitful plain, thirteen miles north-weſt of Satz, forty-three ſouth-weſt of Dreſden, and ſixty north-weſt of Prague. Long. 12. 25. E. Lat 50. 30. N.

COMINES, a town in French Flanders, ſeated on the river Lys, five miles ſouth-weſt of Menin. Long. 3. 1. E. Lat. 50. 45. N.

COMITIA, in Roman antiquity, an aſſembly of the people, in order to elect magiſtrates, or to conſult on ſome important affairs of a public nature. Theſe were held either in the Comitium or Campus Martius, and were of three kinds, viz. the Comitia curiata, centuriata, and tributa, ſo denominated from the manner in which the people voted and gave their ſuffrages either by curiæ, which in many reſpects reſemble our pariſhes, by tribes or by centuries. Comitial aſſemblies, held for the election of conſuls, were called conſular comitia, and in like manner the other comitia were named from the officer to be created, whether a tribune, pontif, ædile, or the like. There were certain days fixed for theſe aſſemblies, called dies comitiales, which were marked with a C in Julius Cæſar's calendar. The power of calling them was at firſt only inveſted in the kings; but on the eſtabliſhment of the democracy the ſame privilege was allowed to moſt of the chief magiſtrates.

COMITIUM, in Roman antiquity, a large hall in the forum, where the Comitia were uſually held, and which was open at the top till the time of the ſecond Punic war, when it was firſt covered.

COMMANDINUS (FREDERIC) a learned man in the ſixteenth century, was born at Urbino in Italy. To a vaſt knowledge in the mathematics he added great ſkill in the Greek tongue. He was well qualified to tranſlate the Greek mathematicians into Latin, and to illuſtrate them with notes; he therefore tranſlated and publiſhed ſeveral of theſe, as the works of Archimedes, Apollonius, Euclid and other ancient mathematicians; and alſo wrote ſome books of his own compoſing, viz. A Treatiſe de Centr Gravitatis Solidorum; Horologiorum Deſcriptio, &c. He died in 1575, aged ſixty-ſix.

COMMELIN (JEROM) a celebrated and learned printer, born at Douai, was well ſkilled in the learned languages, eſpecially in the Greek, his editions are therefore very correct, and ſought after by the curious. By him and the other Comelins, his relations, there are publiſhed many works.

COMMENGES, a diſtrict of Gaſcony, about forty-five miles long, and fifteen broad. It is bounded on the north by Toulouſan Gaſcony; on the eaſt by Couſerans; on the ſouth by Catalonia; and on the weſt by Bigorre. St. Bertrand is the capital town. Its principal commerce is in cattle, mules, and corn.

COMMERCY, a town of France, in the duchy of Bar, with the title of a principality, and a magnificent caſtle. It fell to France in 1745, after the deceaſe of the ducheſs dowager of Lorrain. It is ſeated on the river Meuſe, thirteen miles from Toul, fifteen from Bar-le-Duc, and one hundred and fifty from Paris. Long. 5. 28. E. Lat. 48. 45. N.

COMMINES (PHILIP DE) a celebrated French hiſtorian, chamberlain to Lewis XI. and ſeneſchal of Poitiers, was born of a noble family in Flanders. He at firſt attended the court of Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy and count of Flanders, where he was eſteemed a perſon of extraordinary merit, and at length attached himſelf to king Lewis XI. who repoſed the utmoſt confidence in him, lived with him in great familiarity, and employed him in ſeveral important negociations. After the death of that prince, Commines attended Charles XII. to the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples; but his favour was not now firmly eſtabliſhed; he was charged with treaſon, in having favoured the party of the duke of Orleans, afterwards Lewis XII. and ſhut up at Loches, in an iron cage, where his ſufferings were very great. At length, he was removed to the priſon of the Tournelles, at Paris, and having continued there eighteen months, his wife prevailed on the commiſſioners to bring on his trial; when Commines fully juſtified his conduct, and was honourably acquitted. He had, however, no credit at court under the reign of Lewis XII. He died at Argenton, on the 17th of October, 1509, aged ſixty-four. His Memoirs, which contain what paſſed under the reigns of Lewis XI. and Charles VIII. are very curious, and juſtly eſteemed.

COMMIRE (JOHN), a celebrated Latin poet, was born at Amboiſe, on the 25th of March, 1625; and at length entered into the ſociety of the Jeſuits, and taught polite literature and divinity. He died at Paris, in 1702. We have a volume of his Latin Poems, and a collection of his Poſthumous Works. His odes and fables are more particularly admired.

COMO, a populous and ſtrong town in the duchy of Milan, with a biſhop's ſee. It was taken by the Imperialiſts in 1706. It is ſeated on the ſouthern ſhore of a lake of the ſame name, twenty-three miles north of Milan, and ſeventy north-eaſt of Turin. Long. 8. 57. E. Lat. 45. 45. N.

COMO (the lake of) is the largeſt in all Italy, and is in the Comaſco, a diſtrict of Milan. It is, as it were, divided into three gulphs; one of which lies towards the north, and receives the river Adda; another lies towards the north-eaſt, through which the ſaid river runs out; and the third is towards the ſouth-weſt, at the bottom of which Como is built. It is nowhere above twenty-three miles in length, and four in breadth.

COMMODIANUS GAZÆUS, a Chriſtian author in the fourth century, who wrote a work in Latin verſe, intitled, Inſtructions; the moral of which is excellent, but the verſe extremely heavy. M. Davies publiſhed a fine edition of it, in 1711, at the end of Minucius Felix.

COMMODUS, or LUCIUS AURELIUS COMMODUS ANTONINUS, emperor of Rome, was the ſon of Antoninus the Philoſopher, and Fauſtina. He was born on the 31ſt of Auguſt 161, and proclaimed emperor on the 17th of March, 180. Commodus, notwithſtanding his having an excellent education, was extremely vicious from his youth. He reſolved to paſs for Hercules, the ſon of Jupiter; he obliged the ſenate to prepare altars, and offer ſacrifices to his honour, and perſecuted the Chriſtians becauſe they would not acknowledge his pretended divinity. He treated the ſenators and chiefs of the empire with extreme cruelty, put perſons of merit to death upon the moſt trifling pretences, advanced the vileſt and moſt deſpicable men, corrupted his own ſiſters, and, abandoning himſelf to the moſt infamous debauches, he was fond of attending the combats of the gladiators, and made his glory conſiſt in the great dexterity with which he killed lions, tygers, and leopards. In ſhort, reſolving to get rid of Martia, with whom he had a criminal commerce, ſhe prevented him, by giving him poiſoned wine, at his coming out of the bath; and the poiſon not operating ſpeedily enough, ſhe cauſed him to be ſtrangled by a wreſtler, named Narciſſus, in the year 192, and the 31ſt of his age.

COMNENA (ANNA). See ANNA COMNENA.

COMNENUS, the name of an illuſtrious family, of which there have been ſeveral emperors of Conſtantinople and Trebiſond.

COMORRAN, a palatinate in Hungary, is nothing elſe but the iſle of Shut, formed by the confluence of the rivers Danube, Raab, and Vag. It is about fifty miles in length, and is full of marſhes. In a corner of it ſtands the town Comorra. It is a ſtrong place, built in the ſhape of a triangle, two of whoſe ſides are cloſe to the water. The inhabitants are Hungarians and Ruſſians, and in point of religion adhere to the Greek church. They are rich, and much addicted to mirth and feaſting. The Turks have attempted to take it, but in vain. It is fifteen miles north of Neuhauſel, fifteen north-eaſt of Rahab, thirty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Preſburg, and ſeventy eaſt-by-ſouth of Vienna. Long. 18. 25. E. Lat. 47. 50. N.

COMORIN (Cape) the moſt ſouthern promontory of India on this ſide the Ganges. It is about one hundred miles weſt of Ceylon. Long. 75. 25. E. Lat 8. 0. N.

COMPIEGNE, a town in the iſle of France and territory of Senlis, with a caſtle, where the kings often reſide. It is ſeated on the river Oyſe, near a foreſt of the ſame name, which is a good place for hunting. It is eighteen miles north-weſt of Senlis, thirty eaſt of Beauvais, and forty-five north of Paris. Long. 3. 12. E. Lat. 49. 25.

COMPITALIA, or COMPITALITIA, in Roman antiquity, feaſts inſtituted by Servius Tullius, in honour of the Lares, and obſerved on the 12th of January and the 6th of March. See LARES.

COMPOSTELLA, a famous city of Spain, the capital of Galicia, with an archbiſhop's ſee, and an univerſity. It is a large handſome city, with a great number of convents and churches. The metropolitan is dedicated to St. James, and it very magnificent. The common people believe the body of St. James is buried here, which draws a vaſt number of pilgrims; and for this reaſon, it is called St. James's of Compoſtella: whence the original of the order of knighthood of the ſame name. It was taken and burnt by Almanza, an Arabian prince. The city is ſeated in a peninſula, formed by the rivers Tambra and Ulla, in an agreeable plain, eighty-eight miles north of Braganza, one hundred and thirty-eight weſt of Leon, two hundred and fifty-three north of Liſbon, and two hundred and ſeventy-five north weſt of Madrid. Long. 9. 28. W. Lat. 48. 21. N.

COMPOSTELLA (NEW) a town of New Spain, and in the province of Xaliſco, built by Nuno de Guſman, in 1531, near the Pacific Ocean. It is ſeventy-two miles from Guadalaxara. Long. 110. 15. W. Lat. 12. 0. N.

COMPTON (WILLIAM) anceſtor of the preſent earl of Northampton, was the ſon of Edmund de Compton, and was born in the year 1481. The firſt foundation of his ſucceeding honours and riches, was his being made, in the eleventh year of his age, one of the pages to Henry duke of York, afterwards king Henry VIII. in whoſe reign he was knighted, and obtained ſeveral conſiderable poſts; and, in 1525, was conſtituted keeper of the king's money and jewels, which is the ſame we now call the privy purſe. He died of the ſweating ſickneſs, May 31, 1528, aged forty-ſeven.

COMPTON (HENRY) grandſon of the former, was knighted Feb. 10, 1566, by the earl of Leiceſter; and on the 8th of May, 1572, was ſummoned by writ to the houſe of lords, by the title of baron Compton of Compton. In 1586, he was one of the peers for the trial of Mary queen of Scots. He is ſuppoſed to have died in the year 1589.

COMPTON (WILLIAM) earl of Northampton, eldeſt ſon of the former, was ſummoned to parliament in the thirty-fifth of queen Elizabeth. In 1604 he was made knight of the Bath, and in 1618 was advanced to the title of earl of Northampton. He died June 24, 1630.

COMPTON (SPENCER) only ſon of the former, and the ſecond earl of Northampton, was a particular favourite of king Charles I. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his loyalty and bravery. He accompanied him, when prince of Wales, into Spain, in the year 1622, in the quality of maſter of the robes and wardrobe, and had the honour to deliver all his preſents, amounting, as was computed, to ſixty-four thouſand pounds. He afterwards endeavoured to compoſe the differences between king Charles I. and his parliament; but finding his endeavours ineffectual, he raiſed forces in his defence, and exerted himſelf on ſeveral occaſions with great ſucceſs, particularly, at Hopton-Heath, near Stafford, where he defeated the parliament's army, which was greatly ſuperior to his own, and took eight pieces of cannon. In that engagement his lordſhip had his horſe killed under him, and his own body of horſe engaging in the purſuit with too much fury, he was left encompaſſed by the enemy. Being on foot, he killed with his own hand the colonel of foot, who firſt came near him. After his head-piece was ſtruck off with the butt-end of a muſket, they offered him quarter, which he bravely refuſed to accept; and was ſlain by a blow with a halbert on the hinder-part of his head, receiving at the ſame time another deep wound in the face. Thus died this brave and noble earl, on the 19th of March, 1642-3, in the forty-ſecond year of his age.

The enemy refuſed to deliver up his body to the young earl of Northampton, unleſs he would deliver, in exchange for it, all the priſoners, ammunition, and cannon, he had taken taken in the late battle. However, at laſt it was delivered, and interred in Allhallows church, in Derby. Lord Clarendon obſerves, that this noble lord was not known till the evening of his days, he having led an eaſy and luxurious life; but that from the beginning of the civil wars, as if he had been awakened out of a lethargy, he behaved with the utmoſt activity and vigour. His lordſhip was married to Mary, the daughter of Sir Francis Beaumont, by whom he had ſix ſons, and two daughters.

COMPTON (JAMES) the eldeſt ſon of the former, and the third earl of Northampton, taking arms with his father for king Charles I. was diſtinguiſhed by his bravery and conduct, and performed many gallant actions in thoſe times of confuſion. He was at the battle of Edgehill, the taking of Banbury, &c. On the 19th of March, 1642, he was in the engagement at Hopton-Heath, where, receiving a ſhot in one of his legs, he was obliged to quit the field. However, on the 8th of April, 1643, he was with prince Rupert, at the taking of Litchfield; and on the 6th of May, he routed a party of the enemy's horſe and foot, at Middleton Cheney, in Northamptonſhire. He afterwards commanded the horſe at the firſt battle of Newbury, on the 20th of September, 1643, when he charged and put to flight the enemy's horſe, under Sir William Waller. On the 29th of June, 1644, he was one of the commanders at Cropredry-bridge fight, in which Sir William Waller was again routed. Soon after, he marched with the king into Cornwall, and at his return raiſed the ſiege of Banbury, on the 26th of October, 1644, and routed the parliament's forces. Then joining the king, he relieved Donnington caſtle, and, on the 18th of May, 1645, he and his three brothers routed the parliament's horſe near Althorp; but being at laſt defeated by lieutenant-general Cromwell, and finding his majeſty overpowered by the parliament, he compounded for his eſtate. At the reſtoration of king Charles II. on the 29th of May, 1660, he lead a troop of two hundred gentlemen, cloathed in grey and blue; and in that reign was of the privy-council, conſtable of the tower of London, lord-lieutenant of the county of Warwick and city of Coventry, &c. and died at his ſeat at Caſtle-Aſhby, in Northamptonſhire, on the 15th of December, 1681, leaving three ſons, George, who ſucceeded him in his honours; James, who died young, and Spencer, who, in January, 1727-28, was created baron of Wilmington, and in May, 1730, viſcount Pevenſey, and earl of Wilmington.

COMPTON, (HENRY) biſhop of London, and one of the moſt eminent prelates that ever ſat in that ſee; was the ſixth and youngeſt ſon of Spencer, the ſecond earl of Northampton. He was born at Compton in the year 1632. His father being ſlain, fighting on the king's ſide, in 1643, he was thereby deprived of that paternal care which was ſo neceſſary for a perſon of his tender years; but by the direction of his mother, he received an education in every reſpect ſuitable to his high rank and quality. He was firſt ſent to Oxford, where he ſtudied three years, and afterwards to travel, which he did to great advantage. Returning to England ſoon after the Reſtoration, he accepted a cornecy in a new raiſed regiment of horſe; but ſoon after quitting that poſt, and dedicating himſelf to the ſervice of the church, he was made rector of Cottenham, in Cambridgeſhire; and after ſeveral promotions, was made biſhop of Oxford, and dean of the royal chapel; he was next promoted to the ſee of Wincheſter; and, in 1675, was tranſlated to the ſee of London, and ſoon after ſworn one of the privy council.

The educating and well-grounding of the king's two nieces, the princeſs Mary and Anne, in the doctrine and communion of the church of England, was committed to his care, which he diſchared to the ſatisfaction of the nation. But in the reign of king James II. he was not only diſmiſſed from the council-table, and from being dean of the royal chapel, but was ſuſpended for not fully obeying a letter from the king, commanding him to ſilence Dr. John Sharp, who had vindicated the doctrines of the church of England in oppoſition to popery. However, juſt before the Revolution, he was reſtored to his epiſcopal function. He had a great ſhare in producing that event. And afterwards king William made him again dean of the royal chapel, and appointed him one of the privy-council. All which preferments he enjoyed under the reign of queen Anne. This worthy prelate died July 7, 1713, in the eighty-firſt year of his age, COMUS, in pagan mythology, the god of feſtivals, and nocturnal revels. He was repreſented as a young man crowned with roſes or myrtle, holding in one hand a golden cup, and in the other a diſh of fruit.

CONAN, the firſt king of Brittany, was the ſon of Gerenton, prince of Albania. He followed Maximus againſt Gratian, and had for his reward the country of Armorica, afterwards called Brittany. Conan took advantage of the irruption of the Goths, Huns, and Vandals, to render himſelf independent; and the Romans being unable to reduce him, entered into an alliance with him. He reigned thirty-ſeven years, and during eleven of them had the title of king. He died about the year 421.

There have been four other princes of the name of Conan, who were counts of Brittany, and lived in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries.

CONANT, (JOHN) D. D. an eminent Engliſh divine, born at Yeatenton, a ſmall village in Bicton pariſh, Devonſhire, and educated at Oxford, where, in 1649, he was made rector of Exeter-college. He there maintained a ſtrict diſcipline, and cauſed that ſociety to flouriſh more than any other in the univerſity. In 1654, he was admitted to the degree of doctor of divinity, and the ſame year became divinity-profeſſor in the univerſity of Oxford, in 1657 he was admitted vice-chancellor of Oxford; and in 1661, was one of the commiſſioners appointed for the review of the Common Prayer. However, upon paſſing the act of uniformity, he loſt his profeſſorſhip of divinity, and the rectory of Exeter-college, and was diſabled from the public exerciſe of his miniſtry; but conforming about eight years after, he enjoyed ſeveral preferments in the church, and was at length archdeacon of Norwich, and one of the prebendaries of the cathedral church of Worceſter. He publiſhed a volume of Sermons, and five others were publiſhed after his death, which happened on the 12th of March, 1693, in the 86th year of his age. This worthy divine had a very amiable character, and underſtood moſt of the oriental languages.

CONCEPTION, a town of South America, in Chili, founded by Baldivia, the conqueror of Chili, in 1550, and has a biſhop's ſee. The Indians have taken and ravaged it ſeveral times. CONCINA, (DANIEL) a celebrated Dominican divine, was born in the province of Friuli, in Italy, about the year 1686. He entered into the order of St. Dominic, in 1708, and preached with great applauſe in the principal cities of Italy. He obtained the eſteem of the popes Clement XII and Benedict XIV. and died at Venice on the 21ſt of February, 1756, aged 69. He wrote a great number of works, ſome in Italian, and others in Latin.

CONCINI, (CONCINO) known by the name of Marſhal d'Ancre, was born in Florence, where his father, from the profeſſion of a ſcrivener, roſe to be ſecretary of ſtate. He came into France with Mary de Medicis, wife of Henry IV. and was at firſt but gentleman extraordinary to that princeſs, from whence he raiſed himſelf to a prodigious height of power. After the death of Henry IV. he removed ſuch noblemen as were of the greateſt abilities from the council, and filled the vacancies with his own creatures: he diſpoſed of the treaſury, beſtowed all poſts and employments as he pleaſed, and intimidated, by examples of ſevere vengeance, thoſe who oppoſed his faction. At laſt, Mary de Medicis, the queen-mother, ſeeing no other way of putting a ſtop to his ambition, and the diſorders he occaſioned, but by his death, a commiſſion was given to the captain of the life-guards, to have him killed, and he was ſhot with ſeveral piſtols, as he was going over the draw-bridge of the Louvre, April 24, 1617. After his being buried, the populace roſe, took him out of his grave, forced open his coffin, dragged him to the end of the Pont Neuf, and hung him by the feet on one of thoſe gibbets he had cauſed to be erected for all thoſe who ſhould ſpeak ill of him. They then cut off his noſe, his ears, and privities. And a little after he was cut down, dragged his body to the Greve, and other public places, and then his limbs were torn aſunder, and his corpſe cut in a thouſand pieces. Every one would have ſome part of him; the ears were bought at a great price; the bowels were caſt into the river; part of the body was burnt before the ſtatue of Henry IV. on the Pont Neuf, and ſome perſons roaſted at this fire part of his fleſh, and threw it to their dogs. In ſhort, the parliament ſentenced his wife to loſe her head, and declared their ſon ignoble, and incapable of poſſeſſing any employment in the kingdom.

CONCLAMATION, Conclamatio, in Roman antiquity, a cuſtom of calling the dead at certain intervals for eight days together; this was done by perſons who waited round the corpſe; but, on the ninth day, concluding him paſt all hopes of recovery, they buried him.

CONCORDIA, in pagan mythology, was worſhipped as a goddeſs among the Romans. To this bleſſing Tiberius, at the requeſt of his mother Livia, erected a temple. Concordia is commonly repreſented on coins as a graceful woman, who holds a cup in one hand, and the cornucopia in the other, to denote, that plenty attends the ſtate where the people live together in concord and friendſhip.

CONDOM, a town of France, in Gaſcony, capital of the Condomois, with a biſhop's ſee. It is a poor place, having no trade. It is ſituated on the river Geliſe, twenty-three miles north-weſt of Auch, twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Agen, and three hundred and ſeventy-five ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 22. E. Lat. 44. 0. N.

CONDORE, or PULO CONDORE, the chief of a cluſter of iſlands in the Indian ſea, lying to the ſouth of the river of Cambodia. They lie ſo near together, that at a diſtance they ſeem to be but one. Two of them are pretty large and high, but the reſt are only ſmall ſpots. The largeſt which is inhabited, is about ſeventy-four miles in length, and three in breadth. The other is three miles long, and half a mile wide. The mold of theſe iſlands is blackiſh, and pretty deep, only the hills are ſomewhat ſtoney. The eaſtern part of the largeſt iſland is ſandy, and yet is covered with large and tall trees, of various ſorts.

The animals are, hogs, lizards, guanoes, and another creature li' a guanoe, but bigger. They have alſo parrots, paroquets, doves and pigeons, beſide wild cocks aud hens of the ſize of a crow.

Theſe iſlands are pretty well watered with little brooks of freſh water, which run into the ſea, for ſix months in the year; but in March they begin to dry up, and in April ceaſe to run. In May the rainy ſeaſon begins, and then they flow again.

In 1702, the Eaſt India company had a ſettlement here; but the factors not agreeing with the natives, they were moſt of them murdered, and the reſt of them were driven away in 1705. Long. 106. 26. E. Lat. 9. 30. N.

CONDRIEU, a town of France, in Lyonnois, remarkable for its good wines. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, near the river Rhone, eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Vienne, thirty-eight north of Valence, and eighteen ſouth of Lyons. Long. 4. 33. E. Lat. 45. 28. N.

CONECTE (THOMAS) a Carmelite and a native of Brittany, who having excited the admiration of his countrymen by his preaching, left the convent of Rennes and went into Flanders. He there gained ſuch reputation by his ſermons, that words cannot expreſs the honours that were paid him in all places through which he paſſed, nor the multitudes who flocked to hear his ſermons. He inveighed with great vehemence againſt the vices of the clergy, and the luxury of the women, and particularly againſt their head-dreſſes which then roſe to an enormous height; but preaching againſt the immoralities of the clergy, he was burnt at Rome as an heretic, in the year 1434.

CONFOULENS, a town of France, ſeated on the river Vienne, at the confines of Marche and Poitou. Long. 0. 53. E. Lat. 46. 55. N.

CONFUCIUS, a famous Chineſe philoſopher, born at Chanping, about the five hundred and fiftieth year before the Chriſtian æra, of an illuſtrious family in the kingdom of Lu, now called the province of Xantung. In his youth he acquired great reputation by the livelineſs of his wit and the ſolidity of his judgment. Being ariſen to the rank of mandarin and miniſter of ſtate, he became admired as a politician and legiſlator, ſhewing, by his example, the great advantage of having kings who are philoſophers themſelves, or have philoſophers for their miniſters; however, notwithſtanding all his endeavours to prevent it, diſorders were introduced into the monarch's court, by a number of beautiful girls, who were ſent thither by the king of Xi, in order to render the king and his courtiers effeminate; when Confucius ſeeing that the king would no longer liſten to his advice, retired into the kingdom of Sum, where he taught moral philoſophy with ſuch applauſe, that in a ſhort time he had above three thouſand diſciples, among whom ſeventy-two ſurpaſſed the reſt in knowledge and virtue, on which account the Chineſe have ſtill a particular veneration for them.

Confucius divided his doctrine into four parts, and his diſciples into four claſſes. The firſt order was thoſe that belonged to the practice of virtue; the ſecond learned the art of reaſoning juſtly; the third treated of the arts of government and the duties of magiſtrates; and the fourth learned to diſcourſe, in a noble and eloquent manner on every thing relating to ſcience and manners. Confucius was diſtinguiſhed by his modeſty; he publicly declared, that he was not the inventor of his doctrine, but that he had drawn it from more ancient writings, and principally from thoſe of the kings of Yao and Xun, who had preceeded him above fifteen hundred years. At length he returned with his diſciples to the kingdom of Lu, where he died in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age, and was interred near the city of Rio Fu, on the bank of the river Xu.

This philoſopher has been held in ſuch veneration by the Chineſe for above two thouſand years, that each city has a palace conſecrated to his memory, on the frontiſpiece of which is ſeen, in letters of gold, theſe or the like titles: To the Great Maſter. To the Illuſtrious. To the Wiſe King of Learning. When a great officer of the law paſſes before theſe palaces, he alights from his palanquin, or chair of ſtate, and walks by, to do honour to his memory. No body is raiſed to the poſt of mandarin, or to thoſe of the law, till after they have been received as doctor, according to the doctrine of Confucius. His deſcendants are alſo ſtill in great eſteem: They are born mandarins, and enjoy the privilege in common with the princes of the blood, of not paying tribute to the emperor; and beſides all who receive the title of doctor, are obliged to make a preſent to a Mandarin of the race of Confucius. Four books are attributed to him, which are of great authority amongſt the Chineſe. Three of which have been tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed by father Couplet.

CONGLETON, a town of Cheſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and four fairs, viz. on the firſt Thurſday before Shrove Tueſday, May 12, July 5, and July 13, for cattle and pedlars' ware. It is ſeated on the river Dane, on the edge of Staffordſhire, and is a large place, governed by a mayor and ſix aldermen, yet has no church, but only a chapel of eaſe to Aſturby, which is about two miles diſtant. It is twelve miles north of Newcaſtle under Line, twenty-ſeven eaſt of Cheſter, and one hundred and ſixty-two N. N. W. of London. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 53. 12. N.

CONGO, or LOWER GUINEA, a country in Africa; has Benin on the north, the ocean on the weſt, and the kingdom of Mataman on the ſouth; but as for the eaſt, the countries beyond it are not certainly known. It is divided into four parts; Loango, Congo proper, Angola, and Benguela.

Loango is the moſt northern part of Congo in general, and extends near three hundred miles along the coaſt. The inhabitants are very black and well ſhaped, and have a ſort of cloth made of graſs or palm-tree leaves, wrapt about them, to hide their nakedneſs: on the head they wear a cap made of graſs, with a feather on the top. The women tye on a ſquare piece of ſtraw cloath before them for decency ſake, but behind, and elſewhere, they are quite naked; only they wear ſtrings of ſhells on their legs, and ivory bracelets on their arms. Both ſexes anoint their bodies with palm-oil. Loango is the capital town, and is four miles and a half from the ſea coaſt. The buildings are not contiguous, which allow them room to plant bananas, palm, and other trees about them, inſomuch that ſome houſes are quite ſurrounded with them.

What they call the king's palace, is a great many houſes paled paled round for his wives or concubines; that, for his own particular uſe, has not above three rooms. Our author, ſays, the king has ſometimes five hundred children, which is no great wonder, conſidering the number of his women. The cuſtom of having plurality of wives obtains here as well as in all other parts of Africa; but that they do all ſorts of drudgery, and the men are altogether idle, may be juſtly doubted. Attempts have been made to introduce the Chriſtian religion among them, and ſome have been brought to profeſs it; but when we conſider the genius and cuſtoms of theſe people, we may ſafely conclude, they can only be Chriſtians in name, if there are any profeſſors yet remaining.

Authors pretend to give us an account of the inland provinces, and of the genius, temper, employment, and religion of the inhabitants; but they are only tales, made at pleaſure, for we know nothing at all of theſe countries, but the parts along the ſea coaſts.

CONGO PROPER, is bounded on the north by the river Zaire, on the ſouth by Angola, from which it is parted by the river Dande, and on the weſt by the ocean, extending along the coaſt about one hundred and eighty miles. It is a low country, and is watered by ſeveral rivers. That of Zare is three miles wide at the mouth, and is navigable about ſixty miles up the country. The inhabitants are like the other negroes; only ſince the Portugueſe have been among them, ſome of the richer ſort have been prevailed upon to wear clothes, which conſiſt of a gown, a ſhirt, and a petticoat, for both ſexes. They are married to one wife, according to the Roman Catholic manner; but they take as many concubines as they pleaſe beſides, notwithſtanding their profeſſion of Chriſtianity; and the women are as incontinent as they were in their pagan ſtate. Authors pretend to tell you, that they proſtitute themſelves to all comers for a month together, and then chooſe huſbands from among thoſe who have had to do with them. Their religion, before the coming of the Portugueſe, was idolatry; and ſince their converſion it is little better; for they ſtill retain their old cuſtoms, which are altogether inconſiſtent with true Chriſtianity. The diviſions of this country and the Negroe towns are not worth mentioning; but the Portugueſe have a town called St. Salvador, built on the top of a mountain, in the diſtrict of Pemba, which we cannot paſs over in ſilence. The houſes are low, but white-waſhed within and without, and the ſtreets are broad, and planted with palm-trees, in a beautiful manner. They had a great many churches formerly, but part of them are now ruined; as alſo a fortreſs, which was taken by the Negroes, and turned into a habitation for their king. However, the remaining Europeans are ſaid to be about four thouſand, who inhabit a part of the town by themſelves. They have as many artificers of all ſorts as can be of any uſe in this ſavage part of the world. The cathedral and three more churches are built of ſtone. They generally go to war about the chuſing a new king, which occaſions them to burn one another's houſes; but as ſoon as the commotions are appeaſed, they go to building again.

In general we may obſerve that the air is exceſſively hot. They have crops twice a year of Indian corn, caravanſes, and beans. They ſow in January, and reap in April; and May, June, July, and Auguſt is their winter. In September they ſow again, and get in their harveſt in December. They have a great many large elephants, and ſerpents twenty-five feet long. Their ſheep are of the Syrian kind, with large tails; and civet-cats are very common, beſides a great number of wild beaſts. They have two animals very remarkable. One is the pacaſſe, which is as large as a buffaloe, with ſtrait horns, and a white ſkin with red and black ſpots: his roaring is almoſt like that of a lion. The zebra ſomewhat reſembles a mule; but has a finer ſhape, and is beautifully ſtriped with white, yellow, and black, from the ridge of the back to the belly. There are a great number of inſects, of which the ants are moſt remarkable. Theſe are very large, and make their way under the foundations of houſes, and would do a great deal of miſchief if they were not driven away by burning ſtraw. The villages are generally ſurrounded with quickſet hedges, through which there is only one paſſage, cloſed with a door of dry thorns. Theſe grow to a good height, and are deſigned to keep out wild beaſts. Theſe villages may conſiſt of about one hundred huts, made with earth and ſtubble. The women of each village ſow the corn, and get in the harveſt in common, and diſtribute it to every hut in proportion to the number of the perſons that are in it. The Portugueſe, by their familiarity with the Negroe women, have produced a great number of Mulattoes, and theſe, as well as the Blacks, hide nothing but what modeſty teaches them to conceal. Their chief trade is in ſlaves and elephants teeth. Congo in general lies between two degrees thirty minutes and eleven degrees thirty-five minutes of ſouth latitude.

CONGREVE (WILLIAM) eſq. an eminent dramatic poet, the only ſurviving ſon of William Congreve, eſq. was born in Ireland, or, according to others, in the village of Bardſa, near Leeds, in Yorkſhire, in 1672, and educated at Trinity college, Dublin; after which he ſtudied the law for a ſhort time in the Middle Temple, London. His firſt peformance was a novel, entitled Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled, and he ſoon after began his comedy of the Old Bachelor, which, on its being acted, procured him many conſiderable friends, and particularly Mr. Montague, afterwards the lord Hallifax, who obtained for him the poſt of one of the commiſſioners of the hackney coaches; then gave him a place in the pipe-office, and afterwards a patent place in the cuſtoms, of ſix hundred pounds per annum, and the poſt of ſecretary to Jamaica, which brought him in ſeven hundred and nine pounds a year, on the Exchange of London. It is no wonder that, after ſuch encouragement, he ſhould ſoon make his appearance again on the ſtage, and accordingly, the year after, he brought on the Double Dealer. Queen Mary dying ſoon after, he wrote a paſtoral on that occaſion, intitled The Mourning Muſe of Alexis; and in 1695 he produced his comedy of Love for Love. The ſame year he addreſſed to king William an ode upon the taking of Namur. After having eſtabliſhed his reputation as a comic writer, he reſolved to attempt a tragedy, and in 1697 was acted his Mourning Bride, which met with great applauſe. He was now called off to engage in another ſpecies of writing; Mr. Jeremy Collier attacked him not as a dull or taſteleſs, but as a pernicious writer. Indeed Mr. Congreve had admitted many lewd and indecent ſcenes into his plays, and Mr. Collier attacked him as a dangerous immoral author. An anſwer was neceſſary, and therefore an anſwer was given, under the title of Amendments of Mr. Collier's falſe and imperfect Citations, &c. from the Old Bachelor, Double Dealer, Love for Love, and Mourning Bride, by the Author of thoſe Plays; which though this piece does not entirely juſtify Mr. Congreve, it ſhews however great modeſty and wit.

This quarrel is thought to have given Mr. Congreve ſome diſtaſte to the ſtage, yet he afterwards brought on another comedy, intitled the Way of the World, which not taking, completed his diſguſt to the theatre. He amuſed himſelf afterwards with compoſing original poems and tranſlations, which he collected in one volume, and publiſhed in 1710. The beſt part of the laſt twenty years of his life he ſpent in eaſe and retirement, but towards the end of it, being much afflicted with the gout, which brought on a general decay, he, in 1728, went to Bath for the benefit of the waters; but having there the misfortune to be overturned in his chariot; from that time he complained of a pain in his ſide, ſuppoſed to ariſe from an inward bruiſe. Upon his return to London, his health continued to decline, and he died on the 19th of January, 1728-9, and as he had lived in the ſtricteſt intimacy with the great, they now ſhewed their reſpect to his memory; for on the 26th of January, his body was removed from his houſe in Surry-ſtreet in the Strand, to the Jeruſalem chamber, where it lay in ſtate, and the ſame evening was carried with great ſolemnity into king Henry the Seventh's chapel, and after the funeral ſervice was performed, was interred in the abbey. It is remarkable that the pall was ſupported by the duke of Bridgewater, the earl of Godolphin, lord Cobham, lord Wilmington, brigadier-general Churchill, and the honourable George Berkeley. Some time after, a neat and elegant monument was erected to his memory, in which is a half length figure of him in white marble, placed on a pedeſtal of fine Egyptian marble, and enriched with emblematical devices relating to the drama. Underneath is this inſcription.

"Mr. William Congreve, died January 19, 1728, aged
"fifty-ſix, and was buried near this place. To whoſe
"moſt valuable memory this monument is ſet up, by Hen-
"rietta, ducheſs of Marlborough, as a mark how dearly
"ſhe remembers the happineſs ſhe enjoyed in the ſincere
"friendſhip of ſo worthy and honeſt a man; whoſe virtue,
"candour, and wit, gained him the love and eſteem of the "preſent age; and whoſe writings will be the admiration
"of the future."

CONI, a ſtrong town of Piedmont, capital of a territory of the ſame name, with a good citadel. It has been beſieged ſeveral times by the French, but without ſucceſs; particularly the French and Spaniards attempted to take it in 1744, but were obliged to retire, after a battle between them and the king of Sardinia, in which they had the advantage. It is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Geſſe and Sture, twenty-five miles ſouth of Turin, thirty north-weſt of Final, and forty-five north-by-eaſt of Nice. Long. 7. 29. E. Lat. 44. 23. N.

CONNAUGHT, one of the four provinces of Ireland, is bounded on the eaſt by the river Shannon, which ſeparates it from Leinſter, and alſo on the ſouth and ſouth-eaſt, which parts it from Munſter; by the ocean on the weſt, and by Ulſter and a part of the ocean on the north and north-weſt. It is about one hundred and thirty miles in length, and eighty-four in breadth. The ſoil is various, for in ſome places it conſiſts of pleaſant paſtures, and in others it is boggy, woody, and ſubject to fogs. It abounds in cattle, deer, hawks, and honey, and has many convenient bays and creeks for navigation. The principal river is the Shannon, beſides others of leſs note.

This province was firſt conquered by the Engliſh adventurers, in the reign of Henry II. but it was afterwards neglected, till the time of Tir Owen's rebellion, when it was again reduced under the Engliſh government. It was formerly a kingdom, and is now governed by a commiſſioner under the lord lieutenant of Ireland. It contains the counties of Thomond or Clare, Galway, Mayo, Roſcommon, Sligo, and Leitrim.

CONNECTICUT, a province of New England, in North America, bounded by the Maſſachuſets colony on the north-eaſt; by the ſea on the ſouth; and by New York on the weſt; being about one hundred miles in length, and eighty in breadth. This colony, though uſually ſtyled a province to New England, is a diſtinct government, of a different form. The inhabitants have the choice of their own governor, deputy-governor, council, and aſſembly, in the ſame manner as the colony of Rhode Iſland. Theſe are ſtyled charter governments.

CONNOR, a town of Ireland, in the county of Antrim, and province of Ulſter. It is of no note for any thing but being a biſhop's ſee. It is ſix miles north of Antrim. Long. 6. 28. W. Lat. 54. 50. N.

CONNOR (BERNARD) a learned phyſician, born in the county of Kerry, in Ireland, about the year 1666. Having determined to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of phyſic, he went to France, and reſided ſome time in the univerſity of Montpellier, and from thence went to Paris, where he obtained great ſkill in medicine, anatomy, and chemiſtry. From thence he travelled to Venice, with the two ſons of the high-chancellor of Poland, and then taking a tour through great part of Germany, went to Warſaw, where he was made phyſician to king John Sobieſki; and in 1695 came to England, read a courſe of lectures in London and Oxford, and became member of the Royal Society and College of Phyſicians; afterwards, being invited to Cambridge, he read public lectures there, and made various experiments in chemiſtry. He wrote, in Latin, a work intitled Evangelium Medici, i. e. the Phyſician's Goſpel; or Myſtical Phyſic, with reſpect to the Suſpenſion of the Laws of Nature, or of Miracles; and a Hiſtory of Poland; and died in October, 1698, in the thirty-third year of his age.

CONON, a celebrated Athenian general, commanded their fleet in the laſt Peloponneſian war; but foreſeeing that the enemy would obtain a victory, retired before the engagement with nine veſſels. His retreat greatly contributed to the deciſive advantage obtained by the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Liſander, at the Goat's river, four hundred and ten years before the birth of Chriſt. After this victory the Lacedæmonians obtained Athens, and became maſters of Greece. Conon who fled to his old friend Evagoras, king of Salamis, in the iſland of Cyprus, afterwards put himſelf under the protection of Artaxerxes, king of Perſia; and that prince, at the ſolicitation of Pharnabazes, made him ſatrape, or admiral of his fleet, on which Conon inſtantly ſet ſail, attacked the Lacedæmonians, and gained the famous naval victory of Cnidus, in the three hundred and ninety-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra, in which the Spartans loſt fifty veſſels, with Piſander their general, and the empire of the ſea. The following year, Conon, after having ravaged the coaſt of Sparta, ſailed to Athens, and with Pharnabazes's conſent, rebuilt its walls. But attempting to incite the Ionians againſt the Perſians, in order to have an opportunity of bringing them under the Athenian yoke, Tiribazes, governor of Sardis for the Perſians, being informed of this ſecret conſpiracy, found the means of drawing him to that city, under the pretence of communicating ſome important affairs to him, and made him his priſoner. Some authors ſay, that he was ſent to Artaxerxes, who cauſed him to be put to death; but others aſſert, that he eſcaped from priſon, and it was not known what became of him. Conon left a ſon, named Timotheus, who was, like his father, a great general.

CONON, a celebrated mathematician and aſtronomer, born at Samos, died before his friend Archimedes, who had a great eſteem for him, and who communicated to him his writings, and ſent him his problems. This was the perſon who pretended to metamorphoſe into a ſtar the treſſes of Berenice, the ſiſter and wife of Ptolemy Evergetes, about three hundred years before the Chriſtian æra.

CONON, a native of Thrace, was elected pope after the death of John V. on the 20th of October, 686; but died the following year, and was ſucceeded by Sergius I.

CONQUET, a little town of Brittany, in France, in the diſtrict of Cornouailles, with a good harbour and road. It is eight miles weſt of Breſt. Long. 4. 45. W. Lat. 48. 26. N.

CONRAD I. duke of Franconia, was choſen emperor after the death of Lewis, king of Germany, in 912. He made war on Otho of Saxony, and on Arnulph the Bad, duke of Bavaria, and died on the 23d of December, 918. He was ſucceeded by Henry duke of Saxony.

CONRAD II. ſurnamed the Salic, the ſon of Herman, duke of Worms and Franconia, ſucceeded the emperor Henry II. in 1024. He maintained a long war againſt the princes of the houſe of Saxony, and appeaſed the troubles of Hungary and Poland. Ralph, king of Burgundia Transjurana, made him his heir in 1033, on account of his having married Giſele, his younger ſiſter; but Eudes, count of Champagne, the ſon of Bertha, Giſele's eldeſt ſiſter, claimed a part of the inheritance, and engaged in a war with the emperor, which was concluded, in 1037, by the death of Eudes, who was killed at the battle near Bar-le-Duc, on the 17th of December; after which Conrad marched into Italy, ſubdued thoſe who had revolted againſt him, and died at Utrecht, on the 4th of June, 1039.

CONRAD III. emperor of Germany, was the ſon of Frederic, duke of Suabia, and Agnes, the ſiſter of Henry V. who was choſen after Lothaire II. on the 22d of February, 1138, and had a long and bloody war with Henry the Proud, duke of Saxony and Bavaria. The emperor afterwards went upon a cruſade into the Holy Land, and ſet out, by the way of Conſtantinople, at the head of ſeventy thouſand horſe, and a numerous body of light-horſe and infantry. He arrived at Conſtantinople, and marched from thence to beſiege Iconium; but being led by the ſpies granted by Manuel Comnenus, the Greek emperor, into the deſarts and ſtreights of mount Taurus, the flower of this prodigious army periſhed by famine, and the frequent attacks of the troops of the ſultan of Iconium, ſo that only a tenth part eſcaped with the emperor, who arrived at Jeruſalem, and joining his forces with thoſe of Lewis VII. king of France, laid ſiege to Damaſcus, but being unable to take it, the emperor returned to Germany, and died on the 15th of February, 1152.

CONRAD IV. emperor of Germany, was the ſon of Frederic II. He was proclaimed king of the Romans, in 1233, and governed the empire with great wiſdom during the abſence of his father; and after the death of that prince, in 1250, was choſen emperor, when pope Innocent IV. oppoſed his election, at which Conrad was ſo enraged, that he marched into Italy, took Naples, Capua, and Aquino, and whereever he went behaved with great cruelty; but at length Mainfroy, his father's natural ſon, cauſed him to be poiſoned on the 19th of May, 1254. Conrad married Elizabeth, the daughter of Otho, duke of Bavaria, by whom he had only the unhappy Conradin. See CONRADIN.

CONRAD, biſhop of Utrecht, in the eleventh century, was preceptor to the emperor Henry IV. and ſeveral works are attributed to him.

CONRAD, of Lichthenaw, more known by the title of the Abbot of Uſperg, in the dioceſe of Augſburg, was the author of a famous Chronicle, which ends with the year 1229. He collected a fine library, and died about the year 1240.

CONRADIN, or CONRAD the Young, a prince rendered famous by his misfortunes, was king of the Romans and of Naples, grandſon of the emperor Frederic II. and the ſon of Conrad IV. Reſolving to attempt the recovery of the kingdom of Sicily, the inveſtiture of which had been given by pope Urban IV. to Charles of Anjou, the brother of St. Lewis, he raiſed an army, and marched into Italy with his couſin Frederic, the ſon of Herman, marquis of Baden; but was there defeated by Charles of Anjou in a bloody battle, fought near the lake Fucin, now called Celano, on the 23d of Auguſt, 1268. After this defeat, being taken priſoner, with his couſin Frederic, as they were paſſing a river, they were conducted to Naples, and condemned to be beheaded, which ſentence was executed on a ſcaffold erected in the middle of the city, on the 26th of October, 1269. Thus ended this race of the princes of Swabia, which had produced many kings and emperors. Conradin was then but eighteen years of age.

CONRINGIUS (HERMANNUS) a learned profeſſor of phyſic at Helmſtadt, was born at Norden, in Frieſland, on the 9th of November, 1606. He compoſed many books on civil law and hiſtory; and being well verſed in the affairs of Germany, and modern hiſtory, was frequently conſulted by ſeveral princes. The moſt curious of his works is intitled, Hermanni Conringii de Antiquitatibus Academicis Diſſertationes ſeptem, the beſt edition of which is that of Gottingen, printed in quarto, in 1736. He died on the 12th of December, 1681.

CONSENTES, Dii Conſentes, in the pagan theology, were the gods of the firſt order, who compoſed the council of heaven. They were twelve in number, ſix gods, who were Jupiter, Neptune, Apollo, Mars, Mercury, and Vulcan, Vulcan, and ſix goddeſſes, Juno, Minerva, Venus, Diana, Ceres, and Veſta. Theſe twelve deities preſided over the twelve months of the year.

CONSERANS, a territory of Gaſcony, in France, on the confines of Languedoc, bounded by the county of Foix on the eaſt, by that of Comminges on the north and weſt, and by Catalonia on the ſouth. It lies along the ſide of the river Salat, and has nothing conſiderable in it but St. Lizier, the capital town.

CONSTANCE, a city of Germany, in the circle of Swabia and biſhoprick of Conſtance, is ſeated between a lake of the ſame name and that of Zell upon the Rhine, which ſeparates it from the ſuburb of Peterſhauſen. It has fine bridges, and ſeveral handſome ſtructures, as well ſacred as prophane. It was formerly a free imperial city, but is now ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. It was taken by the French in 1744, but was afterwards reſtored. This city is taken notice of in hiſtory for the famous council of Conſtance, by which John Hus and Jerom of Prague were condemned to be burnt for hereſy. Conſtance is a mercantile city, and the inhabitants are rich. The biſhop was formerly lord of Conſtance, but now he has nothing to do with temporals; however, he is a prince of the empire, and the firſt director of the circle. It is thirty-eight miles north-eaſt of Zurich, ſixty-three eaſt of Baſil, and ſixty three ſouth-weſt of Ulm. Long. 9. 22. E. Lat. 47. 35. N.

CONSTANCE (the lake of) in Germany, between Swabia and Swiſſerland. The map makes it thirty miles in length, and eight in breadth. The Rhine runs through it, and on its banks are Conſtance, Bregentz, Bodmen, Lindaw, Buchorn, Merſburg, and Uberlingen.

CONSTANS (FLAVIUS JULIUS) the third ſon of Conſtantine the Great, was made Cæſar in 333. At the death of his father, in 337, he had for his ſhare Italy, Africa, and Illyium. Conſtantine, his brother, who was an ambitious prince, invading his dominions, was killed, in 340, in Aquileia, when Conſtans, by his death, obtained Gaul, Spain, and Britain. This prince oppoſed the Arians, and endeavoured to put an end to the ſchiſm of the Donatiſts in Africa. He conquered the Franks, and engaged publicly in the defence of Athanaſius againſt the emperor Conſtantius; but at length Magnenſius, who had uſurped the empire of the Gauls, killed him in the town of Elne, in 350, when but thirty years of age, and after he had reigned thirteen years.

CONSTANS II. emperor of the Eaſt, was the grandſon of Heraclius, and the ſon of Heraclius Conſtantine. He was educated by the Monothelites, and embraced their ſentiments. In 648, at the perſuaſion of Paul, whom he had raiſed to the ſee of Conſtantinople, he publiſhed an edict or formulary called the Type, by which he impoſed ſilence both on the orthodox and ſuppoſed heretics; but this prudent ſtep was condemned by pope Martin I. in a council held in 619, at which Conſtans was ſo diſpleaſed, that he ordered Theodore Calliopas, exarch of Ravenna, to ſeize the pope, which was accordingly performed in 653. Conſtans was afterwards defeated by the Saracens; but a civil war being kindled amongſt them, he ſoon rendered them tributary to him. In 656, he made made a preſent to pope Vitalianus of a volume of the Goſpels, covered with plates of gold, and adorned with precious ſtones. Four years after, his brother Theodoſius, was ordained deacon; but afterwards being greatly enraged againſt him, he cauſed him to be put to death; but this act of cruelty to a brother was followed by ſuch remorſe of conſcience and diſtraction of mind, that he imagined Theodoſius always before him. He at length went into Sicily, and afterwards to Rome, which he entered on the 5th of July, 663, and from thence took the braſs he found about the temples; but returning to Sicily, was murdered at Syracuſe by one of his domeſtics, on the 15th of July, 668, after having reigned about twenty-ſeven years.

CONSTANS, a celebrated Roman general in the fifth century, was born at Nyſſa. He obtained a great number of victories, drove the Goths from Gaul, and, in 415, ſent the rebel Attalus to the emperor Honorius. That prince, in 417, gave him Placida, his ſiſter, in marriage; and, in 421, aſſociated him to the empire; but Conſtans died ſeven months after, leaving the emperor Valentinian on the throne.

CONSTANT (DAVID) a learned profeſſor at Lauſanne, where he was born, on the 26th of March, 1638. After having ſtudied in his native country, and in Holland, he went to Paris, where he contracted a friendſhip with Conrart, Daillé, and other learned proteſtants, and then going to Geneva, acquired the eſteem of Bayle, Turretin, and Meſtrezat. At his return to Lauſanne, he ſucceſſively taught polite literature, morality, and divinity. He wrote, 1. Notes on Florus, Tully's Offices, and Eraſmus's Colloquies. 2. Curious Diſſertations on Lot's Wife, the Burning Buſh, and brazen Serpent; and other works; and died on the 27th of February, 1733, aged ſixty-five.

CONSTANTIA, the daughter of Conſtantius Chlorus and Theodora, and the ſiſter of Conſtantine the Great, was a princeſs whoſe beauty only ſerved to add a luſtre to her merit. She had a maſculine courage, great prudence, and ſolid virtue. She was admired for the ſtrength of her genius, her great penetration in affairs, her lively eloquence, and particularly the power of reconciling thoſe who were at the greateſt variance. Conſtantine gave her in marriage to Licinius, his colleague in the empire, and their nuptials were celebrated at Milan with the utmoſt magnificence. At length Licinius, by his ill conduct, forced Conſtantine to engage in a war againſt him; and that prince finding that he carried on a correſpondence with the Barbarians, cauſed him to be ſtrangled in the year 325. Conſtantia then attached herſelf ſolely to the emperor her brother, eſpecially after the death of the empreſs Helena. She made uſe of all her power in protecting Euſebius biſhop of Nicomedia, and in favouring the Arians.

CONSTANTINA, a city of the kingdom of Algiers, in Africa, ſeated between high mountains, near the river Suſſegmar. It is large, well built, and drives a conſiderable trade with Biledulgerid and Nigritia. It is ſtrong, by its ſituation among the rocks, and is defended by a caſtle. The emperor Caligula had made it the capital of Cæſarian Mauritiana; and it was afterwards the ſeat of the Arabian princes, who were ſovereigns of this country. We may gueſs at its former ſplendor and magnificence by the remains of the Roman antiquities found there. The bey of the eaſtern part of Algiers reſides here, and has a guard of three hundred ſpahis, or Turkiſh horſe, and fifteen hundred Moors maintained at his own expence. It is ſeventy-five miles from the ſea, two hundred and fifty-four eaſt-by-ſouth from Algier, and one hundred and ſeventy-five weſt-by-ſouth from Tunis. Long. 7. 20. E. Lat. 35. 36. N.

CONSTANTINA, a province of Algiers in Africa. It is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the eaſt by the kingdom of Tunis, on the ſouth by Biledulgerid, and on the weſt by the river Suſſegma, which ſeparates it from Gigery. Conſtantina, juſt mentioned, is its capital, and near the ſea is the town called Collo, built by the Romans, but deſtroyed in the ſucceeding wars. There ſtill remains a caſtle built on a rock, where there is a garriſon commanded by an aga. In the town or village is a factor belonging to the French, who has a houſe or factory under the protection of the government. He buys ox hides, wax, and wool of the Moors by little and little, and when he has a ſufficient quantity, ſends to Calle for ſhips to take in their loading.

On the mountains of Collo are a great number of monkies, which are very fierce and hard to be tamed. The Moors have a ſecret to take as many as they pleaſe, which they never do but when they have an opportunity of ſelling them. On the ſame coaſt there are the remains of the ancient town of Stora, where there is a ſpacious and commodious gulph. There the Genoeſe firſt began to trade. In this country there are the ruins of a great many other towns and caſtles built by the Romans.

The territory of this province contains very high mountains, inhabited by Arabs and Moors, who are jealous of their liberty, and form a kind of republic: they are divided into tribes governed by ſheiks, who all unite when the bey of Conſtantina attempts to violate their privileges. They can raiſe an army of forty thouſand men, but they have no fire arms, their weapons being only lances and darts. When the wives of theſe mountaineers are ill-uſed by their huſbands, or diſlike them, they fly from one mountain to another, which is often the occaſion of war between the ſeveral tribes, eſpecially when the women have jewels, money, or any effects of value.

Conſtantina had her own kings from the time the Arabian Mahommedans took poſſeſſion of this country, till the Tuniſians became maſters of it. But in the year 1520, when Barbaroſſa had conquered Algiers firſt, and Collo afterwards, which ruined the trade of the inhabitants of Conſtantina, they ſubmitted to the conqueror, and were united to the kingdom of Algiers.

CONSTANTINE the Great, or FLAVIUS VALERIUS CONSTANTINUS, the ſon of Conſtantius Chlorus and St Helena, was born at Naiſſus, a town of Dardania, in 274. He was with his father in Britain, where he ſaw him die, and was declared emperor in his room on the twenty-fifth of July 306; but Galerius Maximianus would give him no other title but that of Cæſar, which did not prevent his reigning in Britain and Spain. He obtained ſeveral victories over the Gauls and Germans, and in 308 took the title of Auguſtus by the conſent of Galerius himſelf. Some time after he marched into Italy againſt the emperor Maxentius, whom he defeated near Rome, on the twenty-eighth of October 312: by this victory Conſtantine became maſter of Italy and Africa. He immediately put a ſtop to the perſecution of the Chriſtians, and even placed himſelf in the rank of catechumens. This prince afterwards defeated Licinius, and put him to death; and a ſhort time after Licinianus, the ſon of Licinius was alſo condemned, by which means Conſtantine became the ſole maſter of the Roman empire. He then cauſed to be built at Rome, and throughout the empire, magnificent edifices, and particularly churches, which he furniſhed with every thing neceſſary to adorn and render them commodious. He built New Rome at Byzantium, but afterwards changed its name to that of Conſtantinople. Conſtantine took no leſs pains to eſtabliſh the Chriſtian religion, than to govern the empire with wiſdom. He endeavoured to put an end to the ſchiſm of the Donatiſts at the council of Arles; injoined, by an edict publiſhed on the third of March 321, the celebration of the Lord's day, prohibiting the exerciſe of all ſervile employments upon it; and called the firſt general council of Nice, in which Arius was condemned. He provided carriages for all the fathers of that council; defrayed their expences on the road, and kiſſed the wounds of thoſe who had ſuffered under Licinius's perſecution. He ſoon after depoſed and baniſhed Athanaſius. He has been particularly blamed for putting his ſon Criſpus to death; that prince was accuſed by Fauſta, his mother-in-law, of having attempted her honour, when that virtuous prince had really refuſed to liſten to the criminal paſſion of that empreſs, as ſhe herſelf afterwards confeſſed, on which ſhe alſo was condemned to die. Conſtantine died at Acheron, near Nicomedia, on the 22d of March 337, aged ſixty-three, after his having reigned thirty-one years. He was baptized a little before his death by Euſebius, biſhop of Nicomedia, and divided the empire between his three ſons Conſtantine, Conſtantius, and Conſtans.

What has been ſaid of his being baptized by pope Silveſter, and of his pretended donation in favour of the Romiſh church, is intirely without foundation. Several epiſtles relating to eccleſiaſtical affairs, written by him, or at leaſt in his name, are ſtill extant; as are alſo his ſeveral edicts concerning the doctrines and diſcipline of the church. Among theſe is placed that pretended edict, by which he bequeaths to Silveſter, biſhop of Rome, and to his ſucceſſors forever, the ſovereignty of Rome, and all the provinces of the weſtern empire: but though this carries the name of Conſtantine, and might be of great uſe in ſupporting the authority of the Roman pontiff in ages of darkneſs and ignorance, yet ſince the revival of learning it has been given up, even by the papiſts themſelves, as a forgery too barefaced to be defended.

CONSTANTINE II. ſurnamed the Young, the ſon of Conſtantine the Great, had to his ſhare Gaul, Spain, and Britain. He protected Athanaſius; but being deſirous of robbing his brother Conſtans of his dominions, marched with an army into Italy, and was killed at Aquileia in 340, in the twenty-ſixth year of his age. While he was Cæſar he conquered the Sarmatians, the Goths, and the Gauls.

CONSTANTINE III. ſurnamed Pagonatus, i. e. the Bearded, emperor of the Eaſt, was the ſon of Conſtans II. He ſeverely puniſhed his father's murderers; conquered the Saracens, and obliged them to pay him tribute. In 680 he aſſembled the ſixth general council of Conſtantinople, in which the Monothelites were condemned. He ceded Myſia to the Bulgarians; treated his brothers with cruelty, and died in 685, in the ſeventeenth year of his reign.

CONSTANTINE VI. ſurnamed Copronymus, emperor of the Eaſt, thus called from what happened to him at the font, when he was baptized. He was the ſon of Leo the Iſaurean, whom he ſucceeded on the 18th of June 742. He ordered the images of the ſaints ſet up in the churches to be broken and trodden under foot, and puniſhed thoſe who worſhipped them. He died in his expedition againſt the Bulgarians in 775, after a reign of thirty-four years, and was ſucceeded by Leo IV.

CONSTANTINE VII. ſurnamed Porphyrogeneta, emperor of the Eaſt, was the ſon of Leo the Wiſe, and aſcended the throne, under the guardianſhip of his mother Zoe, on the ſeventh of June 912. When he was of age to govern by himſelf he puniſhed the miniſters who encroached on his authority, chaſtiſed ſome tyrants in Italy, and took Benevento from the Lombards. He was a lover of learning, and protected learned men; but his ſon Romanus cauſed him to be poiſoned on the ninth of November 959, at the age of fifty-eight, after a reign of forty-eight years. He wrote a treatiſe on the affairs of the empire; two books of Themes, or on the Situation of Cities, an important work with reſpect to the geography of the middle age; and alſo other works, that have been printed in Greek and Latin.

There have been ſeveral other princes of the name of Conſtantine.

CONSTANTINE, a native of Syria, was elected pope after the death of Siſinnus, on the ſeventh of March 708. He took a journey into the Eaſt, where he was received in a reſpectful and magnificent manner. He died on the ninth of April 714, and was ſucceeded by Gregory II.

He ought not to be confounded with Conſtantine the antipope, who, after the election of Stephen IV. in 769, was driven from the Romiſh church, and condemned to loſe his life.

CONSTANTINE (MANASSES) a Greek hiſtorian in the twelfth century, under the reign of the emperor Comnenus, was the author of an Abridgment of Hiſtory in Greek verſe.

CONSTANTINE (ROBERT) a learned phyſician born at Caen, taught polite literature in that city, and acquired great reputation by his ſkill in the Greek language, in hiſtory, and medicine. He died, according to M. de Thou, on the 27th of September 1603, aged one hundred and three. He wrote a good Dictionary in Greek and Latin, and other works, which are eſteemed.

CONSTANTINOPLE, a city of Turky in Europe, ſeated in Romania, on a neck of land which advances towards Anatolia, from which it is ſeparated by a channel about a mile in breadth, and was formerly called the Boſphorous of Thrace. The ſea of Marmora waſhes its walls on the ſouth, and the Black Sea being on the north, renders its ſituation the moſt convenient in the univerſe; for it ſeems as if the channel of the Dardanelles, and that of the Black Sea were made on purpoſe to bring it the riches of the four quarters of the world. Thoſe of the mogul, the Eaſt Indies, China, Japan, and the North, come by the Black Sea. And the merchandizes of Arabia, Egypt, Ethiopa, Africa, the Weſt Indies, and Europe, come by the channel of the White Sea. The port or harbour is ſix miles in circuit, and the water is ſo deep, that the largeſt veſſels may come cloſe to the ſhore without danger.

This city, which was formerly called Byzantium, was firſt built by Pauſanias, king of Sparta, though ſome ſay he only rebuilt it. It was demoliſhed by the emperor Severus to puniſh the revolt of its inhabitants; but was afterwards repaired by Conſtantine the Great, from whom it obtained its preſent name. It continued after this the ſeat of the eaſtern empire for a great number of years, not without being taken and retaken by different nations till at length it fell into the hands of Mahomet II. emperor of the Turks, on the 27th of May 1423, and has been ever ſince in the poſſeſſion of the Turks, who call it Iſtampol. Its form is triangular; two of its ſides are waſhed by the ſea. It may be about eighteen miles in circumference about the walls; but if the ſuburbs are included, it muſt be at leaſt twenty-ſix. The firſt angle of this triangle is at the ſeven towers, the ſecond at the ſeraglio, and the third at the moſque of Ejoub, towards the freſh waters.

The walls of Conſtantinople are very good. Thoſe on the land ſide have a double range, twenty feet from each other, defended by a ditch about twenty-five feet broad. The outward wall is twelve feet high, and has two hundred and fifty low towers. The inner wall is twenty feet high, and its towers, which anſwer to the outer, are well proportioned. The battlements, the curtains, and the port holes are well contrived, but there is no appearance of artillery. They are built chiefly with free ſtone, and there are five gates on this ſide. The walls from the ſeven towers to the ſeraglio, and thoſe along the harbour, ſeem to be ſomewhat diſregarded. There are ſeven gates from the point of the ſeraglio to the ſeven towers, and eleven towards the harbour, all which are entered up an aſcent. When we view the city on the outſide nothing can appear more delightful; becauſe the roofings, terrace-balconies, and gardens, form a great variety of amphitheatres, ſet off with the bezeſtans, caravanſerais, ſeraglios, and moſques. The domes of theſe laſt are covered with lead or gilding, and with their high ſlender minarets or towers, adorned with creſcents at the tops, appear very beautiful to thoſe who ſtand at the entrance of the channel of the Black Sea.

Yet notwithſtanding all this promiſing appearance of the outſide at a diſtance, when you come near it your expectations are greatly balked, for in the ſuburb of Galata, the uſual landing-place, the houſes are low, and moſtly built of clay and wood, ſo that a fire will conſume thouſands of them in a day. Thoſe within the walls are inferior to the moſt contemptible of ours, none being above two ſtories high, ſome of rough ſtone, ſome of ſun-dried brick, but moſt of wood, and the roofs riſing but very little are covered with tiles. But thoſe belonging to the principal perſons are flat, and are adorned with trees, and flowers of beautiful colours. There are many vacant places in the city, and many rows of ſhops, where the women never come. The ſtreets are generally exceeding narrow, and ſome are raiſed on the ſides for the ſake of cleanlineſs. In ſome there are ſteep aſcents, and others are bounded with dead walls, being great men's ſeraglios. They are all ill paved, and ſome not at all, inſomuch that there is but one that is fit to walk in with any conveniency; this runs from the gate of Adrianople to the ſeraglio. The reſt are cloſe, dark, and deep, and look like ſo many lanes. However the bagnios, bazars, and ſome of the great men's houſes are built with lime and ſand, and the corners with free-ſtone, and others are ſurrounded with walls like a monaſtery; yet at beſt they make a very poor appearance on the outſide. However within there are very handſome apartments, and the roofs of ſome of the rooms are covered with gold and azure, and have fine carpets on the floors. The walls are covered with ſquare tiles, which look like China ware. In all the halls and rooms there is an alcove raiſed about half a foot from the ground, covered with rich carpets and embroidered cuſhions, laid cloſe to the walls. They call them divans, and in theſe they repoſe themſelves, receive viſits, and paſs the beſt part of the day. In all the palaces the women have an apartment by themſelves, where no one enters but the maſter of the houſe or the eunuchs.

There are ſeven royal moſques in the city, which are magnificent ſtructures, and kept in good condition. Theſe and all the reſt ſtand by themſelves in an incloſure planted with fine trees, and adorned with pleaſant fountains. Each moſque has a principal dome, with other ſmaller, which have a very fine effect. The minarets, from which they call people to prayers, are as high as our ſteeples, but very ſlender.

Sancta Sophia is one of the moſt ſtately of all the moſques, and ſtands upon an eminence, in the moſt advantageous part of the city. The plan is ſquare, and the dome is ſupported by four prodigious large pillars, which cannot be overturned by a common earthquake, to which this country is ſubject. It was formerly a moſt magnificent Chriſtian church, of much larger extent before the Turks turned it into a moſque, however it is now one hundred and fourteen paces long, and eighty broad: but it would be endleſs to recount the particular beauties of this and the other moſques; they are built in the ſame manner, and have cloiſters, with a fountain in the middle, where the Turks perform their ablutions.

The boats uſed in the harbours are like Venetian gondolas, and are extremely light and pretty. This harbour opens to the eaſt, over againſt Scutari. The river Licus, which falls into it, is made up of two ſtreams, on the largeſt of which is a paper-mill; and the torrent is ſo ſtrong, that it is of great uſe in cleanſing the harbour. The only wind that can diſturb the ſhips is from the eaſt, and when that blows, it cauſes ſuch a bawling among the ſeamen, and ſuch a barking of the dogs, that one would think the city was going to be ſwallowed up, and is a great annoyance to the ſeraglio. This is near three miles in circumference, and is a kind of a triangle, whoſe ſide next the city is longeſt. The apartments are on the top of a hill, and the gardens below. The outſide of the palace has nothing curious. The gardens are planted with cypreſs and ever-green trees, to conceal the ſultanas from any overlookers when they are walking in them. The apartments have been made at different times, according to the capriciouſneſs of emperors, or their ſultanas. Thus this famed palace is nothing but a cluſter of houſes, put together without any manner of order. The principal entrance of the ſeraglio is through a pavilion or gate-way; but it looks rather like a guard-houſe than a building belonging to a palace. Fifty capigies or porters keep this gate, who have no weapons, but only white rods in their hands. Within this gate there is a large court-yard, on the right hand of which are infirmaries, and on the left lodges for the azancoglans, that is perſons employed in the meaneſt offices of the ſeraglio. The wood for fuel is likewiſe kept here, of which they conſume forty thouſand loads in a year. Here the ſlaves of the baſhas and agas wait for their maſters. Into this court any perſon may enter, but every thing is ſo ſtill that the buzzing of a fly may be heard, becauſe if any perſon ſpeaks loud, he is immediately baſtinadoed. From the firſt court you go to the ſecond, the entrance whereof is kept by fifty capigies. This is ſquare, and about three hundred paces in diameter, but much handſomer than the firſt, having paved paths, fountains, and graſs-plots. The grand ſeignior's treaſury is on the left, with what is called the little ſtable. The offices and kitchens are on the right. The firſt kitchen is for the emperor, the ſecond for the principal ſultana, the third for the other ſultanas, the fourth for the capi aga of the gates, in the fifth they dreſs victuals for the principal officers of the divans, the ſixth belongs to the pages, called ichoglans, the ſeventh to the officers of the ſeraglio, the eighth is for the women and maid-ſervants, and the ninth for all ſuch as attend the divan. The common proviſions are forty thouſand oxen in a year; and in a day two hundred ſheep, one hundred lambs or kids, according to the ſeaſon, ten calves, four hundred fowls, two hundred pigeons, and fifty green geeſe. All round the court runs a low gallery, covered with lead, and ſupported by marble pillars. On the days when foreign ambaſſadors are admitted to an audience, the janizaries, well dreſſed, range themſelves on the right beneath the gallery. The divan or juſtice-hall is on the left towards the end, which is large, but low, and covered with lead. Within it is wainſcoted and gilt, after the Mooriſh manner. Here the grand viſier, with his aſſiſtants, determine all cauſes, as well criminal as civil, without appeal. Here likewiſe they entertain the ambaſſadors on the days of audience. Theſe courts are all that ſtrangers are permitted to ſee. The whole ſeraglio is under the care of black eunuchs, who are deprived of their virility in Ethiopia, and ſent from thence young. Some of theſe are appointed as guards to the women, and they are ſo vigilant, that there is no poſſibility of coming near them. Not to mention the raſhneſs of any ſuch attempt, which would be puniſhed with immediate death. When an emperor dies, his women are ſent to the old ſeraglio in another part of the city, where they are as ſtrictly watched as before. When the ſultanas walk in the gardens, the gardeners run behind a ſcreen, placed near the walls, and look towards the ſea; for a ſingle glance, if perceived would coſt them their lives.

There was formerly in Conſtantinople a great number of fine ſtatues, obeliſks, and pillars; but they are moſt of them ruined. The ancient Hippodrome is ſtill in being, and is ſtill uſed for horſe races: the Turks call it, the Almeidan. In the midſt of this ſquare, there is an obeliſk, pretty entire, with hieroglyphic figures; and, a few paces from thence, there is a high column erected, with ſtones laid one upon another, without any cement. Towards the end, there was a brazen column, made with three brazen ſerpents wreathed together, and their heads terminated the top at a little diſtance from each other; but in the year 1700 this pillar was thrown down. Within the city are two other fine columns, one of which is ſtyled, the Column of Hiſtory; becauſe there are figures on it, in baſſo relievo, ſaid to repreſent the hiſtory of the expedition of Arcadius. There is a ſtair-caſe within, to aſcend to the top. The other is called the Burnt Column, becauſe it ſuffered by the burning of the houſes near it. It conſiſts of eighteen porphyry ſtones, which before the fire ſeemed to be all of a piece; but now the joints are open, and they are faſtened together with iron cramps.

From Conſtantinople we paſs to the ſuburb of Galata, which is defended by pretty good walls, flanked with towers, and is ſeparated from the city by the harbour. As there are boats always in waiting, it may be paſſed over for a trifle. You may paſs on foot round the harbour; but then it is a great way round about. Going this way, the firſt thing we meet is the Ocmiedan, where the Turks exerciſe themſelves in ſhooting with the bow and arrow; and where they come in proceſſion to pray for ſucceſs, in time of war and other public calamities. From hence we go to Caſſumpacha, which is a good village, where the arſenal is placed, by the ſea-ſide, and where they build the ſhips. There are twenty ſix arches, under which they may put the gallies, to ſhelter them from the weather, or build new ones. Galata is ſeparated from this village by nothing but the burying-places. It is a large conſiderable place, in which there is a tower, which the Genoeſe kept a long time, in ſpite of the Turks, after they were maſters of Conſtantinople. The houſes are good and well-built, and there are a great number of Greeks live here, as well as Franks. There are five convents belonging to theſe laſt, with their churches. In the main ſtreet, there are fiſhmongers ſhops on each ſide; and it is aſtoniſhing to ſee what a prodigious number of different kinds of fiſh are expoſed to ſale, at a cheap rate. The Greeks keep ſeveral taverns in Galata, which draw a great number of the meaner ſort from the city, who are very inſolent when drunk, inſomuch that it is ſometimes dangerous to meet them. From From Galata the paſſage is through burying-places to Pera, where all the foreign ambaſſadors live, except thoſe from the emperor, the king of Poland, and Raguſa, for they are in the city. This ſtands high, and the houſes are good; but there are no Greeks there but the richer ſort. From hence you have a view of the coaſt of Aſia, and the Grand Seignior's ſeraglio.

The foreign merchants have houſes and warehouſes in Pera, as well as in Galata, promiſcuouſly with the Jews, Greeks, Armenians, and Turks. Next to Pera is Topena, another ſuburb, near the entrance of the Black Sea. Here ſuch as have a mind to divert themſelves on the water uſually take boat. About one hundred paces from the ſea ſtands the foundery of cannon, which is a houſe covered with a low dome.

Conſtantinople is five hundred and ſixty miles ſouth-eaſt of Vienna, ſeven hundred and fifty eaſt of Rome, one thouſand four hundred and fifty from London, one thouſand five hundred and fifty from Madrid, one thouſand and twenty-five from Copenhagen, one thouſand one hundred and twenty five from Stockholm, eight hundred and ſeventy-five from Moſcow, and one thouſand two hundred and fifty from Paris. CONSTANTINOW, a town of Poland, in the Volhinia. It is ſeated on the river Sclucza, ſixty-ſeven miles north-eaſt of Kaminiek, and thirty ſouth-eaſt of Bar. Long. 28. 37. E. Lat 50. 21. N.

CONSTANTIUS CHLORUS, or FLAVIUS VALERIUS CONSTANTIUS, the ſon of Eutropius, and father of Conſtantine the Great, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour, by his prudence, and his moderation towards the Chriſtians; and was created Cæſar, by Diocleſian, in 292. He then repudiated his firſt wife, Helena, in order to marry Theodora, the daughter of Maximianus Herculeus, Diocleſian's colleague. Conſtantius Chlorus ſubdued Britain, gained ſignal victories over the German nations, and was declared emperor with Valerius Maximianus, his colleague, in 305. He died at York, on the 25th of July, 306, leaving ſix children by his ſecond wife; after having given, when dying, the title of Cæſar to Conſtantine.

CONSTANTIUS II. or FLAVIUS JULIUS CONSTANTIUS, the ſecond ſon of Conſtantine the Great and Fauſta, was born at Sirmich, in 317, and was created Cæſar in 324. He married Euſebia, a princeſs diſtinguiſhed by her extraordinary accompliſhments. After his father's death, it is ſaid, that he cauſed his nephews and couſins to be murdered, in order to ſeize their poſſeſſions, and divided the empire with his brothers, Conſtantine and Conſtans, having, for his ſhare, the Eaſt, Thrace, and Greece. Conſtantius declared war againſt the Perſians, obliged them to raiſe the ſiege of Niſiba, and obtained a great victory over them near that city, in which Narſes, the ſon of Sapor, king of Perſia, was ſlain; but afterwards the Perſians gained great advantages over him. Conſtantine the Great had deſired him when dying, to recal Athanaſius; but he however treated him with ſeverity, and protected the Arians. After the death of Conſtantine the Young, in 340, and of Conſtans, in 350, Vetranio and Magnenſius divided the dominions of the two princes between them, on which Conſtantius marched againſt them. He firſt obliged Vetrario to ſubmit to his authority, when Magnenſius, after being defeated in Murcia and in Gaul, killed himſelf at Lyons. Thus Conſtantius, in 353, became maſter of all the countries that had been governed by his father. The following year he cauſed Sylvainus, a captain who commanded in Gaul, to be aſſaſſinated, and put to death his couſin Gallus, in Iſtria. He was preparing to make war on the Perſians, when Julian, the brother of Gallus, took the title of emperor, and marched againſt him; Conſtantius went to meet him, but died at Mopſueſta, in Cilicia, on the 3d of November, 361, aged forty-five, after a reign of twenty-five years. He was baptized a little before his death, by Euzoius.

CONSTANTIUS, a celebrated Roman general, born at Niſſa, gained many ſignal victories, drove the Goths out of Gaul, and, in 415, ſent the rebel Attalus to the emperor Honorius. In 417, that prince gave him Placidia, his ſiſter, in marriage, and in 421 aſſociated him to the empire; but Conſtantius died ſeven months after, leaving Valentinian III. who was emperor.

CONSUALIA, in Roman antiquity, a feſtival inſtituted by Romulus, who, at the rape of the Sabine virgins, found an altar under-ground dedicated to Conſus, the god of counſel. This feſtival was annually obſerved in the month of Auguſt; it was introduced with a magnificent cavalcade, and during its celebration, the horſes and aſſes were crowned with flowers, and a mule was ſacrificed to that god.

CONSUL, in Roman antiquity, the chief magiſtrate of the common-wealth, of which there were two, annually choſen by the people. In the early ages of that republic, none could pretend to this dignity but ſuch as were of a patrician family; but afterwards the people obtained the privilege of having one of the conſu's choſen out of their body. The common age required in the candidates was that of forty-two. The power of the conſuls was of very great extent; at firſt it was the ſame as that of the kings, it bing only reſtrained by plurality of perſons and ſhortneſs of time. They were the head of the ſenate, which they aſſembled or diſmiſſed at their pleaſure: they alſo commanded the armies, and were ſupreme judges of the difference between the citizens; but as ſome of them made an ill uſe of their power, the party aggrieved was at length allowed, by the Valerian law, to appeal from their tribunal to the people, eſpecially in caſes where the life of a citizen was concerned. They had alſo the honour of characterizing the year by their own names. Their authority was equal; only in ſome ſmaller matters, he had the precedency, according to the Valerian law, who was the eldeſt; and he, according to the Julian law, who had moſt children. As a mark of their authority, twelve lictors went before one of them one month, and before the other the next. However, under the emperors, the poſt of conſul was little more than an honourable title; and at laſt, it became abſolutely extinct, in the time of Juſtinian.

CONSUS, in Pagan mythology, a deity worſhipped by the ancient Romans, and ſuppoſed to be the god of counſel: he was alſo called Neptunus Equeſtris, and had an annual feſtival inſtituted to his honour, called Conſualia. See CONSUALIA.

CONTARINI (GASPARD) a learned cardinal, born at Venice, was employed in ſeveral important negociations, and died at Bologna, in 1542, aged fifty-nine. He wrote in Latin, a Treatiſe on the Immortality of the Soul, and ſeveral other works.

CONTARINI (VINCENT) a learned profeſſor of polite literature at Padua, died at Venice, in 1617, aged forty. He left a treatiſe De Re Frumenta; another, De Militari Romanorum Stipendio, and other works.

CONTE (ANTHONY LE) in Latin Contius, a learned civilian, born at Noyon. He taught with reputation at Bourges and Orleans; wrote againſt Duaren and Hotman, and died at Bourges, in 1586. His works are printed in one volume quarto.

CONTENSON (VINCENT) a Dominican monk, who wrote a treatiſe, intitled, Theologia Mentis & Cordis, printed in nine volumes, 12mo, and in two volumes folio.

CONTY, a town of France, in Upper Picardy, with the title of a principality, It is ſeated on the river Seille, thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Amiens, and ſixty-three north of Paris. Long. 2. 17. E. Lat. 49. 54. N.

CONTZA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Principato, with an archbiſhop's ſee. Is is ſeated on the river Offanta, thirty-three miles north-eaſt of Salerno, thirty ſouth-eaſt of Benevento, and fifty-three eaſt of Naples. Long. 16. 5. E. Lat. 40. 50. N.

CONVERSANO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and territory of Bary, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated among the mountains, ten miles from the Gulph of Venice, eight ſouth-weſt of Poilgnano, and fifteen ſouth-eaſt of Bari. Long. 17. 15. E. Lat. 41. 10. N.

COOK (Sir ANTHONY) governor or preceptor to king Edward VI. was born at Giddy, or Gidding-hall, in Eſſex, about the year 1506, and became a thorough maſter of the Latin and Greek languages; an excellent critic and philologiſt, and equally ſkilled in poetry, hiſtory, and the mathematics. He died on the 11th of June 1576, aged ſeventy.

COOKE, (HENRY) an Engliſh hiſtory-painter, was born in 1642, and ſtudied at the univerſity of Cambridge; after which he went to Italy, and painted under Salvator Roſa. On his return, he, for ſome time, lived obſcurely in partnerſhip with a houſe-painter in Knave's Acre; but being introduced to Sir Godfrey Copley, that gentleman was ſo pleaſed with his works, that he took him into Yorkſhire, and employed him in painting a new houſe he had built. He next lived five years with the father of Anthony Ruſſel; but quarrelling with a man about a miſtreſs whom Cooke kept, by whom he had children, and whom he afterwards married, Cooke killed him, and fled to Italy, where he ſtaid ſeven years, and then returning, lived privately till the affair was forgot. Towards the end of his life he was much employed. By order of king William he repaired the cartoons, and other pictures in the royal collection, and painted the choir of New college chapel, Oxford, the ſtair-caſe at Renelagh-houſe, and that at lord Carliſle's, Soho ſquare. He died on November 18, 1700, aged near fifty eight.

COOLTICORMACK, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, and province of Munſter, twenty-four miles ſouth of Limerick. Long. 8. 45. W. Lat. 52. 11. N.

COOPER, or COUPER, (THOMAS) biſhop of Wincheſter; was born at Oxford, and educated in that univerſity. After ſeveral preferments in the church, he was conſecrated biſhop of Lincoln in 1570, and in 1584, was tranſlated to the biſhoprick of Wincheſter. He publiſhed, 1. Cooper's Chronicle; 2. Theſaurus linguæ Romanæ & Britannicæ; 3. A brief Expoſition of ſuch Chapters of the Old Teſtament as are uſually read in the Church at Common Prayer, on the Sundays throughout the year; 4. An Admonition to the People of England; and 5. Sermons.

COOPER, (ANTONY ASHLEY) earl of Shafteſbury, one of the greateſt politicians and diſtinguiſhed miniſters in the laſt century, was the ſon of Sir John Cooper, and was born at Winborne St. Giles, in Dorſetſhire, on the 22d of July, 1621. He was educated at Oxford, and from thence removed to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied himſelf with great vigour to the ſtudy of the law. In the beginning of the civil wars, he repaired to king Charles I. at Oxford, and offered his ſervices, not for ſubduing or conquering his country, but for reducing ſuch as had deſerted or miſtaken their duty.

Mr. Locke, in his memoirs of this extraordinary man, ſays, "That he was preſented to the king by his friend, the Lord Falkland, as having ſomething to offer to his majeſty worth his conſideration; when he obſerved, that the men of eſtates beginning to be weary of the war, would be glad to be quiet at home, could they be aſſured of the redreſs of their grievances; and propoſed, that if his majeſty would impower him to treat with the parliament garriſons, to grant them a general pardon, with an assurance, that on both sides laying down their arms, all things should be reinstated in the posture they were in before the war, and a free parliament should do what more remained to be done for the settlement of the nation. The king consented, and having furnished him with full power, he went into Dorsetshire, and managed a treaty with the garrisons of Pool, Weymouth, Dorchester, and other places, with such success, that one of them was actually put into his hands, as the others were to have been a few days after. But prince Maurice, being with his army in those parts, no sooner heard that the town was surrendered, than he marched into it, and gave the pillage of it to his soldiers. Sir Antony, filled with indignation, expressed his resentment to the prince, and some hot words passed between: but all that he could then do, was to send to the other garrisons he was in treaty with, to stand on their guard, as he could not secure his articles to them. And thus this design proved abortive.

His majesty afterwards invited Sir Antony to Oxford; but perceiving that he was not to be confided in; that his behaviour was disliked, and his person in danger, he laid aside all his projects for his majesty's service, and came to London; and at length entered into the parliament's service, accepted a commission, and in 1644, took Wareham by storm, and soon after reduced all the adjacent parts of Dorsetshire. He was afterwards greatly instrumental in bringing about the Restoration, upon which he was admitted to the privy council; and before Charles the II's. coronation, was, in April 1661, created baron Ashley of Winborne St. Giles, and soon after made chancellor and under-treasurer of the exchequer. Upon the death of the earl of Southampton, he was appointed one of the commissioners for executing the office of high-treasurer; on the 23d of April 1672, was created baron Cooper of Pawlet, and earl of Shaftesbury; and on the fourth of November was raised to the post of lord high-chancellor; but the very next year his lordship, finding himself unable to put a stop to the violent measures taken by the court, resigned the seals. He, however, spoke with the same ease and freedom in parliament as before; and their happening a recess of fifteen months, when the parliament met again on the 16th of February, 1676-7, the duke of Buckingham argued, that it ought to be considered as dissolved, the earl of Shaftesbury was of the same opinion, and maintained it with such warmth, that together with the duke before mentioned, the earl of Salisbury, and the lord Wharton, he was sent to the Tower, where he continued for thirteen months, though the other lords, upon their submission, were speedily released. After this, steadily promoting the bill of exclusion, and the prosecutions that followed the discovery of the popish plot, he made the duke of York and his friends his inveterate enemies; and an occasion was soon found to make him feel the effects of their resentments. One Bryan Haines applied himself to the earl under the pretence that he could make clearer discoveries than had hitherto been made of the popish plot and the murder of sir Edmund Bury Godfrey, provided he obtained a pardon; but when this man came before the privy council, he gave quite another account, and boldly charged the earl with endeavouring to suborn him; upon which his lordship was apprehended, on the 2d of July, 1681, and after being examined by his majesty in council, was committed to the Tower, where he remained upwards of four months; but at length a bill being presented to the grand jury, at the Sessions-house in the Old Bailey, against him, for high-treason, the jury returned the bill ignoramus, when great rejoicings were made in the city on his lordship's acquital, soon after which he went to Holland, and died at Amsterdam on the 22d of January, 1682-3, in the sixty-second year of his age. His lordship was succeeded by Antony, his son and heir.

The character given of the earl of Shaftesbury in the Biographia Britannica is a perfect panegyric; but that given by Mr. Walpole, and the Reverend Mr. Granger seems more just. "The great talents of the earl of Shaftesbury, and "his exact knowledge of men and things," says the latter, "contributed to render him one of the first characters of his "age; but the violence of his passions, and the flexibility "of his principles prompted him to act very different and "even contrary parts. This was, in some measure, owing "to the changes in the times in which he lived, but is more "to be attributed to the mutability of his character, which "ever varied with the interest of his ambition. When we "consider him as sitting in the highest tribunal in the kingdom, explaining and correcting the laws, detecting "fraud, and exerting all the powers of his eloquence on "the side of justice; we admire the able lawyer, the commanding orator, and the upright judge; but when he "enters into all the iniquitious measures of the cabal, when "he prostitutes his eloquence to enslave his country, and "the becomes factious leader and the popular incendiary, "we regard him with an equal mixture of horror and regret." He published, 1. A Letter from a Person of Quality to his Friend in the Country. 2. Several Speeches in Parliament. 3. Two seasonable Discourses concerning this present Parliament, 1675. 4. His Case at the King's Bench, on his Confinement in the Tower. 5. No Protestant Plot; and other pieces.

Cooper (Antony Ashley) earl of Shaftesbury, grand son of the above-mentioned earl of Shaftesbury was born on the 26th of February, 1670-1, at Exeter-house, in London, where his grand-father then resided, and from the time of his birth, conceived so great an affection for him, that he took upon himself the care of his education, and in order insensibly to instil into him a knowledge of the learned languages, placed a person about him, who was so thoroughly versed in the Latin and Greek tongues, that she could speak either of them with the greatest fluency; and by her instructions he made such surprising progress, that he could read with ease both the Latin and Greek languages when eleven years old. At this age he was sent to a private school, where he staid till his grand-father's death, when he was removed to the school at Winchester, where being treated ill, on his grandfather's account, by the zealots for despotic power, he prevailed on his father to consent to his desire of going abroad. He began his travels, under the care of a tutor, in 1686, and after three years stay abroad, returned to England in 1689, where he prosecuted his studies for five years, after which he was elected member for Pool, where he expressed that spirit of liberty which he maintained to the end of his life, by bringing in and supporting the act for regulating trials in cases of high treason. Mr. Walpole mentions, on this occasion, an instance of his modest ingenuity. "Attempting," says that pleasing writer, "to "speak on the bill for granting counsel to prisoners in cases "of high treason, he was confounded, and for some time "could not proceed; but recovering himself, he said, "What now happened to him would serve to fortify the "arguments for the bill; if he, innocent and pleading for "others, was daunted at the augustness of such an assembly, "what must a man be who should plead before them for "his life?"

The fatigue of regularly attending the house, impairing his health, he declined coming again into parliament, after the dissolution in 1698. He then went to Holland, where the conversation of Mr. Bayle, Mr. Le Clerc, and several other learned men, induced him to reside a twelvemonth. His father dying soon after his return to England, he became earl of Shaftesbury, when he supported, in the house of lords, the measures of king William, who was at that time projecting the grand alliance; and so much was he in favour with that prince, that he was soon offered the post of secretary of state; but his declining constitution would not allow him to accept it. On queen Anne's accession to the throne, he was no longer consulted in public affairs, and was then removed from the vice-admiralty of Dorset, which had been in the family for three generations. In 1703, he made a second voyage to Holland, and returned to England the following year. Soon after which, the French prophets occasioning disturbances by their enthusiastic extravagancies, and some advising a prosecution, the earl, from his love of liberty, and the opinion that such measures would rather tend to inflame than to cure the disease, wrote his Letter on Enthusiasm. At length, finding his health declining, and being advised to seek assistance from a warmer climate, he went to Naples, and after residing near two years in that city, died there, on the 4th of February, 1711-12, and was succeeded in his title and estate by his only son Antony. In the three volumes of Characteristics, he completed the whole of those writings which he intended should be made public, though we have several other pieces of his since published. His principal study was the writings of antiquity, from which he formed the plan of his philosophy.

Cooper (Samuel) an eminent limner, was born at London, in the year, 1609, and brought up under the care of Mr. Hoskins, his uncle, but derived the most considerable advantages from his observations on the works of Vandyck, so that he was commonly styled the Vandyck in Little. The high price his works sold at, and the great esteem they were in at Rome, Venice, and in France, were eminent proofs of the skill of this great artist, whose fame spread over all Europe. He drew king Charles II. and his queen, the duchess of Cleveland, the duke of York, and most of the court; but his two most famous pieces were those of Oliver Cromwell and of one Swingfield. Mr. Walpole observes, "that his works are so bold, that they seem perfect nature, "only of a less standard. If a glass," says he, "could "expand Cooper's pictures to the size of Vandyck's, they "would appear to have been painted for that proportion; "if his portrait of Cromwell could be so enlarged, I do not "know but Vandyck would appear less great by the com-"parison." For this portrait the French king offered one hundred hundred and fifty pounds, but could not have it. That of Mr Swingfield Mr. Cooper carried with him to France, where it introduced him to the favour of the court; yet the above ingenious author obſerves, that his ſkill was confined to mere heads, his drawing even of the neck and ſhoulders being incorrect. He ſpent ſeveral years abroad, was perſonally acquainted with the greateſt men of France, Holland, and England, and died at London, in the year 1672, at ſixty three years of age.

Mr Alexander Cooper, his elder brother, was alſo brought up by their uncle; he performed well in miniature, and became limner to Chriſtina, queen of Sweden.

COOTE (ſir CHARLES) a brave officer, who, at the breaking out of the Iriſh rebellion, in 1641, commanded a regiment of foot, and was made governor of Dublin. He relieved the caſtle of Wicklow, and routed a thouſand Iriſh commanded by Luke Toole. In April, 1642, he went with ſir Thomas Lucas and ſix troops of horſe to relieve Bir, and ſome other places. The rebels had caſt up a ditch at the end of the cauſeway, Coote made thirty of his dragoons diſmount, and leading them on in perſon, beat off the Iriſh, having killed forty with their captain, and then relieved the caſtle. Some time after he went with lord Liſle to relieve the caſtle of Geaſhill, and a council of war being ſummoned, he told them, that if they made haſte, they might eaſily paſs the defiles and cauſeways, before the enemy could aſſemble to oppoſe them. To which another anſwered, that it might be ſo, but when the country was alarmed, how ſhould they get back? "I proteſt," ſaid ſir Charles, "I never thought of that in all my life; I always "conſidered how to do my buſineſs, and when that was "done, I got home as well as I could; and hitherto I have "not miſſed of forcing my way." They therefore relieved that place, and likewiſe took Philipſtown and Trim, and with a very few forces routed three thouſand, who came the next night to retake Trim; but in this rencounter he was killed by a muſket ball.

COOTE (CHARLES) earl of Mountrath, was the eldeſt ſon of ſir Charles Coote, bart. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his activity, bravery, and conduct, both againſt the Iriſh rebels and the friends of king Charles II. from the time of the Iriſh maſſacre to the death of Oliver; in which period he gained a great number of victories, and took ſeveral important towns and forts; but at length obſerving the meaſures taken to reſtore king Charles II. he engaged heartily in that event, and was greatly inſtrumental in preſerving Ireland for that prince. For theſe ſervices he was, on the 6th of September, 1660, created baron and viſcount Coote, and earl Mountrath, and was alſo appointed one of the lord's juſtices in that kingdom. He died on the 18th of December, 1661, and was ſucceeded in honour and eſtate by his ſon Charles, the anceſtor of Algernoon, the fifth earl of Mountrath.

COOTWICH (JOHN) doctor of law, was born at Utrecht, and ſpent great part of his life in travelling. He publiſhed in Latin, in 1619, an Account of his Journey from Jeruſalem, and from Syria; which is a very ſcarce and curious work.

COPENHAGEN, the capital city of Denmark, is large, populous, and well fortified. The houſes are generally built on piles, as at Amſterdam. The port, called Chriſtians Haven, is incloſed in a fortreſs, and is wide enough to contain five hundred large veſſels, very commodiouſly and ſafely; yet the entrance is ſo well guarded, that only one ſhip at a time can enter in. The houſes on the banks of the harbour in the iſland Amark make a ſmall town, and are ſurrounded with the fortifications. The palace where the king reſided was formerly very ill built, it was therefore levelled with the ground in 1730, and another built, five ſtories high, which is very magnificent. It was finiſhed in 1740, and called Chriſtianſburg. Beſides this, there are two other palaces in the city kept for the king's uſe; one of which is near the royal garden, and is called Roſenburg. Here the crown and the royal jewels are kept. The other is called Charlottenburg, near which ſtood the opera-houſe, which was quite conſumed by fire, in 1689.

The citadel, called Frederick's Haven, is regularly built, and fortified with five good baſtions, a double ditch full of water, and ſeveral good advanced works. The aſtronomical tower was a fine building before it was damaged by the fire, and was well furniſhed with inſtruments; but there are ſtill ſome that were uſed by Tycho Brahe, and part of the regiſters of his aſtronomical obſervations, as alſo a fine and rich library, full of ſcarce manuſcripts. The arſenal is furniſhed with every thing neceſſary for fitting out a fleet. There is a dock near the ſea, which they empty of all the water, and when a ſhip is built they fill it again, and conduct it into the ſea without the hazard and trouble of launching. The exchange, the houſes of the Eaſt and Weſt India companies, the houſe for proviſions, the king's ſtables, the tennis-court, the college of the univerſity, the orphan-houſe, the opera-houſe, and the military-ſchool, are all large ſuperb ſtructures.

The royal library contains above forty thouſand books, among which are many curious manuſcripts. It is ſeated above the arſenal. They reckon this city has above ſixty thouſand inhabitants, and if the ſailors and ſoldiers were comprehended there would be above eighty thouſand. Before the dreadful fire, in 1728, there were ſix thouſand houſes, which were divided into ſeven large pariſhes. There was likewiſe a public ſchool, provided with able maſters. The houſes were generally well built, and the inhabitants lived very comfortably. In the middle of the city was a large handſome building belonging to the univerſity, which was founded in 1479, by Chriſtian I. It had ſeveral colleges, which were like ſo many academies; among which was one for the ſtudy of medicine, beſides three halls for public lectures and diſputations, a chemical laboratory, a handſome anatomical theatre, and a cabinet of rarities. Near theſe buildings were the houſes of the twelve profeſſors, with a private library to each. But all theſe large pariſhes, with the colleges, which took up two thirds of the city, were unfortunately reduced to aſhes by fire, which burnt for three days together, in which time it conſumed ſixty-ſeven ſtreets, and only the pariſh of St. Nicholas, near the royal palace was left ſtanding. This fire ſeemed to be trifling at firſt, but there being an accidental want of water, and a boiſterous wind at the ſame time, it was communicated to ſeveral parts of the city in an inſtant, which, together with a prodigious heavy rain, hindered the inhabitants from ſaving either their houſes or their goods. After this great numbers muſt have periſhed for want, if the king had not taken care to ſupply them with proviſions, and ſent them into the neighbouring towns to lodge. However moſt of the houſes and churches have been rebuilt handſomer than before. It is ſeated on the eaſtern ſide of the iſle of Zealand, one hundred miles north-eaſt of Hamburg, two hundred ſouth-weſt of Stockholm, four hundred and fifty north-weſt of Vienna, five hundred from London, two hundred and ſeventy-five from Amſterdam, and five hundred and ſixty from Paris. Long. 12. 50. E. Lat 55. 40. N.

COPERNICUS (NICHOLAS) a celebrated aſtronomer, philoſopher, and phyſician, born at Thorn on the 19th of January 1472-3. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Greek language, to philoſophy, and medicine, but principally to the mathematics and aſtronomy, in which he made great progreſs, while in that city. To perfect himſelf in theſe ſciences he took ſeveral voyages, remained for a long time at Bologna, and taught the mathematics at Rome. At his return to his native country his uncle, Luke Watzelrod, biſhop of Warmia, gave him a canonry in his church. Copernicus then publiſhed his Syſtem of Aſtronomy, which he revived from Pythagoras, Ariſtarchus of Samos, and cardinal de Cuſa. He maintained that the Earth, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn, move round the Sun: that the earth has another motion about its axis, and that the moon performs a circuit round the earth. This ſyſtem Copernicus ſo greatly improved, and gave ſuch admirable proofs deduced from the celeſtial phænomena, and other reaſons, that he has obtained the glory of its invention. While Copernicus was reviving this ſyſtem, and labouring to improve and eſtabliſh it, ſome of his friends objected, that ſuppoſing it true, that is, ſuppoſing the ſun at reſt in the centre of the univerſe, and the earth moving round it, the planet Venus muſt undergo the ſame phaſes with the moon; to whom he is ſaid to have replied, "Poſterity will "probably diſcover that it does ſo." This prophecy of Copernicus was fulfilled by the famous Galileo Galilei, who firſt made the diſcovery with the teleſcope, and thereby greatly confirmed the Copernican ſyſtem. This prince of aſtronomers was ſkilled in other branches of ſcience, and was a perfect maſter of the Greek and Latin tongues, to which he joined great piety and innocence of manners. He died on the 24th of May, 1543, aged ſeventy. He wrote a treatiſe De Motu octavæ Sphæræ, in which he explains and proves his ſyſtem; and another De Revolutionibus.

COPIAPO, a port town of Chili in South America, ſeated in a very fruitful plain, at the mouth of a river of the ſame name in the Pacific Ocean. It is five hundred miles north of St. Jago. Long. 75. 10. W. Lat. 25. 20. S.

COPORIA, a town of the Ruſſian empire, at the mouth of a river of the ſame name on the gulph of Finland. It was ceded to the Swedes by treaty in 1617, but was taken from by them Peter the Great, in the beginning of this century. Long. 29 50. E. Lat. 59. 36. N.

COPROGLI PACHA (MAHOMET) a celebrated general, and grand vizier during the minority of Mahomet IV. was a native of Albania, and the ſon of a Greek prieſt. He embraced Mahometaniſm and ſettled in the iſland of Cyprus, where he applied himſelf to the profeſſion of arms. He ſignalized himſelf in a war againſt the Perſians, and obtained the government vernment of Baruth, and afterwards that of Aleppo. In 1649 he was nominated grand vizier, at the ſollicitation of the ſultana Zaima, the mother of young Mahomet. He governed the Turkiſh empire with great wiſdom; conquered a part of Tranſylvania, and died at Adrianople in 1663, regretted both by the ſultan and the people.

Achmet Coprogli Pacha, his ſon, ſucceeded him in the poſt of grand vizier; he ſignalized himſelf equally by his valour and conduct, and in 1669 rendered himſelf maſter of Candia. He died in 1676, aged thirty-five. Mahomet Coprogli Pacha, the brother of Achmet, was alſo grand vizier: he defeated the Imperialiſts, and was of great ſervice to the Ottoman empire, but was killed by a cannon ball at the battle of Salankemen on the 19th of Auguſt 1691.

COQUILLE (Guy) a learned civilian and advocate in the parliament of Paris, was born at Deciſe in 1523, and died in 1603. His works have been printed in two volumes folio.

COQUIMBO, a town of South America, in Chili, near a river of the ſame name, was built by Baldvia in 1554. It is ſeated in the lower part of the vale of Coquimbo, a quarter of a league from the ſea, on an eminence about ten yards high, which like a terrace, extends from north to ſouth in a ſtrait line along the town three quarters of a mile, and on it is the principal ſtreet, which is a very pleaſant walk, from whence is a proſpect of the bay and the adjacent country. The ſtreets are all in ſtrait lines from north to ſouth, and from eaſt to weſt. However the number of the inhabitants is ſmall, the houſes are mean, being only a ground floor, made with mud walls, and thatched; and the ſtreets are dirty, which would render it a very diſagreeable place, if it was not well planted with olive-trees, oranges, figs, palm-trees, &c. which yield a delightful ſhade. The moſt conſiderable part of it is taken up by two ſquares, without reckoning the pariſh church and the chapel of St. Agnes. There was a church called St. Lucy, but all the quarter in which it ſtood, as well as the ſouth part of the town, has been burnt and plundered by the Engliſh and others, and have never been rebuilt, inſomuch that now there are no more than about two hundred families.

The air is temperate, for there are no ſharp cold winds in the winter, and in the ſummer there are refreſhing breezes, which moderate the heat. But in the winter the rains are ſometimes pretty plentiful, and form rivulets that bring down gold from the mountains, where there are gold and ſilver mines, but they are not worked for want of labourers. The copper mines lie eight miles north-eaſt from the town, from which they ſupply the coaſt of Chili and Peru with utenſils for the kitchen. The inhabitants furniſh St. Jago with wine and oil, and likewiſe export hides, tallow, and dried fleſh, but not much. Sometimes French ſhips reſort here for freſh proviſions, wine, and brandy. They have plenty of fiſh in the bay. Long. 75. 46. W. Lat. 31. 3. S.

CORAM (Captain Thomas) a gentleman remarkably diſtinguiſhed by his humanity, was born about the year 1668, and ſpent the early part of his life in the ſtation of maſter of a veſſel trading to our colonies. Afterwards reſiding in the eaſtern part of the metropolis, among ſeafaring people, where buſineſs often obliged him to come early into the city and return late, he frequently ſaw young children expoſed in the ſtreets, through the indigence or cruelty of their parents. This excited his compaſſion, and induced him to project the foundation of an hoſpital for foundlings. In this humane deſign he laboured with indefatigable diligence for ſeventeen years, and by his application procured a number of the nobility and gentry, whom he prevailed upon to patronize and carry the ſcheme into execution, and at length obtained the royal charter for it. He was alſo highly inſtrumental in promoting the trade of America, by procuring a bounty upon naval ſtores imported from our colonies. He was likewiſe eminently concerned in ſetting on foot the colonies of Georgia and Nova Scotia. His laſt charitable deſign, in which he lived to make ſome progreſs, was a ſcheme for uniting the North American Indians more cloſely to the Britiſh intereſt, by an eſtabliſhment for the education of Indian girls. In ſhort, a great part of his life was ſpent in ſerving the public with ſurprizing zeal and ſpirit, and with an entire diſregard to his private intereſt. Towards the cloſe of his life he was ſupported by the voluntary ſubſcription of ſome public-ſpirited perſons, at the head of whom was the benevolent Frederick, late prince of Wales. He died on the 29th of March 1751, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, and was interred, by his own deſire, in the chapel of the Foundling hoſpital.

CORAS (John de) in Latin Coraſius, one of the moſt learned civilians in the ſixteenth century, was born at Realmont in 1513, and taught the civil law at Angers, Orleans, Paris, Padua, Ferrara, and Toulouſe, with univerſal applauſe. He was at length counſellor in the parliament of Toulouſe, and chancellor of Navarre; but having embraced Calviniſm, was driven from Toulouſe in 1562, and was with great difficulty reſtored to his poſt in that city by the protection of his friend the chancellor of the hoſpital; but this was of no advantage to him, for he was maſſacred in 1572, after the news was received of the dreadful maſſacre on St. Bartholemew's day. He wrote ſeveral excellent works in Latin and French, the principal of which are printed in two volumes folio.

CORBACK, a town of Germany in Heſſe, and the principality of Waldeck. It is ten miles north-weſt of Waldeck, and twenty-eight weſt of Caſſel. Long. 8. 36. W. Lat. 51. 29. N.

CORBEIL, a town of France, ſeated on the river Seine, in the iſle of France. It is eight miles from Melun, and eighteen from Paris. Long. 2. 21. E. Lat. 48. 38. N.

CORBET (Richard) biſhop of Norwich, and an eminent poet, was born at Ewell in Surry, toward the latter end of the ſixteenth century, and educated at Oxford, where he was eſteemed one of the moſt celebrated wits of the univerſity. Entering into holy orders, he became a popular preacher, and was made chaplain to king James I. when after ſeveral preferments in the church, he was, in 1629, made biſhop of Oxford, and, in 1632, was tranſlated to the ſee of Norwich. He was very hoſpitable, and always a generous encourager of public deſigns. This learned and ingenious prelate died in the year 1635. There have been ſeveral editions of his poems publiſhed under the title of Poemata Stromata.

CORBEY, a town of Picardy in France, with a famous abbey of Benedictine monks. It is ſeated on the river Somme, ten miles eaſt of Amiens, and ſeventy-five north of Paris. Long. 2. 35. E. Lat. 49. 55. N.

CORBINELLI (James) a perſon of great integrity and learning, and the friend and patron of learned men, was born at Florence, of an illuſtrious family. He retired into France in the reign of Catharine de Medicis; and that queen, to whom he had the honour to be related, placed him with her ſon the duke of Anjou, as a man well ſkilled in polite literature, and capable of giving him good advice. He flouriſhed about the middle of the ſixteenth century.

CORBUEIL (Francis) a French poet in the fifteenth century, more known by the name of Villon, was born at Auvers near Paris. He was a great wit, and had a poetic genius; but ſome knaviſh exploits occaſioned his being condemned to be hanged; however the parliament of Paris changed his ſentence into baniſhment. Rabelais ſays that he then retired to the court of Edward V. king of England, and became the favourite of that prince. The beſt edition of his works is that of Paris, in 1723, duodecimo. His poetry may be characterized by a ſtyle natural, ſimple, and ſportful; and he was the firſt who drew the French poetry out of that confuſed chaos in which it had been left by their ancient poets.

CORBULO (Domitius) a famous Roman general under Claudius and Nero, put a ſtop to the ravages of the Cauſſes, and obliged the inhabitants of Friezland to confine themſelves within their own country. He was ſo rigorous an obſerver of military diſcipline, that he condemned two ſoldiers to ſuffer death for working in their entrenchments without their arms. In the year 59, under the reign of Nero, he ſubdued Armenia; he was at length governor of Syria, and in 66 obliged the Parthians to ſue for a peace. Nero, alarmed at the power of this great man, gave orders for his being put to death when he was at the port of Cenchrea; and Corbulo being acquainted with this order, fell upon his own ſword in the year 66.

CORCEONE (Robert de) cardinal, with the title of St. Stephen on Mount Celius, was born in England, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the latter end of the twelfth, and beginning of the thirteenth centuries, by his zeal for the cruſades, and his invading the rights of the Gallican church. Among the books which he wrote, there is one upon the queſtion, Whether Origen be in Heaven?

CORDEMOI (Gerald de) a learned philoſopher and hiſtorian, born at Paris, made himſelf known to Mr. Boſſuet, who placed him about the dauphin in the quality of reader. He inſtructed that young prince with great aſſiduity, and in 1675 was received into the French academy. He wrote a General Hiſtory of France, during the firſt Races of the French Kings, in two volumes. Six Diſcourſes on the Diſtinctions between Body and Soul, which were printed together in 1702, in quarto; and died on the eighth of October 1684. Mr. Cordemoi followed the principles of Deſcartes.

CORDIER (Mathurin) in Latin Corderius, was an excellent teacher of the Latin tongue, and ſpent his lifetime in inſtructing children at Paris, Nevers, Bourdeaux, Geneva, Neufchatel, Lauzane, and laſtly again at Geneva, where he died September 8, 1564, at the age of eighty-five. Calvin was one of his ſcholars. He wrote ſeveral ſchool-books, among which is a French Tranſlation and Conſtruction of the Latin Diſtichs, aſcribed to Cato, which has had above one hundred editions.

CORDOUA, an ancient and large city of Andaluſia in Spain, and one of the moſt conſiderable places in it next to Seville. It was well known in the time of the Romans by the name of Corduba. Its ſituation is very agreeable on the north bank of the river Guadalquiver, which there runs under a magnificent ſtone bridge. On the north ſide there are high mountains that are a part of the Sierra Morena, and extend to the ſuburbs of the town; and to the ſouth beyond the river there is a large extenſive plain. The city is built in the form of an oblong ſquare, and is of a great extent, but it is not peopled in proportion, there being gardens and vineyards that take up a great deal of room within the walls; but its ſuburbs are ſo large and handſome, that they might be taken for a town, particularly that towards the eaſt. It is embelliſhed with a great number of palaces, churches, and religious houſes. The cathedral church, which is the fineſt, was built by Abderhamen, king of the Moors, in the eighth century. It is ſix hundred feet long, and two hundred and fifty broad. It has twenty-four large gates, adorned with ſculptures and workmanſhip in ſteel, and the roof is ſupported by three hundred and ſixty-five pillars of alabaſter, jaſper, and black marble, a foot and a half in diameter. The new chapel is as large as a church, and is quite covered with marble, as well as embelliſhed with rich gilding. Near this is one more ſmall, gilt in the ſame manner, in which is the ſtatue of St. Lewis, king of France, on horſeback. The whole vault is richly gilt, and the great number of pillars, which ſeparate the chapels, produce a very ſurpriſing effect at the firſt entrance. In one place there are five porticos, which lead to a garden planted with lofty orange trees, which form fine walks. This ſtructure was a Mahommedan moſque, for which reaſon it is ſtill called the meſquita. It was turned into a church when this city was taken from the Moors, in the year 1236, after they had been in poſſeſſion of it five hundred and twenty years.

Cordoua is the ſee of an archbiſhop, whoſe palace is grand, and hath a handſome garden, with a fine orange grove. The houſe of the inquiſition ſtands by the river ſide, and there are ſeveral convents up and down the city, the fineſt of which is that of St. Auguſtine. The royal palace is ſeated at the weſtern extremity of the city, and is incloſed with a wall of great extent, which parts it from the city. There are very handſome ſtables, in which there are generally kept two hundred horſes. The plaça mayor, or royal ſquare, is ſurrounded with beautiful houſes with piazzas. A great many magnificent buildings were thrown down by an earthquake, in 1589. This city is inhabited by many people of quality, and there are a pretty many coaches. The river which here begins to be navigable is a great help to their trade.

The parts about the city are very pleaſant, and the ſoil fruitful; but the mountains are ſteep, and have but little ſoil, part of them being nothing but bare rocks; and yet we find among them gardens, vineyards, and groves of fruit trees, ſuch as the orange, fig, citron, and olive trees. Between them are charming vallies, watered by a great number of ſprings, which render them very fruitful. It is ſeventy miles north-eaſt of Seville; eighty-five north of Malaga, and one hundred and ſeventy-four ſouth-by-weſt of Madrid. Long. 4. 13. W. Lat. 37. 42. N.

CORDOUA (NEW) a town of South America, in Tucuman, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in marſhy, but fruitful land, and has ſeveral convents. The ſalt pits which are near the town yield ſuch a quantity of ſalt, as to be very advantageous to the inhabitants. It is one hundred and ſeventy-five miles from St. Jago. Long. 62. 5. W. Lat. 32. 10. S.

CORDOUA (GONSALVE FERNANDEZ DE) ſurnamed the Great Captain, duke of Ternovo, prince of Venoſa, and grand conſtable of the kingdom of Naples, was the ſon of Peter Fernandez de Cordoua, who was of an illuſtrious houſe in Spain. He made himſelf maſter of Naples, for Ferdinand V. king of Aragon, and gained many victories over the French. He died at Granada, on the 2d of December, 1512, aged ſeventy-two.

CORDUS (VALERIUS) a learned botaniſt, was the ſon of Ericius Cordus, a phyſician and poet of Germany. He was educated with care, and having learnt the languages, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of botany; in the proſecution of which he examined the mountains of Germany, and travelled into Italy: but being wounded in the leg by the kick of a horſe, died at Rome, on the 25th of September, 1544. He wrote Remarks on Dioſcorides, and other works.

COREA a peninſula of Aſia, lying between China and Japan. It is called by the Chineſe Kaalin, and by the Mantcheou Tartars, Solho. It is bounded on the north by the ancient country of the Eaſtern or Mantcheou Tartars, on the north-weſt by a province of China called Leaotong, and on all other parts by the ſea. Its length from north to ſouth is about five hundred and forty miles, and its mean breadth from eaſt to weſt two hundred. The land is cultivated much in the ſame manner as in China, and produces the uſual neceſſaries of life, as rice, wheat, millet, and other grain. It is partly mountainous, and partly plain, and is very well watered with fine rivers. There are ſeveral conſiderable mountains, of which Changpe is the higheſt.

The houſes of the Coreans are only one ſtory high; in the country they are made of earth, but thoſe in the cities are of brick. The walls of the towers are built in the Chineſe manner, with ſquare towers, battlements, and arched gates. The wall built on the north ſide for a defence againſt the Tartars, is not to be compared to the Chineſe wall; and at preſent it lies in ruins. The capital of this kingdom is called King ki Tao, of which we know little or nothing beſides the name. The language of this people is peculiar to themſelves, and their religion the ſame as that of the Chineſe, but they are no bigots, for they will not let the bonzes build their pagods within the walls of the towns, and the bonzes themſelves live but very poorly. The miſſionaries have not yet attempted to introduce the Chriſtian religion, and now perhaps never will, ſince they are all baniſhed from China.

The form of government in Corea is like that of China, it being divided into eight provinces, each of which has its particular juriſdiction. The root called ginſeng is here in plenty, which, with ſable ſkins, brings them in a great deal of money. Their cotton paper is likewiſe in great requeſt for making blinds for windows, even in China, where they have ſuch various ſorts. This kingdom muſt be very ancient, as one of the Chineſe royal family was raiſed to this throne near three thouſand years ago, ſince which this country has always had ſome dependence on China, and is now tributary to it.

The Coreans are generally well made, and of a mild tractable diſpoſition. They underſtand the Chineſe language, delight in learning, and are given to muſic and dancing. The northern inhabitants are naturally warlike, and good ſoldiers. Their moſt common dreſs is fur caps and brocaded gowns; the women have petticoats bordered with lace or edging, and perſons of quality generally wear purple ſilk. The men of learning are diſtinguiſhed by wearing two feathers in their caps, and are great practitioners in muſic. In public aſſemblies the principal perſons wear brocaded robes, adorned with gold and ſilver. The women, who are willing to oblige any of the male ſex, are very numerous; and their marriages, if they can be called ſo where no ceremonies are uſed, are brought about by courtſhip, and the mutual conſent of the parties, not by bargain and ſale, and without ſeeing each other, as in moſt of the Eaſtern countries. However, thoſe of the blood royal, and perſons of rank, never deſcend below their own dignity. They never bury their dead till three years after their deceaſe, and they wear mourning for their parents all that time; but for their brothers, only three months. At their interment they place their cloaths, chariots and horſes, if they had any, or any thing they were fond of in their life time, near the tomb, and leave them to be carried off by thoſe that can get them. They are naturally ſuperſtitious, and are averſe to the killing of animals, being obſervers of the precepts of Fo.

They have ſilk worms, but no great quantity, becauſe linen and cotton cloth are moſt in uſe; but the poor are forced to wear hempen cloth, and the ſkins of beaſts. The ſalaries of the mandarins are paid only in rice, and they claim no property in the land, but every one occupies as much as is ſufficient to maintain his family. The arms of the ſoldiers are croſs-bows, and very long ſabres, which are very plain, and without ornament. Their puniſhments are very mild; however, thoſe who abuſe their parents are puniſhed capitally by beheading. For other conſiderable crimes they are whipt, or baniſhed into the adjacent iſlands.

The trade of Corea conſiſts in cotton and other paper, pencils made with the hair of a wolf's tail, ginſeng, gold, ſilver, iron, yellow varniſh, which, when laid on, looks like gold; fowls with tails a yard long; little horſes or ponies, about three feet high; ſable ſkins, caſtor, and rock ſalt. This is the moſt we can ſay with any certainty concerning this country, for though there is an account given by Dutchmen who were ſhipwrecked here, yet the whole has ſo much the air of a fable, that there is no depending on any thing they ſay.

CORELLI, a celebrated Italian muſician, whoſe compoſitions are juſtly admired. He was ſo charmed with the character and abilities of our famous Harry Purcel, that he is ſaid to have declared, that he was the only thing worth ſeeing in England. Accordingly he reſolved on a journey hither to viſit him; but ſome ſay he died on the road; while others maintain that he ended his days at Rome, about the year 1733.

CORFE CASTLE, a borough town in Dorſetſhire, with a market on Thurſdays. It takes its name from a ſtrong caſtle, belonging to the crown, that ſtood there, but is now ruined.

ruined. It is governed by a mayor and aldermen, and ſends two members to parliament. It has two fairs, May 12, and October 19, for hogs and toys. It is twenty-one miles eaſt of Dorcheſter, and one hundred and twenty-one weſt of London. Long. 2. 8. W. Lat. 50. 33. N.

CORFU, an iſland in the Ionian ſea, at the mouth of the gulph of Venice, formerly called Corcyra and Phæacia, famous for the gardens of Alcinous. It is the bulwark of Chriſtendom againſt the Turks, it being well fortified, and having fifty caſtles, and fifty thouſand inhabitants. The ſoil is fruitful, and produces a great deal of wine, olives, and ſeveral other fruits, particularly figs, which are exceeding good. The principal city is Corfu, beſides which there is Caſſopo, which has been remarkable for the temple of Jupiter Caſſius. There is now a little church with the picture of the Virgin Mary, which they pretend is a great worker of miracles. The Palæopoli, the ancient metropolis of this iſland, was built on a cape, to the ſouth of the city, from which it is ſeparated by a little bay. The ruins yet remaining ſhow that it has been a great city. But the place on which it ſtood is now overgrown with olive-trees, only there is here and there an old church ſtill remaining. Three or four miles to the weſt there is a plain, watered with ſeveral brooks, which renders it very fertile. The gardens abovementioned are ſuppoſed to have been on this ſpot. The inhabitants are of the Greek church, and the Venetians ſend them a governor and magiſtrates, which are changed every two years. The Turks have often attempted to take it, but hitherto without ſucceſs.

CORFU, a city of the iſland of Corfu, belonging to the Venetians, about twelve miles from the city of Butrinto, in Epirus. It is a large place, and is well fortified with walls to the ſouth, where there are two fortreſſes, one to the eaſt, and the other to the weſt. There are no fortifications on the ſide of the haven, nor are they neceſſary. Here the Venetian general of the Levant reſides, under whom are the proveditors of Zante, Cephalonia, &c. To the weſt there is a great ſquare, called the Eſplanade, where a large ſtreet begins, which runs along the weſt ſide of the city. On the right hand of this ſtreet is the cathedral church, dedicated to St. Spiridion, whoſe body they pretend to have, and which performs great miracles, if you will believe the prieſts. The biſhop is not of the Greek, but the Roman church; but the Greeks have a protopapa or prieſt of their own. The church is enriched with ſilver lamps, and one of gold, given by a gentleman of the city. The inhabitants of Corfu are very revengeful, never forgiving an injury, which cauſes the quarrels between families to be hereditary. There is always a garriſon here of four thouſand men. The Turks attempted to take it in 1716, but they were forced to raiſe the ſiege with the loſs of eighteen thouſand men. Long. 19. 48. E. Lat. 39. 50. N.

CORIA, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Leon, and province of Eſtramadura, towards the confines of Portugal, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the little river Alagon, in a very fertile plain. There is nothing remarkable but the cathedral church, except at a little diſtance a river without a bridge, and a bridge without a river. This was cauſed by an earthquake, which turned the channel of the river another way. It is twenty-five miles ſouth-weſt of Placentia, twenty-five north-eaſt of Alcantara, and one hundred and twenty ſouth-weſt of Madrid. Long. 6. 46. W. Lat. 39. 59. N.

CORICIUS (JOHN) gained great reputation by his generoſity to men of letters. He made them meet often in his garden, and gave all the poets whom Leo the Tenth's liberality had invited to Rome, an opportunity to ſhew their wit, by eſtabliſhing poetical games, which were celebrated every year on St. Anne's day. But on the taking of the city of Rome in 1527, he fell into the hands of the ſoldiers, after which he was reduced to great want, and at laſt died at Verona, overwhelmed with grief.

CORINNA, a Grecian lady, celebrated for her beauty and poetic talents, was, according to the common opinion, born at Theſpi, a city of Bœotia. Her verſes were ſo eſteemed by the Greeks, that they gave her the name of the Lyric Muſe. She lived in the time of Pindar, about four hundred and ſeventy-four years before the Chriſtian æra, and was the diſciple of Myrtis, another Grecian lady.

CORINNUS, a Greek poet, who, according to Suidas, was more ancient than Homer. He is ſaid to have been the diſciple of Palamedes, and to have written in verſe, the Hiſtory of the Siege of Troy, and the War of Dardanus. It is alſo added that he uſed in his poems the Doric letters, invented by Palamedes; and that Homer made great advantage of his verſes; but the whole is fabulous.

CORINTH, a city of Turky, in Europe, in the Morea, ſeated on an Iſthmus, between the gulphs of Lepanto and Engia. It was formerly one of the moſt important cities of Greece, not only on account of its antiquity, for it was founded many years before the city of Rome; but from its ſituation on the paſſage between Greece and the Morea; from the city of Acro-Corinthus, which is built on a rock almoſt inacceſſible; from its havens on the gulphs of Lepanto and Engia; from its magnificent temple dedicated to Venus; from its riches and its architects, ſculptors, and painters. It was at firſt governed by kings, but was afterwards a republic, when it was entirely ruined by a Roman conſul, in the year of Rome 607. It was rebuilt by Julius Cæſar, and after Chriſtianity was planted there, became an archiepiſcopal ſee. But it was ruined a ſecond time by the Goths, and is now ſo much reduced, that it does not contain above one thouſand five hundred ſouls. However, the houſes have fine gardens, wherein citron and orange trees are planted. Where the houſes ſtand cloſeſt together there is a bazar, which is but an indifferent place. The avenue to the Acro-Corinthus, as the citadel was formerly called, is very ſteep, and the paſſage narrow, with an entrance through two gates. It contains three moſques, with their minarets, and five or ſix little Greek churches, whereof that of St. Nicholas is the metropolitan. From the top of the gulphs of Lepanto and Engia there is a very fine proſpect of mount Helicon, Parnaſſus, the fields of Sycion, Athens, and the iſlands of Coluri, Egina, and St. George. This is a place of refuge for the Turks, when they are perſecuted by pirates. The walls which follow the windings of the rock are about three miles in circumference. Towards the top of the eminence is a very fine ſpring, formerly called Pyrene, where Bellerophon took the Muſes' horſe Pegaſus, while he was drinking.

The town is to the north and north-weſt of this mountain, and contains two moſques and a Greek church, where the metropolitan of Corinth reſides. The inhabitants have little devotion and leſs learning; for there is ſcarce one of them who underſtands enough ancient Greek to read the New Teſtament; and they have ſo little regard for the Chriſtian religion, that any trifling diſguſt will make them turn Mohommedans, not excepting the papas or prieſts themſelves. The country is full of villages, and produces wheat, barley, olives, excellent oil, wool, cattle, and wine. It was taken from the Venetians by Mahomet II. but they retook it in 1687. However, in 1715, the Turks got it into their hands again, and have kept it ever ſince. It is forty miles weſt of Athens, ten miles ſouth of Stiva or Thebes, and ſixty-ſix north-by-eaſt of Miſitra, which ſtands near the ruins of ancient Lacedæmon. Long. 23. 10. E. Lat. 38. 14. N.

The iſthmus of Corinth is a rock of land which joins the Morea to Greece: it is about ſix miles over from the gulph of Lepanto to that of Engia. Several attempts were made by Julius Cæſar, Caligula, and Nero, to cut through it to make an iſland of the Morea, but without ſucceſs. Afterwards a wall was built a-croſs it, which was thrown down by Amurath II. and repaired by the Venetians, but Mahomet II. demoliſhed it a ſecond time.

CORIO, (BERNARDINE) an hiſtorian of the fifteen century; was born of an illuſtrious family at Milan, in the year 1460. He was ſecretary of ſtate to that duchy; and the duke Lewis Sforza, appointed him to write the hiſtory of Milan. He died in 1500. The beſt edition of his hiſtory of Milan is that of 1503, in folio. It is printed in Italian, and is very ſcarce.

CORIOLANUS, (CAIUS MARCIUS) a celebrated Roman general, who performed very ſignal ſervices for his country. He took Corioli, a town of the Volſci, in the four hundred and ninety-third year before the birth of Chriſt, on which he obtained the name of Coriolanus. It is ſaid that he would receive no other reward, but only a horſe, and the permiſſion of giving liberty to a captain, who had been his landlord when he was in his country. Some time after he was charged with exciting ſeditions, and was baniſhed by the tribune Decius. He then went over to the Volſci, headed their army, and came and encamped four miles from Rome. The Romans ſeveral times ſent ambaſſadors to deſire a peace, and to conjure him not to ruin the republic; but he remained inflexible, and was not to be prevailed upon by all their intreaties: but at laſt he ſuffered himſelf to be moved by the entreaties of Volumna his mother, and his wife Peturia, who came, followed by all the Roman ladies in tears. He then marched back, and was ſoon after murdered by the Volſci, about the four hundred and ninetieth year before the Chriſtian æra; the Roman ladies went into mourning, and a temple was built on the place where his blood was ſpilt.

CORK, a county of Ireland, in the province of Munſter, and the largeſt in that kingdom. It is bounded by Waterford on the eaſt, by Kerry on the weſt, where it is alſo waſhed by the ſea, by Limerick on the north, and by the ocean on the ſouth and ſouth-eaſt. It is eighty-five miles in length, and fifty in breadth; but it is of a very irregular form. The country is partly woody, partly fenny, and partly mountainous; yet it has ſome good towns, and abounds in fine rivers and harbours. It gives the title of earl to the noble family of Boyle. The lower part of the county is watered by the river Saveren, and the upper by Broadwater or Blackwater. A copper mine has lately been diſcovered near Cork, which is likely to turn to great account. It ſends twenty-ſix members to parliament, two for the county, and the reſt for the towns. The principal towns are Cork, Kinſale, Youghall, and Bandon-bridge.

CORK, the capital city of the county of Cork, in the province of Munſter, in Ireland, with a biſhop's ſee. It is a large populous and wealthy town, of an oval form, enclоſed with walls, and by a channel of the river Lee, which alſo croſſes it. A great many Engliſh proteſtants have ſettled here, who have been very induſtrious, and have made ſuch great improvements, that it is the richeſt city in Ireland except Dublin. It is governed by a mayor, aldermen, and ſheriffs, and is, with its liberties, about three miles round. It ſtands about fifteen miles up the river, at the mouth of which there is a harbour, two miles broad. It has two gates, the north and the ſouth. The cathedral and the red abbey are on the ſouth-ſide of the town, and St. Francis' abbey and Shandon church on the north ſide; and near the river there is a cuſtom-houſe, and a ſtore-houſe. It is the chief port in the kingdom for buſineſs, and there are great quantities of beef, butter, and tallow ſhipped off here for divers parts; for a great number of veſſels bound to our plantations come here to be victualled. It made a brave defence againſt the rebels in 1641, and in 1691, it was taken by the duke of Marlborough for king William, when the duke of Grafton was killed before it. Great ſhips ride ſix miles below the city, but ſmall veſſels come up to the quay. It is forty-ſix miles ſouth of Limerick, and one hundred and twenty four ſouth-weſt of Dublin. Long. 8. 35. W. Lat. 51. 40. N.

CORMANDEL, or COROMANDEL, (the coaſt of) is part of the eaſtern coaſt of the peninſula of India on this ſide the Ganges, being about three hundred miles in length, and two hundred and forty in breadth, having Golconda on north, Viſiapour on the weſt, Madura on the ſouth, and the ſea on the eaſt. However, ſome extend it as far ſouth as Cape-Comorin, and then it will be five hundred and forty miles long, and therefore I ſhall juſt mention the towns along this tract, referring to a more particular deſcription in their proper places. The firſt town we meet with, proceeding from north to ſouth, is Pettipoly, which has a good harbour, where the Engliſh and Dutch had factories, but it is now forſaken: however, the printed and dyed ſtuffs of this place are highly valued. Carrera lies upon a large river, and is noted for a plant uſed in dying. Paliacate is at the mouth of a river of the ſame name, and is the chief factory of the Dutch. Fort St. George or Madraſs, belongs to the Engliſh. St. Thomas was ſo called by the Portugueſe, and was a conſiderable place, but is now reduced, there being no European factory there. It is inhabited by weavers and dyers. Coblon is the place where the Oſtend company intended to ſettle. Conymere was an Engliſh factory, till they purchaſed Fort St. David's. Pondicherry was the principal factory of the French. Gingi is a fortified inland town, and very large. Cindambaran is remarkable for its ſtately pagods. Fort St. David's is a factory of the Engliſh, called by the Indians Tegapatan. Porto Novo, the Dutch have or had a factory here. Tranquebar, a ſettlement of the Danes. Negapatan, belonging to the Dutch. Tanjaor, an inland town, and the capital of a principality. Madura has magnificent pagods, with gilt turrets. Tichera Pali has a pagod ſurrounded with ſeven walls, which the pagans have in the higheſt veneration. Tutacorin, a Dutch factory. Manapaar, another Dutch factory. Penapatan, a conſiderable town. Atoor and Ariepati are the chief towns of a kingdom called Morava, whoſe chief trade is in fiſh.

The religion of this country is pagan, with ſome Mahometans in the north, and Portugueſe converts to Chriſtianity in many places. The pagan men and women in general go naked, the peaſants and fiſhermen having hardly any covering. But the richer ſort are ſwaddled with a piece of ſtuff about their middles and heads. The women wear flowered ſilk or cotton aprons, with necklaces and bracelets, as alſo rings in their noſes and ears. All their upper parts are otherwiſe naked, nor have they any covering for their head, feet or legs. Their houſes are little low huts, but the pagods and temples are magnificent, and their idols monſtrous. The cuſtom of the womens burning themſelves with their huſband is prevalent in thoſe parts, at leaſt when they are under a government that will allow it. Their looms for weaving ſilks, cottons, and muſlins, are very curious; and ſome think they have the fineſt manufactures of this kind in all India. This country was conquered by, and is ſubject to the great Mogul.

CORMERY, a town of France, in Touraine, pleaſantly ſituated on the river Indre, with a Benedictine abbey. It is eight miles from Tours. Long. 3. 18. W. Lat. 5. 30. N.

CORNARIUS, or HAGUENBOT, (JOHN) a celebrated German phyſician, born at Zwickow, in Saxony. His preceptor made him change his name of Haguenbot to that of Cornarius, under which he is moſt known. At twenty years of age he taught grammar, and explained the Greek and Latin poets and orators to his ſcholars, and at twenty-three was licentiate in medicine. He found fault with moſt of the remedies provided by the apothecaries; and obſerving, that the greateſt part of the phyſicians taught their pupils only what is to be found in Avicenna, Raſis, and the other Arabian phyſicians, he carefully ſought for the writings of the beſt phyſicians of Greece, and employed about fifteen years in tranſlating them into Latin, eſpecially the works of Hippocrates, Aëtius, Eginetes, and a part of thoſe of Galen; meanwhile he practiſed phyſic with reputation at Zwickow, Francfort, Marpurg, Nordhauſen, and Gena, where he died of an apoplexy, on the 16th of March, 1558, at fifty-eight years of age. He alſo wrote ſome medicinal treatiſes, and publiſhed editions of ſome poems of the ancients on medicine and botany, and tranſlated ſome of the works of the fathers, particularly thoſe of Baſil, and a part of thoſe of Epiphanius.

CORNARO, (LEWIS) a writer of the ſixteen century, of the illuſtrious houſe of Cornaro at Venice. He wrote a book on the advantages of ſobriety, which was tranſlated into Latin by Voſſius, and has ſince been tranſlated into Engliſh, French, &c. Cornaro practiſed ſo well the advice he gave in that work, that during a long life, he felt no diſorder, either of body or mind. He died at Padua in 1665, at above an hundred years of age.

Mark Cornaro, one of his anceſtors, was doge of Venice, and took the iſle of Candia. There have been ſeveral other doges of Venice of the ſame family; and a queen of Cyprus, named Catherine Cornaro, in the fifteenth century.

CORNARO, (HELENA LUCRETIA) a learned Venetian lady, was the daughter of Gio Baptiſta Cornaro, and very early made an extraordinary progreſs in the languages and the ſciences. After having ſtudied many years, ſhe took her degrees at Padua, and was, perhaps, the firſt lady that ever was made a doctor. She was likewiſe admitted of the univerſity of Rome, where they conferred upon her the title of the Humble, as ſhe had at Padua that of the Unalterable; titles which, it is ſaid, ſhe deſerved, ſince her learning was far from inſpiring her with vanity, nor was any thing capable of diſturbing that calmneſs of ſpirit with which ſhe applied to her ſtudies. She made a a vow of perpetual virginity, and ſpent her whole time between ſtudy and devotion, except when ſhe was obliged to receive viſits; for all the people of rank who paſſed through Venice, were more ſolicitous to ſee her, than any of the curioſities of that ſuperb city. At length her prodigious attachment to books, eſpecially thoſe written in Greek and Hebrew, impaired her conſtitution, and falling ill, ſhe died in the beginning of the year 1683. The news of her death no ſooner reached Rome, than the academicians called Inſecondi, who had formerly admitted her of their ſociety, not only made innumerable odes and epitaphs on that occaſion, but had a funeral ſolemnity to her honour, which was conducted with the greateſt pomp and magnificence; and a deſcription of it was afterwards publiſhed, and dedicated to the moſt ſerene republic of Venice. The whole city flocked together to ſee it, and one of the academicians made a funeral oration, in which he expatiated with all the pomp of Italian eloquence, on her great and valuable qualities.

CORNEILLE, (PETER) a celebrated French poet, born at Rouen, on the ſixth of June, 1606. An affair of gallantry occaſioned his writing his firſt piece, intitled, Melite, which had prodigious ſucceſs. Corneille, encouraged by the applauſe of the public, wrote the Cid, and the other tragedies that have immortalized his name. In his dramatic works he diſcovers a majeſty, a ſtrength and elevation of genius, ſcarce to be found in any other of the French poets, and, like our immortal Shakeſpeare, ſeems better acquainted with nature, than the rules of art. Corneille was received into the French academy in 1647, and died dean of that academy in 1684, aged ſeventy-eight. Beſides his dramatic pieces, he wrote a tranſlation, in French verſe, of the Imitation of Jeſus Chriſt, &c. The beſt edition of his works is that of 1682, in 4 vols 12mo.

CORNEILLE (THOMAS) brother of the former, was a member of the French Academy and of that of Inſcriptions. He diſcovered in his youth a great inclination to poetry, and at length publiſhed ſeveral dramatic pieces, in five volumes duodecimo, ſome of which were applauded by the public, and acted with ſucceſs. He alſo wrote, 1. A Tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, and of ſome of Ovid's Epiſtles. 2. Remarks on Vauglas. 3. A Dictionary of Arts, two volumes folio; and, 4. An univerſal, geographical, and hiſtorical Dictionary, in three volumes folio. Theſe works are well wrote.

CORNEILLE (MICHAEL) a celebrated painter, was born at Paris, in the year 1642, and was inſtructed by his father, who was himſelf a painter of great merit. Having gained a prize at the academy, young Corneille obtained a penſion from Lewis XIV. and was ſent to Rome, where that prince had founded a ſchool for young artiſts of genius. Having ſtudied there ſome time, he gave up his penſion, and applied to the antique with great care, and is ſaid to have equalled Carache in drawing; but in colouring he was deficient. Upon his return from Rome, he was choſen profeſſor in the academy of Paris, and was employed by the above prince in all the great works he was carrying on at Verſailles and Trianon, where are ſtill to be ſeen ſome noble efforts of his genius.

CORNELIA, an illuſtrious Roman lady, the daughter of Scipio Africanus, and the wife of the conſul Septimus Gracchus, ſeventy-ſeven years before the Chriſtian æra, was diſtinguiſhed by her learning and virtue. A lady ſhewing her jewels, and deſiring that ſhe, in her turn, would let her ſee her's, Cornelia preſented to her her children, ſaying, that ſhe conſidered them as her only treaſure, ſince ſhe had educated them with care, that they might be of ſervice to their country.

CORNELIA, the daughter of Cinna, and the wife of Julius Cæſar, by whom he had Julia, who was married to Pompey. Cæſar had ſuch an affection for her, that he himſelf made her funeral oration, and on her account recalled Cinna, her brother, from baniſhment, about the forty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra.

CORNELIA (MAXIMILLA) a chaſte and virtuous veſtal, whom Domitian cauſed to be interred alive, under the pretence of her having had a criminal commerce with Ceber, a Roman knight. The Romans admired the modeſty and intrepidity with which ſhe behaved at her death.

CORNELIUS (St.) biſhop of Rome, ſucceeded Fabian, on the 30th of April 251. He ſuffered under the perſecution which was revived under Gallus and Voluſius, and was baniſhed to a place called Centumcellæ, where he died on the 14th of December, 252. There are two of his letters ſtill extant among thoſe of St. Cyprian. He was ſucceeded by St. Lucius.

CORNELIUS NEPOS. See NEPOS.

CORNELIUS (CORNELIUS) of Haerlem, was the ſon of Peter Cornelius, a ſkilful painter. He was born in the year 1562, and, though he had never been in Italy, drew a great many very fine pieces, and bred up good diſciples. He joined with Charles Van Mander in erecting an academy of painting at Haerlem, about the year 1595.

CORNELLII (LUCAS) a painter who excelled both in oil and miniature, was the ſon and ſcholar of Cornelius Engelbert, but was reduced ſo low as to ſupport himſelf by being a cook at Leyden; but hearing of the encouragement given to painters by king Henry VIII. he came to England with his wife and ſeven or eight children, and was made his majeſty's painter. Some of his works are ſtill preſerved at Leyden, particularly the ſtory of the woman taken in adultery. His chief performances extant in England are at Penſhurſt.

CORNET, a caſtle in the iſle of Guernſey, belonging to the Engliſh, though by the coaſt of France. Long. 2. 40. W. Lat. 49. 40. N.

CORNETO, a town of Italy, in the Patrimony of St. Peter, with a biſhop's ſee, is ſeated on the river Marle, three miles from the ſea, twenty ſouth-weſt of Viterbo, and thirty-eight north-weſt of Rome. Long. 11. 43. E. Lat. 42. 15. N.

CORNUTUS, a Stoic philoſopher, was born in Africa, and was preceptor to the poet Perſeus; but was put to death, by Nero's order, about the year 54.

CORNWAL, the moſt weſterly county of England, is bounded by the ſea on the north, ſouth, and weſt, and on the eaſt by the river Tamar, which parts it from Devonſhire. This is a mountainous country, and yet ſome parts of it near the ſea are tolerably fertile, being enriched with a ſea-weed called ore-wood, and a fat kind of ſea ſand. The air in general is very healthy, being kept clear by the frequent winds; but the ſpring is more backward, and the air more temperate than in other parts in the ſame latitude; likewiſe the autumnal fruits are later, and the harveſt more backward: however, they have the advantage of milder winters, the ſnow never lying long on the ground. The worſt thing relating to the weather is the ſtormy winds, which ſometimes do a great deal of damage. The middle part of this county is not very well cultivated, except near the towns, the land being over run with heaths.

In the moors and waſte grounds, they find a ſtone called the moor-ſtone, which is of a whitiſh colour, containing many glittering particles, is very hard, and of great uſe in building, it being proof againſt all ſorts of weather. It is commonly employed for facing windows, doors, and chimnies. The pantuan ſtone is like a grey marble, and is dug out of the ſea-cliffs. They have likewiſe caracloufe, which is a ſtone as black as jet, and free-ſtone out of the inland quarries. They have three ſorts of ſlate for covering houſes; the blue, the ſage-leaf, and the grey. They make lime with a ſort of marble, and burn it with furze.

But the moſt remarkable production of this county, is the tin, which is either got near the ſurface of the earth, which they call ſtream works, or by digging of mines of a vaſt depth in the mountains. After it is brought above ground, in the ſtone or ore, they break it in pieces with hammers, and then carry it to the ſtamping-mill; from thence it is carried to the crazing, where it is bruiſed to a fine powder; when this is waſhed, it is ſent to the blowing-mill, where it is melted into pigs of three or four hundred weight. Laſtly, it is carried to the coining-houſe, where it is weighed, and tried whether it be ſoft or hard, after which it is ſtamped with the duchy ſtamp, and the price ſet. The towns that have the privilege of coining are Helſtone, Truro, Leſtwithiel, Leſkard, and Penzance. The times for ſtamping are Midſummer and Michaelmas. Thoſe that are not ready, and have it done at Michaelmas or Lady-day, muſt pay four-pence per hundred for the ſtamp.

Theſe mines have been diſcovered a great while ago, but how long is uncertain. They are mentioned in Diodorus Siculus, who lived in the time of Julius Cæſar; and ſome ſay the Phœnicians traded here for tin much earlier. However, they ſeem to have been neglected afterwards, or at leaſt not greatly improved till the time of Henry III. who having made his brother Richard, earl of Cornwall, gave encouragement to the tinners, and received a conſiderable revenue from them. After this, ſeveral regulations were made for conducting the tin mines, which were confirmed and enlarged by Edward III. He divided the body of tinners into four parts, denominated from the place where the tin is wrought, viz. Foymore, Blackmore, Tiwarnell, and Penrith. Beſides, he placed a general warden or overſeer over all the reſt, who was to be ſupreme judge both in law and equity, from whom there is no appeal but to the king and council. He has power to appoint a ſub-warden over every company, who ſhall determine all controverſies between the tinners themſelves or foreigners, in matters relating to their trade and dealings; but from theſe there lies an appeal to the lord warden, before it can be moved to the king. Theſe are called ſtannary courts and ſtannary judgments. The cauſe is tried by a jury of ſix tinners, according to whoſe verdict, the warden, or his deputy, pronounces judgment; but in matters of great importance; the lord warden, or his deputy, generally impannels a jury of twenty-four principal tinners, ſix out of every quarter, returned by the mayors of the four ſtannary towns, and their verdict binds the whole body. The goal for offenders in theſe cauſes is kept at Leſtwithiel, and the office is annexed to the comptrollerſhip.

The ore called mundick was thought by the tinners to be a ſort of earth, from which tin was generated. As it contained tin, this was ſeparated from it with great care, by evaporating the other part, which went off in a loathſome ſtinking ſmoke; but this was a bad practice; for upon trial it yields good copper, which makes a conſiderable return. This mundick contains poiſonous, perhaps arſenical, qualities; for its ſteam ſometimes ſuffocates the miners; and yet the water which runs from the mundick ore is an excellent remedy for wounds; but the water that has waſhed the ore after it is burnt, cauſes a ſore to feſter, and kills the fiſh in any river it falls into.

The inhabitants of this county are robuſt, ſtout, and delight in manly exerciſes, ſuch as wreſtling, hurling, &c. which enable them to carry great burdens. Many people live to a great age here, ſome having attained one hundred and thirty years. The language in general is Engliſh, except two or three pariſhes at the Land's End. The animals are the ſame as in other parts of England, only their ſheep have no horns. Their cows and oxen are ſmall, but their fleſh is ſweet. Their horſes are low, but good travellers in this rough hilly country; however, they breed mules, becauſe they will live on hard fare and carry great burdens. They have many otters, badgers, martens, and foxes, which ſerve as game for gentlemen.

The rivers have variety of fiſh, as trout, peal, ſoals, flukes, plaice, bret, whitings, ſmelts, and many others; but the moſt advantageous fiſh that come upon the coaſt are the pilchards, which appear in vaſt ſhoals, from July to November, and are caught in incredible quantities. The country people attend this fiſhing with horſes and panniers, and carry them away for ſale as well as their own uſe. The merchants make a great trade of them by ſending them away to foreign markets, after they are ſalted, and packed up. They have multitudes of ſea-fowl, as gulls, ſanderlings, ſea-pies, puffins, curlews, ducks, mallards, teals, wild geeſe, barnacle geeſe, choughs, herons, cranes, and many others. The waters of this country, though full of mines, are ſweet and wholeſome, and very rarely tinged with any mineral taſte. However, they have a ſpring near Penzance, called Madden's Well, which is uſeful in various diſtempers.

In this county, the ancient Britons kept their ground againſt many invaders, much in the ſame manner as Wales, and were a long time governed by their own princes, called earls of Cornwall, till Egbert, the firſt monarch of England, conquered it in 809. It was annexed to the crown, in 1337, by Edward III. who made his ſon, Edward the Black Prince, duke of Cornwall, who was the firſt that was created in England. Ever ſince, the king's eldeſt ſon, is duke of Cornwall without creation. It is computed to be eighty miles long, fifty broad where broadeſt, and two hundred in circumference. It contains twenty-five market-towns, one hundred and ſixty-one pariſhes, and twenty-five thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four houſes, and ſends forty-four members to parliament. The principal towns are Bodmin, Launceſton, and Falmouth.

CORON, a town of Belvidera, in the Morea, part of Turky in Europe, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſtrong by ſituation, for on two ſides it has the gulph of Coron, and on that towards the land there is a craggy mountain; beſides, it is ſurrounded by good walls, flanked with large ſolid towers. It was taken from the Turks by the Venetians in 1685; but ſince that time, the Turks have retaken it. It is ſeated on a ſmall peninſula, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Modon, and thirty-eight ſouth weſt of Miſitra. Long. 22. 15. E. Lat. 36. 36. N.

CORONEL (ALPHONSUS) a great lord of Spain, who ſuſpecting Don Pedro the Cruel, king of Caſtile, formed a party againſt him in Andaluſia, raiſed troops, fortified ſome places, and ſhut himſelf up, in the city of Aguilar. Don Pedro, after having taken ſome other towns, beſieged him in that city, where Coronel defended himſelf very vigorouſly during four months; but at laſt the city was carried by ſtorm, in February, 1353. Coronel was hearing maſs when he was told that the enemies were in the city, notwithſtanding which he continued his devotions till maſs was ended, and then ſhut himſelf up in a tower, where being taken, he was condemned to death for high treaſon.

CORONELLI (VINCENT) a famous geographer, born at Venice. His ſkill in the mathematics having brought him to the knowledge of the count d'Eſtrees, his eminence employed him in making globes for Lewis XIV. With this view Coronelli ſpent ſome time at Paris, and left a great number of globes there, which are eſteemed. In 1685, he was made coſmographer to the republic of Venice, and four years after, public profeſſor of geography. He founded an academy of coſmography at Venice, and died in that city, in December, 1718. He publiſhed above four hundred geographical charts, an Abridgment of Coſmography, ſeveral books on geography, and other works.

CORONIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Phlegyas, was beloved by Apollo, who being informed by a crow, that ſhe favoured a young man of Theſſaly, was ſo exaſperated at her infidelity, that he ſhot her with an arrow; but repenting of what he had done, he delivered her of the child with which ſhe was pregnant, and afterwards changed the feathers of the malicious tale-bearer from white to black.

CORONIS, in fabulous hiſtory, daughter to Coroneus, king of Phocis. This lady ſhunning the importunities of Neptune, and flying to Minerva for ſhelter, that goddeſs transformed her into a daw; but Coronis afterwards rendering herſelf unworthy of her protection by her indiſcreet tattling, ſhe baniſhed her from her preſence.

CORRADINI DE SEZZA (PETER MARCELINUS) a learned civilian and cardinal, born at Sezza, on the 3d of June, 1658, acquired the eſteem and confidence of Clement XI. and died at Rome, on the 8th of February, 1743, aged eighty-three. He was the author of a learned and curious work, entitled Veras Latium profanum & ſacrum, two volumes, folio; and a Hiſtory of Sezza, in quarto.

CORRADO (SEBASTIAN) an Italian grammarian in the ſixteenth century, was born at Caſtello d'Arcetto, between Reggio and Modena. He ſtudied under Baptiſt Egnatius, and afterward taught the Greek and Latin tongues at Reggio, where he formed an academy of polite literature, and at length removed to Bologna, in order to be profeſſor of thoſe languages. He wrote ſeveral works, the moſt eſteemed of which are, Queſtura in qua Ciceronis Vita refertur, which is an excellent performance, and De Linguâ Latinâ. He died on the 18th of Auguſt, 1556.

CORREA DE SA (SALVADOR) a celebrated captain, born at Cadiz, in 1594, of an illuſtrious Portugueſe family. He was governor of Rio Janeiro; he enlarged and embelliſhed the city of St. Sebaſtian, built by his father; founded the city of Pernagua in Braſil, and died at Liſbon in 1680, aged eighty-ſix, after his having diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour in many ſieges and battles.

CORREGGIO, a town of Italy, capital of a province of the ſame name, in the Modeneſe, with a ſtrong caſtle. It was taken by prince Eugene in 1706. It is nine miles north-eaſt of Reggio, and ten north-weſt of Modena. Long. 10. 15. E. Lat. 44. 45. N.

CORREGGIO (ANTONIO DA) a celebrated Italian painter, born at Correggio, from which city he took his name, obtained the admiration of the inhabitants of Parma and Lombardy. His pictures of virgins, ſaints, and infants, are particularly eſteemed, for his performances have a ſoftneſs, and ſuch remarkable graces, as charm all true judges of painting. Raphael's fame tempted him to go to Rome. He conſidered attentively the pictures of that great painter; and after having looked on them a long time without breaking ſilence, at laſt cried, "I am ſtill a painter." Yet all his fine pieces could not draw him out of the extreme poverty in which he was involved, his price being ſmall, and his family very burthenſome. At length, going to Parma, to receive fifty crowns, he was paid in a ſort of copper money, when the joy of having obtained it to carry home to his wife, made him not mind its weight, with which he loaded himſelf in the heat of ſummer, and being to lug it twelve miles on foot, the burthen, the walk, and the weather, threw him into a pleuriſy, of which he died in 1513, at forty years of age.

CORSICA, an iſland in the Mediterranean Sea, between the coaſt of Genoa and Sardinia, from which it is ſeparated by a channel eight miles wide. It is nearly of an oval figure, and is from north to ſouth about one hundred miles in length, forty five in breadth, and two hundred and thirty in circumference. The land is mountainous and rocky; however the vallies produce corn, and the hills fruit, olives, figs, grapes, almonds, and cheſnuts. It has mines of iron, and there is plenty of fiſh on the coaſts, with a great deal of coral. They have all ſorts of cattle and game, and, among the reſt, deer, buffaloes, and pheaſants; the horſes are good, but very mettleſome and fiery. The large foreſts abound with plenty of wood. In the middle of this iſland there is a mountain called Gradaccio, on which there are two lakes, very near each other, which are the ſources of the three principal rivers of this iſland, the Liamon, the Tavignan, and the Lolo. It is divided by the mountains into two great parts, the north and the ſouth.

The principal towns are Baſtia, the capital, ſeated near the ſea, in the north part of the iſland. It has a good caſtle, and is the place of reſidence of the governour and the biſhop. Corte is in the centre of the country, and has a biſhop's ſee. Calvi is an epiſcopal town, ſeated on a peninſula. Adjazzo has a good port. Bonifacio is a trading town, and is well built and fortified. It ſtands on the ſouth part of the iſland, and has a well frequented harbour.

CORSINI (LAUR.) See CLEMENT XII.

CORT (CORNELIUS) one of the moſt celebrated engravers, and moſt excellent deſigners Holland has produced, went to Rome in about the middle of the ſixteenth century, and ſettled there. It was he who taught Auguſtin Caracci to engrave.

CORTATE, a town of India, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, a little north of Cape Comorin. Long. 77. 0. E. Lat. 8. 0. N.

CORTE, a town of Italy, in the iſland of Corſica, with a ſtrong caſtle in the middle of the iſland. It is ſeated on the top of a rock, near the ſources of the rivers Golo, Limone, and Tavignane, and is the common place of reſidence of the biſhop of Aleria. It is twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Calvi, and twenty-eight ſouth-weſt of Baſtia. Long. 9. 20. E. Lat. 42. 12. N.

CORTE (GOTLIEB) profeſſor of law at Leipſic, was born at Beſcow, in the Lower Luſace, on the 28th of February, 1693. He publiſhed among other works, an edition of Salluſt, printed at Leipſic in 1724, in quarto, with notes, which are much eſteemed.

CORTEZ (FERDINAND) a Spaniſh gentleman, a native of Medellin, rendered himſelf famous in the ſixteenth century, under the reign of Charles V. emperor and king of Spain, by the conqueſt of Mexico. He ſet ſail for the Indies in 1504, ſtaid ſome time at St. Domingo, and at length arrived at Cuba; where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery in ſuch a manner, that Diego Velaſquez, governour of that iſland, made him captain-general of the army, deſtined for the conqueſt of new diſcovered countries, but ſoon after revoked his grant. Cortez however ſailed from St. Jago, on the 18th of November, 1518, provided for his ſmall army at Havannah, and the following year landed at Tabaſco in Mexico. He then defeated the Indians; founded founded Vera Cruz; made himſelf maſter of the province of Tlaſcala, and marched directly towards Mexico, the capital of that empire. After ſeveral combats, Motezuma, emperor of Mexico, was obliged to receive him into the city. Cortez ſoon after made him priſoner, forced him to reſign his dominions to the emperor Charles V. and obtained from him immenſe riches. Diego Velaſquez, governor of the iſland of Cuba, envying Cortez his extraordinary ſucceſs, reſolved to traverſe his deſigns, and ſent againſt him twelve veſſels, commanded by Pamphilius de Narbaes; but Cortez defeated him, and having obtained freſh ſuccours from Spain, rendered himſelf maſter of all Mexico; and took priſoner Guatimoſin, the ſucceſſor of Motezuma, and the laſt emperor of the Mexicans. Charles V. rewarded his ſervices, by giving him the valley of Guaxaca, in Mexico, which he erected into a marquiſate. Cortez died in Spain, on the 2d of December, 1554, aged ſixty-three.

CORTONE, an antient town of Tuſcany, with a biſhop's ſee, and a famous univerſity. It is ſeated between the Lake Perugi, and the town Aretino, on a high mountain. It is thirty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Sienna, eighteen ſouth-weſt of Citta del Caſtello, and twenty north-weſt of Perugia. Long. 12. 2. E. Lat. 43. 18. N.

CORTONA (PETER DE) See BERETTONI.

CORVAY, a town of Weſtphalia, with an antient abbey, of which the abbot is the ſovereign, and a prince of the empire. It is ſeated on the river Weſer, twenty-three miles eaſt of Paderborn, and thirty-five north of Caſſel. Long. 8. 5. E. Lat 51. 50. N.

CORVO, one of the moſt weſterly iſlands of the Azores, in the Atlantic Ocean, ſeated to the north of Flores. It is not above ſeven miles in compaſs, and has only two or three ſmall villages; but is remarkable for producing beautiful flowers. Long. 32. E. Lat. 40. N.

CORUNNA, a conſiderable maritime town of Spain, ſeated on a peninſula, where there is a very good harbour. It is commonly called the Groyne by the Engliſh, and is perfectly round, and well fortified in the antient taſte. The entrance into the harbour is defended by two forts. There is a tower built by the Romans, which is a bold, ſolid, ſtructure. A great number of the fiſh, called ſardins, are caught on this coaſt. It is fifteen miles north-weſt of Betancos, and thirty-eight north of Compoſtella. Long. 9. 20. W. Lat. 43. 20. N.

CORYATE (THOMAS) a traveller of a very ſingular character, in the reign of king James I. He had a miſhapen head, like that of Therſites; but the cone ſtood in a different poſition, the picked part being before. He had learning, but wanted judgment, which can alone render it valuable. He travelled over a great part of Europe on foot, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by walking nine hundred miles with one pair of ſhoes, which, he tells us, he got mended at Zurich. He afterwards travelled into the Eaſt, where he ſeems to have been as frugal in his food as he was in ſhoes, for in a letter to his mother, he ſays he ſpent but three pounds, living reaſonably well for about two pence a-day. He ſometimes imprudently ventured his life by publicly declaring Mahomet to be an impoſtor. He delivered an oration to the mogul in the Perſian language, and ſpoke that of Indoſtan with ſuch volubility, that he was an over-match for a notorious ſcold in her mother-tongue. The moſt remarkable of his books is intitled Crudities haſtily gobbled up in five Months Travels in France, Savoy, Italy, and Rhetia, Helvetia, ſome parts of High Germany, and the Netherlands, quarto. He was remarkably vain, and before this work are about ſixty copies of verſes, by the poets of that time, who tickled the author's vanity while they made him their jeſt. This book is ſcarce, and ſells at a high price. This gentleman died in the year 1617.

CORYBANTES, in antiquity, prieſts of the goddeſs Cybele, who, inſpired with a ſacred fury, danced up and down, beating on cymbals or brazen drums.

CORYBANTICA, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival kept in honour of the Corybantes.

COSCINOMANCY, Κοσκινομαντεια, in antiquity, the art of divination by means of a ſieve. It was generally practiſed to diſcover thieves, or others ſuſpected of being guilty of a crime: they tied a thread to the ſieve, by which it was ſuſpended, and then having prayed to the gods to direct and aſſiſt them, they repeated the names of the perſons ſuſpected, and he at whoſe name the ſieve moved was thought to have committed the fact.

COSENZA, a city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is the capital of the Hither Calabria, and is ſeated in a fruitful plain, on the river Grata, twelve miles from the ſea, thirty ſouth-weſt of Roſſano, and one hundred and fifty ſouth-by-eaſt of Naples. Long. 16. 35. E. Lat. 39. 23. N.

COSIMO (PIETRO) an eminent painter, was ſo called from Coſimo Roſelli, for whom he worked a long time, chiefly in the Vatican, where Roſelli was employed by Sixtus IV. It being obſerved that the ſcholar's paintings exceeded thoſe of his maſter, he obtained many diſciples, among whom were Andrea del Sarto, and Franceſco da Sangalla. He loved ſolitude, and his way of living was very extraordinary, for he was ſo eager about his buſineſs, that he would often forget to eat or drink. He had a great averſion to hearing the ringing of bells, the crying of children, and monks ſinging pſalms; and it is ſaid he was ſo fearful of thunder, that a conſiderable time after the clap was over, he would be found ſhrunk up in a corner, wrapped up in his cloak. He died of a paralepſy in 1521, in the eightieth year of his age. Pietro Coſimo excelled in painting bachanals, monſters, and other uncommon figures.

COSIN (JOHN) biſhop of Durham, was born at Norwich on the 30th of November, 1594, and educated at Cambridge. In 1624 he was made prebendary of the cathedral church of Durham. The next year he was collated to the archdeaconry of the eaſt riding in the church of York. In 1634 he was elected maſter of Peter-houſe; in 1640 he ſerved the office of vice-chancellor for the univerſity of Cambridge, and the ſame year was made dean of Peterborough, but was ſoon after proſecuted by the houſe of commons for ſuperſtition and innovations in the church of Durham; and being at length deprived of all his preferments, he, in 1643, withdrew to Paris, but at the reſtoration of king Charles II. took poſſeſſion again of his preferments and dignities, and in 1660 was conſecrated biſhop of Durham. He laid out prodigious ſums in repairs and ornaments in the caſtle of Durham; built and endowed two hoſpitals, and founded eight ſcholarſhips at Cambridge, beſides a great number of other benefactions. He wrote 1. A Collection of private Devotions. 2. A ſcholaſtical Hiſtory of the Canon of the Holy Scriptures, which is his principal work, and ſeveral others. This worthy and benevolent divine died on the 15th of January 1671-2, in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age.

COSLIN, a town of ducal Pomerania in Germany, in the duchy of Caſſubia. At this place the ſupreme court of juſtice is held. It is ſeated on the river Neſslebach, twelve miles eaſt of Colberg. Long. 16. 20. E. Lat. 54. 10. N.

COSMO I. great duke of Tuſcany, was of the houſe of Medicis; he took part with the emperor againſt the French, in the wars of Italy; founded the military order of St. Stephen; loved and protected men of learning; founded the univerſity of Piſa, and died in 1574, aged fifty-five.

COSMO II. great duke of Tuſcany, ſucceeded his father Ferdinand in 1609. He was a mild, liberal, and pacific prince, and died in 1621.

COSROES. See CHOSROES.

COSSACKS, a people inhabiting the confines of Poland, Ruſſia, Tartary, and Turky. They are divided into three branches, 1. Koſakki-ſa-Poravi, who dwell near the river Nieſter, and entered into alliance with the Polanders in 1562, but were afterwards brought under the dominion of Ruſſia. Since that time they took the part of Charles XII. king of Sweden, for which reaſon Peter the Great cauſed a great number of them to be maſſacred after the battle of Pultowa. Their country is called the Ukrain. 2. Koſakki-Donſki, who live near the banks of the river Don. They put themſelves under the protection of Ruſſia in 1549. 3. The Koſakki-Jaiki, who inhabit the parts about the river Jaick. Theſe are ſubject to Ruſſia, and are generally at war with the Tartars.

The Coſſacks of the Ukrain, who have been remarkable for their martial enterprizes, have made incurſions into, and plundered Crim Tartary and Natolia, almoſt as far as Conſtantinople, putting all to fire and ſword, bringing home a rich booty, as well as children for ſlaves. They have all ſorts of trades among them, but are particularly expert in preparing ſalt-petre, of which they have great plenty. The women ſpin flax and wool to make cloth for their own uſe; but are all fond of ſtrong liquors, which they drink without moderation. The land is fruitful, and would produce plenty of corn, but they having no vent for it, only ſow enough for their own uſe, and ſcarcely that; for, in a literal ſenſe, they take no thought for the morrow. They profeſs the religion of the Greek church, and are mighty fond of celebrating the feſtivals; but on the faſting-days, which are very numerous, they abſtain from fleſh, and yet take their fill of drinking. However the great men are very tenacious of their liberty, which makes them ſubject to revolt on the leaſt occaſion.

They are of a very ſtrong conſtitution, able to endure heat and cold, hunger and thirſt, and are bold, reſolute, and indefatigable in war, not valuing their lives. In general they are thieves, robbers, and pirates, and will ſtick at no manner of villany to gain their ends. The peaſants are very miſerable, being obliged to work three days a-week for their lords, and to allow them a part of their corn, as well as make them preſents of pullets, hens, capons, and geeſe, at Eaſter, Whitſuntide, and Chriſtmas. In ſhort, the the lords deprive them of part of their money and ſubſtance upon all occaſions, having power not only over their goods but their lives.

Their principal town or city is Kiow, or Kiof, on the Nieſter; and a little below it is a town with a great monaſtery, the uſual reſidence of the patriarch. Near which is a mountain, in which are abundance of bodies embalmed, ſuppoſed to have lain there near ſixteen hundred years. They tell ridiculous ſtories of St. John, whom they affirm is buried there, and of the iron chain wherewith the devil beat St. Anthony. Near the monaſtery is a nunnery for about one hundred nuns, who employ themſelves with their needles, and embroider very well; their dreſs is black, and they have the liberty to go abroad when they pleaſe. On the mountain between Kiow and Piecharoe, there is a monaſtery, the monks of which live on nothing but fiſh. There are other monaſteries and places of ſmall note now, whatever they may have been formerly, which is owing to their frequent wars, wherein they were burnt to the ground. Some of them will be taken notice of in their proper places.

They celebrate their marriages with much feaſting, mirth, and ceremonies, which are continued the next day, if the bride proves a maid, and her ſhift is carried in triumph with a great multitude through the ſtreets. But if no ſigns of virginity appear, they break the pots and veſſels, abuſe the mother, and commit a thouſand extravagancies, ſinging at the ſame time filthy ſongs, and uſing obſcene language, and then they retire home in a diſcontented manner. This has the ſtrongeſt tendency to preſerve the chaſtity of maids, becauſe it keeps them continually on their guard againſt the ſtrongeſt temptations. The women in general are cautious and modeſt while ſober; but they are ſo fond of ſtrong liquors, and are ſo often intoxicated with them, that it is no wonder that they ſhould at thoſe times become more free and complying.

At Eaſter their cuſtoms are ſingular and ridiculous enough; for at the church they put an image of our Saviour into a ſepulchre, and then take it out with great ſolemnity. This done, they all go in their turns and kneel before the biſhop, preſenting him with an egg painted red or yellow, for which he kiſſes all the handſome women, but gives his hand to kiſs to thoſe he does not like. Where there is no biſhop the curate receives theſe offerings. For eight days after this both men and women carry eggs about to give to their friends and acquaintance, which cauſes a great deal of hugging and kiſſing in the open ſtreets. There are other ſilly cuſtoms between the young men and maids at this ſeaſon, which are too trifling to mention. On Eaſter-Monday the men carry preſents to their lord, who in return makes them drunk with ſpirituous liquors, and many drink to ſuch exceſs, that they are not able to get home, but lie in the ſtreets all night, and ſome are actually killed with the debauch.

This country lying low, near the water, they are ſtrangely troubled with fleas and gnats; but their greateſt plague is the locuſts, which ſometimes come in ſuch prodigious ſwarms, that they devour every green vegetable in the country.

The Donſkian Coſſacks are now a mixture of Ruſſians, Turks, and Tartars, who have a governor called Woyſkowoi Ataman, which ſignifies captain of war. Theſe people having committed hoſtilities againſt the Ruſſian empire, were brought under ſubjection by the czar Peter I. After this the czar Peter II. finding them loyal, permitted them to appoint their own general again. In the laſt war between the Turks and the Ruſſians, they did the latter a great deal of ſervice; and they alſo behaved againſt the Swedes and Danes with great bravery. They have an annual aſſembly called Krug, held at Czerkaſkoy, their capital, in the open air, where all cauſes are tried without any formal proceeding in writing. But the ſentences are written down, and the ataman puts his ſign manual to it. The capital executions are performed while the court is ſitting. The firſt of theſe is to put the criminal into a ſack with ſand, and fling him into the water; the ſecond is to tye him to a tree and ſhoot him with arrows: the third is to tie him to a horſe's tail, and drag him along till he is dead. The puniſhment for leſſer crimes is whipping. When they ſerve in the Ruſſian army they come well cloathed and accoutered at their own expence, and each man brings two horſes. They receive no pay except in time of war, and then only ſix rubles a year, with proviſions and plunder. Their exemption from taxes binds them to their maſters, and they are now reckoned a gallant, ſober people. Some of them poſſeſs a thouſand ſheep, and three hundred cows.

The Jaikian Coſſacks are like the former; they have the ſame kind of government, and in time of war receive the ſame pay. In time of peace they live upon fiſhing, and ſend yearly vaſt quantities of ſturgeon and caviar to Moſcow and other places for ſale.

COSSANO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Calabria, with a biſhop's ſee. It is thirty-eight miles north of Coſenza, twenty north-weſt of Roſſano, and one hundred and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Naples. Long. 16. 30. E. Lat. 39. 55. N.

COSSE (ARTUS DE) marſhal of France, and lord of Gonnor, was the ſon of René de Coſſé, lord of Briſſac, in Anjou. In 1552 he was governor of Metz, and defended that city againſt the emperor's army. He at length was made the king's lieutenant at Mariemburg, and in 1567 was made marſhal of France. He was at the battles of St. Denis and Montcontour, and was defeated in 1570, at the battle of d'Arnay le Duc. In 1574 he was confined in the Baſtile, from whence he was releaſed the next year, by means of the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. The marſhal de Coſſe was of great ſervice to that prince, and died at Gonnor, in Anjou, on the 15th of January, 1582.

COSSE (CHARLES DE) marſhal of France, more known by the name of the marſhal de Briſſac, was the eldeſt ſon of Rene de Coſſe, lord of Briſſac. He ſerved in the wars of Naples and Piedmont; diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Perpignan in 1541, and was at length colonel-general of the French light-horſe. He defended Landrecy in 1543, againſt Charles V. defeated the rear-guard of the emperor's army at the raiſing of the ſiege of Guiſe; routed two hundred of the Engliſh at the battle of Meure, near Calais, and was made grand-maſter of the French artillery in 1547. He became marſhal of France in 1550, and after having ſignalized himſelf in Italy by his ſervices, died at Paris, on the 31ſt of December, 1563, aged fifty-ſeven.

He ought not to be confounded with Charles de Coſſe, the youngeſt ſon of the duke of Briſſac, a peer and marſhal of France, who, being governor of Paris, delivered up that city to king Henry IV. on the 22d of March, 1594, and died at Briſſac, in Anjou, in 1621.

COSTA (CHRISTOPHER A) a celebrated botaniſt, of the ſixteenth century, was born in Africa, of a Portugueſe father, and went into Aſia to perfect himſelf in the knowledge of ſimples, where he was taken priſoner, but found means to make his eſcape, and after ſeveral voyages practiſed phyſic at Bourgos. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe on Indian Drugs and Medicines. 2. His Voyages to the Indies. 3. A book in praiſe of women, and other works.

COSTA (MARGARET) was born at Rome, and lived in the ſeventeenth century. She had wit and a genius for poetry, and prepared for the king of France an entertainment which was to be performed on horſeback; the ſubject was a conteſt between Apollo and Mars; but it was never acted: however it is printed with her other poems.

COSTA-BLANCHE (MARIA DE) a learned lady, born at Paris, in the ſixteenth century. She was a perfect miſtreſs of the learned languages, and cultivated the ſtudy of mathematics and philoſophy. To her taſte for this laſt ſcience the French owe the tranſlation of Peter Meſſia's three dialogues in Spaniſh, on the Nature of the Earth, the Sun, and every Thing that appears in the Air.

COSTANZO (ANGELO DI) an Italian hiſtorian and poet, lord of Catalupo, was born about the year 1507, of a noble and ancient family of Naples, and died about 1591. He wrote, 1. A Hiſtory of Naples, from 1250 to 1489, the beſt edition of which is that of Aquila, in 1582, in folio, which is very ſcarce. 2. Italian Poems, which are eſteemed, and have had ſeveral editions in duodecimo.

COSTER (LAURENCE) a citizen of Haerlem, to whom the Dutch attribute the invention of printing, about the year 1440; others ſay that printing was invented at Mentz, by Fauſtus and Scheffer: while others again maintain that we owe this admirable art to John Guttemburg, a ſoldier.

COTA (RODRIGUEZ) a Spaniſh poet, in the ſixteenth century, born at Toledo, was the author of the Tragi-comedia de Caliſto y Melibea, which has been tranſlated into Latin by Gaſpar Barthius, and into French by James de Lavardin. The Spaniards ſet a great value on this performance.

COTATIS, a town of Georgia, in Aſia, capital of Immeretta. It ſtands at the bottom of a hill, on the bank of the river Phaſis, and does not contain above two hundred houſes. At ſome diſtance from the town there is a palace, which was formerly the reſidence of the king, but now of a Turkiſh baſha. The town is open, without walls or fortifications, except the parts next the mountain and the river; for beyond the river there is a high mountain, on which the fortreſs is built, with towers and double walls, which are pretty high. Long. 43. 55. E. Lat. 43. 10. N.

COTBUS, a town of Germany, in Luſatia, is a large place, well peopled. It is ſeated on the river Spree, almoſt in the centre of the country. A colony of French proteſtants is ſettled here, and moſt of the German inhabitants are of the reformed religion. This town has belonged to the houſe of Brandenburg ever ſince the year 1461. The inhabitants brew excellent beer for ſale, and cultivate flax in the adjacent parts. It is ſixty miles ſouth-by-eaſt from Berlin, and fifty-

fifty-five ſouth-eaſt from Wirtemberg. Long. 15. 29. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

COTELERIUS (JOHN BAPTIST) one of the moſt learned men in France, was born at Nimes, in 1628. His father, who was a miniſter, took great pains in his education, and in 1641, when he was but twelve years of age, preſented him before an aſſembly of the clergy, held at Mante, when he explained, not only the Greek New Teſtament, wherever the book was opened, but the Hebrew Bible, and performed before the aſſembly ſome mathematical demonſtrations. The clergy conſidered him as a prodigy of learning, and aſſigned his father a penſion to enable him the more eaſily to continue his education. Cotelerius afterwards ſtudied at Paris, was received into the Sorbonne, and was made profeſſor of the Greek language in the Royal College. He wrote, 1. A Collection of the Monuments of the Fathers who lived in the apoſtolic Times, printed at Paris, in 1672, and reprinted in Holland, in 1698, in two volumes, folio. 2. A Collection of ſeveral Monuments of the Greek Church, three volumes, quarto; to theſe two works he added a good Latin verſion, and ſhort, but judicious notes. 3. A Latin Tranſlation of Four of St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies, and of that father's Commentaries on Daniel. Cotelerius died at Paris, on the 12th of Auguſt, 1686, aged fifty-eight.

COTENTIN, a territory of France, in Lower Normandy, near the ſea. It abounds in paſtures, cattle, and excellent horſes. The inhabitants are lively, cunning, and laborious.

COTES (ROGER) an excellent mathematician and Plumean profeſſor of aſtronomy and experimental philoſophy, in the univerſity of Cambridge, was born at Burbage, in Leiceſterſhire, on the 10th of July, 1682. He early diſcovered an inclination to the mathematics, and having ſtudied at St. Paul's ſchool, and afterwards at Trinity college, Cambridge, in 1705, he was choſen fellow of that college, and was at the ſame time tutor to Anthony, earl of Harold, and the lord Henry de Grey, ſons to the then marquiſs, afterwards duke of Kent, to which noble family he had the honour to be related; and in 1707 he was appointed profeſſor of aſtronomy, in the profeſſorſhip founded by Thomas Plume, D. D. archdeacon of Rocheſter. He publiſhed, in quarto, a ſecond edition of ſir Iſaac Newton's Principia, with all the author's improvements, to which he prefixed an excellent preface. He alſo wrote ſeveral uſeful books, one of which, intitled Harmonia Menſurarum, was not publiſhed till after his deceaſe, which happened in 1716, in the thirty-third year of his age.

COTOLENDI (CHARLES) a writer in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Aix, in Provence, and died at the beginning of the eighteenth century. He was the author of a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. The Life of the Ducheſs of Montmorenci, in octavo. 2. The Life of St. Francis de Salis, quarto. 3. The Voyages of Peter Texeira, tranſlated from the Spaniſh into French, two volumes, duodecimo. 4. A Tranſlation of the Life of Chriſtopher Columbus, two volumes, duodecimo, &c.

COTRONA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Calabria, with a biſhop's ſee. It was formerly a great city, and is at preſent in a pretty good condition, and defended by a citadel. It is ſeated near the mountain Crotona, on the coaſt of the Mediterranean ſea, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of St. Severino. Long. 17. 30. E. Lat. 38. 50. N.

COTTA (MARCUS AURELIUS) was conſul of Rome with Lucullus, in the ſeventy-fourth year before the birth of Chriſt. He made war on Mithridates with but little ſucceſs, and took Heraclea by treachery, on which account he had the name of Ponticus.

Caius Aurelius Cotta, his ſon, was baniſhed from Rome during the wars of Marius and Sylla; but the latter being victorious, Cotta was recalled, and became conſul in the ſeventy-fifth year before the Chriſtian æra.

COTTA (ARUNCULEIUS) a Roman captain under Cæſar, in Gaul, who gave him and Titurius Sabinus the command of a legion that he had ſent into the country of Liege. As ſoon as they were encamped, Ambiorix came to attack them; but not finding the advantage he expected, he gave out that the Gauls had revolted againſt the Romans; Sabinus believed it, though Cotta did not, and ſent ſome of his troops away; when the Gauls ſet upon them in their march, defeated them, and Cotta was killed, in the fifty-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra.

COTTA (CATELLIANUS) diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writing Scholia ad Mediolanenſium Statuta, upon the Laws of the Milaneſe; a ſmall treatiſe concerning the civilians, and a work intitled Memorabilia. He lived in the ſixteenth century.

COTTE (ROBERT DE) an excellent French architect, was born at Paris, in 1657, and became architect in ordinary to the French king, and in 1699 director of the academy of architecture. In 1708 he became firſt architect to the king, and intendant of the royal buildings, gardens, arts, and manufactures. He was honoured with the ribbon of St. Michael, and died at Paris, in 1735. The periſtyle of of Trianon and ſeveral other fine works at Verſailles, Paris, &c. were done by him.

COTTERELL (Sir CHARLES) was the ſon of ſir Clement Cotterell, of Wylsford, in Lincolnſhire, groom-porter to James I. and was, in the time of the interregnum, ſteward to the queen of Bohemia. In 1670 he was created doctor of laws, by the univerſity of Oxford, and became maſter of the ceremonies to Charles II. He poſſeſſed, in an extraordinary degree, the various accompliſhments of a gentleman; and particularly excelled in the knowledge of modern languages. During the exile of his royal maſter, he tranſlated from the French, Caſſandra, the famed romance, which has been ſeveral times printed. He had a principal hand in tranſlating d'Avila's Hiſtory of the Civil Wars of France, from the Italian, and ſeveral pieces of leſs note from the Spaniſh. In 1686 he reſigned his place of maſter of the ceremonies, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles Lodowick Cotterell, eſq. He is celebrated by Mrs. Catharine Philips, under the name of Poliarchus.

COTTERUS (CHRISTOPHER). See KOTTERUS.

COTTIN, or COTIN (CHARLES) canon of Bayeux, almoner to the French king, and one of the forty of the French academy, was born at Paris, and was ſeverely ſatirized by Boileau and Moliere; but was far from being ſo deſpicable a perſon as they have repreſented him. He was ſkilled in the languages; was careſſed by the beſt company; and wrote ſeveral works both in verſe and proſe, the principal of which are, 1. Reflections on the Conduct of Lewis XIV. while he himſelf held the reigns of government. 2. Solomon, or the royal Politician. 3. Theoclea, or the true Philoſophy of the Principles of the World, &c. He died at Paris, in 1682.

COTTON (Sir ROBERT) bart a very eminent antiquarian, born at Denton, near Connington, in Huntingdonſhire, on the 22d of January, 1570, and educated at Trinity college, in Cambridge. Afterwards coming to London, he was admitted into a ſociety of antiquaries. Here he proſecuted the ſtudy of antiquities with uncommon ſucceſs, and improving the favourable circumſtances that offered, began in the eighteenth year of his age to gather together ancient records, charters, and other manuſcripts, and left at his death the choiceſt collection of this kind that was ever ſeen in any age or nation. Having, in queen Elizabeth's reign, rendered himſelf eminent for his merit and learning, he was at the acceſſion of king James I. created a knight, and during that whole reign was conſulted as an oracle, by the privy-counſellors, and the reſt of the miniſters, upon every difficult point relating to our conſtitution. In 1608 he was appointed one of the commiſſioners to enquire into the ſtate of the navy; and on the creation of the new order of knights, called baronets, he was the twenty-ninth baronet that was created. Being a member in the firſt parliament of king Charles I. he joined in the complaints of the grievances which the nation then groaned under, and at the ſame time ſhewed his loyalty by the wiſe advice he gave to that prince. He wrote, 1. A brief Abſtract of the Queſtion of Precedencie between England and Spain. 2. A Diſcourſe of the Lawfulneſs of Combats to be performed in the Preſence of the King, or the Conſtable and Marſhal of England. 3. A number of collections that were printed together after his deceaſe, under the title of Cottoni Poſthuma; and books upon ſeveral ſubjects that ſtill remain in manuſcript. He alſo aſſiſted Camden, Speed, ſir Henry Spelman, ſir William Dugdale, &c. by communicating to them many valuable pieces of antiquity, and died at his houſe in Weſtminſter, on the 6th of May, 1631, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age.

COTTON BRUCE (JOHN) the only ſon of ſir Thomas Cotton, bart. and grandſon to the above ſir Robert Cotton. This gentleman, who died in 1702. made conſiderable additions to the valuable library collected by his grandfather. It conſiſted of manuſcripts, which, bound up, made about a thouſand volumes. They, for the moſt part, relate to Engliſh hiſtory and antiquities; the improvement of which was what ſir Robert chiefly aimed at in his collections. They were methodically ranged, and placed in fourteen ſets of ſhelves, over which were the heads of the twelve Cæſars, Cleopatra, and Fauſtina. They were purchaſed of ſir John by queen Anne, and were preſented by his late majeſty to the Britiſh Muſeum.

COTTON, (CHARLES) Eſq. particularly famous for his burleſque verſe, was a gentleman of Staffordſhire, who lived in the reigns of Charles and James II. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was eſteemed one of the ornaments of that univerſity, and was a great maſter of the modern languages. He wrote, 1. The Wonders of the Peak, in Derby-

Derbyſhire; 2. Scarronides, or Virgil traveſtie; 3. Lucian burleſqued; 4. A Volume of Poems on ſeveral Occaſions; and tranſlated Montaigne's Eſſays; a tragedy from Corneille, and ſome Poems from Horace, Catallus, &c. He died about the year 1688.

COTYS, the name of four kings of Thrace. The firſt was cotemporary with Philip, Alexander's father, and lived three hundred and fifty years before the Chriſtian Æra. He gave himſelf up to a voluptuous life, and at laſt became ſo cruel, that he cut his own wife in two, beginning at her private parts: but after a reign of twenty-four years, he was killed by one Python, who afterwards retired to Athens, where that action was nobly rewarded.

The ſecond ſent his ſon to the aſſiſtance of Pompey. The third lived at the time of Auguſtus, and was killed by Rheſcuporis, his uncle, a very cruel prince. To this Cotys Ovid addreſſes ſome of his elogies.

The fourth was the ſon of the former; and by order of Caligula, yielded Thrace to his couſin Rhœmetalces, and had in exchange the Leſſer Armenia, and a part of Arabia.

COTYTTIA, Κοτυττία, in Grecian antiquity, a nocturnal feſtival in honour of Cotys, or Cotytto, the goddeſs of wantonneſs. It was obſerved by the Athenians, Corinthians, Chians, Thracians, &c. and celebrated with ſuch rites as were moſt acceptable to the goddeſs, who was thought to be delighted with nothing ſo much as lewdneſs and debauchery.

Another feſtival of this name was celebrated in Sicily, where the worſhippers carried boughs hung with cakes and fruit, which any perſon might pluck off. This laſt, according to Gyraldus, was in memory of the rape of Proſerpine, who is by ſome thought to be the ſame with Cotytto.

COVARRUVIAS, (Diego) a celebrated civilian, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Toledo, on the 25th of July, 1512. He ſtudied at Salamanca, where he afterwards taught the canon law with ſuch reputation, that he was called the Spaniſh Bartholus. He was alſo well ſkilled in polite literature, the languages, and divinity, and was ſucceſſively promoted to ſeveral biſhopricks. He died at Madrid on the 27th of September, 1577, aged ſixty-ſix. His works, which are greatly eſteemed, are printed in two volumes folio.

COUCO, a country of Barbary, in Africa, ſituated between Algiers and Bugia. It was formerly a kingdom, but at preſent it is inhabited by Arabs, Bereberies, and Azagues, who live among the mountains, and are reduced to a low miſerable condition. They carry on no trade with their neighbours, for fear of being brought into ſlavery by the Algerines, like the reſt of the Arabs and Moors of Barbary. The dey of Algiers has attempted to bring them under contribution, but could not ſucceed, on account of the difficulty of acceſs to the mountains; for the troops would either be expoſed to ambuſcades, or the people would roll vaſt ſtones on their heads, and deſtroy them.

There was a city of the ſame name, but it is now in ruins. This was ſurrounded with rocks at the foot of a mountain; the country about it was full of villages and hamlets, and it was here their king reſided in a ſtately palace. It had likewiſe a port, called Tamagus, where they carried on a trade in honey, wax, and hides, with the people of Marſeilles. This mountain is their principal place of retreat from the Turks, to whom they are irreconcilable enemies. They attempted to aſſiſt the emperor Charles V. when he arrived before Algiers; but he having bad ſucceſs, the deſign failed. Afterwards they put the port of the Tamagus into the hands of the Spaniards, to revenge which, the Algerines ſeized on the city of Couco, and all the flat country, and obliged the king to retire into the mountains with his ſubjects. The mountains of Couco are fruitful in corn, fruits, and cattle; for there are fine valleys, agreeable plains, and plenty of ſprings of excellent water. Here the dey of Algiers retires when he is afraid of being puniſhed, if he can poſſibly eſcape, where he paſſes the remainder of his days in tranquility and plenty.

COVENANT, (Solemn League and) a kind of bond, by which the Scots have, upon ſeveral occaſions, united together when alarmed by any public danger. The noiſe this made in the laſt century in England, and the leagues that have been formed in France, and other nations, for the purpoſes of preſerving the eſtabliſhed religion, or for mutual defence, renders it neceſſary to give the origin of this ſolemn compact, which we ſhall here do from that admirable hiſtorian Dr. Robertſon. Philip II. king of Spain, allured by views of ambition, and animated by a ſuperſtitious zeal for propagating the Romiſh religion, courted James VI. afterwards king of Great Britain, with the utmoſt aſſiduity; excited him to revenge his mother's wrongs; flattered him with the hopes of ſharing his conqueſts, and offered him in marriage his daughter, the infanta Iſabella. At the ſame time Scotland ſwarmed with prieſts, his emiſſaries, who ſeduced ſome of the nobles to popery, and corrupted others with bribes and promiſes. James underſtood his own intereſt in the preſent conjuncture, and purſued it with much ſteadineſs. He rejected an alliance with Spain; he refuſed to admit into his preſence an ambaſſador from the pope; drove many of the trafficking prieſts out of the kingdom; determined to act in concert with queen Elizabeth, and levied troops to obſtruct the landing of the Spaniards.

The zeal of the people on this occaſion was not inferior to that of the king, and the extraordinary danger with which they were threatened, ſuggeſted to them an extraordinary expedient for their ſecurity. A bond was framed for the maintenance of true religion, and the defence of the king's perſon and government, in oppoſition to all enemies, foreign and domeſtic. This contained a confeſſion of the proteſtant faith, a particular renunciation of the errors of popery, and the moſt ſolemn promiſes, in the name, and through the ſtrength of God, of adhering to each other, in ſupport of the former, and in contending againſt the latter to the utmoſt of their power. The king, the nobles, the clergy, and the people ſubſcribed it with equal alacrity. Strange and uncommon as ſuch a combination may now appear, many circumſtances contributed, at that time, to recommend it, and to render the idea familiar to the Scots. When rouſed by any extraordinary event, or alarmed by any public danger, the people of Iſrael were accuſtomed to bind themſelves, by a ſolemn covenant, to adhere to that religion, which the Almighty had eſtabliſhed among them; this the Scots conſidered as a ſacred precedent, which it became them to imitate. In that age no conſiderable enterprize was undertaken in Scotland, without a bond of mutual defence, which all concerned reckoned neceſſary for their ſecurity. The form of this religious confederacy is plainly borrowed from thoſe political ones, of which ſo many inſtances have occurred; the articles, ſtipulations, and peculiar modes of expreſſion, are exactly the ſame in both. Almoſt all the conſiderable popiſh princes were then joined in a league for extirpating the reformed religion; and nothing could be more natural, or ſeemed more efficacious, than to enter into a counter-aſſociation, in order to oppoſe the progreſs of that formidable conſpiracy. To theſe cauſes did the Covenant, which has become ſo famous in hiſtory, owe its origin. It was renewed at different times during the reign of James. It was revived with great ſolemnity in the year 1638. It was adopted by the Engliſh in 1643, and enforced by the civil and eccleſiaſtical authority of both kingdoms. The political purpoſes to which it was then made ſubſervient, and the violent and unconſtitutional meaſures which it was then employed to promote, it is not our province to explain. But at the juncture, in which it was firſt introduced, we may pronounce it to have been a prudent and and laudable device for the defence of the religion and liberties of the nation; nor were the terms in which it was conceived, other than might have been expected from men alarmed with the impending danger of popery, and threatened with an invaſion by the moſt bigotted, and moſt powerful prince in Europe.

COVEL, (John) D. D. a learned divine, born at Horningſhearth, in Suffolk, in the year 1638, and educated at Chriſt's college in Cambridge. In 1670 he was made chaplain to Sir Daniel Harvey, ambaſſador to the Ottoman Porte, where he ſerved both him and Sir John Finch, his ſucceſſor, in that quality for ſeven years; and at his return to England, was promoted to ſeveral livings; he was alſo elected maſter of Chriſt's college; and in 1708, ſerved the office of vice-chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge. He wrote an Account of the Greek Church, with Reflections on their preſent Doctrine and Diſcipline, and died on the 19th of December, 1722, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

COVENTRY, a city of Warwickſhire, and a county of itſelf. It was walled round, and was three miles in compaſs; but there are now only the twelve gates, king Charles II. having cauſed the walls and towers to be demoliſhed ſoon after the Reſtoration. The buildings are generally old, but the market-place is ſpacious, and contains a ſtately croſs, which was adorned with the ſtatues of moſt of our kings ſince William the Conqueror. It is ſixty-ſix feet high, and was built by a legacy of Sir William Hollis, lord mayor of London. The town carries on a great trade in tammies, and is pretty populous.

There are only three churches, two of which are of curious workmanſhip, and a ſpire belonging to the Grey-Friars; but there are two or three meeting houſes for the proteſtant diſſenters. In the windows of Trinity-church were ſet up the pictures of Leofric, who died in the thirteenth

teenth year of the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, and Godina his wife, with this inſcription;

I, Lurick, for love of thee,
Do ſet Coventry toll-free.

This Leofric was earl of Mercia, and ſaid to be the firſt lord of this city, whom the inhabitants having offended, he oppreſſed them with heavy impoſitions. Now, the lady Godina, as tradition informs us, being very deſirous to have them taken off, was ever with her lord on that account; and he, to get rid of her importunities, told her, if ſhe would ride naked on horſe-back through the city, he would grant her requeſt, and not otherwiſe. She, contrary to his expectation, performed the condition, after having ſent an injunction to the inhabitants to keep within doors. But this ſtory is ſo well known, it need not be farther inſiſted on. However, they have a proceſſion or cavalcade once a-year, in commemoration of this event, at which time, a naked figure is ſet on horſe-back, and conducted through the principal ſtreets.

Coventry is governed by a mayor, two bailiffs, two ſheriffs, a recorder, ten aldermen, a coroner, a ſteward, two chamberlains, two wardens, &c. It is ſeated on the river Sherborn, and is divided into ten wards, and the citizens into eighteen companies. It has a grammar-ſchool well endowed, with three maſters, and exhibitions in both univerſities. There is likewiſe another free-ſchool for poor-boys, and a free muſic-ſchool: as alſo ſeveral hoſpitals, viz. one for ten old men; another for twenty blue-coat boys, a third for eight married couples, and a fourth in Weſt Orchard-ſtreet. It ſends two members to parliament, and has three market-days, one on Fridays, for cattle, corn, &c. and on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, for proviſions. The fairs are May 2, for horſes, cows, and ſheep; on the Friday in Trinity-week, for flannels, linen, and woollen. On this day, lady Godina's proceſſion is performed. November 1, for linen, woollen, and horſes. It is fifty-one miles north of Oxford, thirty-ſeven ſouth of Derby, thirty-ſix north-eaſt of Worceſter, twenty-two ſouth-weſt of Leiceſter, ſixty-three north-eaſt of Hereford, fifty-eight north-eaſt of Glouceſter, eighty-one eaſt-by-north of Cambridge, twenty-ſix north-eaſt of Litchfield, ninety-two ſouth-eaſt of Cheſter, and ninety-two north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 26. W. Lat. 52. 26. N.

COVERDALE (Miles) biſhop of Exeter in the reign of Edward VI. was born in Yorkſhire, in the reign of Henry VIII. and being educated in the Romiſh religion, became an Auguſtine monk; however, afterwards embracing the Reformation, he entered into holy orders, and aſſiſted William Tindal, in the Engliſh verſion of the Bible, publiſhed in 1537. In 1551, he was promoted to the ſee of Exeter; but, in queen Mary's reign, was ejected from his ſee, and thrown into priſon; but, at the interceſſion of the king of Denmark, was releaſed, and ſuffered to go into baniſhment. However, ſoon after queen Elizabeth's acceſſion to the throne, he returned from his exile, but refuſed to be reſtored to his biſhoprick. He wrote ſeveral tracts, among which are, 1. The Chriſten Rule, or State of all the World from the higheſt to the loweſt. 2. The Chriſten State of Matrymonye, wherein Huſbandes and Wyfes maye lerne to keepe Houſe together with Loue, &c.

COULAN, Coulang, or Quilon, a petty kingdom or principality of Aſia, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, and on the Malabar coaſt. It is a low country, full of rivers; but it is pleaſant and fruitful, and the air is wholeſome. It is has a town of the ſame name, which is ſurrounded with a ſtone wall, and well fortified by the Dutch, who took it from the Portugueſe in 1661. It is as pleaſantly ſituated as any in the Indies, moſt of the houſes having gardens with Indian fruits, and fine tanks cut out of the rocks. The inhabitants are treacherous and cruel, though ſome of them pretend to be Chriſtians. It has very little trade. Long. 75. 30. E. Lat. 8. 30. N.

COUPER, or Coupen, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Angus, twelve miles north-eaſt of Perth. Long. 3. 0. W. Lat. 56. 33. N.

COURCELLES (Stephen de) a learned proteſtant divine, of the ſect of the Arminians, was born at Geneva, in 1586. After having been miniſter in France, he retired to Amſterdam, where he taught divinity with reputation, and died there in 1658. Several of his works were printed in 1675, in which he follows the ſentiments of Epiſcopus, whom he ſucceeded. He publiſhed a new edition of the New Teſtament in Greek, which is eſteemed.

COURLAND (duchy of), is bounded on the eaſt by Lithuania, on the weſt by the Baltick Sea, on the ſouth by Samogitia, and on the north by Livonia. It is two hundred and fifty miles in length, and one hundred in breadth along the coaſts. The eaſtern extremity terminates almoſt in a point. Courland is divided into two parts; Courland, properly ſo called, and Semigalia. The greateſt number of the inhabitants are of the proteſtant religion. The moſt remarkable places are Mittaw the capital, Goldingen, and Alſvangen; the reſt are but ſmall towns.

COURTENAI, a town of France, ſeated in the Iſle of France, in Gatinois, on the rivulet Clairi. It is ſixteen miles ſouth-weſt of Sens, fifteen north-eaſt of Montargies, and ſixty ſouth of Paris. Long. 3. 9. E. Lat. 48. 1. N.

COURTENAY, an illuſtrious family in France, of which there have been ſeveral emperors of Conſtantinople, and a great number of perſons diſtinguiſhed by their virtue and bravery. The lords of Courtenay have frequently applied to the court, to be acknowledged princes of the blood, as being the legitimate male iſſue of king Lewis the Fat, but have never been able to obtain that privilege

COURTILZ (Gatien de) ſieur de Sandras, a French writer, born at Paris, in 1644. He was captain of a regiment; but quitting the ſervice, compoſed ſeveral works, which he publiſhed in Holland and France, and was at length confined in the Baſtille, from whence he was not delivered till 1711. He died at Paris, on the 6th of May, 1712, aged ſixty-eight. His principal works are, 1. The Conduct of France after the Peace of Nimeguen, in which he treats the French government with great freedom. 2. Memoirs containing ſeveral Events under the Reign of Lewis XIV. 3. The Life of Viſcount Turenne, under the borrowed name of Buiſſon. 4. The Life of Admiral de Coligny. 5. The Political Teſtament of M. Colbert, &c.

COURTIN (Anthony de) ſecretary of ſtate to queen Chriſtina of Sweden, was born at Riom, in 1622. After he had completed his ſtudies in France, he, in 1645, went to Sweden, where he at length obtained the above poſt; and, on queen Chriſtina's abdicating the crown, was nominated, by Charles Guſtavus, her ſucceſſor, envoy extraordinary to the court of France. After that prince's death, M. Colbert made him reſident-general for France to the princes and ſtates of the North. He wrote, 1. Treatiſes on Civility; 2. on the Point of Honour; 3. on Indolence; and, 4. on Jealouſy; and tranſlated into French Grotius's Treatiſe on War and Peace. He died at Paris, in 1685.

COURTNEY (William) archbiſhop of Canterbury, the fourth ſon of Hugh Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, was born in the year 1341, and educated at Oxford, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the civil and canon law; but afterwards entering into holy orders, obtained three prebends in three cathedral churches, viz. thoſe of York, Exeter, and Bath. In 1369, he was promoted to the ſee of Hereford; and, in 1375, was tranſlated to the ſee of London. In 1377, he, in obedience to the king's mandate, cited Wickliff to appear before his tribunal in St. Paul's church; but that reformer being accompanied by ſeveral nobles who ſecretly favoured his opinions, the biſhop proceeded no farther than to enjoin him and his followers ſilence. In 1381, he was appointed lord high chancellor of England, and the ſame year, was tranſlated to the ſee of Canterbury. He then reſtrained, by eccleſiaſtical cenſures, the bailiffs and other officers of that ſee, taking cognizance of adultery and the like crimes, and held a ſynod in London, in which ſeveral of Wickliffe's tenets were condemned as heretical. Archbiſhop Courtney died at Maidſtone, in Kent, on the 31ſt of July, 1396, and was buried in the cathedral church of Canterbury, under a monument of alabaſter.

COURTRAI, a town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſeated on the river Lys. It carries on a good trade in fine linen and damaſk table-cloths and napkins, which are diſperſed all over Europe. It has a collegiate church, a pariſh church, and ſeveral convents. It was taken by the French in 1683, and diſmantled; but it was reſtored to the houſe of Auſtria by the treaty of Ryſwick. It is ten miles from Liſle, thirteen from Tournai and Ypres, and one hundred and forty north of Paris. Long. 3. 13. E. Lat. 50. 52. N.

COUSIN (John) a celebrated French painter, who excelled in painting on glaſs. His picture of the laſt judgment, in the veſtry of the Minims of the Wood of Vincennes, is much admired. He was alſo a good ſculptor. He wrote ſeveral works on geometry and perſpective, and died after the year 1689.

Cousin (Lewis) one of the forty of the French academy, and a famous French writer, was born at Paris, in 1627. He was at firſt deſigned for the church, but afterwards ſtudied the law, and frequented the bar till the year 1657, when he was made preſident of the mint. He wrote in the Journal des Sçavans, from 1687 to 1702, was well ſkilled in eccleſiaſtical antiquities, and learned Hebrew at ſeventy years of age, that he might be able to ſpend his laſt years in reading the Scriptures in their original tongues. He made a French Tranſlation of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Euſebius, Socrates, Sozomenus, and Theodoret; a Tranſlation of the Byſantine Hiſtorians, in nine volumes, quarto; and ſome other works. He died at Paris, on the 26th of February, 1707, aged eighty.

COUSIN (GILBERT) in Latin Cognatus, was born at Nozeret, in Franche Comté, in the year 1505, and afterwards was ſervant to Eraſmus, who procured him a canonry at Nozeret. He was a man of learning, and wrote a great many books.

COUTANCES, a town of France, in Normandy, and capital of the Cotentin, with a biſhop's ſee. It is large and well-built, but is without walls. The churches, eſpecially the cathedral, are very magnificent. It is ſeated near the ſea, twenty-three miles north of Avranches, forty-five weſt of Caen, thirty-eight north-eaſt of St. Malo's, and one hundred and ſeventy-two weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 23. W. Lat. 49. 2. N.

COUTRAS, a town of France, in Perigord, remarkable for the victory obtained near it by Henry IV. It is ſeated on the river Dordogne. It is two hundred and eighty miles ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 3. W. Lat. 45. 15. N.

COUTURES (JAMES PARRAIN baron DES) a French writer, born at Avranches, of a noble family. He bore arms in his youth; but quitting the ſervice, compoſed ſeveral works in French, among which are, 1. The Spirit of the Holy Scriptures, duodecimo. 2. The Book of Geneſis, in Latin and French, with notes on the moſt difficult paſſages, four volumes, duodecimo. 3. The Morals of Epicurus, duodecimo. 4. A French Tranſlation of Lucretius, with remarks, in two volumes, duodecimo. He wrote ſeveral other works, but the laſt we have mentioned is the moſt known, and has had many editions. He died in 1702.

COWBRIDGE, a town of Glamorganſhire, in North Wales, with a market on Tueſdays, for corn, cattle, &c. It is a good place, and is called Pontvan by the Welſh, from its ſtone bridges. It is governed by a bailiff; and the eaſtern ſeſſions for the peace are kept here. It is about half a mile long, and is ſeated on the river Thaw. The fairs are April 23, Auguſt 1, and October 18, for cattle. It is twelve miles weſt of Cardiff, ninety-four eaſt of St. David's, and one hundred ſeventy-ſeven weſt-by north of London. Long. 3. 32. W. Lat. 51. 30. N.

COWELL (JOHN) a learned civilian in the latter end of the ſixteenth, and beginning of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Ernſborough, in the pariſh of Swimbridge, in Devonſhire, and educated at Eton ſchool, from whence he removed to King's college, Cambridge. He was at length made the king's profeſſor of civil law in that univerſity, and maſter of Trinity-hall. In 1603 and 1604, he executed the office of vice-chancellor of Cambridge, ſoon after which he wrote a Law Dictionary, intitled The Interpreter; and, in 1608, was made vicar-general to the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Dr. Cowell was employed by archbiſhop Bancroft, to draw up reaſons and exceptions againſt the too frequent grants of prohibitions, which were delivered to king James I. under the title of Articuli Cleri, or the Clergy's Articles. Theſe works exaſperated ſir Edward Coke againſt him, who not only took all opportunities to affront him by calling him, in deriſion, Dr. Cowheel, but attempted to ruin him; and at length his Interpreter was ordered to be publicly burnt. Beſides the above, Dr. Cowell wrote, in Latin, Inſtitutes of the Laws of England, and a Tract De Regulis Juris. He died on the 11th of October, 1611.

COWES, a town and harbour on the north-eaſt coaſt of the Iſle of Wight, in Hampſhire. It has no market but is the beſt place for trade in the whole iſland; but as it lies low, the air is accounted unhealthy. It is eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Portſmouth. Long. 1. 25. W. Lat. 50. 45. N.

COWLEY (ABRAHAM) one of the greateſt Engliſh poets of the ſeventeenth century, was born in London, in the year 1618, and educated at Weſtminſter ſchool. His firſt inclination to poetry aroſe from his accidentally lighting on Spenſer's Fairy Queen, when he was but juſt able to read; and this inclination ſo far improved in him, that, at thirteen, he began to write poems, a collection of which was publiſhed in 1633, when he was but fifteen years of age, under the title of Poetical Bloſſoms, which were generally regarded as an earneſt of the fame to which he afterwards aroſe. While he was at ſchool, his teachers could never make him remember the rules of grammar; but he ſupplied that want by converſing with the books whence thoſe rules had been drawn, and found this advantage by it, that having got the Greek and Latin languages as he did his own, not by precept, but by uſe, he practiſed them not as a ſcholar, but as a native. In 1636, he was elected a ſcholar in Trinity college, Cambridge, where he laid the plan of moſt of thoſe deſigns which he afterwards finiſhed, and wrote a Latin comedy, intitled Naufragium Joculare, or the Merry Shipwreck, which was acted before the univerſity by the members of Trinity college; but in 1643, being then maſter of arts, he was, among many others, ejected his college, upon which, he ſettled in St. John's college, Oxford. During the heat of the civil war, he was in the earl of St. Albans's family; and accompanied the queen mother, when ſhe was obliged to retire into France. He was then abſent from his country about ten or twelve years, which were wholly ſpent, either in bearing a ſhare in the diſtreſſes of the royal family, or labouring for their intereſt. In 1656, he came over to England, in order to obſerve the poſture of affairs in the nation; but being ſoon after ſeized, he was for ſome time confined; but afterwards complying with thoſe in power, he obtained an order to be created doctor of phyſic, which being done, he went to France again, having made a copy of verſes on Oliver's death. At the Reſtoration, not finding the preferment he expected, he retired into Surry, where he ſpent the remainder of his life at Chertſey. He wrote, in Latin, 1. Six Books of Plants. 2. Miſcellanies. 3. The Miſtreſs, or Love Verſes. 4. Pindaric Odes. 5. A comedy called the Guardian, afterwards publiſhed under the title of Cutler of Coleman-ſtreet. 6. The Davideis, a ſacred poem; and other works. This great poet died on the 28th of July, 1667, in the forty-ninth year of his age, and was interred in Weſtminſter abbey, near the aſhes of Chaucer and Spencer, where a plain neat monument was afterwards erected to his memory by George, duke of Buckingham, with a Latin inſcription written by his friend, Dr. Thomas Sprat, afterwards biſhop of Rocheſter.

The Rev. Mr. Granger obſerves, that Cowley who helped to corrupt the taſte of the age in which he lived, and had himſelf been corrupted by it, was a remarkable inſtance of true genius ſeduced and perverted by falſe wit; but that this wit, falſe as it was, raiſed his reputation to the higheſt pitch. "There is a want of elegance in his words," ſays he, "and of harmony in his verſification; but this was "more than atoned for by his greateſt fault, the redun-"dancy of his fancy. His Latin poems, which are eſ-"teemed the beſt of his works, are written in the various "meaſures of the ancients, and have much of their unaf-"fected beauty. He was more ſucceſsful in imitating "the eaſe and gaiety of Anacreon, than the bold and lofty "flights of Pindar."

COWPAR, a parliament town in Scotland, in the county of Fiſe, ten miles weſt of St. Andrew's. Long. 3. 15. W. Lat. 56. 20. N.

COX (RICHARD) biſhop of Ely in the ſixteenth century, was born at Whaddon, in Buckinghamſhire, in the year 1499. He was elected into a ſcholarſhip at King's college, in Cambridge, and was one of thoſe invited to Oxford by cardinal Wolſey to fill up his new foundation; but ſhewing himſelf averſe to many of the popiſh ſuperſtitions, and declaring freely for ſome of Luther's opinions, he was thrown into priſon, on ſuſpicion of hereſy. On his being releaſed, he was choſen maſter of Eton ſchool, and raiſed to very conſiderable preferments in the church, of which he was ſtripped on queen Mary's acceſſion to the crown, and, in 1553, was committed to the Marſhalſea, but being ſoon after releaſed, retired into Germany. On the acceſſion of queen Elizabeth, he returned to England, and was one of thoſe divines, who were appointed to reviſe the Liturgy: and, in the diſputation held at Weſtminſter, between eight papiſts and eight of the reformed clergy, he was one of the principal champions on the proteſtant ſide. In 1559, he was preferred to the ſee of Ely, when he vigorouſly oppoſed the diſſenters, and ſtrenuouſly exerted himſelf againſt the miniſtry, in relation to the alienation of church-lands. He died on the 22d of July, 1582, in the eighty-ſecond year of his age. He wrote ſeveral ſmall pieces, which were not publiſhed till after his deceaſe; and when a new tranſlation of the Bible was made in the reign of queen Elizabeth, now commonly known by the name of the Biſhops' Bible, the four Goſpels, the Acts of the Apoſtles, and the Epiſtle to the Romans, were allotted to him.

COXIS (MICHAEL) an excellent Flemiſh painter, a native of Malines, was the diſciple of Raphael, and died at Antwerp, in 1592. aged ninety-five.

COXWOLD, a town in the North-Riding of Yorkſhire, which has a fair, on Auguſt 25, for horned cattle, ſheep, linen and woollen cloth, pewter, and hard-ware, with a free-ſchool and an alms-houſe. It is fourteen miles north of York. Long. 1. 10. W. Lat. 54. 16. N.

COYPEL (ANTHONY) an excellent French painter, born at Paris, in 1661. Noel Coypel, his father, being choſen by M. Colbert to be director of the academy at Rome, he took his ſon with him into Italy, where Anthony Coypel formed himſelf on the works of the greateſt maſters, and on his return to France, was made firſt painter to the duke of Orleans. That prince employed him in painting the grand gallery of the royal palace, and allowed him a penſion. In 1714, he was director of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture. In 1715, he was made firſt painter to the French king, and was ennobled on account of his merit. He died on the 7th of January, 1722, aged ſixty-one.

M. Coypel, his ſon, alſo excelled in the ſame art.

COYSEVOX (ANTHONY) ſculptor to the French king, was born at Lyons, in 1640. He was profeſſor, rector, and and chancellor of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, at Paris, where he died in 1720.

CRACOW (palatinate of) is one of the three provinces of Leſſer Poland, and has the palatinate of Sendomir on the eaſt, that of Sirad on the north, Sileſia on the weſt, and Upper Hungary on the South. It contains the duchies of Ozwieczin, Zator, and Severia, and the northern part of the territory of Ceputz. This country has plenty of mines. Thoſe of lead are at Slankow, and contain a little ſilver; thoſe of copper are at Sandecz; thoſe of vitriol at Biecz; and thoſe of ſalt at Wielicza and Bochnia. It is very fruitful, being watered by ſeveral rivers beſides the Viſtula, which is the principal, and runs through the middle of it. The chief towns are Cracow the capital, Slancow, Sandecz, Biecz, Wielicza, Bochnia, Lelow, Czenſtochow, and Lubowla.

Cracow, or Cracovia, the capital city of Poland, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Viſtula, in a vaſt plain, and is the largeſt and moſt important city in that kingdom. The ſtreets are broad and ſtrait, but very naſty. The houſes are five ſtories high, and built with free-ſtone, but covered with ſhingles. The royal palace was a magnificent ſtructure, and ſtood upon a rock; the rooms were handſomely painted; and perhaps there is no place in Europe, from whence there was a finer proſpect. The city has two large ſuburbs; it is ſurrounded with deep ditches, encompaſſed with thick walls, defended by ſtrong towers. Auguſtus III. king of Poland, was crowned here, with his conſort, January 17, 1734. The largeſt and principal church is dedicated to St. Staniſlaus, whom king Boleſlaus II. maſſacred at the altar, in 1079, as he was ſaying maſs. The riches of this church are immenſe, and the offices are read in it day and night, without interruption. The Jeſuits have a fine church here, as well as the Dominicans. The biſhop is in poſſeſſion of the duchy of Severia and thirteen towns. In 1401, there was an univerſity founded here, which is the moſt celebrated of any in Poland; it has twelve colleges, and the ſtudents have great privileges; all employments, as well eccleſiaſtical as ſecular, are generally given to Polanders who have been educated here. This city ſuffered greatly during the civil diſſenſions; for the plague, famine, and war, made a great havock in it at the ſame time, and deſtroyed one half of the inhabitants; beſides, there was a great fire, which reduced part of the city to aſhes. In 1702, the Swedes became maſters of Cracow, and burnt the caſtle, or palace, down to the ground, which has not been ſince rebuilt. The eſtabliſhed religion is the Roman Catholick; and yet they tolerate the Jews, who are ſaid to amount here to twenty thouſand. It is one hundred and fifty miles ſouth of Buda, one hundred and thirteen ſouth weſt of Warſaw, one hundred and eighty north-eaſt of Vienna, ſeven hundred and twenty miles from Conſtantinople, ſix hundred and ſeventy-five from Moſcow, and ſeven hundred and fifty from Paris. Long. 19. 30. E. Lat. 50. 8. N.

CRAGIUS (Nicholas) a learned profeſſor in Greek and hiſtory in the univerſity of Copenhagen, was born at Rippen, about the year 1549. He was employed by the kings of Denmark in ſeveral important negotiations, and died on the 14th of May, 1602. He was the author of an excellent treatiſe De Republica Lacedæmoniorum; the Annals of Denmark, in Latin; and other works.

CRAIL, a parliament town of Scotland, in the county of Fife, ſeated on the ſea-coaſt, ſeven miles ſouth-eaſt of St. Andrew's. Long. 2. 20. W. Lat. 56. 17. N.

CRANGANOR, a ſmall kingdom, on the coaſt of Malabar, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges. It is under the ſamorin of Calicut; and the king lives at a town of the ſame name. Here the Dutch have a factory and a fort, they having taken it from the Portugueſe, in 1662. Long. 75. 15. E. Lat. 10. 25. N.

CRANBOURN, a town in Devonſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays, but no fairs. It had formely a monaſtery, and is pleaſantly ſituated on the London road to Dorcheſter, from which it is twenty-eight miles eaſt-ſouth-eaſt, and ninety-five weſt-north-weſt from London. Long. 2. 10. W. Lat. 50. 54. N.

CRANBROOK, a town of Kent, with a market on Saturdays, and a fair on May 30, and September 29, for cattle and horſes. It is a large place, well inhabited, and the market is the beſt in this part of the country. It is eighteen miles ſouth of Maidſtone, thirty-ſeven ſouth-weſt of Canterbury, and forty-eight ſouth-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 37. W. Lat. 51. 5. N.

CRAMER (Gabriel) an able philoſopher, and one of the moſt learned men of the eighteenth century, was born at Geneva in 1704, and made ſuch a rapid progreſs in the ſciences, that at nineteen years of age he was made profeſſor of mathematics. To him we owe the edition of the works of James and John Bernouilli, which appeared at Geneva in ſix volumes, quarto. In 1746 he completed his Introduction to the Theory of curved Lines; and of his taking poſſeſſion of the chair of philoſophy, in 1749, he pronounced a ſpeech on the utility of the ſtudy of philoſophy in forming great magiſtrates, which was printed in 1750. Mr. Cramer was a member of the Royal Society of London, Berlin, Montpelier, and Lyons. He was diſtinguiſhed by his ſenſe of religion, and the regularity of his manners; and was eſteemed a living library. He died in 1752, at Bagnols, in Languedoc, where he went for the recovery of his health.

Cramer (John James) a learned profeſſor of the oriental languages, was born at Elgg, in the canton of Zurich, on the 24th of January 1673, and became well ſkilled in the oriental tongues, of which he was profeſſor at Zurich and Herborn. His principal works are, 1. Exercitationes de Ara exteriori Templi ſecundi. 2. Theologia Iſraelis. He died at Zurich on the ninth of February, 1742.

CRANMER (Thomas) archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born at Aſlaton in Nottinghamſhire; educated at Cambridge, and commenced doctor of divinity in 1523. Pleading for king Henry's divorce from Catharine of Spain, his way of arguing ſo pleaſed the king, that he was made archdeacon of Taunton, and afterwards ſent ambaſſador into France, Italy, and Germany, and in 1533 he was made archbiſhop of Canterbury. He all along ſhewed himſelf a zealous promoter of the reformation, and, as the firſt ſtep towards it, procured the convocation to petition the king that the Bible might be tranſlated into Engliſh; and when that was done, encouraged the printing and publication of it; cauſed it to be recommended by the royal authority, and to be diſperſed as much as poſſible. He next forwarded the diſſolution of monaſteries, which were one of the greateſt obſtacles to a reformation. But though he had before pronounced the ſentence of divorce between king Henry and queen Catharine, and had married that king to Anne Boleyn, yet, three years after, viz. in 1536, he alſo divorced Henry from his laſt queen. He oppoſed the pope's ſupremacy; endeavoured to aboliſh the ſuperſtitious obſervance of holidays; and yet in 1538, with ſome other of the biſhops, fell under the king's diſpleaſure for not being willing that the monaſteries ſhould be ſuppreſſed for the king's own uſe. In 1540 he was one of the commiſſioners for inſpecting into matters of religion; he alſo gave orders for the taking away of ſuperſtitious ſhrines; and in 1540 procured the act for the advancement of true religion. But the following year ſome of his enemies preferring accuſations againſt him, he was complained of both in the houſe of commons and the privy-council, and was very near being ſent to the Tower, when the king protected him, and gave him his ring, as a token that he took the affair into his own hands.

Upon king Henry's deceaſe he was one of the executors of his will, and one of the regents of the kingdom: and on the 20th of February, 1545-6, he crowned king Edward VI. to whom he had been godfather, as he was alſo to the lady Elizabeth. He ſtill continued labouring for the reformation of religion; and for that purpoſe procured the eſtabliſhment of that communion in both kinds, and a new office for the ſacrament. He alſo ſhewed himſelf a patron to the univerſities by defending their rights, ſecuring their revenues, and encouraging the learning there profeſſed and taught. In 1550 a review was made of the Book of Common Prayer, which by his care had been drawn up, and ſeveral things were amended that were thought to favour too much of ſuperſtition; and in 1552 he had a ſhare in compiling the articles of religion. He confined not his care to the church of England, but extended it to thoſe foreign proteſtants who fled hither for ſhelter; and as he had about twelve years before endeavoured to ſave the lives of biſhop Fiſher and Sir Thomas More, ſo he now exerted himſelf in favour of biſhop Tunſtal, though they were of different perſuaſions. In 1553 he oppoſed the new ſettlement of the crown upon the lady Jane Grey; but upon king Edward VI's deceaſe, appeared for that lady.

Queen Mary's acceſſion to the throne put a period to his happineſs; he was ſoon committed to the Tower, and condemned for high-treaſon, of which he was however pardoned. In 1554 he, with Ridley and Latimer, were removed to Oxford, in order for a public diſputation with the papiſts, which was held with great noiſe and triumph on the ſide of the latter, and with as much gravity, learning, and modeſty on the ſide of the proteſtant biſhops: two days after Cranmer and the two others were condemned as heretics; but this ſentence being void in law, becauſe the pope's authority was not yet re-eſtabliſhed in England, a new commiſſion was ſent from Rome for his trial and conviction. Accordingly on the 12th of September 1555, he appeared before the commiſſioners at St. Mary's church, Oxon, where he was accuſed of blaſphemy, perjury, incontinency, and hereſy, againſt all which he vindicated himſelf; and at laſt was cited to appear at Rome within eighty days to anſwer in perſon; but being cloſely confined, the pope ſent his letters, in which he delared him contumacious, for not appearing at Rome within the limited time, with orders that he ſhould be degraded and deprived, which was accordingly done in the moſt ignominious manner. At laſt, however, Cranmer's courage, wiſdom, and fortitude forſook him; he had the weakneſs to recant, and renounce the proteſtant religion; but notwithſtanding this, the mercileſs queen reſolved to glut her revenge by committing him to the flames; which cruel ſentence was accordingly executed on the 21ſt day of March 1556, when repenting of his cowardice and inſincerity, he ſtretched out his right hand into the flame, and held it there unmoved (except that once he wiped his face with it) till it was conſumed, crying with a loud voice, "This is the hand that "wrote it. This hand hath offended," and often repeating, "This unworthy right hand." At laſt the fire blazing up, he ſoon expired, never ſtirring or crying out all the while, only keeping his eyes fixed towards heaven, and repeating more than once, "Lord Jeſus, receive my ſpirit." Thus died this gentle, mild, and benevolent reformer, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age. A perſon remarkable for his charity and munificence to the indigent; for his humility and affability, his wiſdom, and love of truth. Many of his works he himſelf publiſhed, and others of them ſtill remain in manuſcript.

CRANTOR, a Greek philoſopher and poet, was born at Solos in Cilicia, but leaving his native country, where he was admired for the ſublimity of his genius, he went to Athens, and there ſtudied with Polemon and Crates, under Xenocrates. Polemon ſucceeding Xenocrates about the three hundred and ſixteenth year before the Chriſtian æra, had the honour of having Crantor for his diſciple. Crantor was conſidered as the principal defender of the Platonic ſect, and was the firſt who wrote Commentaries on Plato. He alſo wrote many other works, which are loſt. His book of Conſolation was particularly eſteemed.

CRASSO (JULIUS PAUL) a learned phyſician in the ſixteenth century, born at Padua, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his erudition and ſkill in polite literature. He wrote a Latin tranſlation of Aretæus, and ſome other of the ancient Greek phyſicians, and died in 1574.

CRASSUS PUBLIUS LICINIUS) a Roman high-prieſt, and learned civilian, was made conſul in the one hundred and thirty-firſt year before the birth of Chriſt. He went into Aſia, at the head of the Roman army ſent againſt Ariſtonicus, but was defeated and taken priſoner by the Thracians in Ariſtonicus's pay; but ſtriking a ſoldier who conducted him, was ſtabbed with a poinard, and buried at Smyrna.

CRASSUS (MARCUS LICINIUS) a Roman conſul, who enriched himſelf by trading in ſlaves, and was ſo wealthy, that he treated all Rome, and gave each citizen a ſtock of corn ſufficient to ſerve him for three months. In the eighty-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra he retired from the tyranny of Cinna and Marius to Spain, where his friend Vibicius hid him three months in a cave; after which he went to Africa, and behaved with great courage againſt the ſlaves under Spartacus, whom he defeated in the ſeventy-firſt year before the birth of Chriſt. He was afterwards prætor, conſul, and triumvir, with Cæſar and Pompey. Shortly after joining Pompey, he entered Syria, plundered the temple of Jeruſalem, and carried immenſe riches out of Judea. He at length marched againſt the Parthians; but his army, which was compoſed of about one hundred thouſand men, was defeated, and himſelf killed, near Sinnaca, a city of Meſopotamia, in the fifty-third year before the Chriſtian æra. It is ſaid that his head being carried to Orodes king of the Parthians, that prince cauſed melted gold to be poured into his mouth, ſaying, that "he ſhould be conſumed "by the ſame metal, the inſatiable deſire of which had "made him commit ſo many crimes."

CRASSUS PADUANUS, or CRASSO, a learned Franciſcan monk, born at Barletta, was eſteemed in the ſixteenth century for his eloquence and his writings. He wrote, 1. De Republica Eccleſiaſtica. 2. Enchiridion Eccleſiaſticum, and other works.

CRATERUS, a favourite of Alexander the Great, and rival to Antipater, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his intrepidity amidſt the greateſt dangers, and after the death of Alexander was killed fighting againſt Eumenes. Craterus compoſed a work, the loſs of which has been much regretted by the learned.

CRATES, a famous philoſopher, born at Thebes in Bœotia, was the diſciple of Diogenes the Cynic. It is ſaid that he threw all his money into the ſea, that he might the more freely apply himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy; others aſſert that he placed it in another perſon's hands, with orders to give it to his children if they ſhould happen to be fools; for, ſaid Crates, if they ſhould be philoſophers they will have no need of it. He lived about three hundred and twenty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra. He ought not to be confounded with Crates, a famous academic philoſopher, the diſciple and friend of Polemon, about three hundred years before the Chriſtian æra. This laſt Crates had Arceſilaus, and other celebrated philoſophers, for his diſciples.

CRATINUS, a famous comic poet, of whoſe works there are only ſome fragments now remaining. Quintilian greatly praiſes his comedies. He was born at Athens, and died about the four hundred and thirty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra, at above ninety-five years of age.

CRATIPPUS, a celebrated peripatetic philoſopher, was a native of Mitylene, where he taught philoſophy; but at length went to Athens, where the ſon of Cicero, and Brutus were his diſciples. Pompey went to ſee him after the battle of Pharſalia, and propoſed to him his difficulties in relation to the belief of a providence. When Cratippus comforted him, and by forcible arguments anſwered his objections.

CRATO, a ſmall town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo, with a rich priory. It is the chief commandery which the knights of Malta have in Portugal. It is ſeated ſeven miles weſt of Port Allegro. Long. 8. 12. W. Lat. 38. 50. N.

CRATON, or DE CRAFFTHEIM (JOHN) a learned phyſician, born at Breſlaw, in 1519, was phyſician to the emperors Ferdinand I. Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. He wrote Iſagoge Medicinæ, and ſeveral other works which are eſteemed, and died on the 9th of November, 1585, aged ſixty-ſix.

CRAVAN, a town of France, in Burgundy, remarkable for its good wine, and for a battle fought there between the Engliſh and French. It is ſeated near the confluence of the rivers Cure and Yonne, ten miles ſouth of Auxerre, thirteen north-weſt of Avalon, and eighty-eight ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 30. E. Lat. 47. 42. N.

CRAVEN (WILLIAM, lord) the ſon of ſir William Craven, lord mayor of London, gained great reputation as a ſoldier under Henry, prince of Orange, and Guſtavus Adolphus, king of Sweden. He took, by ſtorm, the ſtrong fortreſs of Crutzenack, in Germany, which is one of the moſt extraordinary actions recorded in the hiſtory of the great Guſtavus. During the Rebellion and the Interregnum, he was in the ſervice of the ſtates of Holland, whence he ſent conſiderable ſupplies to Charles I. and II. This nobleman is ſaid to have been ſecretly married to the queen of Bohemia, the king's aunt; it is at leaſt certain that he was much in her favour and confidence. The duke of Albemarle and this lord continued in London during the peſtilence. He died on the 19th of April, 1687, in the eighty-eighth year of his age.

CREDI (LAURENZO DI) a famous painter of Florence, who was a great imitator of Leonardo da Vinci, and died in 1530, aged ſeventy-eight.

CREDITON, a town of Devonſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and a conſiderable woollen manufacture. It was deſtroyed by fire in 1743. The loſs was computed at fifty-three thouſand pounds, for which collections were made all over England. The fairs are May 11, Auguſt 21, and September 21, for cattle. It is ſeated between two hills, on a rich ſoil, and is compoſed of two towns, the one being called Eaſt town, and the other Weſt. The church is very handſome, and is built in the form of a cathedral; and to it belongs a free-ſchool, over which there are twelve governors, incorporated by queen Elizabeth, who have the diſpoſal of the tithes. The market is very large. Crediton is eight miles north-weſt of Exeter, thirty ſouth-ſouth-eaſt of Barnſtable, and one hundred and ſeventy-nine weſt-by-north of London. Long. 3. 50. W. Lat. 50. 50. N.

CREECH (THOMAS) an eminent poet, was born at Blandford, in Dorſetſhire, in the year 1659, and educated at Oxford. He ſoon began to diſtinguiſh himſelf in the republic of letters by the works he publiſhed, which were, 1. A Tranſlation of Lucretius into Engliſh verſe. 2. An Engliſh Tranſlation of Horace. 3. A Collection of Miſcellany Poems, and other works. His circumſtances were however always very indifferent, and his death very unhappy; for he hanged himſelf in his own ſtudy, about the end of June, 1701; juſt after he had taken holy orders, and was preſented to the living of Welling in Hertfordſhire; but before he had taken poſſeſſion of it. He had the character of being a man of excellent parts, and ſound judgment; a perfect maſter of the Greek and Latin languages; but naturally of a moroſe temper, and too apt to deſpiſe the underſtandings and performances of others.

CREEKLADE, a town in Wiltſhire, ſeated on the river Iſis, where it begins to be navigable, with a market on Saturdays. It is governed by a bailiff, has a free-ſchool, and ſends two members to parliament. The fairs are on the ſecond Thurſday in April, for ſheep, cows, and calves; and September 21, for chapmen's goods and hiring ſervants. It is fourteen miles north-by-weſt of Marlborough, and eighty-three weſt of London. Long. 1. 50. W. Lat. 51. 40. N.

CREL-

CRELLIUS (John) a famous Socinian, born in 1590, in a village near Nuremberg. In 1612 he went into Poland, where the Unitarians had a ſchool, in which he became profeſſor of divinity, and miniſter at Cracow, where he died, in 1632, aged forty-two. He was the author, 1. of a famous Treatiſe againſt the Myſtery of the Trinity. 2. Commentaries on a Part of the New Teſtament. 3. Moral works, in which he is charged with maintaining that a huſband may lawfully beat his wife. All his works are ſcarce.

He ought not to be confounded with Paul Crellius, a Lutheran miniſter, who was born at Iſlebe, and died in 1579. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes againſt the Calviniſts and Papiſts.

CREMA, a town of Italy, in the Cremaſco, in the territory of Venice, with a biſhop's ſee. It is well fortified, has a ſtrong citadel, and may paſs for a good frontier town. It is ſeated on the river Serio, twenty miles north of Placentia, twenty weſt of Cremona, twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Breſcia, and twenty-three ſouth-eaſt of Milan. Long. 9. 50. E. Lat. 45. 25. N.

CREMASCO, a territory in the Venetian dominions, and in the duchy of Milan, on which it formerly depended. It is of ſmall extent, but fertile in corn, wine, and hemp. Crema is the capital town, beſides which there are none of any note.

CREMIEN, a town of France, in Dauphiny, ſeated on the river Rhone, twenty miles eaſt of Lyons. Long. 5. 21. E. Lat. 45. 45. N.

CREMONA, a city of Italy, in the duchy of Milan, and capital of the Cremoneſe, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Po and the Adda. It is a large place, it being five miles in circumference; is well fortified, and has a good caſtle. The ſtreets are large and ſtrait, and the houſes well built. It has handſome churches, and large ſquares, and the portico of the cathedral, which is ſupported by marble columns, is very magnificent, as is alſo the principal altar. The town-houſe, the palace of the biſhop, and that of the podeſta are worth notice. In the collegiate church of St. Peter they preſerve the body of St. Mary the Egyptian. There are likewiſe ſeveral good convents; beſides an univerſity which is almoſt neglected.

It was built in the year of Rome 445, or thereabouts, and has undergone great revolutions. It was greatly damaged by Hannibal, when he paſſed into Italy, after which the Goths committed ſtrange diſorders there; and in 630 it was entirely ruined by the Sclavonians and Lombards. It was rebuilt in 1284, by Frederick Barbaroſſa, who erected a prodigious high tower, now gone to decay. It has been ſubject to the French, the Venetians, the dukes of Milan, and the Spaniards. It has been taken twice by ſurprize, through ſubterranean paſſages; and a third time the Imperialiſts entered by night, in 1702, through an aquæduct, and took marſhal Villeroy and ſeveral officers priſoners, but they were ſoon forced to abandon it. It ſtands in a delightful plain, thirty miles north-weſt of Parma, fifteen north-eaſt of Placentia, twenty-eight ſouth of Breſcia, thirty-eight weſt of Mantua, and forty eaſt of Milan. Long. 9. 55. E. Lat. 45. 8. N.

CREMONESE, a territory in the duchy of Milan, bounded on the eaſt by the duchy of Mantua, on the north by Breſciano, on the weſt by Lodezan and Cremaſco, and on the ſouth by the Parmeſan. It is fertile in wine and fruits. Cremona is the capital; beſides which there are Caſal Maggiore, and Pitzighitone, famous for being the priſon of Francis I. king of France.

CREMONINI (Cæsar) profeſſor of philoſophy at Ferrara, for ſeventeen years, and for forty years at Padua, was born at Cento, in the Modeneſe, in the year 1550. He gained ſuch reputation that kings and princes would have his picture. His lectures were greatly admired; but his printed works did not ſell very well. He died at Padua, during the peſtilence in 1630, aged eighty.

CRENIUS (Thomas) a laborious compiler, born in the marquiſate of Brandenburg, publiſhed a great number of collections, the moſt eſteemed of which are three volumes in quarto, the firſt of which is intitled, Conſilia & Methodi aureæ ſtudiorum optime Inſtituendorum: the ſecond, De Philologia, ſtudiis Liberalis doctrinæ; and the third, De Euriditione comparanda.

CREON, king of Thebes, was the ſon of Menœius, and the brother of Jocaſta. He obtained the crown after the death of Laius, the huſband of Jocaſta; but at length reſigned it to Œdipus, who, after he had put out his eyes, retired to Athens, leaving his kingdom to his ſons Eteocles and Polynices; but theſe two princes being both killed in ſingle combat, about the one thouſand two hundred and fifty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra, Creon reſumed the government, cauſed Antigone and Agria to be put to death, and behaved with extreme cruelty: but at length Theſeus, at the deſire of the Theban ladies, declared war againſt him, and deprived him both of his crown and life.

CREQUI (Charles de) prince of Poix, duke of Leſdiguieres, a peer and marſhal of France, and one of the moſt famous French generals of his age, ſignalized himſelf in ſeveral ſieges and battles. In 1599 he killed Don Philippin, the baſtard of Savoy, in a duel. In 1630 he defeated the Spaniards at the battle of Teſſin, and was killed by a cannon-ball at the ſiege of Bremen, on the 17th of March, 1638.

Crequi (Francis de) marſhal of France, in the ſeventeenth century, after having ſignalized himſelf by his valour and conduct on ſeveral important occaſions, he was, in 1661, made general of the gallies; and in 1668 marſhal of France; but in 1675 was defeated near the bridge of Conſabrick, at the confluence of the Sarre and the Moſelle, and retired into Treves. The following year he was at the ſiege of Conde, and at length, being made governor of Metz, he, in 1678, obliged prince Charles of Lorrain to retire with loſs. He afterwards took Friburg, and in 1684 rendered himſelf maſter of Luxemburg. He died at Paris, on the 4th of February, 1687.

CRESCENS, a Cynic philoſopher, about the year 150, rendered himſelf infamous by his debaucheries, and by the calumnies he publiſhed againſt the Chriſtians. Againſt him St. Juſtin wrote his ſecond Apology.

CRESCENTINO, a city of Italy, in Piedmont, ſeated by the river Po. It was taken by the French in 1704, and retaken by the Germans in 1706. It is twenty miles north-eaſt of Turin, and eighteen ſouth-weſt of Caſal. Long. 8. 5 E. Lat. 45. 30. N.

CRESPET (Peter) a Celeſtin monk, and prior of the convent of that order at Soiſſons, publiſhed a work in French, intitled The Garden of ſpiritual Pleaſure and Recreations; ſome diſcourſes upon the hatred of Satan; and, in Latin, An Abridgment of the Church Diſcipline, and of the whole Canon Law. He died in 1595.

CRESPI, a town of France, capital of the Valois, in the Iſle of France. It is eighteen miles north of Meaux, thirteen ſouth of Compeigne, and thirty-three north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 2. 43. E. Lat. 49. 12. N.

CRESPIN (John) in Latin Creſpinus, a famous printer at Geneva, whither he retired for the ſake of his religion, in the year 1548, was of the province of Artois. He applied himſelf with great ſkill and diligence to the printing of ſeveral books, and eſpecially of a Greek and Latin Lexicon, and of a Martyrology of the Proteſtants. He died of the plague, at Geneva, in the year 1572.

CRESSEY, or Cressy, (Hugh Paulin or Serenus) an eminent writer, in behalf of the papiſts, was born at Wakefield, in York, in the year 1605, ſtudied at Oxford, and at length was made canon of Windſor, and dean of Laughlin, in Ireland; but, through the confuſion of the times, never obtained the actual poſſeſſion of either of thoſe preferments. In 1644, he quitted England, and two years after embraced the popiſh religion, after which he became a Benedictine monk; but at the Reſtoration, and the marriage of king Charles II. queen Catharine made him her chaplain, and thenceforward he reſided at Somerſet-houſe, in the Strand, where the great regularity of his life, his ſincere and unaffected piety, and his modeſt and mild behaviour preſerved him in quiet and ſafety. He wrote many pieces in defence of the doctrines of the church of Rome; and a large and copious Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. He died at Eaſt Grinſtead, in the county of Suſſex, on the 10th of Auguſt, 1674.

CRESSY, a town of France, in the province of Picardy. It is famous for a bloody battle fought there, between Edward III. king of England, and Philip de Valois, king of France, wherein the French loſt thirty thouſand common ſoldiers, twelve hundred knights, eighty bannerets, and eleven princes. It is twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Laon, eight north-weſt of Soiſſons, and fifty-five north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 2. 0. E. Lat. 49. 45. N.

CREST, a town of France, in Dauphiny, ſeated on the river Drome, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Orange, forty ſouth-by-weſt of Grenoble, and three hundred and thirty-five ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 4. 9. E. Lat. 44. 45. N.

CRETHEIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Acaſtus, king of Theſſaly, was in love with young Peleus, who was newly married to Erigone; but not being able to gain him to her embraces, ſhe perſuaded Erigone that he courted another woman, on which that lady killed herſelf. She then complained to Acaſtus, that Peleus would have debauched her, on which he was expoſed to the centaur; but returning victorious, he firſt killed Cretheis, and then Acaſtus.

CRETIN (William) a French poet, who lived under the reigns of Charles VIII. Lewis XII. and Francis I. and died in 1525. The beſt edition of his works is that of Paris, in 1724, in duodecimo. This poet Rabelais repreſents under the name of Rominagrobis.

CREVECOEUR (James de) chamberlain and counſellor to the French king and the duke of Burgundy. He was ſent ambaſſador into England for that duke, and ſignalized himſelf, by his valour and conduct, in ſeveral engagements againſt the Engliſh.

CREW (Nathaniel) biſhop of Durham, was the ſon of John, lord Crew, and was born at Stene, in Northamptonſhire, on the 31ſt of Jan. 1633. In 1652, he was admitted commoner, in Lincoln-college, Oxford, and after ſeveral preferments in the church, was, in 1671, elected biſhop of Oxford, and, in 1674, was tranſlated to the ſee of Durham. In king James II.'s reign, he was appointed dean of the royal chapel and one of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion erected by that king, when he concurred in all the arbitrary meaſures taken to bring in popery, and even offered to attend the pope's nuncio, at his public entry into London; but his coachman refuſed to drive him that way. Thus he complied with the king's deſigns, till he found that the prince of Orange's party was likely to prevail, when he changed ſides, and was one of the firſt who voted that king James II had abdicated the throne. By the death of his two elder brothers, he became, in 1691, baron Crew of Stene. He died on the 18th of September, 1722, aged eighty-eight, after having been fifty years a biſhop; but leaving no iſſue, the title of baron Crew of Stene became extinct.

CRILLON (Lewis de Berton de) knight of Malta, and one of the greateſt captains of his age, was born in Provence, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour under the reigns of Henry II. Francis II. Charles IX. Henry III. and Henry IV. He particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battles of Dreux, Jarnac, Montcontour, and Lepanto. Henry IV. always called him the Brave Crillon. He died on the 2d of December, 1615, aged ſeventy-four.

CRIM Tartary, or the Crimea, a peninſula in the Black Sea, formerly called Taurica Cherſoneſus. It is one hundred and fifty miles in length, and one hundred in breadth, and is joined to the continent by a neck of land not above two or three miles in breadth. The inhabitants are called Crim Tartars, and they have not only villages, but towns and cities, and profeſs the Mohammedan religion. Theſe have given the name of Crim Tartars to the inhabitants of Leſſer Tartary, who live in a quite different manner.

Little Tartary lies near the Black Sea, and comprehends all the country lying between the mouth of the Danube and that of the Don, and is about four hundred and fifty miles in length, and two hundred and twenty-five in breadth. They are both governed by the ſame khan, or han, who has been tributary to the Turks ever ſince the year 1584. When the grand ſeignior commands the army in perſon, he is to ſupply him with an hundred thouſand men; but when the grand vizier only takes the field, with fifty thouſand. The air is cold, and generally foggy; and there is in many places a great want of wood, as well as of good water.

The ſtature of the Crim Tartars is rather low than otherwiſe, but ſtrong and bony, with broad ſhoulders, ſhort necks, round faces, large heads, flat noſes, ſallow complexions, and black hair, coarſe, like a horſe's mane. Their eyes are black, narrow, and long; in ſhort, they have a quite different aſpect and phyſiognomy from other Europeans. They are good, hardy ſoldiers, and will endure all ſorts of weather. At the age of ſeven, they leave their houſes, which are no other than huts drawn about on wheels, and are allowed no other nouriſhment but what they kill with their bows and arrows. At twelve, they commence ſoldiers; and, if there be occaſion, are ſent to the wars. Their habit is a ſhort cotton ſhirt, drawers, and cloſe breeches. The rich wear a pinked cotton caffetan, and a cloth gown over it, lined with furs, and a cap of the ſame. Inſtead of ſtockings, they have boots of red Turky leather, but no ſpurs. The common ſort wear only a caſſock of ſheep-ſkins, in hot weather with the wool outwards, which makes them look like bears on horſeback; but in winter, they turn the wool inwards, and have caps of the ſame

Their weapons are a ſcimeter, with a bow and quiver, holding about twenty arrows. They have a knife at their girdles, with a flint to ſtrike fire, and leathern thongs to bind the priſoners. Only the rich wear coats of mail; but they have all ſun-dials in their pockets. They are good horſemen, and govern their horſes with the greateſt dexterity, leaping from one to another while they are on full trot. Theſe animals are ugly, with long manes and tails, but they will run ſixty or ſeventy miles together without baiting.

Theſe Tartars eat no bread, but look upon horſe-fleſh as the greateſt delicacy, and always kill their horſes, when they are like to die or unable travel; they make no ſcruple of eating thoſe that die a natural death. They cut thin ſlices, and put it under their ſaddles till they think it is fit to eat, which is their manner of cooking it, except thoſe parts which cannot be ſliced; for this they boil with ſalt. Their drink is water, melted ſnow, and mares and aſſes milk. Thoſe that ſtay at home without going to the wars eat ewe kids, rams, and fowls, but no ſwine's fleſh, and ſome eat cakes made with any ſort of meal. They are great lovers of honey; and ſome make a drink of it. Thoſe that live in towns have bread, and a drink made of boiled millet; they are likewiſe fond of butter-milk, which they make freſh every day. They formerly uſed to take a vaſt number of Ruſſians to make ſlaves of them, making concubines of their wives and daughters, and circumciſing the children. When any of their daughters become marriageable, they cover her hut, or tent, with white linen, wherein ſhe is kept very cloſe; they ſometimes put a painted cloth on the top, which is tied with red ſtrings. They have alſo a painted waggon on the ſide of the tent, and this is to be her marriage portion. Thoſe who have a deſign to marry, obſerve this ſignal, and the girl is generally given to him who offers the father the moſt valuable preſent.

The khan chooſes a fertile plain to reſide in, and his court looks like a great city of houſes, and tents drawn on carts, and his houſe or hut is always in the middle. The houſes of the princes are of wicker, aſcending to the top like a dove-cote, and covered with white powdered bones to make them ſhine. Sometimes they are covered with felt, painted of various figures. The breadth of the carts are eighteen or twenty feet, and drawn with ten or twelve camels or oxen. The carts are placed at forty or fifty feet diſtance, with the doors always to the ſouth. It is no wonder this country is ſo populous, ſince they take or buy ſo many concubines, and the women in thoſe parts are generally fruitful. Their chief trade is in men, women, and children, which they make their buſineſs to take out of the neighbouring countries, and then ſell them to the Turks. The chief place of Crim-Tartary is Crim, which beſtows a name on half the Peninſula; but it is now a poor wretched place, and of very little importance.

CRINESIUS, (Christopher) a learned proteſtant divine; was born in Bohemia, in 1584, and was profeſſor of Altorf, where he died, in 1626. He wrote, 1. A Diſpute on the Confuſion of Languages; 2. Concordantiæ Hebraicæ; 3. Gymnaſium & Lexicon Syriacum, &c.

CRINITUS, (Peter) profeſſor of polite literature at Florence, the place of his birth; was the diſciple and ſucceſſor of Angelo Politian, and died about the year 1505, aged forty. He was the author of ſome Latin poems; of a Treatiſe de honeſta Diſciplina; and the Lives of the Latin Poets.

CRISPE, (Sir Nicolas) bart. an eminent merchant of London, diſtinguiſhed by his extraordinary knowledge in trade, and his loyalty to king Charles I. and II. He began the world with a large fortune, which he encreaſed by marriage; and being ſoon taken notice of at court, was knighted, and made one of the farmers of the king's revenues. He formed a project for reviving the trade to Guinea, and having engaged ſeveral wealthy merchants to ſecond him, carried that trade to its greateſt height; and, in the proſecution of this deſign, he cauſed the caſtle of Cormantyn, upon the Gold coaſt, to be erected at his own expence. When king Charles I. was in great diſtreſs for money, he, with the other farmers, advanced him 100,000l. at a very ſhort notice. After the war broke out, he continued to carry on a trade to Holland, France, Spain, Italy, Norway, Muſcovy, and Turkey, which produced to the king near 100,000 l. a-year, beſides keeping moſt of the ports open, and ſhips in them conſtantly ready for his ſervice. All the ſupplies of arms purchaſed in Holland and Denmark were conſigned to his care, and by his vigilance ſafely landed in the north. He had ſurpriſing addreſs in the management of the king's affairs, in which he made uſe of all kinds of diſguiſes, ſeldom truſting to others. Letters of conſequence he carried in the dreſs of a porter; when he wanted intelligence, he would appear at the water-ſide with a baſket of flounders upon his head, and often paſſed between London and Oxford in the dreſs of a butter-woman on horſe-back between a pair of panniers. But being at length betrayed by Mr. Waller, by which means he was rendered incapable of continuing his private ſervice, he raiſed a regiment of horſe for the king's ſervice, put himſelf at the head of it, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf as remarkably in his military, as he had done in his civil capacity. Till at laſt, the king's affairs growing deſperate, he went to France, where he ſtayed till he was permitted to return, and live quietly at home. After the death of Oliver Cromwell, he exerted himſelf in favour of the Reſtoration; and on king Charles the Second's return, was reinſtated in the poſt of farmer of the cuſtoms. In 1665, he was created a baronet; but died the ſame year, on the 16th of February, 1665, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age.

CRISPUS, the ſon of Conſtantine the Great and Minervina, his firſt wife; was made Cæſar in 317. He defeated the Germans, and diſcovered an extraordinary capacity in the military art, both by ſea and land: but Fauſta, his mother-in-law, conceiving a criminal paſſion for him, and being unable to corrupt him, accuſed him to the emperor, who, too eaſily believing her, put him to death. But the innocence of this young and virtuous prince was ſoon after made known.

CRISPUS, (JOHN BAPTIST) a good divine, and a good poet, was born a Gallipoli, in the kingdom of Naples, and lived at the end of the ſixteenth, and beginning of the ſeventeenth century. His chief work, which is a ſcarce and valuable performance, is, De Ethnicis Philoſophis cautè legendis, in folio.

CRITIAS, the diſciple of Socrates, and one of the thirty tyrants who governed the city of Athens, after its being taken by Lyſander, the Spartan general. He was a man of wit, and was poſſeſſed of very extraordinary talents; but theſe he employed in oppreſſing his country. He filled Athens with murders; occaſioned the death of Alcibiades and Theramines, and behaved with ſuch cruelty to thoſe who had been expelled Athens, that they united againſt him, entered Attica under the conduct of Thraſybulus, attacked Critias, who fought valiantly, and killed him, in the four hundredth year before the Chriſtian æra. Critias wrote ſome elogies, and other works, of which only a few fragments are now remaining.

CRITO, an Athenian philoſopher, and one of the moſt zealous of Socrates's diſciples, about four hundred and four years before the Chriſtian æra. He ſupplied Socrates with whatever he wanted, converſed with him as long as he lived; and compoſed ſome dialogues, which are loſt.

CRITOPYLUS, (METROPHANES) a native of Greece, came to England in the reign of king James I. in order to be inſtructed in the doctrine and diſcipline of our church. Upon his arrival, he addreſſed himſelf to archbiſhop Abbot, who placed him in Baliol college, Oxford, where he ſtudied the Latin and Engliſh tongues. In 1622, he returned into his own country; and, upon Cyrill's advancement to the patriarchate of Conſtantinople, he ſucceeded him in that of Alexandria. He died in 1628, and is ſaid to have been the author of a Confeſſion of Faith, publiſhed in Greek, in 1629, under the name of Cyrill.

CROATIA, a province of the kingdom of Hungary, bounded on the weſt by Carniola; on the north by the river Lava, which ſeparates it from Scalvonia; on the weſt by Boſnia, and on the north by the territory of Zara and the gulph of Carnero. It is divided into two parts, Morlaquia, and Carbaira. The inhabitants are called Croats, and have the reputation of being good ſoldiers, hardy and enterpriſing. The garment they wear cover them from head to foot, their waiſtcoat, breeches, and ſtockings being all of a-piece.

CRŒSUS, the fifth and laſt king of Lydia, of the family of the Mermnades, ſucceeded Alyattes, his father, in the five hundred and fifty-ſeventh year before the Chriſtian æra. He made the Greeks of Aſia tributary; ſubdued the Phrygians, Myſians, Paphlagonians, Thracians, and Carians; amaſſed together immenſe riches, and became one of the moſt powerful and magnificent princes in the world. He drew the learned to his court, and took a pleaſure in converſing with them. One day as he was enumerating his riches, and magnifying the felicity of his reign, Solon gave a check to his vanity, by ſaying, that we ought to conſider no man happy before his death. Crœſus ridiculed this reflection, but ſoon he himſelf experienced its truth: for, being defeated by Cyrus, he ſhut himſelf up in Sardes, the capital of his empire. That city was taken by aſſault, and, as a Perſian ſoldier was going to kill Crœſus, that prince's only ſurviving ſon, who had hitherto been dumb, terrified at his danger, he cried, Stop, ſoldier, and lay not thy hand on Crœſus. Crœſus was then conducted to Cyrus, who cauſed him to be laid on a funeral pile, in order to be burnt alive, when reflecting on Solon's words, he cried, O Solon, Solon! This raiſed the curioſity of Cyrus, who deſired to know what he meant, and being told the reaſon of this exclamation, he was ſo moved, that he recalled his ſentence, and ever after treated him with great reſpect.

CROFT, (HERBERT) biſhop of Hereford, was the third ſon of Sir Herbert Croft, and was born at Great Milton, in Oxfordſhire, on the 18th of October, 1603. He began his academical ſtudies at Oxford; but had not been long there before his father joined himſelf to the church of Rome, became a lay-brother in the Benedictine monaſtery at Douay, and a zealous advocate for popery. Upon his father's command he went over to him, and after a ſhort ſtay at Douay, was ſent to the Engliſh college of Jeſuits at St. Omer's, where, by the perſuaſion of father Lloyd, he became reconciled to the church of Rome, and entered into that order; but, ſome time before his father's death, which happened about five years after his going abroad, he was ſent back, to manage ſome family-affairs in England; when happily becoming acquainted with Dr. Morton, biſhop of Durham, he was brought back to the church of England, when returning a ſecond time to ſtudy at Oxford, he at length entered into holy orders, and, after ſeveral preferments in the church, was, in 1661, promoted to the ſee of Hereford, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his conſtant preaching, his hoſpitable manner of living, and his extenſive charity. He publiſhed an excellent pamphlet, intitled, The Naked Truth, or, the True State of the Primitive Church, which made a prodigious noiſe in the world, and was read by all people of ſenſe and learning in the kingdom. He alſo publiſhed a few other works, and after having ſat almoſt thirty years in the ſee of Hereford, died on the 18th of May, 1691.

CROI, (JOHN DE) in Latin Croius, one of the moſt learned miniſters in France, was born at Uſez, and performed his paſtoral functions in the church of Beziers, and afterwards in that of Uſez. He publiſhed ſeveral controverſical works in French, but his Latin works gained him a much greater reputation; theſe are Obſervations on ſome paſſages in Origen, Irenæus, and Tertullian; and Sacred and Hiſtorical Obſervations upon the New Teſtament. He died Auguſt 31, 1659.

CROIA, formerly a ſtrong town of Albany, in Turky in Europe, with a fort, and a biſhop's ſee; but it has been demoliſhed by the Turks. It is ſituated near the gulph of Venice, eighteen Miles north-eaſt of Durazzo, and twenty-eight ſouth of Scutari. Long. 19. 33. W. Lat. 41. 46. N.

CROKEHORN, CREWKERN, or CROOKHORN, a town of Somerſetſhire, ſituated on the river Parret, with a market on Saturdays. The fair is on September 4, for horſes, bullocks, drapery, cheeſe, and toys. It is one hundred and thirty-three miles from London. Long. 3. 0. W. Lat. 50. 50. N.

CROKE, (Sir GEORGE) an eminent lawyer in the reign of Charles I. was the ſon of Sir John Croke of Chiltam, in Buckinghamſhire, and was promoted to the common pleas on the 11th of February, 1623, and to the king's bench on the 9th of October, 1628. He joined to a very uncommon capacity, all the induſtry requiſite to make a figure in his profeſſion; and what was more to his honour than both, an invincible integrity. He pleaded with his uſual ability againſt ſhip-money, and his arguments in that caſe are publiſhed with Sir Richard Hutton's. He died on the 15th of February, 1641. His Reports, in three volumes folio, were publiſhed after his deceaſe, by Sir Harbottle Grimſton, his ſon-in-law.

CROMARTIE, the capital of the ſhire of Cromartie, in Scotland, ſituated on the German ſea, at the mouth of the river Cromartie. Long. 3. 41. W. Lat. 57. 40. N.

CROMER, a town in Norfolk, with a market on Saturdays. It was formerly much larger than it is at preſent, having two pariſh-churches, one of which was ſwallowed up, with ſeveral houſes, by an innundation of the ſea, it ſtanding on the ſea-coaſt, and is now chiefly inhabited by fiſhermen. Here is a fair on Whit-Monday, for petty chapmen. It is forty-four miles from Norwich, ſixty-ſix from Ipſwich, one hundred and twenty ſeven from London, and lies north of them all. Long. 1. 25. W. Lat. 52. 50. N.

CROMER, (MARTIN) a learned biſhop of Warmia, in the ſixteenth century; wrote a hiſtory of Poland, and ſome controverſial pieces againſt the proteſtants. He died on the 23d of March, 1589.

CROMWELL, (THOMAS) earl of Eſſex, and one of the moſt eminent ſtateſmen in the ſixteen century, was the ſon of a blackſmith at Putney, near London, in his latter days a brewer. He was educated in a private ſchool, where he learned reading, writing, and a little Latin; but afterwards travelling, he ſeized the opportunity of learning ſeveral languages. Coming to Antwerp, where was then a conſiderable Engliſh factory, he was retained to be their clerk, or ſecretary; and afterwards he embraced an opportunity that offered in 1510, of taking a journey to Rome. While he remained in Italy, he ſerved for ſome time as a ſoldier under the duke of Bourbon: and at Bologna he aſſiſted John Ruſſel, eſq. afterwards earl of Bedford, in making his eſcape, when he was in danger of being taken by the French. It is remarkable, that Cromwell, in his journey to and from Rome, learned by heart the New Teſtament of Eraſmus's tranſlation. After his return from his travels, he was taken into the family and ſervice of cardinal Wolſey; who, obſerving his great parts and diligence, made him his ſolicitor, and often employed him in affairs of great importance. In return for theſe favours, Cromwell defended his maſter in the houſe of commons, of which he was then a member, with great wit and eloquence. After the cardinal's death, he was taken into the king's ſervice, as the fitteſt perſon to manage the diſputes the king then had with the pope. In 1531, he was knighted, made maſter of the king's jewel-houſe, and conſtituted a privy counſellor. The next year he was made clerk of the hanaper, and the ſame year chancellor of the exchequer. In 1534, he was made principal ſecretary of ſtate, and maſter of the rolls; and the next year appointed viſitor-general of the monaſteries throughout England, in order for their ſuppreſſion. In 1536, he was made lord-keeper of the privy-ſeal, when he reſigned his maſterſhip of the rolls. The ſame year he was advanced to the dignity of a baron, by the title of Cromwell, lord Oakham, in Rutlandſhire; and alſo made vicar-general and vicegerent over all the ſpiritualities under the king, who was declared ſupreme head of the church; upon which he ſent inſtructions to all deans, parſons, vicars, and curates, ordering them to preach up the king's ſupremacy; and, inſtead of diſplaying their rhetoric on images, relics, and pilgrimages, to exhort the people to ſerve God, and make proviſion for their families, to put parents, and other directors of youth, in mind to teach their children the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and Ten Commandments, in their mother tongue; and to provide a Bible in Latin and Engliſh, to be laid in the churches, for every one to read at their pleaſure, &c. In ſhort, having been highly inſtrumental in promoting a reformation, and pulling down the monaſteries, he was, in 1539, rewarded with many noble manors belonging to thoſe diſſolved houſes; and, on the 17th of April, the ſame year, was advanced to the dignity of earl of Eſſex. At length, uſing his utmoſt endeavours to procure a marriage between king Henry and Anne of Cleves, whoſe friends were Lutherans, as the moſt effectual method to ſecure both himſelf and the proteſtant religion, this very ſtep produced his deſtruction; for the king, not liking the queen, took an invincible averſion to Cromwell, and ſeveral articles being brought againſt him, reſolved to give him up; and having cauſed him to be arreſted at the council-table, ſent him to the Tower: when a bill of attainder having paſſed both houſes, he was brought to a ſcaffold erected on Tower-hill, where, after having made a ſpeech, and prayed, he was beheaded, on the 28th of July, 1540. Thus fell Thomas lord Cromwell, though it is ſaid, that for piety towards God, fidelity to his king, prudence in the management of affairs, gratitude to his benefactors, duty to his parents, charity, and benevolence, there was not then any one ſuperior to him in the kingdom.

CROMWELL (OLIVER) ſtyled lord protector of England, one of the greateſt generals and moſt artful politicians that this or any other country has produced, was the ſon of Robert Cromwell, the ſecond ſon of Sir Henry Cromwell of Hinchinbrooke, in the county of Huntingdon, knight, and was born at Huntingdon, on the 24th or 25th of April 1599. He ſtudied ſome time at Sydney college in Cambridge, and afterwards removed to Lincoln's Inn, London, after which he married, and ſettled at Huntingdon till the death of his uncle ſir Thomas Stuart, who left him an eſtate of between four and five hundred pounds a-year, which induced him to remove to the iſle of Ely, about which time he began to leave the church and converſe with the puritans. He was elected a member of the third parliament of king Charles I. which met January 20, 1628; and having ſpent part of his eſtate in returning the ſums of money he had formerly won at play, and in aſſiſting the ſilenced miniſters, reſolved in 1637 to go over to America, and ſettle with his wife and family in New England, but was ſtopped by a proclamation for reſtraining ſuch embarkations, when, it is ſaid, he and others were ſailing down the river in a boat, in order to embark on board the ſhip that was to carry them. He was afterwards choſen member for Cambridge in the long parliament, when he was very free in cenſuring grievances both in church and ſtate, and very zealous in promoting the remonſtrance which was carried on the 14th of November 1641, which laid the baſis of the civil war. As ſoon as the parliament formed ſchemes of raiſing forces for their ſervice, which was at the beginning of the year 1642, he immediately went to Cambridge, where he raiſed a very good troop of horſe; and having ſoon taken a large quantity of arms and ammunition from the royaliſts, he encreaſed his forces, and was in a ſhort time at the head of a thouſand horſe, with the title of colonel Cromwell: and it is very ſurpriſing, that being in his forty-third year before he had thoughts of appearing in a military character, he ſhould notwithſtanding in the ſpace of a few months become a ſkilful officer, and render his new-raiſed men excellent ſoldiers, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves as often as they fought. Cromwell being very active in the parliament's ſervice, was ſoon after appointed lieutenant-general of the horſe under the earl of Mancheſter, who joining the Scots, enabled them to reduce York: and in the battle of Marſton-Moor it is unanimouſly agreed that Cromwell's cavalry, who were commonly ſtyled Ironſides, changed the fortune of the day. Cromwell's reputation ſtill encreaſing, he was made lieutenant general of the army, when after ſeveral victories he gained the battle of Naſeby; and this, with his other ſucceſſes, ſoon put an end to the war. In ſhort, the unhappy king was delivered up by the Scots. Cromwell and the parliament entered into a treaty with him; but that prince's ſecret deſigns being diſcovered by Cromwell's vigilance, and that of his ſpies, he found that his own ſafety made it neceſſary to change his conduct. After various turns the king was brought to his trial, Cromwell himſelf being one of the high court of juſtice, and being principally concerned in his death.

The houſe of lords was now declared uſeleſs, and a council of ſtate appointed to govern the nation. Cromwell, after quelling ſeveral mutinies in his army, was, in 1649, ſent general into Ireland, when in about nine months he ſubdued almoſt that whole kingdom, and leaving his ſon Ireton to complete the conqueſt, returned to England, where he was made general in the room of lord Fairfax. He then went to Scotland, routed the Scots army at Dunbar, took Edinburgh, Leith, and other places, purſued king Charles II's army to England, defeated it at Worceſter, September 3, 1651, and returned to London, where the parliament ſettled four thouſand pounds a-year upon him. He began now with his officers to complain of the long parliament, which on the 20th of April, 1653, he diſſolved by force, and two days after publiſhed a declaration of his reaſons, ſigned by himſelf and his council of officers. July 4, he called a parliament, and by an inſtrument conſtituted them the ſupreme authority; and on the 13th of December following, they reſigned their powers to him, and an inſtrument of government was drawn up, by which he was declared lord protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and upon December 16 he was inſtalled. He now applied himſelf to the management of the ſeveral parties; he ſupplied the benches of the courts of Weſtminſter with the ableſt lawyers, but at the ſame time acted in the moſt unjuſtifiable, arbitrary, and oppreſſive manner, where his own intereſt was concerned. He however made himſelf feared and courted by all the powers of Europe; and having raiſed the glory of England to its higheſt pitch, died on the third of September 1658, in the ſixtieth year of his age, and his funeral was magnificently ſolemnized on the 23d of November following.

CROMWELL (RICHARD) the eldeſt ſon of the former, and named by him for his ſucceſſor before his death, was, by order of the privy-council proclaimed lord protector with great ſtate. Addreſſes were preſented to him from all parts of the nation, promiſing that they would ſtand by him; and a parliament being ſummoned and met, paſſed a bill to recognize him as protector, and for reſtoring the houſe of lords; but debates ariſing about ſetting bounds to his power, and to that of the upper houſe, and Richard not being able to conceal the meaſures he took to bind the fleet and militia to his intereſt, great jealouſies aroſe between him and the army. Fleetwood and Deſborough, the firſt his brother-in-law, and the latter his uncle, gained over the officers of the army, and took the government into their own hands; but finding the people diſſatisfied with their proceedings, they called together ſuch members of the long parliament as were then in town, but ſuffered none of their fellow-members to ſit who did not ſubſcribe the engagement, nor ſat with them ſince 1648. They next choſe a council of ſtate of twenty-one perſons, and ſet about ſettling the king's and other public lands. They then ſent to deſire Richard to reſign the government, to which he readily conſented. He then travelled, and at his return to England lived like a private gentleman in the country, and died on the 24th of July 1702, aged eighty.

CRONACH, a town of Germany, in the circle of Franconia, has a good citadel ſeated on an eminence. It is ſubject to the the biſhop of Bamberg, and is ſituated on a river of the ſame name, thirteen miles eaſt of Coburg, and twenty-five north-eaſt of Bamberg. Long. 11. 20. E. Lat. 50 25. N.

CRONEGK, (JOHN FREDERICK DE) an eminent German poet, was the ſon of Frederick John Charles de Cronegk, lieutenant field-marſhal of the circle of Franconia, and was born at Anſpach on the ſecond of September 1731. He became early acquainted with the Latin, Engliſh, French, Italian, and Spaniſh tongues. He ſpoke theſe languages, and being paſſionately fond of polite literature, not only read all the good Roman authors, but many of thoſe of the other nations of Europe, from which he accuſtomed himſelf to make extracts and notes, that ſerved greatly to perfect his taſte, and extend his knowledge. In 1749 he went to the univerſity of Hall, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the law. In 1753, after being made gentleman of the chamber, and counſellor of juſtice to the margrave of Brandenburg Anſpach, he travelled through Italy and France, and contracted a friendſhip with the moſt ingenious men wherever he came. He wrote in German, 1. A Poem on Solitude, in ſix books. 2. Codrus, a Tragedy. 3. Several Comedies. 4. Satires, moral Poems, Odes, and Songs; with ſeveral pieces which he left unfiniſhed. In 1758, going to ſee his father, who, in quality of general of the troops in the circle of Franconia, had his quarters at Nuremberg, he was there ſeized with the ſmall-pox, of which he died on the laſt day of that year, at only twenty-ſix years of age.

CRONENBURG, a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and in Wetteravia, has been ſubject to the elector of Mentz ever ſince the year 1704. The town and caſtle are pretty well built, and ſtand at the foot of a mountain, in a fertile ſoil. The town is ſurrounded with a double wall, and is ten miles north of Francfort on the Maine. Long. 8. 15. E. Lat. 50. 15. N.

CRONENBURG, a ſtrong and important fortreſs of Denmark, ſeated in Zealand, where the ſtrait called the Sound is but half a league over. Frederick II. laid the foundation in 1580, and it was finiſhed in five years time. It is built upon piles, and was magnificently furniſhed at his expence. In the middle of this fort is a fountain, which ſupplies the whole garriſon with plenty of water. In 1658 it was pillaged by the Swedes, who took away the rich furniture and ſilver ſtatues. However ſince that time it has been pretty well reſtored to its former condition. This and Elſeneur are the keys of the Sound, where the Danes take toll of all ſhips that come into the Baltic. Long. 12. 50. E. Lat. 56. 0. N.

CRONSLOT, an iſland in the mouth of the river Neva, at the entrance of the gulph of Finland, remarkable for a fort of that name built therein, or rather in the ſea, for it is ſurrounded on all ſides by that element. It was conſtructed of ſtone in 1704, and guards the entrance of the Neva. There is likewiſe a harbour for the Ruſſian men of war, with magazines of naval ſtores, docks, and yards for building ſhips. This place was only inhabited by a few fiſhermen, but the czar cauſed a pretty large town to be built of the ſame name. The fort or caſtle is about a cannon ſhot from the iſland, a mile from the coaſt of Ingria, and thirteen miles weſt of Peterſburg. The foundations were laid in winter, with boxes made of timber filled with ſtones. It is in the form of round tower, with three galleries about it, one above another, well furniſhed with cannon from top to bottom. Over-againſt it on the iſland are two batteries of ten or twelve guns. The houſes of the town are of wood, and diſperſed without ſo much as a ditch or hedge about them. There is one large ſtone building, with two wings, adapted for trade and merchandize, and the two remaining ſtories for a palace. There are four others for warehouſes. Long. 30. 0. E. Lat. 60. 0. N.

CRONSTADT, a town of Ingria or Ingermania, in Muſcovy, is ſeated in the iſle of Retuſary, in the gulph of Finland, and was in the beginning but a ſmall fort; but in 1721 a town was built here, with large ſtreets, and ſeveral good houſes for the better ſort of people. Here the officers of the cuſtoms live, and a great number of ſeamen. In 1736 a dock was cut for the refitting of ſhips. It is about thirty-five miles weſt of Cronſlot. Long. 29. 25. E. Lat. 60. 0. N.

CRONSTAT, a town of Hungary in Tranſylvania, ſeated near the frontiers of Moldavia. It is the moſt populous place in all Tranſylvania; for the Hungarians and Walachians are permitted to live in the ſuburbs; and the Germans, who inhabit the town, have a proteſtant college, with a fine library. They have a pretty good trade, and cultivate a great deal of flax in the adjacent country. It is well fortified, and has a good caſtle ſtanding on a hill. They have here a well frequented annual fair. It is ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria, and is fifty miles north-eaſt of Hermanſtat. Long. 25. 0. E. Lat. 47. 0. N.

CROSS, an Engliſh artiſt, and an admirable copyer of paintings, who flouriſhed in the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. A ſtory is told of him that gives us a much better idea of his ſkill than of his honeſty. Being employed by the firſt of thoſe kings to copy ſeveral eminent pieces in Italy, and having leave of the ſtate of Venice to copy the celebrated Madona of Raphael in St. Mark's church, he performed the taſk ſo admirably, that they did not immediately perceive that he had changed the pictures, and, leaving his copy, had taken away the original. It was not long, however, before the fraud was diſcovered, and ſeveral meſſengers ſent after him, but he is ſaid to have got the ſtart of them ſo far as to carry it clear off. This picture, when the king's goods were expoſed to ſale, was ſold to the Spaniſh ambaſſador. Mr. Croſs likewiſe made excellent copies of Titian's Europa, and other celebrated pieces.

CROSSEN, a town of Sileſia, and capital of a principality of the ſame name. It is ſurrounded with walls, has a good caſtle, and the houſes are built of ſtone. It is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Bober and Oder, in a fertile ſoil, which abounds with vineyards and fruit-trees. It is thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Frankfort on the Oder. Long. 15. 36. E. Lat. 52. 5. N.

CROTOY, a ſmall town of France in Picardy, ſeated at the mouth of the river Somme. It had fortifications, but they are demoliſhed. It is thirteen miles north-weſt of Abbeville. Long. 1. 45. E. Lat. 50. 15. N.

CROUZAS (JOHN PETER DE) a learned philoſopher and mathematician, born at Lauſanne on the 13th of April, 1663. His father, who deſigned him for the profeſſion of arms, had him taught the military art; but the young Crouzas having no inclination to it, and ſighing after literary ſtudies, his friends were obliged to allow him the liberty of purſuing his inclinations; he had therefore the ableſt maſters, and having made great progreſs in the mathematics and the philoſophy of Des Cartes, travelled to Geneva, Holland, and France; was ſucceſſively profeſſor in ſeveral univerſities; and at length was choſen governor to prince Frederic of Heſſe-Caſſel, nephew to the king of Sweden. He wrote many works, the moſt eſteemed of which are, 1. His Logic, the beſt edition of which is that of 1741, in ſix volumes octavo. 2. A Treatiſe on Beauty. 3. A Treatiſe on the Education of Children, two volumes, duodecimo. 4. Several Treatiſes on philoſophical and mathematical Subjects, &c. He died at Lauſanne in 1748.

CROWLAND, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Saturdays. This place was formerly famous for its abbey, founded by Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, in 716. The town is ſeated very low, in deep ſens, almoſt in the manner of Venice. It conſiſts of three ſtreets, ſeparated from each other by water courſes, and planted with willows, and the banks are ſecured by piles. They communicate with each other by a triangular bridge. The lowneſs of its ſituation admits of no carriages, and yet it is well inhabited on account of the great quantity of fiſh and wild ducks, taken in the adjacent pools and marſhes. The diſtance from Peterborough is eleven miles, and it is ninety-three north of London. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 52. 40. N.

CROWNE (JOHN) a dramatic writer of the laſt century, was the ſon of an independent miniſter of Nova Scotia, but diſliking the education he received there, he came to England, where employing himſelf in writing he made himſelf known to the court and city, and by the recommendation of the earl of Rocheſter, who was willing to mortify Mr. Dryden, he was nominated by king Charles II. to write the Maſque of Calypſo. Some time after he wrote a comedy called the City Politics, in order to ridicule and expoſe the whigs; but party intrigues prevented its appearing on the ſtage, till the king himſelf laid his abſolute commands on the lord chancellor to have it acted immediately. About the latter end of this reign, tired out with writing, and deſiring to ſcreen himſelf from the reſentment of the many enemies he had made by his City Politics, he addreſſed the king for an eſtabliſhment in ſome office. His majeſty promiſed that he ſhould be provided for, but added, that he muſt ſee another of his comedies, when Crowne, objecting the ſlowneſs of his genius in forming a plot, the king replied, that he would help him to one, and gave him the Spaniſh comedy called Non Poder eſſer, from which he took his comedy of Sir Courtly Nice; but juſt as it was ready to appear, and Mr. Crowne was flattering himſelf with the hopes of being happy during the remaining part of his life, the death of the king blaſted all his proſpects. He wrote in all ſeventeen plays, ſome of which were acted with great ſucceſs, and died about the year 1703.

CROXAL, (SAMUEL) D. D. an eminent poet and divine, was born at Walton upon Thames, and was educated at Eton-ſchool, from whence he was ſent to St. John's college in Cambridge. While he was at the univerſity, it is ſaid that he was firſt inſpired with love by Mrs. Anna Maria Mordaunt, to whom he dedicates his tender poem of the Fair Circaſſian. Soon after his leaving the univerſity, he was

was inſtituted to the living of Hampton, in Middleſex, and afterwards to the united pariſhes of St. Mary Somerſet, and St. Mary Mounthaw, in London. He was likewiſe chancellor, prebendary, and canon-reſidentiary of Hereford, and at length was made archdeacon of Salop, and chaplain in ordinary to his late majeſty. Beſides the above poem, he wrote two cantos in imitation of Spencer's Fairy Queen; the Viſion, a poem addreſſed to the earl of Hallifax; an entire Tranſlation of Æſop's Fables; with many other poems and tranſlations, and died in 1751.

CROYDON, a town of Surry, with a market on Saturdays. It is ſeated on the edge of Banſted Downs, in a very pleaſant place. The church is large and handſome, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury has a palace here. There is alſo an hoſpital and a free-ſchool. The fairs are July 5, and October 2, for horſes, bullocks, ſheep, and toys. It is ten miles ſouth of London. Long. 0. 5. W. Lat. 51. 22. N.

CROZE (Mathurin Veyssiere la) librarian to the king of Pruſſia, and a learned profeſſor of philoſophy at Berlin, was born at Nantes, on the 4th of December, 1662. He took a voyage to America, learned the ancient and modern languages, and, in 1678, became a Benedictine monk. However, he left that order in 1696, and abjured the popiſh religion at Baſil, from whence he went to Berlin, where he employed himſelf in inſtructing youth, and the following year obtained the poſt of librarian to the king of Pruſſia. In ſhort, he was, in 1724, profeſſor of philoſophy at Berlin, and died there on the 21ſt of May, 1739, aged ſeventy-eight. He was the author of many works, the principal of which are, 1. Hiſtorical Diſſertations on ſeveral Subjects. 2. Converſations on ſeveral hiſtorical Subjects. 3. An Armenian Dictionary, two volumes, quarto. 4. The Hiſtory of Chriſtianity in Ethiopia and Armenia.

CRUSADES, or expeditions in order to reſcue the Holy Land out of the hands of infidels. As theſe expeditions conſtitute a remarkable object in the hiſtory of Europe, it will be proper here both to take ſome notice of the ſpirit which gave riſe to them, and a general view of theſe expeditions. It is natural to the human mind, to view thoſe places that have been diſtinguiſhed by being the reſidence of any illuſtrious perſonage, or the ſcene of any great tranſaction, with ſome degree of delight and veneration. From this principle flowed the ſuperſtitious devotion, with which Chriſtians, from the earlieſt ages of the church, were accuſtomed to viſit that country which the Almighty had ſelected as the inheritance of his favourite people, and in which the Son of God had accompliſhed the redemption of mankind. As this diſtant pilgrimage could not be performed without conſiderable expence, fatigue, and danger, it appeared the more meritorious, and came to be conſidered as an expiation for almoſt every crime; an opinion which ſpread with rapidity over Europe, about the cloſe of the tenth and beginning of the eleventh century. The thouſand years, mentioned by St. John in Revel. xx. were then ſuppoſed to be accompliſhed, and the end of the world to be at hand. A general conſternation ſeized mankind; many relinquiſhed their poſſeſſions, and abandoning their friends and families, hurried with precipitation to the Holy Land, where they imagined that Chriſt would quickly appear to judge the world. While Paleſtine continued ſubject to the caliphs, they had encouraged the reſort of pilgrims to Jeruſalem, and conſidered this as a beneficial ſpecies of commerce, which brought into their dominions gold and ſilver, and carried nothing out of them but relics. But the Turks having conquered Syria about the middle of the eleventh century, pilgrims were expoſed to outrages of every kind from theſe fierce barbarians. This change happening preciſely at the time, when the above panic terror juſt mentioned rendered pilgrimages moſt frequent, filled Europe with alarm and indignation. Every perſon who returned from Paleſtine related the dangers he had encountered, and deſcribed with exaggeration the cruelty and vexations they had ſuffered from the Turks.

When the minds of the people were thus prepared, the zeal of a fanatic monk, who conceived the idea of leading all the forces of Chriſtendom againſt the infidels, and of driving them out of the Holy Land by violence, was ſufficient to give a beginning to that wild enterprize. Peter the Hermit ran from province to province, with a crucifix in his hand, exciting princes and people to this holy war, and wherever he came kindled the ſame enthuſiaſtic ardour for it, with which he himſelf was animated. The council of Placentia, where upwards of thirty thouſand perſons were aſſembled, pronounced the ſcheme to have been ſuggeſted by the immediate inſpiration of heaven. In the council of Clermont, ſtill more numerous, as ſoon as the meaſure was propoſed, all cried out, with one voice, "It is the will of "God." Perſons of all ranks were ſmitten with the contagion; not only the nobles of that age, with their martial followers, whom the boldneſs of a romantic enterprize might have been apt to allure, but men in the more humble and pacific ſtations of life, eccleſiaſtics of every order, and even women and children, engaged with emulation in an undertaking which was deemed ſacred and meritorious. If we may believe the concurring teſtimony of cotemporary authors, ſix millions of perſons aſſumed the croſs, which was the badge that diſtinguiſhed ſuch as devoted themſelves to this holy warfare. All Europe, ſays the princeſs Anna Comnena, torn from its foundations, ſeemed ready to precipitate itſelf in one united body upon Aſia; nor did the fumes of this enthuſiaſtic zeal evaporate at once; the phrenzy was as laſting as it was extravagant. During two centuries, Europe ſeems to have had no other object but to cover or keep poſſeſſion of the Holy Land; and through that period, vaſt armies continued to march thither. The diſorders committed by theſe cruſaders, in their paſſage to the Holy Land, were exceeding great; many thouſand Jews were murdered, and their treaſures ſeized, and innumerable rapes and robberies were committed in the countries through which they paſſed. On the other hand, many hundred thouſand Chriſtians died of famine, and fatigue. However, the efforts of their valour, animated by enthuſiaſm, were irreſiſtible; part of the Leſſer Aſia, all Syria, and Paleſtine, were wreſted from the infidels; the banner of a croſs was diſplayed on Mount Sion; Conſtantinople, the capital of the Chriſtian empire in the Eaſt, the fineſt city in the world, was ſeized by a body of theſe adventurers, who had taken arms againſt the Mahometans, and an earl of Flanders, and his deſcendants, kept poſſeſſion of the imperial throne during half a century; but eſtabliſhments ſo diſtant from Europe, ſurrounded by warlike nations, were perpetually in danger of being overturned. Before the expiration of the thirteenth century, the Chriſtians were driven out of their Aſiatic poſſeſſions, in acquiring of which incredible numbers of men had periſhed, and immenſe ſums of money had been waſted. This, the only common enterprize in which all the European nations ever engaged, and which all undertook with equal ardour, remains a ſingular monument of human folly; yet from theſe extravagant expeditions the moſt beneficial conſequences flowed, with reſpect to the liberty, the commerce, and the happineſs of Europe, which had neither been foreſeen nor expected. Robertſon's Hiſtory of the Emperor Charles V. See the article Feudal System.

CRUSER (Herman) a learned writer of the ſixteenth century, was born at Campen, and was ſkilled in the languages, in philoſophy, phyſic, and civil law. He was counſellor to Charles, duke of Guelderland, and afterwards to William, duke of Cleves. He died at Koningſberg, in 1574. He tranſlated into Latin ſixteen books of Galen, Plutarch's Lives and Morals, and compoſed ſeveral works.

CRUSIUS (Martin) an able writer in the ſixteenth century, was born at Grebern, in the biſhoprick of Bamberg, on the 19th of September, 1526, and died at Eſlingen, on the 25th of February, 1607, after he had taught polite literature at Tubingen and elſewhere. He wrote, 1. An excellent collection, in Greek and Latin, intitled Turco-Græcia, a work of great uſe in order to underſtand the hiſtory and language of the modern Greeks. 2. Annales Suevici, a ſcarce and valuable work, &c.

CTESIAS, a famous Greek hiſtorian and phyſician, born at Gnidos, was at the battle fought by Cyrus the Younger againſt his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, the four hundred and firſt year before the birth of Chriſt, when, being taken priſoner, he cured a wound Artaxerxes had received in the engagement, ſtaid with that prince, and practiſed phyſic in Perſia during ſeventeen years. He compoſed the Hiſtory of the Aſſyrians and Perſians in twenty-three books, fragments of which are to be found in Photius and Euſebius. The greateſt number of critics give no credit to the authority of Cteſias, while others prefer his chronology to that of Herodotus.

CTESIBIUS, of Alexandria, a famous mathematician, in the time of Ptolemy Phyſcon, about one hundred and twenty years before the Chriſtian æra. He was the firſt who invented hydraulic organs.

CTESIPHON, a celebrated Greek architect, who gave the deſigns for the famous temple of Epheſus, and invented a machine for bringing thither the columns to be uſed in that noble ſtructure.

CUBA, an iſland of North America, at the entrance of the gulph of Mexico. It is about three hundred and ſixty miles long, and ninety broad. Chriſtopher Columbus diſcovered it the ſecond voyage he made to America. The air is not exceeding hot, and is pretty wholeſome. The country is full of mountains, foreſts, and lakes, and yet is tolerably fruitful in ſeveral places, eſpecially near the ſhore; for there are a great many rivulets running from the hills, though they have but a ſhort courſe. They have a particular ſort of tree, called caninga, whoſe bark hath the taſte of cinnamon and cloves, which ſerves the inhabitants for ſpice. Some of the cedars are ſo large, that they ſerve to make canoes, canoes, which will hold fifty men. They have a ſort of wild vines; but the grapes are not fit to make wine. They have mines of copper, and, ſome ſay, of gold. The tortoiſes, or ſea-turtles, are ſo large and numerous, that the Spaniards make uſe of them to victual their fleet, when they are homeward bound. The trees and fruits which grow here are moſt of them common to the Weſt Indies; but they are remakable for a particular ſort of tobacco, of which they make Havanna ſnuff. They have large walks of cocoa-trees and ſugar-canes, by which means they make excellent ſugars; they have likewiſe horſe-mills, water-mills, and plenty of mules. The black cattle have increaſed ſo faſt ſince they were brought here, that they are in very great plenty, inſomuch that they run wild in the woods; beſides which, they have horſes, wild boars, hogs, and ſheep, which were brought originally from Europe. The ſhores abound with ſea-fowl, particularly a ſort of cranes, which are white when young, and of ſeveral colours when old. They have a great number of alligators, which much infeſt the rivers. Great numbers of cattle are killed only for their ſkins, and their fleſh is left to rot on the ground; though ſome of it is dried in the ſun, and is uſed in victualling ſhips. Upon the whole, it is a pleaſant iſland, and greatly improved by the Spaniards, and might be much more ſo in diligent hands.

There are abundance of commodious harbours about the iſland; and one in particular, on the ſouth ſide, where an Engliſh admiral and general landed ſeveral thouſand men in 1741; but they going at an improper time, the rainy ſeaſon came on, which cauſed a mortality among the men, and forced the remainder to return to Jamaica without attempting any thing. It was, however, taken by the Engliſh, in July, 1761, but was reſtored to the Spaniards by the peace of 1763. St. Jago is called the capital of the iſland; but the Havannah is much more conſiderable, on account of its trade, and the annual rendezvous of the galleons on their return to Spain. Cuba is about one hundred and twenty miles ſouth of Florida, fifty weſt of Hiſpaniola, and ſeventy north of Jamaica.

CUCKFIELD, a town in Suſſex, with a market on Fridays, and four fairs, viz. on May 25, for cattle and pedlar's ware; on Whitſunday and Sept. 19, for cattle and ſheep; and on November 18, for cattle and pedlar's ware. It is twelve miles north-weſt of Lewes, thirty eaſt-north-eaſt of Chicheſter, and forty-two ſouth of London. Long. 17. 23. W. Lat. 51. 5. N.

CUDWORTH (Ralph) a very learned divine of the church of England, was born at Aller, in Somerſetſhire, in the year 1617, and educated at Cambridge. He was afterwards preſented to the rectory of North Cadbury, in Somerſetſhire. In 1644, he was choſen maſter of Clare hall, Cambridge; the next year he was made regius profeſſor of the Hebrew language; and, in 1654, he was choſen maſter of Chriſt college. He was one of the perſons nominated by a committee of the parliament to be conſulted about the Engliſh tranſlation of the Bible; for he underſtood the oriental languages, and was an exact critic in the Greek and Latin. He was a good antiquary, mathematician, and philoſopher, and was ſuperior to all his cotemporaries in metaphyſics. He publiſhed, 1. A Diſcourſe on the true Notion of the Lord's Supper. 2. A Treatiſe entitled Chriſt and his Church in a Shadow. 3. His True Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe; and, 4. The Divine Goodneſs vindicated againſt the Aſſertions of abſolute inconditionate Reprobation. He died June 26, 1688, in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age, and left ſeveral poſthumous work, as a Treatiſe on Moral Good and Evil, a Treatiſe of Liberty and Neceſſity, and ſeveral others.

CUENZA, a town of Spain, in New Caſtile, ſeated on a hill, among the high mountains, near the confluence of the rivers Xucar and Gueſcar, with a biſhop's ſee. It was taken by the lord Peterborough, in 1706, but the duke of Berwick retook it after a vigorous reſiſtance. It is ſeventy-eight miles eaſt-by-north of Toledo, and ſeventy-four eaſt-by-ſouth of Madrid. Long. 1. 45. W. Lat. 40. 10. N.

CUEVA (John de la) a famous Spaniſh poet, whoſe tragedies are admired by the Spaniards.

Cueva (Alphonso de la) more known by the name of the Marquis of Bedmar, was a famous Spaniard, of an illuſtrious and ancient family, who being ſent ambaſſador to Venice, in the year 1618, formed, in conjunction with the duke d' Oſſona, governor of Naples, a conſpiracy that would have ruined Venice, had it not been diſcovered by two Frenchmen. The marquis de Bedmar fled, and was created cardinal by Gregory XV. in 1622: and afterwards the king of Spain made him governor of the Netherlands; but the ſeverity of his behaviour in that poſt occaſioned his being diſgraced; on which he retired to Rome, where he obtained the biſhoprick of Paleſtrina, and afterwards that of Malaga. He died on the 10th of Auguſt, 1665, aged eighty-three. There is attributed to him a treatiſe in Italian againſt the republic of Venice.

CUFF (Henry) a famous ſcholar, and celebrated wit, was born in 1560, and at the age of ſixteen was admitted a ſtudent of Trinity college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow; but was ſome time after deprived of his fellowſhip, and even expelled the college, on account of a reflection, which, in one of his merry moods, he had thrown upon the character of ſir Thomas Pope, the founder of the college. He was however, notwithſtanding this circumſtance, received into Merton college, of which he likewiſe became a fellow; and was alſo promoted to the profeſſorſhip of Greek, and choſen proctor of the univerſity. His excellent parts recommended him to the notice of Robert, earl of Eſſex, who appointed him his ſecretary, and always repoſed in him the greateſt degree of confidence. But having been concerned in the dangerous deſigns and unwarrantable attempts of that miſguided nobleman, he was convicted of high treaſon, and executed at Tyburn, March the 30th, 1601. He wrote two books; the one intitled The Differences of the Ages of Man's Life; the other De Rebus Geſtis in Sanctio Corvilio Nitæro. The firſt was publiſhed after his death; the ſecond is ſtill in manuſcript.

CUJAS (James) in Latin, Cujacius, the moſt famous civilian in the ſixteenth century, was born at Toulouſe, of obſcure parents, in 1520. He learned polite literature and hiſtory, and acquired great knowledge in the ancient laws, which he taught with extraordinary reputation at Toulouſe, Cahors, Bourges, and Valence, in Dauphiné. Emanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, invited him to Turin, and gave him ſingular marks of his eſteem. Cujas afterwards refuſed very advantageous offers from pope Gregory XIII. who was deſirous of having him teach at Bologna; but he choſe rather to fix at Bourges, where he had a prodigious number of ſcholars; to whom he with pleaſure communicated all his diſcoveries, and aſſiſted them with his ſubſtance, which occaſioned his being called the Father of his Scholars. He died at Bourges, on the 4th of October, 1590, aged ſeventy. The beſt edition of the works of this great civilian is that of Fabrot, in ten volumes, folio.

CUJAVIA, a territory of Great Poland, having on the north the duchy of Pruſſia, on the weſt the palatinate of Kaliſk, on the ſouth thoſe of Licici and Rava, and on the weſt that of Ploczko. It contains two palatinates, the chief towns of which are Inowloez and Breſt; as alſo Uladiſlaw, the capital of the diſtrict.

CULEMBACH, a diſtrict or marquiſate of the circle of Franconia, in Germany. It is bounded on the weſt by the biſhoprick of Bamberg; on the ſouth by the territory of Nuremberg; on the eaſt by the palatinate of Bavaria and Bohemia, and on the north by Voightland and part of the circle of Upper Saxony. It is about fifty miles in length from north to ſouth, and thirty in breadth from eaſt to weſt. It is quite full of foreſts and high mountains, the moſt conſiderable of which is Frichtelberg, all of them covered with pine-trees, and here are the ſources of four large rivers, the Maine, the Sala, the Eger, and the Nab. The principal towns are Culembach, Barrheiſt, Hoff, and Erlang. This marquiſate is the upper part of the burgraviate of Nuremberg.

Culembach, a town of Germany, in Franconia, the capital of the marquiſate of the ſame name. It has good fortifications, and is ſeated at the confluence of two branches of the river Maine. It was pillaged and burnt by the Huſſites in 1430, and by the inhabitants of Nuremberg in 1573. It is near the caſtle of Baſtemburg, twenty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Coburg, and twenty-five north eaſt of Bamberg. Long. 11. 28. E. Lat. 50. 12. N.

CULIACAN, a province of North America, in the audience of Gudalajara. It is bounded on the north by New Mexico, on the eaſt by New Biſcay and the Zacatecas, on the ſouth by Chiametlan, and on the weſt by the ſea. It is a fruitful country, and has rich mines. The principal towns are St. Miguel and Culiacan, this laſt is ſeated on a river of the ſame name near the ſea. Long. 114. 5. W. Lat. 24. 20. N.

CULLEMBURG, a town of the Low Countries, in Guelderland, ſeated on the river Leck, in the Betau, ten miles north of Bommel, and thirteen ſouth-eaſt of Utrecht. Long. 5. 8. E. Lat. 51. 58. N.

CULLEN, a parliament town, in Scotland, ſeated on the coaſt of the county of Bamf, forty miles north-weſt of Aberdeen. Long. 2. 12. W. Lat. 57. 38. N.

CULLITON, a town in Devonſhire, with a market on Thurſdays. The fairs are May 4, and November 30, for cattle. It is ſeated on a river not far from the ſea, and is a pretty good town, with a conſiderable market. It is ten miles eaſt-by-ſouth of Exeter, thirty weſt-by-north of Dorcheſter, and one hundred and fifty-four weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 3. 10. W. Lat. 50. 40. N.

CULLODEN HOUSE, ſeated three miles eaſt of Inverneſs, near which the king's forces, commanded by his royal highneſs William duke of Cumberland, gained a compleat victory over the Rebels, and thereby put an end to the rebellion, April 16, 1746.

CULM, a town of Poland, capital of a palatinate of the ſame name, in Poliſh Pruſſia, with a biſhop's ſee. The town is pretty large, but the biſhop does not reſide there. It is ſeated near the river Viſtula, eighty-five miles ſouth of Dantzick, and thirty north-weſt of Uladiſlaw. Long. 8. 10. E. Lat. 53. 4. N.

CULMORE, a town of Ireland, in the county of Londonderry, and province of Ulſter, ſeated on the coaſt of Loughſoyle, five miles north of Londonderry. Long 7. 40. W. Lat. 55. 0. N.

CULPEPER (NICHOLAS) a practitioner in phyſic, in the reign of Charles I. was the ſon of Nicholas Culpeper, a clergyman, and the grandſon of ſir Thomas Culpeper, bart. He was for ſome time a ſtudent in the univerſity of Cambridge, which he left without taking a degree, and was ſoon after bound apprentice to an apothecary, and employed all his leiſure hours in the ſtudy of phyſic and aſtrology, which he aftewards profeſſed, and was much reſorted to for his advice, which he gave to the poor gratis. He wrote and tranſlated many books into Engliſh; but the moſt noted of his works is his herbal, in octavo, intitled The Engliſh Phyſician, which has had many editions. He died in 1654, at his houſe in Spital-fields.

CULROSS, a parliament town in Scotland, ſeated on the river Forth, in the county of Monteith, twenty-three miles north-weſt of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 34. W. Lat 56. 8. N.

CUMBERLAND, the fartheſt north-weſt county in England, is bounded on the north by Scotland, on the weſt by the Iriſh ſea; on the ſouth, partly by Lancaſhire, and partly by the ſea; and on the eaſt by Weſtmoreland, and part of Durham. It is fifty-five miles in length, thirty-eight in breadth, and one hundred and ſixty-eight in circumference, in which are one city, fourteen market towns, fifty-eight pariſhes, fourteen thouſand eight hundred and twenty five houſes, and eighty-eight thouſand nine hundred and twenty inhabitants, according to a former computation. It ſends ſix members to parliament, two for the county, two for Carliſle, and two for Cockermouth. It was part of a country called Brigantes, when inhabited by Britons, and there are ſeveral names of towns ſtill retained, that were given them by thoſe ancient people.

The Roman legions were often in this county, as well to repreſs the Picts and Scots, as to guard the walls of Adrian and Severus. In the time of the Saxons it was part of the kingdom of Weſtmoreland. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Scots, till the Saxons vanquiſhed the Danes, who then got it again into their own poſſeſſion. Hence we ſee the reaſon why Cumberland is full of Roman antiquities; for it is plain theſe were the altars and monumental inſcriptions erected by the Romans who continued ſo long in theſe parts.

The air of this county is ſharp and piercing, which is no wonder, as it lies ſo far north, and is over-run with mountains; however, the plains are fruitful in corn and graſs, and the mountains are well ſtocked with ſheep. Some of theſe are very remarkable for height, as that called Wry-Noſe, on the top of which are the three ſhire ſtones of Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, and Lancaſhire. That called Skiddaw riſes with two heads like Parnaſſus, and may be ſeen from Scruffle hill, in Annandale, in Scotland. This, with Lawellin and Caſtinand, the inhabitants believe to be the higheſt hills in England; they terminate in craggy precipices at the tops, that have the appearance of huge fragments of rocks, irregularly heaped one upon another.

There are ſeveral copper mines in this county, but it is moſt remarkable for black lead, called wad by the natives, becauſe it may be doubted whether there are any other mines exactly of the ſame kind in the world or not. They lie near nine miles to the ſouth of Keſwic, out of which the black lead is got in lumps, ſeldom or never exceeding ſix or ſeven pounds. They have likewiſe mines of lapis caliminaris and coal.

They have a great many large lakes in this county, of which the principal are Keſwick water, and the Cromac lake. Theſe are frequented by ſeveral ſorts of wild fowl, and are well ſtored with fiſh. The chief rivers are the Derwent, famous for ſalmon fiſhing; the Eln, the Eden, the Eſk, the Leven, the Itching, the South Tine, the Eimot, the Petterel, and the Cauda; beſides ſeveral leſſer ſtreams, which ſerve to water the country, and render it fruitful. Not far from Lanecroft there is a medicinal ſpring, which riſes out of a rock; and is ſaid to be good for moſt diſeaſes of the ſkin. The eaſtern parts of this county are the moſt barren and deſolate.

The Picts wall, of which there are ſtill ſome remains in this county, was firſt built by the emperor Adrian, and was eighty miles in length. It was only a mural hedge, made with large ſtakes driven into the ground, wreathed with wattles, ſtrengthened with huge heaps of earth and turf, and defended by a deep ditch. This, when gone to decay, was repaired by Severus, who built a wall, and added ſtone forteſſes and turrets, at ſuch diſtances that the ſound of a trumpet might be heard from the one to the other.

The market towns in this county are Carliſle the capital, Cockermouth, Whitehaven, Keſwick, Penrith, Brampton, Holm, Egremont, Alſton-Moor, Ireby, Kirk Oſwald, Longtown, Ravenglas, and Wigton.

CUMBERLAND (RICHARD) a very learned Engliſh divine, was born at London, on the 15th of July, 1632. He was educated in grammar and claſſical learning at St. Paul's ſchool, and removed from thence to Magdalen college, Cambridge. His firſt preferment was to the rectory of Brampton, in Northamptonſhire; from whence he was promoted to the living of All hallows, in Stamford, and after the Revolution was nominated by king William III. to the biſhoprick of Peterborough, without the leaſt ſolicitation on his part. He wrote an excellent Treatiſe of the Laws of Nature; and an Eſſay towards the Jewiſh Weights and Meaſures. The world is obliged to him for clearing up ſeveral difficulties in philoſophy, hiſtory, and chronology; and it is remarkable that, after the age of eighty-three, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Coptic language, which he made himſelf maſter of. He died October 9, 1718, in the eighty-ſeventh year of his age. He left ſeveral works behind him, two of which have been publiſhed, viz Sanchoniatho's Phœnician Hiſtory, and Origines Gentium Antiquiſſimæ; or Attempts for diſcovering the Times of the firſt planting of Nations.

CUNÆUS (PETER) born in Zeland, in 1586, was diſtinguiſhed by his knowledge in the learned languages, and his ſkill in the Jewiſh antiquities. He alſo ſtudied law, which he taught at Leyden, in 1615; and read politics there till his death, in 1638. His principal work is a Treatiſe, in Latin, on the Republic of the Hebrews.

CUNITZ (MARY) a learned lady, born in Sileſia, in the ſixteenth century, was equal to the greateſt men Europe produced in that century. She learned languages with amazing facility, and underſtood Poliſh, German, French, Italian, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. She attained a knowledge of the ſciences with equal eaſe; ſhe was ſkilled in hiſtory, phyſic, poetry, painting, muſic, and playing upon inſtruments; and yet theſe were only an amuſement. She more particularly applied herſelf to the mathematics, and eſpecially to aſtronomy; which ſhe made her principal ſtudy; and was ranked in the number of the moſt able aſtronomers of her time. Her Aſtronomical Tables acquired her a prodigious reputation: She printed them in Latin and German, and dedicated them to the emperor Ferdinand III. She married Elias de Lewin, M. D. and died at Piſtehen, on the 22d of Auguſt, 1664.

CUPER (GISBERT) a learned profeſſor of hiſtory, and burgomaſter of Deventer, in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Hammen, in 1644, and was the author of Critical and chronological Obſervations; and other works. He died in 1716.

CUPID, in pagan mythology, the god of love. The ancients give very different accounts of the origin of this little deity: ſome make him the ſon of Porus, the god of counſel; others the ſon of Cœlus and Terra; and others of Zephyrus and Flora; other again ſay, that Nox or Night, produced an egg, which having hatched under her ſable wings, brought forth Cupid or Love, who with golden pinions immediately flew through the world. The common opinion however ſeems to have been that there were two Cupids, the one the ſon of Jupiter and Venus, whoſe delight it was to raiſe ſentiments of love and virtue; and the other the ſon of Mars and the ſame goddeſs, who inſpired baſe and impure deſires. The firſt of theſe, called Eros, or True Love, bore golden arrows, which cauſed real joy, and a virtuous affection; the other, called Anteros, had leaden arrows, that raiſed a paſſion founded only on deſire, which ended in ſatiety and diſguſt.

Cupid was always drawn with wings, to repreſent his inconſtancy; and naked, to ſhew that he has nothing of his own. He was painted blind, to denote that love ſees no fault in the object beloved; and with a bow and quiver of arrows, to ſhew his power over the mind. Sometimes he is crowned with roſes, and at others, is ſeen with a roſe in one hand, and a dolphin in the other; ſometimes he is placed between Hercules and Mercury, to ſhew the prevalence of eloquence and valour in love; and at others is placed near Fortune, to ſignify that the ſucceſs of lovers depends on that inconſtant goddeſs.

The abbé la Pluche traces the origin of this little god, from the Egyptian Horus, which attended the Venus Popularis, who who was at different times repreſented with different attributes; ſometimes with the wings of the Eteſian wind, and the arrows of Apollo; and at others riding on a lion, driving a bull, tying a ram, or having a large fiſh in his nets. Theſe attributes which pointed out the different ſeaſons of the year, by the ſun's entrance into theſe ſigns, gave riſe to ſo many fables, and the empire of love was hence made to extend to heaven and earth, and even to the depth of the ocean.

CUR, the ancient Cyrus, a river of Aſia, which riſes in mount Taurus, and running through Georgia, and the province of Shirvan, in Perſia, unites with Arras, formerly the Araxes, and continues its courſe to the Caſpian ſea.

CURASSOW, an iſland of the Leſſer Antilles, in the Weſt Indies, belonging to the Dutch, from whence they carry on a clandeſtine trade with the Spaniſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Terra Firma, from which it is not far diſtant. It is not above twenty-five miles in length, and thirteen in breadth.

CURCELLÆUS (Stephen) a very learned divine, born at Geneva, in 1586. He was for many years a miniſter in France, and afterwards retired to Amſterdam, where he ſucceeded the famous Epiſcopius in the profeſſorſhip of divinity, and acquired great reputation among the followers of Arminius. He tranſlated Comenius's celebrated book, intitled Janua Linguarum, into Greek, and applied himſelf to a critical examination of the Greek copies of the New Teſtament, of which he gave a new edition, with many various readings, drawn from different manuſcripts. He died at Amſterdam, in the year 1658.

CURCHUS, in pagan worſhip, one of the falſe gods of the ancient inhabitants of Pruſſia. He was ſuppoſed to preſide over eating and drinking, on which account they offered him their firſt fruits. In honour of this god, it is ſaid, they kept a continual fire, and every year breaking his old ſtatue, erected him a new one.

CURDISTAN, or the Land of the Curds, a country of Aſia, lying between the Turkiſh empire and the kingdom of Perſia. It extends along the eaſtern banks of the river Tigris, from the ſources of the Euphrates to Chuſiſtan, comprehending the greateſt part of the ancient Aſſyria, and part of Great Armenia, now called Turcomania. The language of the Curds partakes of the Perſian, and their religion, if they may be ſaid to have any, is partly Chriſtian and partly Mahommedan. Some live in towns, and are a little civilized, and others wander about the country like the wild Arabs, and have no fixed abode, but move in ſearch of paſture for their cattle. Some of them alſo make it their buſineſs to rob caravans that paſs through Diarbeker and Turcomania. Their tents are large, and of a ſort of coarſe brown cloth, which ſerves for a covering for their portable houſes, which are of a ſquare figure, made of hurdles, with mats laid on the ground, that ſerve them for bed and board. When they diſlodge they take them to pieces, and load their oxen and cows with them, as alſo their children. Theſe commonly go naked in the coldeſt weather. The men are generally mounted on fleet horſes, and the women ride indifferently on horſes or oxen. Theſe as well as the men have ſmall eyes, wide mouths, dark complexions, and black hair. They have no fuel but cow-dung, with which they dreſs their victuals, and heat their milk. They have neither wine, beer, nor ſpirituous liquors. The only weapon of the men is a lance.

The towns of Curdiſtan are Betlis, Schereſul, Arbel, Moſul, and Van or Wan.

CUREUS (Joachim) a learned phyſician, born at Freyſtat, in Silecia, travelled into Italy to perfect himſelf in the knowledge of the ſciences, and at his return to his native country, practiſed phyſic with reputation, and died there on the 21ſt of January, 1573, aged forty-one. He compoſed the Annals of Sileſia and Breſlaw.

CURIA, in Roman antiquity, a certain diviſion of the people, anſwering in many reſpects to a pariſh in our cities: for Romulus divided the people into thirty curiæ, or wards; which were not only ſeparated by proper bounds and limits, but alſo diſtinguiſhed by different places ſet apart for the celebration of divine ſervice, which were performed by particular prieſts, one of which belonged to each curia, under the name of curio. See Comitia.

The Roman curia alſo ſignified a public edifice, of which there were two ſorts, religious and civil; in the former, the prieſts and religious orders met for the regulation of the rites and ceremonies belonging to the worſhip of the gods; and in the other, the ſenate aſſembled to conſult about the public concerns of the common-wealth. Theſe were not always diſtinct buildings, ſince they were ſometimes only a room, or hall, in ſome public place. The moſt celebrated of the curiæ were, the Curia Hoſtilia, built by Tullus Hoſtilius; and the Curia Pompeii, in which the ſenate aſſembled when Julius Cæſar was murdered.

CURIATII, the name of three brothers of the city of Alba who fought againſt the Horatii, about the ſix hundred and ſixty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra.

CURIO, a Roman orator, in the year of Rome 700, was ſon to another orator of the ſame name, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence, and his ſagacious and inſtructive ſayings.

Curio (Coelius Secundus) a learned man of Piedmont, who, being perſecuted in Italy for being a proteſtant, retired to the canton of Bern, in Switzerland, where he was kindly received, and made maſter of the college of Lauſanne; afterwards he went to Baſil, where they gave him the chair of profeſſor of eloquence. He publiſhed ſeveral books, and one amongſt others in which he endeavours to prove that the number of the elect exceeds that of the reprobates. He died in the year 1569, aged ſixty-ſeven.

CURIOSUS, an officer of the Roman empire, during the middle age, one or two of whom were annually ſent into each province, to ſee that no frauds and abuſes were committed, and to bring intelligence to court of what paſſed in all the provinces.

Curius Dentatus (M. Annius) was a Roman citizen, and thrice conſul. He conquered the Samnites, Sabines, and Lucanians. He gave each citizen forty acres of land, allowing himſelf no more. The ambaſſadors of the Samnites making him a viſit, found him boiling turnips in a pipkin, upon which they offered him gold plate to come over to their intereſt; which he nobly refuſed, telling them that his deſign was not to grow rich, but to command thoſe that were ſo. He defeated Pyrrhus, near Tarentum, in the two hundred and ſeventy fifth year before the Chriſtian æra, and obtained the honour of a triumph.

CURLE (Walter) biſhop of Wincheſter, and lord almoner to king Charles I. was a prelate of eminent abilities, and of an exemplary character. In 1628 he was prolocutor of the convocation, he being at that time dean of Litchfield. He was ſucceſſively biſhop of Rocheſter, Bath and Wells, and Wincheſter. He expended large ſums in acts of charity and munificence; repaired ſeveral churches, promoted the expenſive work of the Polyglot Bible, and relieved many a ſtarving royaliſt out of the ſmall remains of his eſtate. He was a great ſufferer by the civil war, and died in narrow circumſtances, in the year 1647.

CURTIUS (Quintus) a famous Roman knight, who, it is ſaid, lived about the five hundred and ſixty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra, underſtanding by the oracle, that a certain gulph in the Forum, which boded misfortunes to the city, could not be ſtopped without throwing into it what was moſt precious to the Roman people, he devoted himſelf to the good of his country, and imagining that the Romans had nothing more excellent than their valour and their arms, precipitated himſelf into the abyſs, with his horſe and arms, on which it is ſaid that it ſuddenly cloſed up.

Curtius (Quintus) a celebrated Latin hiſtorian, who wrote the Hiſtory of Alexander the Great, in ten books, the two firſt of which are loſt, but have been excellently ſupplied by Freinſhemius. It is very extraordinary that it is neither known where he was born, nor at what time he lived; but ſome have imagined, from the ſtyle of his hiſtory, which is elegantly written, that he muſt have lived in or near the Auguſtan age; but of this there is no proof. Others place him in the reign of Veſpaſian, and others have brought him down ſo low as to Trajan's; yet it does not appear that any ancient author has mentioned his hiſtory before the fifteenth century.

Curtius (Matthew) a famous phyſician of Pavia, who died at Piſa, in 1544. He was the author of a treatiſe De Curandis Febribus, and other works.

CUSA (Nicholas de) in Latin Cuſanus, one of the greateſt men in the fifteenth century, was born in 1401, at Cuſa, a village ſituated on the Moſelle, in the dioceſe of Treves, was the ſon a fiſherman, or waterman, named John Crebs. The count de Mandercheidt took him into his ſervice in his infancy, and finding that he had a capacity for learning, ſent him to ſtudy at Daventer, where he was inſtructed by ſome regular canons in the neighbourhood of that city. He afterwards ſtudied at the moſt celebrated univerſities in Germany, and became not only ſkilled in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, but in philoſophy, the mathematics, civil law, hiſtory, and divinity. Nicholas de Cuſa at length became curate of St. Florentine at Coblentz, and then archdeacon of Liege, under which character he aſſiſted at the council of Baſil. He was afterwards taken notice of by pope Eugenius IV. who ſent him in quality of legate to Conſtantinople, and afterwards into Germany and France. On the death of that pope, Cuſa retired to his archdeaconry of Liege, but Nicolas V. the zealous protector of the learned, made him cardinal in 1448, and gave him the biſhoprick of Brixen, in the Tyrol, in which ſee he continued, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the canons, and even of Sigiſmund, the archarchduke of Auſtria, who had cauſed Leonard Corſmer, his chancellor, to be elected in an irregular manner. Cardinal de Cuſa was ſent legate à latere to the German princes, to engage them to be at peace among themſelves, and to turn their arms againſt Mahomet II. who threatened Chriſtendom. He was afterwards ſent, in quality of legate, by the popes Calixtus II. and Pius II. The laſt mentioned pope made uſe of his utmoſt endeavours to bring about a reconciliation between the archduke Sigiſmund and Cuſa, on a freſh quarrel occaſioned by the cardinal's endeavouring to introduce a reformation in a monaſtery. Sigiſmund made the faireſt promiſes; but cardinal de Cuſa had ſcarcely ſet his foot in his dioceſe, when the archduke cauſed him to be ſeized and thrown into priſon. From that moment public worſhip ceaſed through almoſt his whole dioceſe; the pope excommunicated Sigiſmund, who at laſt releaſed the cardinal on very ſevere conditions, who died ſome time after, at Todi, on the 11th of Auguſt, 1454, aged fifty-three. All his works were printed together at Baſil, in 1565, in three volumes folio. Among theſe, his Catholic Concordance is particularly eſteemed. All cardinal de Cuſa's works diſcover great learning and erudition, but too much ſubtilty and metaphyſical reaſoning. Father Gaſpard Hartzeim, a Jeſuit, has written his Life, which was printed at Treves, in Latin, in 1730.

CUSCO, a town of South America, in Peru, that was the capital of the whole country before the coming of the Spaniards. This city, as is pretended, was built by Mango Capax, the firſt prince of the family of the Incas, on a rough, unequal ſpot of ground ſurrounded by mountains on all ſides, near the rivers Yuſa and Aperina, and there are ſtill the remains of a fortreſs.

Cuſco is divided into two parts, Havan-Cuſco and Oran-Cuſco. On the mountain Caremga, near the town, are certain towers, where the Incas are ſaid to have obſerved the courſe of the ſun. In the middle of the town was a large ſquare, from whence four magnificent ſtreets proceeded, which repreſented the four parts of the Peruvian monarchy and ſubſiſt to this very day. This was their beſt conſtructed town, it had the fineſt buildings, and was the moſt rich and powerful. It was death for any perſon to tranſport any part of the riches from hence without the ſovereign's leave. The famous temple of the ſun was at this place, which contained prodigious riches, and all the idols of the people whom the Incas had brought under ſubjection, as ſo many trophies of victory. One part of the town was inhabited by Mitimacs, who had ſubmitted to the Incas, and were ſubject to rigid laws, agreeable to their former cuſtoms and ceremonies. The Incas had their palace in the fortreſs of Chachſa-Hama, which, in ſome ſenſe, conſiſted of three fortreſſes placed in a triangle; that in the middle was the reſidence of the Incas, the walls of which were plated with gold and ſilver, and adorned with all ſorts of figures. There was no entrance to this citadel but through ſubterranean paſſages, in which there was ſuch turnings and windings, that it was a hard matter to find out the way. The whole edifice was conſtructed with ſuch large ſquare ſtones, that ſeveral oxen could hardly ſtir one of them; inſomuch that this building might be looked upon as one of the maſterpieces of human induſtry. Now, as the Spaniards could not remove theſe enormous maſſes, they were forced to let the greateſt part of the walls ſtand, but have ſince made uſe of them in building ſeveral fine houſes in the city.

During the government of the Incas, none of the inhabitants of Cuſco were permitted to ſettle elſewhere, which, with the reſort of ſtrangers and the arts of the rulers, rendered it extremely populous; for many of the children of foreigners were kept as hoſtages; others were invited to learn the languages; others came to work at the public buildings; and others again to clean the ſtreets, and keep the public roads in repair. The gold and ſilver from the adjacent mines, which were very rich, were brought to Cuſco; but theſe have been neglected of late for thoſe of Potoſi.

The people of each province lived in a particular part of the city by themſelves, and were governed by their own laws and cuſtoms; but they were all obliged to worſhip the ſun. Under ſeveral parts of the city, there are ſubterranean vaults, where the Spaniards ſometimes find plenty of gold and ſilver. The vallies round Cuſco abound in grain and fruits; that of Yuca is full of gardens and country ſeats, where are many remaining monuments of the magnificence of the Incas. The air is ſo pure, that thoſe who are indiſpoſed or ſick are brought hither to recover their health; and the other vallies are very agreeable. In ſhort, there is nothing wanting at Cuſco, which can contribute to the comfort and pleaſure of human life, though the air is a little cold, on account of the proximity of the mountains called the Andes. There are now fifteen or ſixteen thouſand Spaniards in Cuſco, without reckoning thoſe who come here to trade. The churches and religious houſes are very rich, among which that of the Jeſuits is moſt brilliant.

The more we reflect upon it, the more wonderful it ſeems, that in all the vaſt continent of South America, there ſhould be only theſe people under the dominion of the Incas of Cuſco, or, as ſome call them, the Incas of Peru, who had any appearance of a regular government, and who, as we are told, managed all their affairs according to the rules of the moſt refined policy. However, when we hear of their human ſacrifices, their greedineſs in devouring their enemies, and other ſtories of the like kind, we are obliged to believe them to be at once the moſt wiſe and the moſt ſilly people in the world; for which reaſon, we muſt needs make abatement in all the Spaniſh relations, in order to reconcile them together, eſpecially ſince it is now greatly doubted whether there ever were ſuch people as cannibals, or man-eaters in the world, which doubt will be much ſtrengthened by comparing the firſt accounts of any of theſe people with thoſe of our modern travellers, who contradict almoſt every thing that has been ſaid by the earlieſt adventurers. One would almoſt be tempted to think, that theſe Peruvians were the offſpring of a colony from Aſia, if they had not the univerſal characteriſtic of all the Indian nations, that is, long black hair, the red copper colour of the ſkin, and the want of hair on the face and all other parts of the body. We know ſome have looked upon the colour to be entirely owing to the weather; but I can contradict this with the greateſt certainty, as I have had an opportunity of examining Indians who have been clothed from their infancy, and all the difference that I could perceive was, that their ſkin was of a brighter red than that of thoſe who expoſed it to the ſun and air, and daubed it with greaſe; beſides, every one may have obſerved, that weather will render the ſkin of a white perſon duſky, but never will turn it red.

The Indians of Peru are as ignorant, indolent, and improvident now, as in moſt other parts; and yet it cannot be denied but their anceſtors were a powerful and better regulated people. This is evident from the walls of the temple of the ſun, part of which are ſtill to be ſeen at Cuſco; for they are built with ſtones fifteen or ſixteen feet in diameter; and tho' they are unhewn and irregular, yet they join very exactly, without leaving any vacuity: beſides, there are the ruins of ſeveral ſtructures, which ſerved the Incas to lodge in when they travelled. The doors, indeed, are not wide, but they are very high, becauſe the ſovereign was always carried on the ſhoulders of ſome of the principal men. The walls are often of a kind of granite, and the ſtones, which are hewn, united ſo exactly that they ſeem to be worn by rubbing one againſt the other.

All theſe ſtructures, which are called the tamboes, are placed along the great road that runs over the Cordillieras from Cuſco to Quito, and even beyond it, ſo that it is a thouſand miles in length; beſides there are ſepulchres of an aſtoniſhing form and magnitude, in a place called Coſheſqui. Theſe are mounts of earth forty feet high, as many broad, and two hundred and eighty long; of theſe there are ſeven or eight, and about one hundred of another form. It is ſaid, there was a fine palace here, but there is not the leaſt trace of it remaining. This has been the fate of all the other ancient monuments and works of the Peruvians. Cuſco is ſeated three hundred and ſeventy-five miles eaſt of Lima. Long. 73. 35. W. Lat. 13. 30. S.

CUSSET, a town of France, in Bourbonnois, with a celebrated nunnery near the city. It is eighteen miles north of Roan, and one hundred and eighty-eight ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 3. 35. E. Lat. 46. 2. N.

CUSPINIAN (John) a learned writer of the ſixteenth century, born at Sweinfort, in Franconia, was employed by the emperor Maximilian I. in ſeveral negociations, and died at Vienna, in 1529. He wrote, 1. A Commentary on the Roman Conſuls, Cæſars, and Emperors. 2. An Hiſtory of Auſtria. 3. An Hiſtory of the Origin of the Turks; and other works. His Life has been written by Nicholas Gerbel.

CUSTRIN, a ſtrong town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and in the New March of Brandenburgh. It is one of the moſt important fortreſſes of the whole empire, and is ſeated at the confluence of two great rivers, the Warte and the Oder, which there make a large moraſs, in the middle of which Cuſtrin is built. The entrance is over a cauſeway four or five miles long, on which there are thirty-two bridges. Almoſt all the electors have added ſome new work to the fortifications, or have made ſome advantageous change in the old. For this reaſon, it is looked upon as impregnable. There is alſo a palace, which may have been formerly the place of reſidence of the margraves. The houſes in the town are well built, and there is a large handſome church. The regency of the New March is eſtabliſhed here. It is eighteen miles north-eaſt of Frankfort.

fort, and fifty eaſt of Berlin. Long. 15. o. E. Lat. 52. 34. N.

CUTTS (John, lord) an officer diſtinguiſhed by his bravery in king William's wars, was the ſon of Richard Cutts, eſq. of Matching, in Eſſex, where the family was ſettled about the time of Henry VI. and had a great eſtate. His lordſhip diſtinguiſhed himſelf in an extraordinary manner at the taking of Buda by the imperialiſts, in 1686, which had been for near a century and a half in the hands of the Turks. He returned to England, with the prince of Orange, at the Revolution, and was made baron of Gowran, in Ireland, one of the lords juſtices general, of the forces in that kingdom, and governor of the Iſle of Wight. He wrote a volume of Poems entitled Poetical Exerciſes upon ſeveral Occaſions, dedicated to her royal highneſs Mary princeſs of Orange, which was printed in 1687. He died at Dublin, in 1706, and is buried there, in the cathedral of Chriſt-church.

CUYCK, (John Van) a learned counſellor, and conſul of Utrecht, the place of his birth, wrote ſome remarks on Tully's Offices, which are eſteemed, and an edition of Cornelius Nepos, printed at Utrecht in 1542, in octavo, which is a ſcarce and valuable work. He died in 1566.

CYANE, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph of Sicily, who, endeavouring to prevent the rape of Proſerpine, Pluto metamorphoſed her into a fountain.

CYANIPPUS, of Syracuſe, in fabulous hiſtory, a perſon, who deſpiſing the feaſts of Bacchus, was puniſhed by that God with a fit of drunkenneſs, in which he raviſhed his own daughter Cyana. Some time after, the plague breaking out, and making an extreme havock in the country, and the oracle declaring, that the Gods would not be appeaſed till the inceſtuous were ſacrificed, Cyana prevailed on her father to offer himſelf for his country, and to die with her.

CYAXARES, king of the Medes, ſucceeded his father Phraortes, who was killed at the ſiege of Nineveh in the ſix hundred and thirty-fifth year before the birth of Chriſt. He immediately marched againſt the Aſſyrians, to revenge the death of his father, defeated them in a great battle, and laid ſiege to Nineveh; but was obliged to raiſe it in order to defend his own country, which was attacked by the Scythians; they at firſt defeated him, but he, in his turn, conquered them, and afterwards made war on Halyattes king of Lydia. This war was terminated by the marriage of Ariana, that prince's daughter, with Aſtyages the ſon of Cyaxares. Cyaxares died in the 595th year before the Chriſtian æra, after a reign of forty years.

Xenophon mentions another king of the Medes, named Cyaxares; who was the ſon of Aſtyages, and the grand-ſon of the preceding; but Herodotus takes no notice of this ſecond Cyaxares.

CYBELE, in Pagan Mythology, the daughter of Cœlus and Terra, and the wife of her brother Saturn, was alſo called Magna Mater, or, the Mother of the Gods, Ops, Rhea, Veſta, Dyndimina, Berecyntha, the Good Goddeſs, &c. under which different characters ſhe had different repreſentations, and different ſacrifices. Thus, under the character of the elder Veſta, ſhe was repreſented ſitting, to denote the ſtability of the earth; ſhe had a drum in her lap to ſignify the earth's cavity, and the winds impriſoned in it; her head was crowned with towers, and ſhe was ſurrounded with animals of various kinds ſporting about her, to expreſs her fruitfulneſs and bounty. But under the character of Cybele, ſhe made a more magnificent appearance, being crowned with towers, ſeated in a golden chariot drawn by lions, cloathed with a robe wrought with flowers, and holding a key in her hand. Some indeed imagine, that the Phrygian Cybele was a different perſon from that of Veſta, and ſay, that ſhe was the daughter of Mæones, an antient king of Phrygia, and Dyndima; but being expoſed on mount Cybelus, whence ſhe took her name, ſhe was there nouriſhed by lions. Her parents afterwards owned her, and ſhe fell in love with Atys, by whom conceiving, her father cauſed her lover to be ſlain, upon which Cybele ran mad, and filled the woods with her lamentations. Soon after a plague and famine laying waſte the country, the oracle was conſulted, who adviſed them to bury Atys with great pomp, and to worſhip Cybele as a goddeſs. On which they erected a temple to her honour, and placed lions at her feet, to denote her being educated by thoſe animals. See Atys. All the prieſts of Cybele were eunuchs. They carried her ſtatue through the ſtreets and public places, dancing about it to the ſound of cymbols, with extravagant cries and howlings, making ſtrange contorſions, and wounding their bodies, to extort alms from the people. They offered in their ſacrifices a bull, a goat, or a ſow.

It is probable that Cybele was originally no other than the Iſis or Rhea of the Egyptians, who, it is ſaid, was always repreſented with a crown of turrets, with a key in her hand, and a lion at her feet, to ſhew that the principal feſtival of Egypt was fixed at the time when the ſun entered Leo.

CYCLOPS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſons of Neptune and Amphitrite, the principal of which were Brontes, Steropes, and Pyracmon, but their whole number amounted to above an hundred. Jupiter threw them into Tartarus as ſoon as they were born, but they were delivered at the interceſſion of Tellus, and became the aſſiſtants of Vulcan. They were of prodigious ſtature, and had each only one eye, which was placed in the middle of their foreheads.

Some mythologiſts ſay, that the Cyclops ſignify the vapours raiſed in the air, which occaſion thunder and lightning, on which account they are repreſented as forging the thunder-bolts of Jupiter. Others repreſent them as the firſt inhabitants of Sicily, who were cruel, of a gigantic form, and dwelt round mount Etna.

CYGNE, (Martin du) a Jeſuit, one of the moſt famous rhetoricians of the ſeventeenth. He publiſhed an Analyſis of Cicero's Orations; and left a Treatiſe on the Art of Poetry, and another on Rhetoric. He died at Ypres in 1699.

CYGNUS, or Cycnus, in fabulous hiſtory, king of the Ligurians, whom Jupiter transformed into a ſwan, for lamenting the death of Phaëton, and his ſiſters.

CYLLABARUS, king of Argos ſucceeded Stenelus, his father, and ſucceſſively united the parts of that kingdom, which had been divided into three ſovereignities, about the 1312th year before the Chriſtian æra. He ſeduced Egiale the wife of Diomedes during the abſence of that prince who went to the ſiege of Troy. Cyllabarus dying without iſſue, his crown paſſed into the family of Pelops.

CYNETHÆUS, a Greek poet of the iſle of Chio, who firſt collected Homer's verſes at Syracuſe, and recited them in public.

CYNÆAS of Theſſaly, the ſcholar of Demoſthenes, flouriſhed in the one hundred and twenty-fifth olympiad, or two hundred and ſeventy-five years before the Chriſtian æra. Pyrrhus had ſo high an eſteem for him, that he ſent him to Rome to ſollicit a peace; and ſo vaſt was his memory, that the day after his arrival, he ſaluted all the ſenators and knights by name.

CYNÆGYRUS, an Athenian ſoldier, in the battle of Marathon againſt the Perſians, four hundred and ninety-one years before the chriſtian æra. In this battle, it is ſaid, he purſued the enemy to their very ſhips, and taking hold of one with his right hand, held it tell it was cut off; then he took hold of it with the other, and when that was cut off, held it with his teeth. Such ſtories as theſe recorded in hiſtory, ſhews, that the author's fondneſs for the marvelous, is greater than his love of truth.

CYPARISSUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a beautiful youth beloved by Apollo, who being exceſſively grieved for the death of a favourite deer, the god, in compaſſion, changed him into a cyprus-tree.

CYPRIA, one of the names of Venus. See Venus.

CYPRIAN, (St.) or Thasetus Cæcilius Cyprianus, a celebrated father of the Chriſtian Church, was born at Carthage in the third century; and before his converſion to Chriſtianity, taught rhetoric with great reputation. He took the name of Cæcilius, to ſhew his gratitude to a miniſter of that name by whom he was converted. Donatus biſhop of Carthage dying, St. Cyprian was choſen in the year two hundred and forty-eight to ſucceed him; but was obliged to quit that city about two years after, on account of the perſecution under Decius, when he wrote in the place of his retreat, Pious and Inſtructive Letters to thoſe who had been his Hearers, and alſo to the Libellatici, a name by which thoſe puſilanimous Chriſtians were called, who procured certificates of the heathen magiſtrates, to ſhew that they had complied with the emperor's orders in ſacrificing to idols. At his return to Carthage, he held ſeveral councils on the repentance of thoſe who had fallen during this perſecution, and other points of diſcipline; he oppoſed the ſchiſms of Novatus and Novatianus; and contended for the re-baptiſing of thoſe who had been baptiſed by heretics. In two hundred and fifty-ſeven, during the perſecution of Valerian, St. Cyprian was baniſhed to Curuba, twelve leagues from Carthage; however, the pro-conſul Galerus Maximus, permitted him, eleven months after, to live in the gardens near Carthage; but being ſoon after ſeized, he was carried before the pro-conſul, when having bravely confeſſed the faith, he was beheaded near Carthage on the 14th of September, 258. St. Criſpian wrote eighty-one letters, and ſeveral treatiſes: the beſt editions of his works, are thoſe of Pamelius in 1568, of Rigaltius in 1648, and of Oxford in 1682. His ſtyle is maſculine, eloquent, grave, elevated, and worthy of the majeſty of the Chriſtian religion.

Cyprian, (St.) who ought not to be confounded with the above St. Cyprian biſhop of Carthage, though he lived about the ſame time; was the author of a poem, Ad Felicem cem de Reſurrectione Mortuorum. This poem is found at the end of Tertulian's works. Martenne and Durand have given an edition of it more conformable to the manuſcript in the ninth volume of their Ampliſſima collectio.

CYPRUS, an iſland of the Mediterranean ſea, near the coaſt of Syria, between 50. 30. and 52. 45. of Long. and 34. and 36. of Latitude, ſixty miles ſouth of the coaſt of Caramania, and thirty weſt of the coaſt of Syria. It is fifty miles long and ſeventy broad. It has no river, and not above one ſpring of freſh water, otherwiſe it would be one of the moſt delightful places in the world. The country produces corn, excellent wine, ſugar, cotton, and all kinds of fruits. There is great plenty of orange, citron, pomgranate, myrtle, and laurel trees, which produce a perpetual verdure; and the air is ſo temperate, that the gardens are full of flowers all the year. The Greeks called it Macaria, or the Fortunate Iſland, on account of the fertility of its ſoil; and the poets were ſo taken with its beauties, that they made it the abode of Venus.

One part of the inhabitants are Mahomedans, and the other Chriſtians, of the Greek Church, who carry on a trade in honey, ſalt, cotton, ſilk, vitriol, copper, cryſtal, agate, and red and white coral. They have plenty of fleſh, fiſh, and fowl, particularly a great number of ortolans. However, this iſland is not ſo flouriſhing as it was while in the hands of the Chriſtians, it being now but thinly peopled. The inhabitants were always addicted to luxury, and in this they have not degenerated from their anceſtors.

This iſland is divided into four diſtricts, 1. Paphia to the eaſt; 2. Salaminia to the weſt; 3. Amathuſia to the ſouth; and 4. Lapethia to the north. The moſt remarkable places are Nicoſia the capital, ſituated in Lapethia, in the centre of the country, Famagoſta in the province of Salaminia; Paphos in Paphia, a large but open town, where Venus was formerly worſhipped; Cernes in Lapethia, which has a good caſtle; Larneca, a trading place, where the Engliſh, French, and Dutch have a conſul.

CYPSELUS, the ſon Action a Corinthian. It is ſaid that his birth was foretold by the oracle of Delphos, which being conſulted by his father, replied, that the eagle ſhould produce a ſtone that would oppreſs the Corinthians; and indeed Cypſelus ſeized the ſovereign power of Corinth, about the ſix hundred and fifty-eighth year before the birth of Chriſt, and reigned for about thirty years. Periander, his ſon, who ſucceeded him, had two ſons Lycophon and Cypſelus. It was this laſt Cypſelus who reigned after Periander, about the five hundred and fifty-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra.

CYRANO DE BERGERAC, a gentleman of Perigord, thus called from the place of his birth. He went to Paris to perform his ſtudies; delivered himſelf up to debauchery; embraced the profeſſion of arms, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery at the ſiege of Mouzon, at that of Arras in 1640, and on ſeveral other occaſions, on which he obtained the name of Intrepid. At length quitting the ſervice on account of his wounds, he in 1653 entered into the family of the duke of Arpajon, and died in 1655, at the age of of thirty-five. He was the intimate friend of Rohault, and a great admirer of the philoſophy of Des Cartes. He wrote ſeveral theatrical pieces; the comical Hiſtory of the States and Empires of the Moon, and other works which abound with wit, but are too full of points and antitheſes.

CYRIACUS, patriarch of Conſtantinople in the ſixth century, ſucceeded John the Younger, who had taken the title of Oecumenic, or univerſal biſhop. He ſent a confeſſion of his faith to pope Gregory the Great, who returned him a friendly anſwer, but forbad his nuncio to aſſiſt at his maſs, &c. unleſs he renounced the title of univerſal biſhop, which the pope was afraid he would get confirmed. Cyriacus oppoſed the emperor Phocas, who encroached upon the liberties of the church; and in revenge that emperor made an edict forbidding the name of Oecumenic to be given to any biſhop but to him of Rome. Cyriacus died in 606.

CYRILL, deacon of the church of Heliopolis, near mount Libanus, in the beginning of the fourth century, under the reign of Conſtantine, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by demoliſhing ſeveral ſtatues worſhipped by the heathens, who remembered it when their religion got the upper hand under the reign of Julian, and revenged themſelves, not only by killing him, but by tearing out his bowels and eating his liver. However it is ſaid that all who ſhared in this crime were puniſhed in a moſt extraordinary manner, they firſt loſing all their teeth, afterwards their tongues, and at laſt their eyes.

CYRILL (St.) Patriarch of Jeruſalem, ſucceeded Maximus in 350, but having a diſpute with Acacius, biſhop of Cæſaria, in relation to the privileges belonging to their reſpective ſees, he was accuſed by that biſhop of having ſold the treaſures of the church, and was depoſed in a council held in 357, though he had ſold the ornaments and ſacred veſſels to aſſiſt the poor in a time of famine; but St. Cyril was reſtored to his ſee at the counil of Seleucia in 359, when Acacius was at the ſame time depoſed. He was however depoſed a ſecond time in 360 by the council of Conſtantinople. After death of the emperor Conſtantius, Julian his ſucceſſor, recalling the exiled biſhops, St Cyrill returned to Jeruſalem, but was driven from thence three years after, in the reign of the emperor Valens, and did not return till after the death of that prince in 378. He died on the 18th of March 386. There are ſtill extant of his eighteen Catecheſes addreſſed to the catechumens, and five to the newly baptized. We have alſo a letter he wrote to the emperor Conſtantius on the appearance of a luminous croſs ſeen over the city of Jeruſalem. The beſt edition of his works is that of father Touttée, in Greek and Latin.

CYRILL (St.) Patriarch of Alexandria, ſucceeded Theophilus, his uncle, on the ſixth of October 412. Scarce was he inſtalled, when he began to exert his authority with great vigour; he drove the Novatians and Jews from Alexandria, permitting their wealth and ſynagogues to be taken from them. This proceeding highly diſpleaſed Oreſtes, the governor of the city, who ſaw that if the biſhop's authority was not ſoon ſuppreſſed it might grow too ſtrong for that of the magiſtrate. Upon which a kind of civil war broke out between Oreſtes and the biſhop; many tumults were raiſed, and ſome battles fought in the very ſtreets of Alexandria. One day, when Oreſtes was abroad in an open chariot, he was ſurrounded by about five hundred monks, who had left their monaſteries to revenge the quarrel of their biſhop. They purſued him with fury, wounded him with ſtones, and would certainly have killed him, if the people had not reſtrained their fury till his guards came to his relief. Ammonius, one of theſe monks, being afterwards ſeized, was put to the rack, and died in torments, upon which Cyrill had him immediately canonized, and took every opportunity of commending his zeal and conſtancy. About the ſame time there was at Alexandria a female philoſopher named Hypathia, who was a heathen, and ſo celebrated, that people came from all parts to ſee and hear her. Oreſtes ſaw her often, and the people imagining that it was ſhe who inſpired him with ſuch an averſion to their biſhop, ſeized upon her, and tore her in pieces.

St. Cyrill alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal againſt Neſtorius biſhop of Conſtantinople, who, in ſome of his homilies, had aſſerted that the virgin Mary ought not to be called the mother of God; and theſe homilies coming to Egypt, raiſed no ſmall diſturbance among the monks there, and the affair being laid before Celeſtine, biſhop of Rome, Cyrill, ſupported by Celeſtine's authority, iſſued forth anathemas againſt Neſtorius and his doctrine, and the quarrel aroſe ſo high, that a general council was convened at Epheſus in order to put an end to it; but the biſhops of the Eaſt, who aſſembled on the part of Neſtorius, oppoſed Cyrill with ſuch warmth, that his opinion was not only condemned, but he was deprived of his biſhoprick, and thrown into priſon. But he was ſoon after releaſed, and gained a complete victory over Neſtorius, who, in 431, was depoſed from his ſee of Conſtantinople. Cyrill returned to his ſee at Conſtantinople, where he died in 444. St. Cyrill alſo wrote againſt Theodorus of Mopſueſta, Diodorus of Tarſus, and Julian the Apoſtate. He made Commentaries on St. John's Goſpel, and wrote ſeveral other books. His works were publiſhed in Greek and Latin in 1638, in ſix volumes folio. His ſtyle is diffuſe, and full of metaphyſical ſubtleties.

CYRILLUS LUCARIS, a famous patriarch of Alexandria, and afterwards of Conſtantinople, was born in the iſland of Candia, on the 12th of November, 1572. He performed his ſtudies at Venice and Padua, and had for his maſter the learned Margunius biſhop of Cythera. At length, travelling into Germany, he became acquainted with the proteſtants, and embraced their ſentiments. Returning into Greece, he at length was made patriarch of Alexandria, and, in 1621, was raiſed to the patriarchate of Conſtantinople, when, endeavouring to introduce the proteſtant religion, pope Urban VIII. and at length the Jeſuits, endeavoured to the utmoſt of their power to countermine him, and ſo far prevailed with the Turks as to get him depoſed and baniſhed to the iſle of Rhodes; but he was afterwards reſtored, at the ſolicitations of the Engliſh ambaſſador, when he publiſhed a confeſſion of faith agreeable to that of the proteſtants. However, in 1636, he was baniſhed to Tenedos, and recalled three months after; but he did not long enjoy this favour; for being ſtill perſecuted by his old enemies, he was carried from Conſtantinople, and ſtrangled near the Black Sea, in 1638.

CYRUS I. the founder of the Perſian empire, the ſecond of the four ancient monarchies that have been eſtabliſhed in the world, was the ſon of Cambyſes, king of Perſia, by Mandana, daughter of Aſtyages, king of Media. Cyaxares, who ſucceeded his father Aſtyages, being threatened with an in-vaſion

vaſion by the king of Babylon, entered into an alliance with the king of Perſia, and ſeveral other princes bordering on his dominions, for their mutual defence. On this occaſion, Cambyſes ſent Cyrus, with thirty thouſand foot, to join the Medes. Cyrus entered the enemy's country, gained a complete victory over the Babylonians in the firſt engagement, in which their king fell in battle; he then marched up to the walls of Babylon; but finding that the garriſon conſiſted of a hundred thouſand men, he retired with Cyaxares into Media, to ſtrengthen their alliance and augment their forces. Cyaxares, ſenſible of the merit of his nephew Cyrus, gave him his daughter in marriage, and made him heir to his Median dominions, upon which Cyrus marched towards Babylon, leaving Cyaxares in Media. Cyrus ſurpriſed the Babylonians before they joined their forces, and marching with the utmoſt expedition, gave them battle, and was a ſecond time victorious. He took Sardis, and making Crœſus, king of Lydia, priſoner, poſſeſſed himſelf of all his treaſure and the wealth of that opulent city, but reſtored Crœſus to his throne.

After ſubduing the Leſſer Aſia, Syria, and part of Arabia, Cyrus marched a ſecond time to the walls of Babylon. He cauſed a number of canals to be made, and on the evening of a feaſt, cutting the banks of the Tigris, the water of that river being let into the canals, fell ſo low, that he marched ſeveral bodies of forces, on both ſides of the city, along the bed of the river. The Babylonians were then ſolemnizing a grand feſtival, ſo that he found an opportunity of entering the brazen gates, which the drunken Babylonians had left often; and taking Balthazar, the king, and his whole court priſoners, put them to the ſword, fulfilling the propheey of Daniel, that the cruelties which the Babylonians had exerciſed upon others, ſhould be returned upon themſelves.

Cyrus, after being twenty-ſix years general of the forces both of his father and uncle, at length recovered all the countries in Africa and Leſſer Aſia, which had been in ſubjection to the Aſſyrian empire. He then returned to Babylon, and both his father Cambyſes and his uncle Cyaxares dying, he became the ſole monarch of that vaſt empire of Perſia.

In the firſt year of the reign of Cyrus, expired the ſeventieth year of the Jewiſh captivity in Babylon, and by the advice of the prophet Daniel, he publiſhed an edict for rebuilding the temple of Jeruſalem, and re-peopling that city with its ancient inhabitants. He reſtored all the veſſels of the temple, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken from thence and placed in the temple of Baal, at Babylon. Upon this, the Jews returned to their own country, under the conduct of Zorobabel. In Cyrus's time, the Perſian empire extended from the gulph of Ormus, and the Red Sea, and from Ethiopia, on the ſouth, to the Euxine and Caſpian Seas on the north, and from the river Indus on the eaſt to the deſerts of Lybia, the Mediterranean and Ægean Seas, on the weſt. Cyrus made it the buſineſs of his reign to exerciſe juſtice, and to relieve the oppreſſed, governing the nations he had conquered with ſuch humanity and tenderneſs, that they became his faithful ſubjects. He reigned ſole monarch of Perſia only ſeven years, and died in Babylon, in the five hundred and twenty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra, leaving his ſon Cambyſes his ſucceſſor. It is remarkable, that this wiſe and formidable prince was mentioned by name in the ſacred Scriptures two hundred years before his birth; for Iſaiah called him the Servant of God, and informed the Jews, that God would make uſe of this prince to deliver them from the captivity of the Chaldeans.

This is the account given of this great conqueror by Xenophon and the Holy Scriptures; but Herodotus and Juſtin repreſent his actions, and particularly his death, in a very different light, with ſeveral circumſtances that are highly improbable, and ſay, that he having conquered the Maſſagetes with their general Spargapiſus, the ſon of Tomyris, their queen, ſhe marched againſt him a ſhort time after, with a powerful army, defeated him, took him priſoner, cauſed his head to be cut off, and plunging it into a veſſel filled with blood, cried, "Quench the thirſt thou haſt had "for human blood."

Cyrus the Younger, the ſon of Darius Nothus, was made governor of the coaſt of Aſia, and ſuccoured the Spartans againſt the Athenians. Some years after he was accuſed of conſpiring againſt his elder brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, who had ſucceeded his father, but his life was ſaved by Pariſatis, his mother. At his return into Lydia he ſecretly raiſed troops; engaged the Ionians to riſe in his favour, and marched againſt his brother Artaxerxes, pretending that the crown belonged of right to him, on account of his being born when his father was king. The battle was fought near the Cunaxa, in the four hundredth year before the birth of Chriſt, when Cyrus loſt life, fighting with great bravery. This prince brought with him the famous Aſpaſia. Artaxerxes took her priſoner, and conceived as great a paſſion for her as Cyrus himſelf had done.

The ten thouſand Greeks who had fought for Cyrus, and had already conquered Tiſſaphernes, then performed under the conduct of Xenophon, that noble retreat ſo celebrated by hiſtorians.

Cyrus, a native of Panopolis in Egypt, lived in the fifth century, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the court of the emperor Theodoſius the Younger, by his wit and his great facility in making verſes. He commanded the Roman troops at the taking of Carthage. In 441 he was conſul, and preſect of Conſtantinople, which he repaired after its being almoſt deſtroyed by an earthquake; but this procuring him the favour of the people, Theodoſius deprived him of all his poſts, and confiscated his goods, under the preſence that he was an idolater: however we are told that this diſgrace diſpoſed him to embrace Chriſtianity.

Cyrus, patriarch of Conſtantinople, was a monk of the iſle of Ameſtriads, in the eighth century, and was made patriarch through the intereſt of Juſtin the Younger. He went to meet pope Conſtantine, who came to Conſtantinople in 710, and was afterwards baniſhed, when Philippicus Bardanes uſurped the empire in 712.

CYTHEREA, in pagan mythology, a name given to Venus, on account of her being formed of the froth of the ſea, at the iſland of Cythera, and the ſumptuous temple erected to her in that iſland. See Venus.

CYZICUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of the peninſula of the Propontis, treated the Argonauts ſumptuouſly, who landed there as they went for the golden fleece. Theſe heroes parting from thence, and being a day at ſea, were driven back upon the ſame coaſt at night by a ſtorm; when Cyzicus taking them for pirates or enemies, oppoſed their landing, but was killed in the engagement.

CZACKTHURN, a ſtrong place of Auſtria, and in the duchy of Stiria. It is ſeated between the rivers Drave and Muer. It is ſurrounded with water on all ſides, which makes it look like an iſland. It is forty miles ſouth eaſt of Gratz, and one hundred ſouth of Vienna. Long. 17. 19. E. Lat. 46 24. N.

CZASLAW, a town of Bohemia, capital of a circle of the the ſame name, remarkable for being the burying place of of Ziſca, general of the Huſſites; as alſo for the battle gained by the Pruſſians over the Auſtrians in 1742. It is ſeated on the river Crudenka, forty three miles ſouth-eaſt of Prague. Long. 15. 33. E. Lat. 49. 50 N.

CZENSTOCHOW, a town of Poland in the palatinate of Cracovia, where there is a monaſtery large enough to hold a garriſon of four hundred men, and whoſe revenues are ſufficient to maintain them. They pretend to have the picture of the virgin Mary painted by St. Luke, which draws a vaſt number of pilgrims hither, for which reaſon this place is called the Loretto of Poland. It is ſeated on the river Wart, ſeventy-five miles ſouth weſt of Breſlaw, and fifty north-by-weſt of Cracovia. Long 19. 15. E. Lat. 50. 48. N.

CZEREMISSI, a people inhabiting the country near the river Volga. Thoſe who live to the north of it are called Sanagornia, and thoſe to the ſouth Lugowija. They are a ſavage pagan people, who live under tents, which they tranſport from place to place, and are under the government of Caſan. They have no idols of wood or ſtone, but direct their prayers to heaven in the open air, near great trees, to which they pay honour, and hold their aſſemblies about them. When they ſacrifice cattle they hang their hides and bones about theſe trees till they rot. They have no books nor writing among them, and if you aſk them the reaſon of it, they anſwer that they had ſuch things in ancient times, but the great cow has devoured them all.

CZERNICOW, a town of Ruſſia, capital of the duchy of the ſame name, with a caſtle. It is ſeventy five miles north-eaſt of Kiow. Long. 32. 13. E. Lat. 51. 20. N.

CZIRNIC, a town of Carniola, near a lake of the ſame name in the circle of Auſtria. This lake is three miles in length, and a mile and a half in breadth. It is ſurrounded with mountains, and in it are three iſlands. The water of this lake generally runs out once a year through ſubterranean conduits, and it becomes dry land. After a certain time it returns again with great impetuoſity. When the water is going off they give notice to the neighbouring villages by the ſound of bells, and the people all haſten to the lake, and take a great quantity of fiſh. Some time after the waters are gone off they mow excellent hay. This done they plough the land, and ſow it with millet ſeed. It is ſeated twenty five miles ſouth-eaſt of Lauback. Long 15. 0. E. Lat. 46. 12. N.

CZERSKO, a town of Poland in Mazovia, ſeated on the river Viſtula, twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Warſaw. Long. 21. 31. E. Lat. 52. 26. N.

CZONGROD, a town of Upper Hungary, and capital of the territory of the ſame name, is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Thieſſa and Keres. Long. 20. 57. E. Lat. 46. 30. N.

D.

DABUL, a town of Aſia, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, and on its weſtern coaſt, ſeated on a navigable river. It was taken and plundered in 1509 by the Portugueſe, ſince which it never recovered its former condition. Moſt of the inhabitants are banians, who live in houſes made of reeds, and fare very hard, and yet they are moſt of them goldſmiths. Its principal trade is in pepper and ſalt. It is one hundred and ſixty miles north of Goa. Long. 73. 33. E. Lat. 17. 30. N.

DAC (JOHN) an able German painter, born at Cologne in 1556. After having perfected himſelf in Italy, he returned into Germany, where the emperor Rodolphus loaded him with wealth and honour, and engaged him to draw a great number of fine pictures.

DACA, or DACCA, a town of Aſia in the kingdom of Bengal, ſeated on the river Ganges, and in the dominions of the great mogul. It is the largeſt town in Bengal, but the houſes of the natives are built ſlightly with cane, covered with earth. Proviſions are at a very low rate, though the country is full of people. It is one hundred and twenty-five miles eaſt of Hughly. Long. 89. 10. E. Lat. 24. 0. N.

DACHAW, a town of Bavaria in Germany, ſeated on a mountain. It is large and well built, and the elector hath a caſtle or palace there built in a very ancient taſte. The air is very pure and healthy, which with the fine gardens, and agreeable proſpect from the caſtle, render it a very agreeable ſeat. Long. 11. 30. E. Lat. 48. 20. N.

DACIER (ANDREW) a perſon of diſtinguiſhed merit in the republic of letters, was born at Caſtres in Upper Languedoc, on the ſixth of April 1651, and ſtudied at Saumur, under Tannegui Le Fevre, who was then engaged in the inſtruction of his daughter. M. Dacier no ſooner ſaw the riſing merit and fine endowments of that young woman, than he conceived an affection for her, and their inclination for ſtudy was the ſource of that mutual tenderneſs, which continued unabated during the forty years of their marriage. The duke of Montauſier hearing of his merit, put him in the liſt of the commentators for the uſe of the dauphin, and engaged him in an edition of Pompeius Feſtus; this with his edition of Horace, and his other works, raiſed him a very great reputation. In 1695 he was made a member of the Academy of Inſcriptions, and of the French Academy. Soon after Lewis XIV. ſettled upon him a penſion of two thouſand livres, and appointed him keeper of the books in the king's cloſet in the Louvre; and he was made perpetual ſecretary of the French Academy. In 1717 he obtained a reverſionary grant of ten thouſand crowns upon the place of keeper of the books in the king's cloſet; and when that poſt was united to that of library-keeper to the king, he was not only continued in the privileges of his place during life, but the ſurvivorſhip of it was granted to his wife, a favour of which there had been no inſtance before. Beſides the works already mentioned, he tranſlated into French, 1. Marcus Antoninus's Moral Reflections. 2. Ariſtotle's Poetics. 3. The Oedipus and Electra of Sophocles. 4. The Works of Hippocrates. 5. The Works of Plato. 6. The Life of Pythagoras. 7. Plutarch's Lives, &c. He died September 18, 1722.

DACIER (ANNE) a lady juſtly celebrated for her many learned works, was the daughter of Tanneguy Le Fevre, profeſſor of Greek at Saumur in France, and was born in that city in the year 1651. She gave an early proof of a fine genius, which her father cultivated with great care. After his death ſhe went to Paris, whither her fame had already reached; ſhe was then preparing an edition of Callimachus, and ſhewed ſome ſheets of that work to Mr. Huet, preceptor to the dauphin, and to ſeveral other learned men, and the work was ſo highly admired, that the duke of Montauſier made a propoſal to her of publiſhing ſeveral Latin authors for the uſe of the dauphin. She at firſt rejected this propoſal, as a taſk to which ſhe was not equal. But the duke having made her a viſit, and being charmed with her converſation, inſiſted upon it, upon which ſhe undertook an edition of Florus, which ſhe publiſhed in 1674. Her reputation being now ſpread all over Europe, the academy of Recovrati at Padua choſe her one of their body; and Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, ordered count Coningsmark to make her a compliment in her name, upon which mademoiſelle Le Fevre ſent the queen a Latin letter, with her edition of Florus. Her majeſty wrote a very obliging anſwer, and not long after ſent her another letter, to perſuade her to abandon the proteſtant religion, making her conſiderable offers to induce her to ſettle at her court. In 1683 ſhe married M. Dacier, after which, having employed ſome time in conſidering the proteſtant and popiſh religions, they embraced the latter, and made their public abjuration in 1685. Mad. Dacier publiſhed ſeveral valuable works, and, among the reſt, French tranſlations of Anacreon, Homer, Terence's and Plautus's comedies, &c. Several of the Latin claſſics, with notes, for the uſe of the dauphin, and ſome original pieces. This admirable lady was as remarkable for her firmneſs, generoſity, equality of temper, and piety, as for her extraordinary learning; and her modeſty was ſo great, that ſhe never ſpoke of ſubjects of literature, or her own performances, but always put herſelf upon a level with thoſe about her. She died Auguſt 17, 1720, at ſixty-nine years of age.

DACHSTEIN, a town of Lower Alſace, three miles from Molzhein, with a caſtle. It belongs to the biſhop of Straſburg. Long. 7. 45. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

DACTYLI IDÆI, in Pagan worſhip, an order of prieſts, ſaid to be inſtituted on the following occaſion: Cybele having brought forth Jupiter and Juno at one birth, ſhe only ſhewed Juno to Saturn, and gave Jupiter to the Curetes or Corybantes, to be nurſed by ſtealth, leſt Saturn ſhould devour him: the prieſts, to prevent the infant being diſcovered by its crying, invented a kind of dance, in which they met one another, ſtriking upon little braſs ſhields, and thus prevented the father's diſcovering his ſon.

DÆDALUS, in fabulous hiſtory, an Athenian artiſt, who invented ſeveral mechanical inſtruments, as the ſaw, &c. and even made walking ſtatues. He threw his brother's ſon out of a window, and killed him, for fear he ſhould excel him in his art, becauſe he had invented the potter's wheel; upon which he fled into Crete, to king Minos, and took his ſon Icarus along with him. He there built the celebrated labyrinth, in which he and his ſon were ſhut up, on account of having ſerved the queen Paciphäe in her baſe amour: however, making wings for himſelf and Icarus, they flew away; but the youth not obſerving his directions, fell into the ſea, and was drowned. He then fled to Cocalus, king of Egypt who cauſed him to be ſuffocated in a hot bath, to prevent Minos's making war againſt him on his account.

DAGHESTAN, a country of Aſia, bounded by Circaſſia on the north; on the eaſt by the Caſpian ſea; on the ſouth by Perſia; and on the weſt by Georgia. The inhabitants are Tartars, of the Mahommedan religion, and had a prince of their own, under the government of whom they continued till the year 1722, when the Ruſſians brought them under ſubjection. But in 1734 they revolted at the ſolicitation of the Ottoman Port, and were ſeconded in their rebellion by the Crim Tartars, and thoſe called Leſkis. They ſeized on the fortreſs of Derbent, but the Ruſſians conquered them again, and brought them back to their duty. The inhabitants are ſtrong and well ſet, with a duſky complexion, and dreadful ugly faces. Their hair is black and long, falling over their ſhoulders. Their habit is a long cloſe coat, of a grey or black colour, of very coarſe cloth, over which they wear another as coarſe, or perhaps a ſheep's ſkin. On their heads they wear a patch-work ſquare cap, and on their feet a piece of the hide of a beaſt, clumſily ſowed on for ſhoes. They formerly uſed to leave the women to take care of the cattle, while they went robbing and plundering caravans, or kidnapping children, to ſell to the Perſians. Their defenſive arms are a coat of mail, a head-piece, and a buckler. The offenſive a ſcymeter, a bow and arrows, and a buckler.

DAGHO, an iſland of the Baltic ſea, near the coaſt of Livona, and to the north of the iſland of Oeſel, from which it is ſeparated by a narrow canal. It is about thirty-ſeven miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The ſoil is fruitful, and there is plenty of game. Dagheort is the principal place, and Paden is a ſmall harbour. It is ſubject to Ruſſia. Long. 22. 30. E. Lat. 58. 48. N.

DAGOBERT I. king of France, the ſon of Clotaire II. was king of Auſtraſia, in 622, and after the death of his father, in 628, ſucceeded him in the poſſeſſion of the kingdoms of Neuſtria, Burgundy, and Aquitain. Dagobert ſubdued the Gaſcons; loaded his ſubjects with taxes, and was exceſſively fond of women. He died at Epinay, about the year 638, leaving Clovis II. by whom he was ſucceeded, and Sigibert, who was king of Auſtraſia.

DAGOBERT II. ſurnamed the Young, king of Auſtraſia, was the ſon of Sigibert III. and ought to have ſucceeded his father, who died in 656; but Grimoald, mayor of the palace, cauſed him to be confined in a monaſtery; from whence he afterwards took him and ſent him into Ireland, and then placed Childebert on the throne. Clovis II. king of France, put Grimoald to death; dethroned Childebert, and on a falſe rumour of the death of Dagobert, gave Auſtraſia to Clotaire III. and afterwards to Childeric. Dagobert married Matilda in Ireland, and had ſeveral children by her. After the death of Childeric he aſcended the throne of Auſtraſia, in 673, but notwithſtanding his being a pious and virtuous prince, he was aſſaſſinated in 678, by order of Ebroin, mayor of the palace.

He ought not to be confounded with Dagobert the Young, king of France, who was the ſon of Childebert. This laſt aſcended the throne in 711, and died on the 17th of January, 715.

DAGON, in pagan worſhip, the god of the Philiſtines, whoſe upper parts reſembled the human form; but from the belly downwards, except his legs, he had the reſemblance of a fiſh, being covered with ſcales, and having a tail turning upwards.

D'AGUESSEAU (HENRY FRANCIS) chancellor of France, was born at Limoges, on the 27th of November, 1668, and was the ſon of Henry D'Agueſſeau, counſellor of ſtate. He received his education almoſt entirely from his father, and was diſtinguiſhed by the ſweetneſs of his manners, his eloquence, and his amazing abilities. He became well ſkilled in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and other oriental languages; and alſo in the Engliſh, Italian, Spaniſh, and Portugueſe tongues; and uſed to ſay that the learning of a language was only an amuſement. He was well acquainted with the works of the Roman civilians, the conſtitutions of the Greek and Roman emperors, and the laws and cuſtoms of France. He made the firſt eſſay of his abilities in the poſt of advocate to the king, at twenty-one years of age; and when he had only enjoyed that a few months, he was raiſed by the recommendation of his father, to the poſt of advocate-general to the parliament. The king giving him the preference to another, ſaid, that he knew his father well enough to be certain that he would not deceive him, even in the teſtimony he gave in favour of his ſon. He immediately ſhone in this poſt with the greateſt luſtre, and his ſpeeches were conſidered as maſterpieces of eloquence. Lewis XIV. afterwards raiſed him to the poſt of procurator-general, when but thirty-two years of age, and he filled this poſt with equal dignity. In 1717 he was raiſed to the poſt of chancellor, without having aſked or deſired it; but he now began to be expoſed to ſtorms. In January 1718 the regent ſent to him to demand the ſeals, and ordered him to retire to his eſtate of Freſnes; but in 1720 they were reſtored to him, without aſking. In 1722 they were taken from him a ſecond time, and he returned to Freſnes. He was not recalled till the year 1727, when he reſumed a great part of the functions, in which he had been before engaged; but the ſeals were not reſtored to him till the year 1737. In the year 1750 his infirmities made him reſolve to quit his poſt, and he wrote to the king for permiſſion to reſign, which was granted him in the eighty-ſecond year of his age, after having enjoyed the poſt of chancellor near thirty-four years; upon which the king granted him a penſion of one hundred thouſand livres. He died on the 9th of February, 1751. His works were printed in 1756, in two volumes, duodecimo.

DAHOME, a kingdom of Africa, which lies north of Whidaw, on the Guinea coaſt. The king of this country lately made a conqueſt of Widaw, and greatly diſturbed the ſlave-trade of the Europeans.

DAIDALA, Δαίδαλα, in Grecian antiquity, two feſtivals, one of which was obſerved by the Plateans, in the groves at Alalcomenos, in Bœotia; where expoſing to the open air pieces of ſodden fleſh, they carefully watched whither the crows that came to prey upon them directed their flight, and then hewed down all thoſe trees upon which any of them alighted, and formed them into ſtatues.

The other feſtival was obſerved by all the cities of Bœotia, once in fifty years, in the following manner. A ſtatue being dreſſed in woman's apparel, upon the banks of the Aſophus, a woman in the habit of a bride-maid was appointed to accompany it, being followed by a long train of Bœotians to the top of mount Cithæron; upon which an altar of ſquare pieces of timber, cemented together in the manner of ſtones, was erected. Upon this large quantities of combuſtible matter being laid, each of the cities, and ſuch men as were poſſeſſed of plentiful fortunes, offered a bull to Jupiter, and an ox or heifer to Juno, with plenty of wine and incenſe; the poorer ſort contributing ſmall ſheep, which being thrown into one common heap, were ſet on fire, and not extinguiſhed till the whole fabric, of which the altar was a part, was conſumed to aſhes. The firſt occaſion of this cuſtom was ſaid to be as follows: Jupiter and Juno quarrelling, the goddeſs was ſo exaſperated, that ſhe departed from him, and retired into Eubœa, when the god finding all his endeavours to prevail on her to return ineffectual, adviſed with Cithæron, king of the Platæans, who perſuaded him to dreſs a ſtatue in woman's apparel, and place it in a chariot, giving out that it was Platæa, the daughter of Aſophus, and that ſhe was contracted to him in marriage: the god approved his counſel, and put it in practice; when the report reaching Juno, ſhe haſted to meet the chariot, where, having diſcovered the cheat, ſhe was ſo pleaſed with the contrivance, that ſhe became reconciled to her huſband.

DAILLE (JOHN) in Latin, Dallæus, miniſter of the church of Paris, and one of the moſt learned proteſtant divines of his time, was born at Chatelleraut, January 6, 1594. In 1625 he was appointed miniſter of the church of Saumur, and in 1626 was removed to Paris. He ſpent all the reſt of his life in the ſervice of this laſt church, and from thence diffuſed great light over the proteſtant world, as well by his ſermons, which were printed in nineteen volumes, as by his books of controverſy. His firſt work, intitled De Uſu Patrum, is eſteemed his maſter-piece. He alſo wrote many other works, the principal of which are, 1. De Confeſſione. 2. De Confirmatione & Extrema Unctione. 3. De Cultu Religioſo, &c. He died at Paris, on the 15th of April, 1670, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

DAIN (OLIVER LE) a barber, and afterwards miniſter of ſtate to Lewis XI. was born at Thielt, in Flanders, and was the ſon of a peaſant. His family name was Le Diable, but he changed it into that of Le Dain, or Le Daim, and came to France, where he was made barber to Lewis XI. and having obtained the favour of that monarch, was made governor of ſeveral places, obtained conſiderable eſtates, and took the title of count de Meulan, a lordſhip which Lewis XI. had given him at the rent of a maille of gold, the ſmalleſt coin at that time in France. His conduct, his inſolence, and vanity, made him univerſally hated. In 1472 he endeavoured to reduce the city of Ghent, but in vain. He afterwards ſurpriſed Tournay. After the death of Lewis XI. and in the beginning of the reign of Charles VIII. he was proſecuted, for having abuſed a woman, on condition of ſaving the life of her huſband; and having the inhumanity to cauſe him to be ſtrangled. For this he was condemned, and hanged on a gibbet, in 1484. Thus ended the life of this inſolent miniſter of ſtate.

DAIN, a river of France, ariſes at Val de Miege, in the bailliage of Salins, paſſes to Nozeray and to Siroſs, croſſes Bugey, and at length falls into the Rhone.

DALACA, or DALHAKA, an iſland of the Red Sea, over againſt the coaſt of Abex, about ſixty miles in length, and thirty in breadth, remarkable for a pearl fiſhery. The religion of the inhabitants is the ſame as that of Abyſſinia, which can hardly be called the Chriſtian. However, they are ſworn enemies to the Mahommedans. The capital town is ſeated on the weſt point of the iſland. Long. from 40. 55. to 51. 26. E. and from 14. 20. to 16. 15. N. lat.

DALECARLIA, a province of Sweden, bounded by Norway on the north and weſt; by Helſtringia and Geſtricia on the eaſt; and by Dalia, Wermeland, and Weſtmania on the ſouth. It is about one hundred and ſeventy-five miles long, and one hundred broad. The ſoil is not only fertile in grain, but this country is remarkable for iron and copper mines. The Dalecarlians are dexterous miners, and excellent ſoldiers; for which reaſon, whatever ſide they take in the time of civil wars, they render that party formidable. The moſt remarkable places are Idra, an open town; Hedemora, the capital; and Fahlun, or in the language of the country, Kupferberg, that is Copper Hill, which is one of the largeſt towns in Sweden. See FAHLUN SAETHER, a town where they coin copper money.

DALECARLIA, a river of Sweden, riſes in the Dofrine mountains, which divide Norway from Sweden, and running from the north-eaſt to the ſouth-eaſt, through the whole province of Dalecarlia, falls into the Bothnic gulph, between the provinces of Upland and Geſtricia.

DALECHAMPS (JAMES) a learned phyſician, well ſkilled in polite learning, was born of a gentleman's family at Caen, in Normandy, in the year 1513, and practiſed phyſic, ſic at Lyons, from the year 1552 to the year 1588. He was well ſkilled in polite literature, and was the author of ſome works which ſhewed his learning to be very univerſal. He wrote, 1. A general Hiſtory of Plants. 2. De Peſte. 3. Scholia in Pauli Æginetæ. 4. A Tranſlation into Latin of Athenæus, in which he is ſaid to have ſpent thirty years; and, 5. publiſhed an edition of Pliny's Natural Hiſtory, with notes. He died in 1588, at ſeventy-five years of age.

DALEM, a town of the United Provinces, capital of a diſtrict of the ſame name, with a caſtle. The French took it in 1672, and demoliſhed the fortifications. It is ſeated on the river Bervine, five miles north-eaſt of Liege, and fifteen north-weſt of Limburg. Long. 5. 59. E. Lat. 50. 40. N.

DALIA, a province of Sweden, between the lake Wener and the province of Bahus. It is about one hundred miles in length, and fifty in breadth. It is full of mountains and foreſts, and yet there are ſome very good meadow-land. Here they get maſts for ſhips, which they ſend to Gottenburg.

DALKEITH, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Mid-Lothian, is the ſeat of a preſbyterry, containing ten pariſhes. The ducheſs of Buccleugh has built a very handſome palace here, in the place where the old caſtle formerly ſtood, which is adorned with very fine portrait paintings. Long. 2. 20. W. Lat. 55. 50. N.

DALMATIA, a country of Europe, extending along the gulph of Venice. It is bounded on the weſt by Iſtria; on the north by Croatia; on the eaſt by Albania; and on the ſouth by the Adriatic Sea. It is about two hundred and eighty miles in length, and fifty-eight in breadth; and the ſoil is fruitful, producing corn, wine, and oil; but the air is unhealthy. This country had formerly its own kings, but now it partly belongs to the queen of Hungary, partly to the Venetians, and partly to the Turks.

The upper part of Dalmatia belongs to the queen of Hungary, and borders on Croatia. The inhabitants of this country are commonly called Uſcocks. They are very much addicted to theft, and live upon rapine and plunder. However, they profeſs the Roman Catholic religion, and are ſtrongly attached to the houſe of Auſtria. They are the deſcendants of certain Hungarians, whom the Turks drove from their country about two centuries ago. They are utter enemies to the Turks, and never fail to kill them when they have an opportunity. The inhabitants conſiſt of about ſeven thouſand men, and are divided into three claſſes. The Caſalins, who inhabit a town called Zeng. The Stipendarii, who form four companies. The reſt are called Avanturieri, and are the moſt wicked and dangerous of all. They are fugitive vagabonds, from Turky and other parts of Dalmatia. They have no remarkable town but Segnia, which is a ſtrong fortreſs, and has an harbour and a biſhop's ſee. The Uſcocks are the greateſt pirates in all the gulph of Venice.

DALMATIN (George) a Lutheran miniſter, at Laubech, in Carniola, in the ſixteenth century, who tranſlated the whole Bible into the Sclavonian tongue, and publiſhed it at Wittemberg.

DALMATIUS, ſon of Conſtantius Chlorus, brother of Conſtantine the Great, lived about the year 300, he wore the purple, and had the title of Nobiliſſimus.

Dalmatius (St.) a famous archimandrite, of the monaſteries of Conſtantinople. He ſhewed great zeal againſt the Neſtorians, and was nominated by the fathers of the council of Epheſus, to act in their name at Conſtantinople, and died ſome time after, at above eighty years of age.

DALTON, a town of Lancaſhire, ſeated in a champaign country, at the ſpring-head of a river not far from the ſea. There is an ancient caſtle, in which are kept the records, and the priſoners for debt, in the liberty of Funes. The market, which is on Saturdays, is well ſupplied with corn, cattle, fiſh, and fowl; and there are two fairs, which are held on June 6, for horned cattle; and on October 23, for horned cattle, horſes, and pedlar's ware. Dalton is twenty-four miles weſt-north-weſt of Lancaſter, and two hundred and ſeventy-one north-north-weſt of London. Long. 3. 0. W. Lat. 54. 15. N.

Dalton (John) D. D. an eminent divine and poet, was the ſon of the rev. Mr. John Dalton, rector of Deane, near Whitehaven, in Cumberland, where he was born, in 1709. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and became tutor or governor to the lord Beauchamp, only ſon of the earl of Hertford, late duke of Somerſet, during which time he adapted Milton's admirable Maſque of Comus to the ſtage. He afterwards became aſſiſtant to Dr. Secker, late archbiſhop of Canterbury, at St. James's, and was preſented to the rectory of St. Mary, at Hill, by the late duke of Somerſet, and afterwards promoted by the king to a prebend of Worceſter, where he died, on the 22d of July, 1763, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. Beſides the above, he wrote a deſcriptive poem, addreſſed to two ladies at their return from viewing the coal-mines near Whitehaven; and Remarks on Twelve hiſtorical Deſigns of Raphael, and the Muſeum Græcum & Egyptiacum.

DALZIEL (Thomas) general of the forces in Scotland, in the reign of king Charles II. He was an excellent ſoldier, but a ſingular man. He was taken priſoner fighting for Charles II. at the battle of Worceſter, and was ſome time confined in the Tower, whence he made his eſcape, and went to Muſcovy, where he was made general to the czar. After the Reſtoration, he had the command of the king's forces in Scotland; but refuſed to ſerve in that kingdom under the duke of Monmouth, by whom he was ſuperſeded only for a fortnight. After the battle of Bothwell-bridge, he, with the frankneſs which was natural to him, openly reproved the duke for his miſconduct upon that occaſion. As he never ſhaved his beard after the death of Charle', it grew ſo long, that it reached almoſt to his girdle; and though his head was bald, he never wore a peruke, but covered it with a beaver hat, the brim of which was about three inches in breadth. He never wore boots, nor above one coat, which had ſtraight ſleeves, and ſat cloſe to his body. He conſtantly came to London once a year, to kiſs the king's hand. His uncouth appearance attracted the notice of the populace; and wherever he went, he was followed by the rabble with huzzas.

DAM, a ſtrong town in Flanders, ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. It was taken by the duke of Marlborough, in 1706. It is ſeated near the ſea, three miles from Bruges, and five weſt of Sluys. Long. 3. 15. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

Dam, a town of the United Provinces, in Groningen, ſeated on the river Damſter, three miles from the ſea, thirteen north-eaſt of Groningen, and fifteen ſouth-eaſt of Embden. Long. 6. 48. E. Lat. 53. 36. N.

Dam, a town of Germany, in Pomerania, with ſome fortifications, ſubject to the Swedes. It is ſeated on the Oder, three miles from Stetin. Long. 15. 5. E. Lat. 53. 4. N.

DAMAN, a maritime town of the Eaſt Indies, at the entrance into the gulph of Cambay. It is divided by the river Daman into two parts, one of which is called New Daman, and is a handſome town, well fortified, and defended by a good Portugueſe garriſon. The air is very healthy, and the gardens are delightful. The other is called Old Daman, and is very ill built. There is a harbour between the two towns, defended by a fort. It was taken by the Portugueſe, in 1535. The mogul has attempted to get poſſeſſion of it ſeveral times, but always without effect; it is ſtill ſubject to the Portugueſe, and is fifty miles from Surat, and two hundred from Goa. Long. 72. 35. E. Lat. 21. 5. N.

DAMASCENUS (St. John) a famous writer in favour of the worſhip of images, was born at Damaſcus, about the year 676, and became a monk, in a monaſtery near Jeruſalem. It is ridiculouſly pretended, that the caliph Hiocham having cauſed his right hand to be cut off, on account of a letter forged in his name by the emperor Leo, his hand was miraculouſly reſtored to him the following night, while he was aſleep. He died about the year 760, aged eighty-four. He wrote many works, which were printed in Greek and Latin, at Baſil, in 1559, and father Quien gave a new edition of them, in Greek and Latin, in 1721.

DAMASCIUS, a heathen philoſopher, ſaid by ſome to be of the Stoic ſchool, and by others of the Peripatetic, was born at Damaſcus, and flouriſhed in the middle of the ſixth century, when the Goths reigned in Italy. He wrote the Life of Iſidorus, his maſter in logic, and dedicated it to Theodora, a very learned and philoſophic lady. In this Life, he repeatedly attacked the Chriſtian religion, yet with ſome reſerve; but of this work there is nothing remaining, except ſome extracts preſerved by Photius. He wrote another work, which was of the philoſophic kind, in four books, which is alſo loſt. Damaſcius ſucceeded Theon in the rhetorical ſchool, over which he preſided nine years, and afterwards Iſidorus, in that of philoſophy, at Athens, in which ſituation he is ſuppoſed to have ſpent the latter part of his life.

DAMASCUS, the capital city of the ſouth part of Syria, is called Sham by the Turks. It is a very ancient place, and hath undergone various revolutions; yet it ſtill continues to be one of the moſt conſiderable cities of the Eaſt. It hath eight gates; and yet a man may walk round the walls in an hour and a quarter. The figure of it is ſquare, or rather oblong; but the ſuburbs are twice as large as the city, particularly that called Babullah is three or four miles in length. There are only part of the walls to be ſeen on the outſide, the reſt being hid with houſes. From the gate called Bab-Tciaour to Bab-Thoma, the walls are double, pretty high, and well built with large ſtones, furniſhed with handſome battlements, and flanked with good towers, which are generally round; there are ſome ſquare, but very few. The inward walls are about twenty-four feet high; and the outward, which are about four yards diſtant, ſtant, are about twenty-one. The ſpace between is filled with earth four or five feet high. The towers of the inſide wall are about eighty feet diſtant from each other, and ſixteen feet in diameter; the towers of the outward wall are placed at the diſtance of one hundred and twenty feet, and are twenty feet in diameter. Before the walls is a ditch, thirty feet wide, and fifteen deep; but all theſe works are continually going to decay.

The firſt thing that ſtrangers generally go to ſee is the houſe of Ananias, which may be ſeen for a few aſpres. After having paſſed through the door, you turn to the right hand, and deſcend fourteen ſteps into a vault, which was formerly a church, whoſe floor and pavement was of moſaic work, of which there is ſome remains; at preſent it is a moſque, which is pretty light, conſidering it is under ground. This room, as is pretended, is that where Ananias lodged, when he was commanded by the Lord to go to Saul. After this, they go to viſit the gate called Bab-Sharki, the gate of the eaſt, near which, as they ſay, he was let down in a baſket. At this gate begins the ſtreet called Strait, which runs directly to the gate Jabiez, through which you go into the fields, to the burying-ground of the Jews and Chriſtians, each having a place apart.

Thoſe who travel on a religious account viſit the tomb of St. George the Porter, or Gate-keeper, who was ſtoned by the Jews for having aſſiſted the eſcape of St. Paul. The tomb is in the middle of a court; it is erected of free-ſtone, and covered with a pavilion in the form of a pyramid. You need not doubt but there are a great many miracles wrought at this holy ſepulchre. Out of the Vicus Rectus, or Strait Street, you may paſs into the bazar, which is covered with wood-work over head, and well furniſhed with ſhops, wherein they ſell nothing but linen cloth, and the like. Out of this, you go to viſit the tomb of Ananias, and then the fountain, where St. Paul baptiſed him. There is another covered bazar, where they ſell nothing but cloth; and a third, whoſe roof is ſupported by ſtone arches. Near this, without the gate, you may have a ſight of the green moſque, the outſide of whoſe tower is caſed with green ſhining bricks, except the point at the top, which is covered with lead. It ſtands in a large court, paved with curious ſtones, and at the end of the court is a portico, ſupported with eight marble columns of the Corinthian order, of which the ſix middle ones are fluted. Through this there is an entrance into the moſque, which has a large dome, covered with lead; and on the weſt ſide is the tower or minaret, from whence they call the people to prayers.

It would be endleſs to deſcribe the other moſques. The number of which is ſaid to be two hundred, two of which had formerly been Chriſtian churches. However, it may be obſerved, that no Chriſtian is permitted to ſee the inſide of a moſque, otherwiſe than by peeping through grates of of poliſhed ſteel. By theſe means, may be diſcovered, in two of them, ſeveral handſome well-wrought tombs, which are ſaid to be the ſepulchres of ſome of the kings of Damaſcus. There is, indeed, an opportunity ſometimes of ſeeing the great moſque, when the brazen gates are thrown open; for then the whole inſide appears to the eye, which is charmed with the order of the columns which ſupport the roof, the beauty of their capitals the rich cornice which runs through the whole length of the nave, and the gildings wherewith they are embelliſhed.

The caſtle is like a little town, having its own ſtreets and houſes. It is defended by five towers, the ſtones of which are cut in the ſhape of diamonds. The houſes of the city are built partly of wood, and their fronts are backward, facing inward courts. Towards the ſtreets nothing is to be ſeen but great walls without windows; and yet within they are adorned with marble pillars, ſculptures, rich paintings, and gildings. Every houſe has its divan, or place where all viſitants are received, and they have, for the moſt part, gardens planted with fruit-trees.

The caravanſera, or inn, has much the air of a monaſtery; its firſt ſtory conſiſts of a long gallery, ſupported by marble pillars, ſurrounding a great ſquare court. The chambers are placed, as in a dormitory, one after another, the doors of which are adorned with ſeveral little ſtones of divers colours, and ranged in a Moſaic order. The court is paved with marble of different colours, and in the midſt is a baſon ſupplied with water from the river Barada: belonging to this is a moſque, with its dome, perfectly well built, and adorned with many columns of the faireſt marble. Among the reſt, there are four remarkable ones, which ſupport the portico entering into the moſque. Theſe pillars, though of a ſurpriſing height and thickneſs, are only of one piece of marble each.

The only river belonging to Damaſcus is the Barada, which, before its entrance into the city, is divided into three ſtreams, the greateſt of which runs to the city through an open plain, called the Field of Damaſcus. This ſupplies all the public and private fountains in the city, there being one belonging to every houſe. The other ſtreams go to the gardens, where they are divided and ſubdivided in ſuch a manner, that every garden receives it branch; hence ariſes the verdure and fertility of the plains and gardens, which ſurround this delightful place.

DAMASUS, biſhop of Rome, was a native of Guimarens, in Spain, and ſucceeded Liberius, in 366. Urbin, or Urſicinus, oppoſed his election, and was ordained biſhop of Rome, which cauſed a ſedition, wherein many perſons were maſſacred. Urſicinus was however baniſhed by the emperor, but returned into Italy, in 381, when he raiſed freſh diſturbances, and was the next year condemned by the Italian biſhops, in the council of Aquileia, when, at their requeſt, the emperor Gratianus ſentenced him to perpetual baniſhment; on which Damaſus remained in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the ſee of Rome. He held ſeveral councils, and condemned Urſacius, Valens, and Auxentius, took the part of Paulinus againſt Meletius, excommunicated Apollinarius, Vitalis, and Timotheus, and declared againſt the Luciferians. He enjoyed the biſhoprick of Rome eighteen years, and died in 384. There are ſtill extant ſome of his letters. It is ſaid, that Damaſus was the firſt who introduced the cuſtom of ſinging Hallelujah in the church.

DAMASUS II. was choſen pope after the death of Clement II. and died at Paleſtrina, twenty-three days after, in 1048, while the antipope Benedict IX. continued to poſſeſs the ſee of Rome.

DAMBEA, a province of Abyſſinia, in Africa, the capital of which, and of the whole province, is Gondar. It likewiſe contains the lake Dambea, through which the Nile paſſes. This is ſo large, that the natives call it Bahal Dambea, the Sea of Dambea. It is two hundred and fifty miles in length, and one hundred in breadth, the water of which is freſh. In the middle of it, there is an iſland, full of towns, villages, and groves, and is exceeding pleaſant.

DAMBROWKA, the daughter of Boleſlas, duke of Bohemia, was married, in 965, to Miceſlas I. duke of Poland, and afterwards prevailed on her huſband to embrace the Chriſtian religion, which ſhe profeſſed, and to eſtabliſh it in his dominions. Miceſlas being baptiſed, his example was followed by moſt of the Poles, who, till that time, were pagans.

DAMGARTEN, a town of Pomerania, with a caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Recknilz, near a bay of the Baltick Sea, eighteen miles weſt of Stralſund. Long. 12. 50. E. Lat. 54. 34. N.

DAMIAN (PETER) cardinal and biſhop of Oſtia, flouriſhed in the eleventh century. He had been a Benedictine, and it is thought he would always have preferred ſolitude to the dignities of the church, if he had not been forced, as it were, to accept them. He publicly condemned the liberty which the popes took to oppoſe the enterpriſes of the emperors by temporal arms, and deſcribed, in very lively colours, the enormous vices of the age in ſeveral of his works, particularly in that intitled Gomorrhæus.

DAMIANUS, a captain of a troop of robbers, who being willing to ſignalize himſelf by ſome bold enterpriſe, reſolved to kill Solyman II. in his tent, in the midſt of his army, encamped on the bank of the Ionian ſea, near the city of Batranto, in Albania. He engaged the ſavage people of mount Chimera in his deſign, and coming from the mountains, got up in a tree, the better to diſcover the ſultan's tent; but a branch breaking, he was diſcovered, and being put upon the rack, revealed the whole plot, upon which Solyman cauſed him to be devoured by ſome wild beaſts which he had juſt taken, and detached ſome of his troops to cut off his accomplices.

DAMIEN, a celebrated artiſt of the order of the Dominicans, was a native of Bergamo, and excelled in the art of inlaying, which he performed in ſuch a manner, as ſcarcely to be inferior to the fineſt paintings, as may be ſeen by the beautiful inlaid work, in the choir of the church of the Dominicans at Bergamo, the figures being done with ſuch ſkill, that the eye is deceived, and one would imagine it performed by the pencil. In this kind of work, Damien excelled all other artiſts.

DAMIEN (ROBERT FRANCIS) famous for having wounded Lewis XV. the French king, was born of mean parents, in a hamlet, in the dioceſe of Arras. He was ſervant to an officer at the ſiege of Philipſburg, and at length entered a college of Jeſuits as a domeſtic, but left it, and afterwards entered himſelf there again; he left it again, and after having gone through many different ſtations of life, in which he ſhewed the bad diſpoſition of his mind, robbed the laſt maſter he ſerved of a conſiderable ſum, and made his eſcape into Flanders, where he ſtaid about five months, during which he held many extravagant diſcourſes on the diſputes which then agitated the church and ſtate, and ſeveral times attempted to deſtroy himſelf, diſcovering in all his actions a diſordered mind. At laſt he returned to Paris, and on the third of January, 1757, went to Verſailles; and on the 5th, between five and ſix in the evening, ſtuck the king with a kind of pen-knife, juſt as he was getting into his chariot, ſurrounded by all his courtiers. The unhappy wretch being laid hold of, immediately declared that he had ſome accomplices, but ſaid that they were a great way off, and that he could not find them; but being preſſed to name them, ſaid that he could not, and muſt not, and that he was proof againſt the moſt dreadful torments.

The king having referred the examination and trial to the grand chamber, Damien was removed to the priſon of the palace, on the 18th of January, and ſhut up in the tower of Montgomeri, where he was fixed on a bed of a ſingular make, and the utmoſt care taken to preſerve his life. He obſtinately perſiſted to the commiſſaries appointed to examine him, in declaring that he had no accomplices, which being communicated to the attorney-general, he gave it as his opinion, that Damien ſhould be condemned to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment as Ravaillac had done; but that firſt he ſhould be put to the torture. On the 26th of March, this unhappy wretch appeared on the ſallete (a ſeat for the criminal) before all his judges, and ſeemed undaunted at the preſence of that auguſt aſſembly, looked upon them with reſolution, and ſteadily preſerved an uncommon preſence of mind. On Monday, the 28th, he was brought up to the chamber, where he was to be put to the torture to make him confeſs. He there heard his ſentence read with the ſame intrepidity, and ſupported the dreadful pains of the queſtion, as it is termed, without ſhewing any ſign of concern. At length, on his being brought to the ſcaffold, he there denied, with great reſolution, that there was any one concerned with him They firſt burned his right hand, then tore of his fleſh with red-hot pincers, and poured oil, melted lead, and roſin into his wounds. At every part of this infernal puniſhment he ſcreamed out, and then looked quietly at his torn and burnt members. At laſt they proceeded to quarteri g him; four horſes were faſtened to his legs and arms; but they wanting ſtrength to break the muſcles, they were cut, and then his legs and one arm were torn off; yet, it is ſaid, that he did not expire till the other arm was ſeparated from his body. After which all the parts of his mangled body were burned to aſhes, and they diſperſed in the air. How amazing is it that ſuch horrid ſcenes of cruelty ſhould be exerciſed upon a fellow-creature in a Chriſtian country!

DAMIETTA, a port of Egypt, ſeated at the extremity of the Delta, oppoſite to Roſetta, on the oriental branch of the river Nile, and anſwers to the ancient Peluſium. It has a caſtle, which ſeems to be at leaſt eight hundred years old. It is ſurrounded on all ſides with marſhes, and is itſelf a very dirty place. The heat is very moderate here in ſummer, and it rains plentifully in the winter. It is ſurrounded with gardens, and the caſſia of this place is greatly eſteemed. It is a trading town, and there are a hundred ſhips loaded here every year chiefly with rice. It is one hundred miles north of Cairo, one hundred and twenty-five eaſt of Alexandria, and ſeventy-three eaſt of Roſetta. Long. 31. 50. E. Lat 31. 15. N.

DAMOCLES, a courtier of Dionyſius the Tyrant, lived three hundred and twenty years before the Chriſtian æra. He told that prince, that he greatly admired his happineſs, on which Dionyſius invited him to a ſumptuous feaſt, and had him placed on a magnificent couch Damocles was delighted with theſe honours; but looking up, he ſaw a naked ſword hanging over him by a ſingle thread; when, ſtruck with terror, he inſtantly begged to be reſtored to his former ſtate.

DAMON, a celebrated Pythagorean philoſopher, about the four hundredth year before the birth of Chriſt, was united by ſo ſtrict a friendſhip to Pythias, that Dionyſius the Tyrant, reſolving to put one of them to death, and having permitted Damon to go home to ſettle his domeſtic affairs, Pythias was ſurety for his return. He accordingly came back to the tyrant at the appointed hour, when Dionyſius admiring their mutual fidelity, pardoned them both, and deſired to be admitted to a ſhare in their friendſhip.

DAMPIER (William) a famous mariner, was born of a good family in Somerſetſhire, in 1652, but loſt his father when young; and at ſeventeen years of age, was put apprentice to the maſter of a ſhip at Weymouth; but having made a voyage to France, and another to Newfoundland, he ſuffered ſo ſeverely by the ſeverity of the climate, that, on his return, he went to his friends with the reſolution of going no more to ſea; but ſoon changing his mind, he entered on board an Eaſt India ſhip, and ſailed to Bantam. In 1673, he ſerved on board the Royal Prince, commanded by ſir Edward Spragg, in two engagements againſt the Dutch. Afterwards going into Somerſetſhire, he became acquainted with colonel Hallier, by whoſe advice he went to Jamaica, and ſettled there as a planter; but, in about a year, quitted that employment to go with captain Hodſel, to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy. He, however, at length, left this profitable buſineſs, entered into a company of buccaniers, and made ſeveral voyages round the earth. At length, the earl of Pembroke, lord high admiral of England, ſent him, in the year 1699, in his majeſty's ſhip Roebuck, to make diſcoveries; but, after viſiting ſeveral parts of New Holland and New Guinea, he loſt his ſhip by her ſpringing a leak, and returned to England in an Eaſt-India veſſel, in 1701. He afterwards engaged in an expedition to the South Seas, concerted by the merchants of Briſtol, under the command of Woodes Rogers, which ſailed in Auguſt, 1708; and after again encompaſſing the earth, returned to England, in September, 1711; after which we have no farther account of him. His voyages are printed in four volumes, octavo.

DAMPIERRE (John) in Latin Dampetrus, acquired great reputation by his Latin poems, and paſſed for one of the moſt able advocates of his time. He died at Orleans, in 1550.

DAMVILLIERS, a town of France, in the duchy of Luxemburg. It was ceded to France by the treaty of the Pyrennees, and diſmantled in 1673. It is ſeated on a hill, in a marſhy country, thirty miles ſouth-weſt of Luxemburg, fifteen north-eaſt of Verdun, and twenty-eight weſt of Thionville. Long. 5. 33. E. Lat. 49. 22. N.

DAN, the ſon of Jacob and Bilhah, was born about the one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty fifth year before the Chriſtian æra, and was the chief of a very warlike people. He died at one hundred and twenty-ſeven years of age.

DANAE, in fabulous hiſtory, daughter to Acriſius, king of Argos, who being informed by an oracle, that he ſhould be killed by her ſon, ſhut her up in a caſtle of braſs to prevent it; but Jupiter transforming himſelf into a ſhower of gold, or in other words, corrupting her guards, he obtained acceſs to her, and Danaë becoming pregnant, brought forth Perſeus, who at length killed Acriſius.

DANAIDES, in fabulous hiſtory, the fifty daughters of Danaus, who having married their couſin germans, the fifty ſons of Ægiſthus, their father's brother, murdered them the firſt night, Hypermneſtra alone ſaving her huſband Linceus. The other ſiſters were condemned to ſuffer in Tartarus by filling a veſſel full of holes with water.

DANAUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Argos, was, according to ſome authors, an Egyptian, and the brother of Ramaſſes. After having reigned nine years in conjunction with his brother, he, it is ſaid, was forced to ſeek an aſylum in the country of Argos, which he erected into a kingdom, about the one thouſand four hundred and ſeventy-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra. He gave his fifty daughters in marriage to his fifty nephews; but being informed by the oracle that he ſhould be dethroned by one of his ſons-in-law, he ordered each of his daughters to murder her huſband on the wedding-night; but Hypermneſtra ſaving the life of Linceus; that young prince fulfilled the prediction of the oracle, and ſucceeded Danaus.

DANCALA, or Dangola, a province of Abyſſinia, in Africa. It lies to the weſt of the ſtraits of Bab-elmander. It is a barren country, and but little known.

DANCHET, (Anthony) a French dramatic poet, born at Riom in 1671. He was received into the Academy of Inſcriptions in 1706, and into the French Academy in 1712, and died at Paris on the 21ſt of February, 1748. His works are printed in four volumes 12mo.

DANCOURT, (Florence Carton, ſieur) a famous comedian and comic-poet, born at Fontainebleau on the firſt of November, 1661. He was at firſt an advocate in the parliament of Paris, but his paſſion for a young actreſs, named Thereſa le Noir, whom he married in 1680, gave him a fondneſs for the theatre, and he not only became an actor, but wrote a great number of comedies. He died on the ſixth of December, 1726, aged ſixty-five. The moſt complete edition of his works is that of 1729, in nine volumes 12mo.

DANDINI, (Jerome) an Italian jeſuit, and the firſt of his order who taught philoſophy at Paris, was born at Ceſena, in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and bore ſeveral honourable offices in the ſociety. He wrote a Commentary on the three books of Ariſtotle de Anima, in folio, and a work intitled, Ethica ſacra, in folio. He died November 29, 1634.

Dandini, (Hercules Francis) count, and a celebrated profeſſor of law at Padua, was born in 1691, and was the author of ſeveral works, the principal of which are, 1. Otium Aricinum, S. de Urbanis Officiis Dialogi. 2. Erminii ac Merani Dialogus, in quo Erminius ad filium ſuum erudiendum inſtitutionem parat. 3. De Forenſi ſcribendi Ratione culta atque perſpicua. 4. De Servitutibus prædiorum Interpretationes per Epiſtolas, &c. He died 1747.

DANDOLO, (Henry) a famous doge of Venice, admired for his prudence, courage, and capacity in the management of affairs. In 1201, he received, in a magnificent manner, the deputies of the princes engaged in a cruſade; and notwithſtanding his extreme old age, put himſelf at the the head of the Venetian fleet, and, in 1203, contributed to the taking of Conſtantinople, when he refuſed to be emperor of that city, and cauſed count Baldwin to be elected.

There have been ſeveral other doges of this family.

DANDRIEU, (JOHN FRANCIS) a French muſician, diſtinguiſhed by his ſkill in touching the organ and the harpſicord; wrote three books of pieces for the harpſicord, a book of pieces for the organ, and a number of Chriſtmas carols, which are eſteemed. He died at Paris in 1740, at fifty-ſix years of age.

DANEAU, (LAMBERT) in Latin Danæus, a learned Calviniſt miniſter, born at Orleans, was the diſciple of the famous Anne du Bourg, and taught divinity at Leyden. He wrote a commentary on St. Matthew and St. Mark, and other works; and died at Caſtres in 1596.

DANES, (PETER) one of the moſt learned men of the ſixteenth century, was born at Paris. He was the diſciple of Budæus, and John Laſcaris, and was firſt profeſſor of the Royal College. Danes was at length curate of St. Joſſe at Paris, preceptor and confeſſor to king Francis II. and was ſent to the council of Trent, where, in 1546, he made a diſcourſe which was greatly admired. One day Nicholas Pſeaume, biſhop of Verdun, having ſpoken with great freedom on the abuſes committed by the court of Rome, the biſhop of Arvietto, looking at the French, replied with a ſmile of deriſion, Gallus cantat, (the cock, or the Frenchman crows); on which Danes, with great ſmartneſs, inſtantly replied, Utinam ad iſtud Gallicinium Petrus reſipiſceret, (I wiſh that Peter would repent at the crowing of the cock.) Peter Danes was made biſhop of Lavaur in 1556, and died on the 23d of April, 1577, aged eighty.

DANET, (PETER) abbot of St. Nicholas de Verdun, was one of the perſons choſen by the duke of Montauſier, to write on the claſſics for the uſe of the dauphin. He had a ſhare in Phædrus, which he publiſhed with an explication, and notes, in Latin. He alſo wrote among other works, a Dictionary in Latin and French, and another in French and Latin. He died at Paris in 1709.

DANGEAU, (LEWIS COURCILLON) a learned writer, and member of the French Academy, was born in January 1643, and became a maſter of the Greek, Latin, Spaniſh, and Italian languages; he alſo applied himſelf to the ſtudy of hiſtory, heraldry, geography, &c. He was the intimate friend of the abbé de Choiſy; had ſeveral benefices, and died at Paris on the firſt of January, 1723. He wrote, in conjunction with the abbé de Choiſy, four excellent Dialogues on the Immortality of the Soul; on the Exiſtence of God; on Providence, and on Religion. He alſo wrote, 1. Reflections on the ſeveral parts of Grammar; 2. A New Method of Geographical Hiſtory; 3. The Principles of Heraldry; and ſeveral other works.

DANGOLA, or DONGOLA, a town of Nubia, in Africa, through which the caravans paſs in their way from Cairo to Abyſſinia. It is ſeated on the eaſtern banks of the Nile, on the declivity of a ſandy hill. The houſes are ill built, and the ſtreets half deſerted, being filled with heaps of ſand, which the heavy rains have brought down from the mountains. There is a large ſpacious caſtle in the middle of the town, but it is but poorly fortified. However, it ſerves to keep the Arabs in awe, who are maſters of the open country, where they wander about, feeding their cattle. The walls of the houſes are made of a ſort of clay, and are covered with ſtraw. It contained 10,000 families of blacks, and is ſtill the reſidence of the king. But how far his dominions extend, is uncercertain, for he is often at war with his neighbours. The commodities are corn, ſandal-wood, civet, elephant's teeth, and ſlaves. A great number of the laſt are brought every year to be conducted to Cairo, in Egypt. It is one hundred and twenty miles north of Sennar, and nine hundred ſouth of Cairo. Long. 34. 35. E. Lat. 15. 6. N.

DANIEL, the fourth of the greater prophets, was born in Judea, of the tribe of Judah, about the twenty-fifth year of the reign of Joſiah. He was led captive to Babylon after the taking of Jeruſalem, in the ſix hundred and ſixth year before the birth of Chriſt, and with other young Hebrew lords, was taken into the ſervice of Nebuchadnezzar. That prince gave them maſters to inſtruct them in the languages and ſciences of the Chaldeans, and ordered them to be fed with the moſt delicate viands; but fearing that they ſhould eat meat forbidden by the law of Moſes, they deſired the king's officers to allow them only pulſe. The wiſdom and conduct of Daniel pleaſing Nebuchodonoſor, that prince gave him ſeveral poſts of honour. It is commonly believed, that this prophet, when but twelve years of age, made known the innocence of the chaſte Suſannah; but the learned are not agreed, that the young Daniel, who confounded the old men, was the ſame with this prophet. However, he explained Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the myſterious ſtatue, which foretold the duration of the four great monarchies, on which account he was made prefect of the province of Babylon. In the reign of Darius king of the Medes, he refuſed to adore the golden ſtatue of the king, and was caſt into the lions den, when thoſe beaſts, though pinched with hunger, did him no manner of hurt. He explained the characters written on the wall of the room where Belſhazzar was feaſting; and died in the reign of Cyrus, at about the eighty-eighth year of his age. His prophecies are partly in Hebrew, partly in Chaldee, and partly in Greek, and the moſt remarkable of theſe, is that of the ſeventy weeks, at the end of which, the Meſſiah was put to death.

DANIEL, (SAMUEL) an eminent poet and hiſtorian, in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James I. was born near Taunton in Somerſetſhire, in the year 1562, and educated at Oxford; but leaving that univerſity without a degree, applied himſelf to Engliſh hiſtory and poetry, under the patronage of the earl of Pembroke's family. He was afterwards tutor to the lady Anne Clifford, and, upon the death of the celebrated Spencer, was appointed poet-laureat to queen Elizabeth. In king James's reign he was made gentleman extraordinary, and afterwards one of the grooms of the privy-chamber to the queen conſort, who took great delight in his converſation and writings. He wrote an Hiſtory of England, ſeveral poems and dramatic pieces; and died in the year 1619. His proſe in the above hiſtory, has much more ſimplicity and elegance, than is to be found in the generality of the writers of his age; but his poetry is too proſaic to gain many admirers in the preſent. However, his poems and plays have been printed ſeveral times. The laſt edition was in two volumes 8vo, 1718.

DANIEL, (GABRIEL) a celebrated Jeſuit, and one of the beſt of the French hiſtorians; was born at Rouen, on the eighth of February, 1649. He taught polite literature, philoſophy, and divinity amongſt the Jeſuits, and was ſuperior of their houſe at Paris, where he died on the 23d of June, 1728. There are a great number of his works in French, the principal of which are, 1. An Hiſtory of France, of which he alſo wrote an abridgment in nine volumes 12mo. 2. An Hiſtory of the French Militia, two volumes 4to. 3. An Anſwer to the Provincial Letters; 4. A Voyage to the World of Deſcartes; 5. Letters on the Doctrine of the Theoriſts, and on Probability; 6. New Difficulties relating to the Knowledge of Brutes; and, 7. A Theological Treatiſe on the Efficacy of Grace.

DANIEL, (PETER) advocate of Orleans, and one of the moſt learned men of the ſixteenth century; collected a noble library of manuſcripts, and publiſhed the Aulularia of Plautus; Servius's Commentaries on Virgil, &c. He died at Paris in 1603.

DANIELE, (RICCIARELLI) a famous Italian painter, ſurnamed da Volterra, from a town in Tuſcany, where he was born, in the year 1509. Being of a melancholy and heavy temper, he ſeemed to be but meanly qualified by nature for an artiſt, yet by the inſtructions of Balthazar da Siena, and his own continual application, he ſurmounted all difficulties, and at length became ſo excellent a painter, that his Deſcent from the Croſs, in the Church of the Trinity on the Mount, is ranked among the principal pieces in Rome. He was choſen by pope Paul IV. to cloathe ſome of the nudities in Michael Angelo's Laſt Judgment, which he performed with good ſucceſs. He was as eminent for chiſſel as his pencil, and wrought ſeveral conſiderable things in ſculpture. He died in 1566, in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age.

DANKERS, (HENRY) an eminent landſcape painter, was born at the Hague, and bred an engraver; but by the perſuaſion of his brother John, who was a painter of hiſtory, applied himſelf to landſcapes, and having ſtudied ſome time in Italy, came to England, where he was employed by Charles II. in drawing views of all the royal palaces and ſea-ports in England and Wales. He alſo worked for a great number of our nobility and gentry, and was eſteemed the neateſt and beſt painter in his way at that time. James II. had twenty-eight views and landſcapes done by him, one of which was a ſliding-piece before a picture of Nell Gwynn; and in a public dining-room at Windſor is the marriage of St. Catherine, by him. Being a Roman Catholic, he left England at the time of the popiſh plot, and died ſoon after at Amſterdam.

DANNEBERG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and capital of a territory of the ſame name. It is moderately large, and has a ſtrong caſtle where the princes uſed to reſide. The inhabitants have a manufacture of coarſe linen cloth here, of which they ſell large quantities to be carried into diſtant parts. It is ſituated on the river Tetze, near the Elbe, forty miles ſouth-eaſt of Lunenburg, and ſeventy-five north-by-eaſt of Brunſwick. Long. 11. 45. E. Lat. 53. 18. N.

DANTE ALIGHERI, one of the firſt and moſt celebrated poets of Italy, was born at Florence in 1265. He had an admirable genius for poetry, and might have been happy had he meddled with nothing elſe; but being made one of the governors of Florence, his ambition involved him in the ruin of the faction he embraced. Pope Boniface VIII. ſent Charles de Valois, in 1301, to reſtore the peace of Florence, which was then divided into two parties, called the Whites and Blacks, when baniſhing the Whites, of which number was Dante, his houſe was demoliſhed, and his lands plundered. In revenge, Dante made uſe of his utmoſt endeavours to kindle a bloody war, but died at Ravenna during his exile, in 1321, aged fifty-ſix. Moſt of his poems were written during his diſgrace, theſe abound with the keeneſt ſatire, and diſcover much wit and genius. They have been printed with the Explications of Chriſtopher Landini, and Alexander Vellutelli. The moſt conſiderable of them is intitled, the Comedy of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradiſe.

DANTE (PETER VINCENT) was of Perugia, and of the family of Rainaldi. He was a man of much wit; he underſtood polite literature, the mathematics, and architecture, and compoſed ſuch fine verſes in imitation of Dante, that it was thought the ſublimity of that great genius was in ſome ſort revived in him. On this account he even obtained the ſurname of Dante, which pleaſed the family ſo well, that his deſcendants quitted the name of Rainaldi, and ſubſtituted that of Dante in its room. He wrote a Commentary in Italian on the Sphere of John de Sacroboſco, and died very old, in the year 1512.

DANTE (JULIUS) ſon of the former, was well ſkilled in architecture and in mathematics. He wrote a book De Alluvione Tyberis, and Notes in Ornamenta Architectura. He died in the year 1575.

DANTE (IGNATIUS) ſon of the preceding, was born at Perugia. He became ſkilful in philoſophy and divinity, and yet more ſo in the mathematics. He publiſhed a Treatiſe on the the Conſtruction and Uſe of the Aſtrolabe. He alſo wrote Notes on the Sphere of Sacroboſco, on the Aſtrolabe, and on the univerſal Planiſphere; made a ſphere of the world in five tables, and died October 19, 1586.

DANTE (VINCENT) brother of the former, was a good mathematician, and an excellent ſtatuary and painter. He wrote the lives of the moſt celebrated ſculptors. The ſtatue of pope Julius III. which he performed at Perouſa, paſſes for a maſter-piece; and Philip II. king of Spain, offered him a conſiderable penſion to finiſh the paintings of the Eſcurial; but he refuſed to go thither on account of the ill ſtate of his health. He died at Perouſa in 1576, aged forty-eight.

DANTE (JOHN BAPTIST) an excellent mathematician in the ſixteenth century, was ſurnamed Dædalus, on account of his inventing an artificial pair of wings, which he ſo exactly proportioned to the weight of his body, that he made uſe of them to fly with. He made the experiment ſeveral times over the lake Traſimenus, and with ſuch ſucceſs, that it inſpired him with the boldneſs to divert the whole city of Perugia with the ſight. The time he pitched upon was the ſolemnization of the marriage of Bartholomew d'Alviano with the ſiſter of John Paul Baglioni. When the crowd of ſpectators was aſſembled in the great ſquare, behold our Dante at once ſhooting from the higheſt place in the city, appeared all covered with feathers, and moving two large wings in the midſt of the air. He directed his flight over the ſquare, and ſtruck the people with admiration; but unfortunately the iron with which he managed one of his wings broke, and then, not being able to balance the weight of his body, he fell on the church of our lady, and and broke his thigh. It was ſet by the ſurgeons, and he was afterwards invited to profeſs the mathematics at Venice, where he died of ſickneſs before he was forty years old.

DANTZICK, a city of Poland in Regal Pruſſia, of which it is the capital. It is ſeated on the weſtern bank of the Viſtula, and on the frontiers of Pomerania, at a ſmall diſtance from the Baltic Sea. It is a handſome, large, rich, well fortified town, and ſurrounded with a good wall. The knights of the Teutonic order made themſelves maſters of it in 1305, and built the walls; but Caſimir III. took it from them again in 1454, and granted them conſiderable privileges; ſince which time it has been encreaſing in grandeur and riches. The houſes are built of ſtone or brick, ſix or ſeven ſtories high, and the ſtreets are pretty large. At the end of every ſtreet there are wells for the uſe of the inhabitants; and the public buildings in general are very elegant. The Roman Catholics and Lutherans are eſtabliſhed by law, but the laſt are moſt numerous, for the chief magiſtrates, and the greateſt part of the burghers are proteſtants.

There are twenty churches in Dantzic, among which the great church is remarkable for its fine organ, pulpit, and front. There is likewiſe a great number of convents, a fine academy, and an excellent library. The ſtadt-houſe is a handſome building, with a high tower, and an excellent clock. The exchange and the arſenal are likewiſe worth notice. The former has a noble hall, adorned with ſome very good pictures. In the arſenal is a prodigious quantity of all manner of military implements, and the effigy of king Sigiſmond ſtretched dead on a tomb; and hard by the effigy of count Egmont, armed cap-à-pee, on horſeback. The fortifications conſiſt of very broad walls, deep ditches, and twenty baſtions. The gates are elegantly built, and have each three drawbridges. At the mouth of the Viſtula, are two ſtrong forts, with a high tower, and a lantern to direct the ſhips coming into the harbour.

The ſuburbs are very large, and the neighbourhood round about exceeding pleaſant, being ſtrewed with villages and public-houſes, whither the inhabitants repair on Sundays and feſtivals to divert themſelves. Not far from the mouth of the Viſtula ſtands the famous abbey of Oliva, of the Ciſtercian order, remarkable for the peace concluded there between the kings of Poland and Sweden in 1660. The inhabitants are very numerous, ſome ſay two hundred thouſand, which may very well be, for when thirty thouſand died of the plague in 1709, they were hardly miſſed. The magiſtacy conſiſts of thirty ſenators, who continue for life, four of whom are burgo-maſters; beſides whom there are thirteen conſuls, who elect the ſaid burgo-maſters out of their own body, and nominate the judges and all other officers of the city. From theſe lies an appeal, to the four burgo-maſters and thirteen conſuls, and from them to republic of Poland. Likewiſe when any affair of great conſequence happens, it muſt be referred to the grand chancellor of Poland, or a diet of the eſtates. The king nominates annually a burgo-maſter out of the conſuls to repreſent his perſon in the ſenate, by whom all ſentences of death muſt be ſigned in the king's name. One hundred burgeſſes are elected to repreſent the people's grievances, defend their privileges, and inſpect the meaſures of the government; and theſe, with the concurrence of the ſenate, have the power to preſent clergymen to vacant benefices.

The juriſdiction of the town extends four miles round, and the garriſon, which is kept in it, is maintained at the expence of the inhabitants, who have the power of coining money, with the king's head on one ſide, and the city arms on the reverſe. The inhabitants pay an annual tribute to Poland for its protection, and for having their liberties maintained. Before the year 1070 Dantzick was only inhabited by a few fiſhermen, but ſince that time it has been continually encreaſing in grandeur, trade, and riches; but moſt remarkably ſo within theſe two hundred years. The principal foreign trade is corn, in which reſpect it may be called the granary of Europe. This is brought in part from Pomerania, but chiefly from the inland parts of Poland, which abounds more than any other country with grain. The magazines for corn are very numerous, and ſeparated from the town by a canal formed by the river. Theſe, as well as thoſe for naval ſtores, are ſeven or eight ſtories high, to which the ſhipping can lie cloſe to take in their loading. The Dutch deal very much here, bartering pickled herrings, ſpices, ſugars, and brandy for corn, timber, and naval ſtores. They trade likewiſe with the commodities of Poland, ſuch as wax, honey, hair, thread, ſalt, furs, raw ſilk, and wool, of which they have a great quantity. All theſe are had by way of exchange for merchandize brought by the Dutch and Engliſh.

In 1734 the Ruſſians beſieged and bombarded this city, under the conduct of general Munich, becauſe it would not acknowledge Auguſtus III. for their ſovereign, but on the contrary received and acknowledged Staniſlaus I. for their king. This laſt, who was in it at that time, found means to eſcape out of it, upon which the inhabitants capitulated and ſubmitted, acknowledging Auguſtus, and agreeing to become his loyal ſubjects. It is one hundred and ſeventy miles north of Warſaw, two hundred and fifty north-weſt of Cracow, and ſeven hundred and fifty north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 19. 5. E. Lat. 54. 22. N.

DANUBE, the moſt celebrated river in Europe, except the Volga, running a courſe of near one thouſand eight hundred miles. It riſes near Eſchingen, a village in the principality of Furſtenberg, croſſes Suabia, Bavaria, Auſtria, Hungary, Servia, and Bulgaria, and falls into the Black Sea by two mouths. It had ſix formerly, but four of them have been choaked up with ſand. This river, which begins to be navigable at Ulm in Suabia, receives many leſſer ſtreams as it paſſes along, and waſhes a great number of conſiderable towns and cities.

DANVERS (HENRY) earl of Danby, was the ſecond ſon of ſir John Danvers, knight, and was born at Darteley in Wiltſhire, on the 28th of June 1573. He ſerved in the wars wars of the Low Countries under Maurice count of Naſſau, and was made captain in the wars of France occaſioned by the league. He was afterwards employed in Ireland, where he was raiſed to the rank of lieutenant-general of the horſe, and ſerjeant-major of the whole army under Robert earl of Eſſex, and Charles baron of Mountjoy, and on the acceſſion of king James I was created baron of Danteſey. In 1620 he was made governor of the iſle of Guernſey for life, and in 1625-6 was created earl of Danby, made one of the privy-council, and knight of the garter. He gave the univerſity of Oxford a piece of ground walled round, and ſtocked with herbs and plants, in order to promote the ſtudy of botany. He founded an alms-houſe and free-ſchool at Malmſbury in Wiltſhire, and died on the 20th of January 1643-4, in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age.

DANZ or DANTZ (JOHN ANDREW) a celebrated Lutheran divine, was born at Sandhuſen, a village near Gotha, on the firſt of February 1654. He ſtudied at the expence of duke Frederick, and made great progreſs in learning. After having received the degree of maſter of arts at Wittemberg in 1676, he went to Hamburg, to improve under the inſtructions of Eſdras Edzardi, and by the aſſiſtance of ſome Jews rendered himſelf ſkilled in the Rabinical writings. From Hamburgh he went to Leipſic, and at length to Jena, from whence he ſet out, in 1683, to viſit Holland and England. Danz every where made himſelf beloved and eſteemed by the learned, and at laſt ſettled at Jena, where he was at firſt profeſſor of the oriental languages, and then of theology. He acquired a great reputation by his lectures, formed a conſiderable number of excellent ſcholars, and died of the apoplexy on the 20th of December, 1727. He wrote many works, which are eſteemed, both on the language, the antiquities of the Hebrews, and ſacred criticiſm, in which he excelled. The principal are, 1. Excellent Hebrew and Chaldee Grammars. 2. Sinceritas ſacræ Scripturæ Veteris Teſtamenti triumphans, quarto. 3. Two Diſſertations againſt the Jews. 4. Three Diſſertations, viz. De Functione Pontificis maximi in Adyto Anniverſaria ad Heb. ix. 7. Partus Virginis miraculoſus ad Eſa. vii. 14. Divina Elohim inter coæquales de primo Homine condendo Deliberatio. 5. In Auguratio Chriſti haud obſcurior Moſaica decem Diſſertationibus aſſerta pro Doctrinæ Evangelicæ Θεοπνευστια. He alſo tranſlated ſeveral of the works of the Rabbins.

DAPHNE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of the river Peneus, who being beloved by Apollo, and flying from him to preſerve her chaſtity, was, on her intreaties to the god her father, changed into a laurel, whoſe leaves Apollo immediately conſecrated to bind his temples, and made that tree the reward of poetry.

DAPHNE, a celebrated Greek poeteſs in the time of the war of Troy. M. de Larrey in his Hiſtory of the ſeven wiſe Men of Greece, ſays, that Homer took from the poems of this learned woman the greateſt beauties of his Iliad and Odyſſey, and was ſo ungrateful as to ſuppreſs the work of his benefactreſs, but without being able to conceal his plagiary from poſterity.

DAPHNEPHORIA, Δαφνηφόρια, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival celebrated by the Bœotians in honour of Apollo, in which they adorned an olive branch with garlands of laurel, and various ſorts of flowers: upon the top of it was placed a globe of braſs, from which hung other leſſer globes; about the middle were fixed purple crowns, and a globe of a ſmaller ſize, and the bottom was covered with a garment of a ſaffron colour. Here the uppermoſt globe was an emblem of Apollo or the ſun; that placed directly under it ſignified the moon; the leſſer globes repreſented the ſtars; and the crowns, which were ſixty-five in number, were types of the ſun's annual revolution. The branch, thus adorned, was carried in a proceſſion, in which was a beautiful youth, of good parentage, whoſe father and mother were both living; he was dreſſed in a ſumptuous garment that reached down to his ancles; his hair hung looſe and diſhevelled; on his head was a crown of gold, and it was his duty to perform the office of prieſt. Before him went one of his neareſt relations, bearing a rod adorned with garlands, and he was followed by a choir of virgins, with boughs in their hands, and in this order they proceeded to the temple of Apollo, where they ſung ſupplicatory hymns.

The original of theſe ſolemnities was as follows: the Æolians, who inhabited Arne, being adviſed by an oracle, to relinquiſh their country, and ſeek their fortunes, invaded the Thebans, who were at the ſame time beſieged by the Pelaſgians; this happening to be near the time of Apollo's feſtival, which was religiouſly obſerved by both nations, a ceſſation of arms was agreed to on both ſides, and each party cut down laurel boughs and carried them in their hands in honour of Apollo. On the ſame day there appeared in a dream to Polematas, general of the Bœotian forces, a young man, who preſented him with a complete ſet of armour, and commanded that every ninth year the Bœotians ſhould make ſolemn prayers to Apollo with a laurel in their hands; about three days after this viſion he made a ſally on the beſiegers with ſuch ſucceſs, that they were forced to quit their enterprize, upon which he cauſed this ceremony to be inſtituted.

DAPPERS (OLIVER) a learned phyſician of Amſterdam, who rendered himſelf famous by his deſcriptions of Aſia, Africa, and America, written in Flemiſh, which are much eſteemed, though he never ſaw the countries he deſcribes.

DARDA, a fort in Lower Hungary, built by the Turks, in 1686, and taken by the Imperialiſts, in 1687. It is ſeated on the river Drave, on the famous bridge of Eſſeck, eight miles ſouth of Baraniwar. Long. 19. 10. E. Lat. 45. 45. N.

DARDANELLS, two ancient and ſtrong caſtles in Turky, the one in Romania, the other in Natolia, ſituate on each ſide the canal, formerly called the Helleſpont, now the Streights of the Dardanelles, which forms a communication between the Archipelago, or White Sea, and the Propontis, or Sea of Marmora. They were built by Mahomet II. and may be called they keys of Conſtantinople. Mahomet cauſed two other caſtles to be built, in 1659, over-againſt each other, at the mouth of the ſtreights, to oppoſe the inſults of the Venetians. They are about three miles diſtant from each other, and one hundred and twenty ſouth-weſt of Conſtantinople. Formerly the caſtle of Seſtos ſtood on the European ſide, and Abydos on the Aſian.

DARDANUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Jupiter and Electra, and the founder of the kingdom of Troy, in Phrygia, about the one thouſand four hundred and eightieth year before the Chriſtian æra.

DARES, in fabulous hiſtory, a Trojan prieſt celebrated by Homer, who is ſaid to have written an Hiſtory of the Trojan War; but that which bears the name of Dares is a ſuppoſititious work. The beſt edition of it is that of madam Dacier.

DARIEN, or the Iſthmus of Panama, is a province between South and North America, being a narrow iſthmus, or neck of land, which joins them together. It is bounded on the north by the North Sea, on the ſouth by the South Sea, on the eaſt by the gulph or river of Darien, and on the weſt by another part of the South Sea and the province of Veragua. It lies in the form of a bow, or creſcent, about the great bay of Panama, in the South Sea, and is three hundred miles in length, and ſixty in breadth. This province is not the richeſt, but is of the greateſt importance to Spain, and has been the ſcene of more actions than any province in America. The wealth of Peru is brought hither, and from hence imported to Europe. This has induced many enterpriſing people to make attempts on Panama, Porto-Bello, and other towns of this province, in hopes of obtaining a rich booty.

The Scotch got poſſeſſion of part of it, in 1699, and had laid the foundations of a new town, deſigning to call it New Edinburgh; but, as the Engliſh were then in alliance with the Spaniards, king William would not permit them to go on. However, this country is not a very deſirable place to ſettle in, it being generally mountainous and barren, as well as exceſſive hot, and the lower grounds are liable to be ſuddenly overflowed in the rainy ſeaſon. Some of the mountains are ſo high, and of ſuch difficult acceſs, that it requires ſeveral days to paſs them. It was from theſe mountains the Spaniards firſt diſcovered the South Sea, or Pacific Ocean, in 1513.

The rainy ſeaſon begins in April or May, and is moſt violent in June, July, and Auguſt. Towards September the rainy ſeaſon begins to diminiſh, but it does not entirely ceaſe till December, and ſometimes not till January. At firſt there is only a ſhower once a day, then two or three in a day, and then one every hour. After this changeable weather is over, there are heavy rains, night and day, for five or ſix weeks together. However, there is now and then a fine day, though but ſeldom. The fineſt ſeaſon of the year is about Chriſtmas, when the rains begin to ceaſe, and the dry ſeaſon advances.

In this country there is a great number of trees entirely unknown in Europe. The cotton tree is the largeſt of all, and bears a fruit of the ſize of a nutmeg, which is full of ſhort wool when it is ripe, which, however, is not much valued by the natives. The principal uſe of the trunk of the tree is to make canoes. The cedars are very high and large, and the colour of the wood is red, with a fine ſmell. There are ſeveral ſorts of palm-trees, one of which is the maccaw; the trunk has rings about it, at certain diſtances, which are covered with prickles. Above half the diameter of the trunk is full of pith, and it is naked almoſt to the top. The leaves are twelve or fourteen feet long, and a foot and a half broad. When the tree is young, they bore a hole in the trunk and put in a leaf, from which the ſap runs in great plenty. This, in two days time, ferments, and becomes a ſort of wine, which the Indians are fond of.

There

A ſmall quantity of pith runs down the middle of the tree, and the wood is as black as jet.

The mammee tree is ſixty or ſeventy feet high, without knots or boughs, unleſs at the top. The fruit is as large as a quince, and yellow when ripe, with a tough rind, and has two rough ſtones; both the ſmell and taſte are very good. Beſides theſe, there are cocoas, bananas, plantains, pine-apples, calabaſhes, and mahoes. The bark of this laſt ſupplies the place of hemp, for nets and cords. They have likewiſe a very light wood, with which they make rafts to paſs over great rivers. Bamboos, or hollow canes, are in ſuch plenty, that they are a nuiſance. They have two ſorts of pepper, which grow on a ſhrub about a yard high; and they have a red wood, which they uſe for dying cotton. Their roots are yams, potatoes, and caſſavy, which laſt ſerves to make bread. They have likewiſe tobacco, but not like that of Virginia; however, they make uſe of it for ſmoaking, which they do by making it up in a roll, and lighting one end.

Among the quadrupedes, are the pecaree, a kind of hog; warree, another ſort of hog, with ſhort ears, long tuſks, and a ſkin thick ſet all over with long briſtles; the fleſh is very good eating. They have deer, not very much unlike ours; but the Indians never hunt them. The monkies are very numerous, of which ſome are white and ſome are black, ſome have beards, and ſome have none.

They have a bird called chicaly, which has a note like a cuckow, but more ſhrill, and loud; it is large, has a long tail, and the feathers are of various colours, as red, yellow, &c. it lives upon fruit; the fleſh is black and coarſe, but well taſted. The quam is another large bird, which lives upon fruit, and perches on trees; the wings are brown, and the tail ſhort and thick; it is better eating than the former. There is a reddiſh bird, not unlike a partridge, only it has a longer neck and legs, and almoſt always runs on the ground. The corroſou is heavy, black, and as large as a turkey hen, with a tuft of yellow feathers on its head, and wattles like a turkey-cock; but the hen has neither tuft nor wattles; the fleſh is tough, but well taſted. There are a great number of parrots and parrokeets, of various colours, whoſe fleſh reliſhes very well. The maccaws are like a parrot, but larger, and their plumage is diverſified with fine lively colours. What they call wood-peckers have long ſlender bills, with which they climb trees, and adhere very cloſe; their plumage is white and black. There are many other kinds of birds, the ſame as in other parts of the Weſt Indies; and the water-fowl are of the ſame kind. The bats are as large as pigeons, with hooks at their wings, by which they faſten themſelves to any place. They have a ſort of waſps, and bees which produce wax and honey; but they are not like ours; they hive in hollow trees, and have no ſting.

The number of the native Indians in theſe parts is not very conſiderable; however, they are moſt numerous towards the north about the river ſides. They are generally between five and ſix feet high, and well made, and have no deformed perſons among them. The women are ſmall, and well ſet; but they have not ſo much vivacity as the men, though they have a lively quick eye, and are agreeable enough; but as they grow old, they become wrinkled, and have a looſe ſkin, which renders them very diſagreeable. They have both a round viſage, a thick ſhort noſe, large eyes, a high forehead, and white teeth; in ſhort, they have in general pretty good features. Their hair is long, ſtrait, and black, and hangs down to the middle of their backs, though ſome of the women tie it in a knot on the back part of their heads. They have no hair on any part but the head, eye-brows, and eye-laſhes, and do not pull it by the roots elſewhere, as ſome fooliſhly pretend. Their ſkin is of the colour of copper; and they anoint their bodies with oil, as well as their hair, to render them more ſhining. There has been here and there an Indian with a diſagreeable white ſkin, which muſt be owing to ſome diſeaſe, for they are looked upon as monſters. The children between an European man and an Indian woman are of a tawny complexion. They all paint their bodies with the figures of birds, beaſts, trees, &c. and the women are generally the painters. Their principal colours are red, blue, and yellow, which they mix with oil. Some of them prick the colours into the ſkin, and then they never come out. When the Indian men go to war, they paint their faces red, and the reſt of their bodies, eſpecially upwards, with large black and yellow ſpots.

They generally go quite naked; but a few of the women have a piece of cotton cloth before, which reaches down to their knees. The men are all quite naked, except the penis, which they cover with a bit of plantain-leaf, made like an extinguiſher; the other part is expoſed to view. In public aſſemblies, the men, that is thoſe of moſt conſideration, put on a white cotton robe, but not till they come to the place of meeting, this the women carry after them in baſkets, with the reſt of their ornaments. On public days, or in time of war, the men wear a plate of gold or ſilver under the noſtrils, which covers the mouth, and the women have always rings of the ſame, or coarſer metals, which paſs through the middle griſtle of their noſes, and draw them down in a very diſagreeable manner. Sometimes the men wear a ſort of hoop round their heads, in which they ſtick bird's feathers; their chiefs have them of gold. Some of them wear rings in their ears, ſo heavy as in time to ſtretch the tips down to their ſhoulders. They all wear necklaces of teeth or ſhells, and, when they can get them, glaſs beads, which reach down to their breaſts. Thoſe that wear the greateſt number of theſe necklaces at a time, are reckoned the fineſt. A woman muſt be very poor indeed, that has not the weight of fifteen or twenty pounds about her neck; however, they never put them on but when they go abroad. Beſides theſe, the women wear bracelets on their arms of the ſame kind.

When they have cleared the wood from any ſpot, they plant it with Indian corn, in the ſame manner as we do beans. This is done in April, and they have a crop in October. They firſt roaſt this corn, then pound it into meal, mix it with water, and drink it. They make another drink with ripe plantains, as well as with thoſe dried over the fire. They never eat ſallads or herbs. The women cultivate the land, and do all the work of the family, and yet they are chearful and obliging. They have very eaſy labours, and are generally about their buſineſs in half an hour's time. As ſoon as the boys grow up, they are taught to ſhoot with the bow, and to throw darts, at which they ſoon become expert, and then they go with their fathers a-hunting. The girls are taught cookery, to make thread with the bark of maho, to beat the ſilk graſs, to ſpin cotton, and to weave it into cloth for hammocks and coverlids. To make baſkets is the employment of the men. The girls are always married as ſoon as they arrive at a proper age. At a wedding, the Indians are all invited to the feaſt for twenty miles round; but then they never come empty handed; the men bring tools for working, the women Indian corn, the boys fruit and roots, and the girls fowls and eggs. The wedding is celebrated with drinking, dancing, and joining the hands of the couple, and then the ceremony is over. The men then clear away the wood for a plantation for the new-married couple. After this, they are fixed in their new habitation, and the men fall to drinking, night and day, till all the liquor is gone, which is generally in three or four days; but then their arms are ſecreted, leſt they ſhould kill one another, for they are always quarrelſome in their cups.

They reckon their time by the courſe of the moon, and have no diſtinction of weeks, or particular days. They can tell to a hundred and no more, for after this their arithmetic fails them; and they have no other way of expreſſing a large number, but by holding up a lock of their hair.

DARIUS the Mede, king of Babylon, cauſed Daniel to be thrown into the lion's den, and afterwards raiſed him to the moſt conſiderable employments. This Darius was, according to ſome authors, the ſame with Cyaxeres II. the ſon of Aſtyages, and the uncle, by the mother's ſide, of Cyrus; and according to others, he was the ſon of Nabonides, who reigned at Babylon after Laboroſoarchod.

DARIUS I. king of Perſia, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, and a celebrated conqueror, was one of the ſeven noble Perſians who dethroned the pretended Smerdis, whom he killed with his own hand, and aboliſhed the tyranny of the Magi. He aſcended the throne by the artifice of his maſter of his horſe, who made his ſteed neigh the firſt, in the five hundred and twenty-firſt year before the birth of Chriſt. Darius took Samos, and gave the government of it to Syloſon, the brother of Polycrates. He protected Zorobabel, permitted him to rebuild the temple of Jeruſalem, in the four hundred and fifteenth year before the Chriſtian æra, and even contributed towards the expence of that ſacred edifice.

The Perſian court being removed from Babylon to Suſa, the former city revolted. Darius, in the fifth year of his reign, laid ſiege to it, but met with little ſucceſs for eighteen months. At length Zopyrus, one of his generals, cut off his own noſe and ears, and then fled to the city, pretending that he had been thus mangled by order of Darius. This aſtoniſhing ſtratagem got him the confidence of the Babylonians, who readily entruſted him with the command of their troops in ſeveral ſallies; and in a ſhort time engaging them to confide entirely in him, he betrayed the city to Darius. When this prince took poſſeſſion of it, he cauſed thirty thouſand citizens to be impaled, and the walls to be demoliſhed.

Darius next invaded Scythia with an army of ſix hundred thouſand men; but the enemy retiring before the Perſians, drew them into a country covered with ſnow, where Darius loſt great part of his army without fighting. The Scythians ſoon returned his viſit, invaded Thrace, and plundered the Perſian country as far as the Helleſpont. While Darius was engaged in this expedition againſt the Scythians, Megabyſus, the Perſian governor of Thrace ſubdued the Macedonians and made them tributary to Perſia.

The Greeks, now alarmed at his progreſs, prepared for a war againſt the Perſians, which broke out at the ſolicitation of Ariſtagoras, governor of Miletus, who abandoning the party of Darius, raiſed Ionia, and put himſelf at the head of the Greeks, who were ſuccoured by the Athenians, and burnt the city of Sardis, except the citadel, which was held by Artaphernes. But the Athenians having ſome time after abandoned the Ionians, Darius's generals retook the iſland of Cyprus, conquered the Ionians, in a great battle, near Miletus, took and ruined that city, and made themſelves maſters of all Ionia, as well as of the iſlands of Chio, Leſbos and Tenedos. Darius, elated at this ſucceſs, ſent Mardonius, a young lord who had married his daughter, againſt the Greeks, with an army and a conſiderable fleet, which meeting with a ſtorm in the Egean ſea, he loſt three hundred of his ſhips, and twenty thouſand men, and the army being ſurpriſed by the Thracians, it was with great difficulty Mardonius made his retreat over the Helleſpont, into Aſia.

After this, Darius again invaded Greece, utterly deſtroyed the city of Eretria, in Eubæa, and then marched towards Athens: the Athenians ſent to the Lacedæmonians to join them; but before they arrived, they fought the famous battle of Marathon, in which Miltiades, the Athenian general, though his forces did not amount to above ten thouſand Athenians and a thouſand Plateans, not only repulſed the Perſians, whoſe army amounted to three hundred thouſand men, but entirely defeated them; many thouſand fell by the ſword, and more periſhed in the ſea, by endeavouring to get on board their ſhips.

Darius afterwards puniſhed the revolted Egyptians, and was making freſh preparations againſt the Greeks, when he died, in the four hundred and eighty-fifth year before the Chriſtian æra, after a reign of thirty-ſix years. Before his death, he nominated his ſon Xerxes for his ſucceſſor, excluding Artabanes, his eldeſt ſons becauſe Xerxes was born after his aſcending the throne.

DARIUS II. ſurnamed Ochus, or Nothus, that is the Baſtard, he being the ſon of a miſtreſs of Artaxerxes Longimanus. He ſeized the crown of Perſia after his father's death, from his brother Sogdianus, in the four hundred and twenty-third year before the birth of Chriſt, married Pariſatis, a cruel princeſs, by whom he had Arſaces, otherwiſe called Artaxerxes Mnemon, who ſucceeded him, Ameſtris, Cyrus the Younger, &c. He carried on ſeveral wars by his ſon Cyrus and his other generals, and died in the four hundred and fifth year before the Chriſtian æra.

DARIUS III. ſurnamed Codomannus, king of Perſia, famous for his misfortunes, was the ſon of Arſamis and Syſigambis, and couſin-german to Darius Ochus. He was raiſed to the throne in the three hundred and thirty-ſixth year before the birth of our Saviour, by the eunuch Bagoas, who poiſoned Arſes, the youngeſt ſon of Artaxerxes Ochus. This eunuch, diſſatisfied with the choice he had made, afterwards attempted to poiſon Darius; but that prince made him drink up the poiſon himſelf. This was the Darius, over whom Alexander the Great gained three celebrated battles; the firſt at the paſſage of the Granicus, the three hundred and thirty fourth year before the birth of Chriſt; the ſecond at the ſtreights of mount Taurus, where Darius loſt his mother, his wife, and his children; and the third near the city of Arbella, on the 1ſt of October, the three hundred and thirtieth year before the Chriſtian æra, and eleven days after the famous eclipſe of the moon, mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy. Darius fled into Media, where he was aſſaſſinated by Beſſus, the governor of Bactria, in the ſixth year of his reign. The Perſian monarchy ended with this unhappy prince, in the two hundred and thirtieth year after its being founded by Cyrus.

DARKING, a town in Surry, with a market on Thurſdays, noted for fowls. It ſtands on the ſide of a ſoft ſandy rock, into which cellars are cut that are exceeding cold in the ſummer time. It has a fair on Aſcenſion-Eve, for horſes, bullocks, ſheep, and toys. It is ſeated on the river Mole, ten miles eaſt of Guilford, and twenty-four ſouth-by-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 20. E. Lat. 51. 18. N.

DARLINGTON, a port-town in the biſhoprick of Durham, with a market on Mondays. At Oxenhall, near this place, there are three pits called, Hell Kettles, of which the vulgar tell many fabulous ſtories. They were ſaid to be bottomleſs till they were ſounded, and found not to be above thirty yards deep; they have the appearance of coal-pits, and perhaps have been ſome ſuch thing. The fairs are on Eaſter-Monday, Whit-Monday, Monday fortnight after Whit-Monday, and November 22, for horſes, cattle, and ſheep. It is ſeated in a flat, near the river Skern, over which there is a ſtone bridge, nineteen miles ſouth of Durham, fifty-one north of York, and two hundred and forty north of London. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 54. 30. N.

DARMSTADT, a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and capital of the landgravate of Heſſe-Darmſtadt. It is the uſual place of reſidence of the landgrave, and has a handſome caſtle. Since the late wars, they have built a great many fine houſes and agreeable ſuburbs. It has likewiſe a good college. It is ſeated on a river of the ſame name, fifteen miles ſouth of Frankfort, eighteen ſouth-eaſt of Mentz, twenty north-eaſt of Worms, and thirty north-weſt of Heidelberg. Long. 8 40. E. Lat. 49. 50. DARNLY (HENRY STUART, lord) titular king of Scotland, and the conſort of Mary, queen of Scots, was the eldeſt ſon of the earl of Lennox, who had been driven from Scotland, and lived in baniſhment twenty years. Henry's mother, the lady Margaret Douglas, was one degree nearer the royal blood of England than Mary, for ſhe was the daughter, and Mary only the grand-daughter of Margaret, the eldeſt ſiſter of Henry VIII. The lord Darnly arrived in Scotland in 1565. He was in the firſt bloom and vigour of youth, and in beauty and graceſulneſs of perſon ſurpaſſed all his cotemporaries; he excelled in thoſe arts which add eaſe and elegance to external form; and queen Mary being of an age to feel the full power of theſe accompliſhments, the impreſſion he made upon her was viſible from the time of their firſt interview. The whole buſineſs of the court was to amuſe and entertain this illuſtrious gueſt; and in all the ſcenes of gaiety, Darnly, whoſe qualifications were altogether ſuperficial and ſhewy, appeared to great advantage, and his conqueſt of the queen's heart became complete. Inclination now prompted her to conclude a marriage with him, the firſt thoughts of which had been ſuggeſted by conſiderations merely political; and as they were ſo nearly related, ſhe ſet on foot a negociation with the court of Rome, to obtain a diſpenſation.

On the 29th of July, 1565, the marriage was ſolemnized in the queen's chapel, according to the rites of the Romiſh church, and at the ſame time the queen iſſued proclamations, confering the title of king of Scots upon her huſband, and commanding that henceforth all writs at law ſhould run in the joint names of king and queen, though ſhe had no right to confer upon him, by her private authority, the title and dignity of king, or by a ſimple proclamation, to raiſe her huſband to be the maſter of her people, without their conſent.

During ſome months after the marriage, the queen's fondneſs for Darnly continued, and ſhe ſoon proved with child. But in a little time ſhe found that the qualities of his mind correſponded but ill with the beauty of his perſon; being of a weak underſtanding, and conceited of his own abilities, he aſcribed his extraordinary ſucceſs entirely to his diſtinguiſhed merit. All the queen's favours made no impreſſion on his temper. Her gentleneſs could not bridle his imperious and ungovernable ſpirit; nor could all her attention to place about him perſons capable of directing his conduct, preſerve him from raſh and imprudent actions. Fond of all the amuſements, and even prone to all the vices of youth, he became by degrees careleſs of her perſon, and a ſtranger to her company. Inſtead of being ſatisfied with that ſtretch of power, by which Mary had conferred on him the title of king, and admitted him to a ſhare in the adminiſtration, he demanded the crown matrimonial, with the moſt inſolent importunity; and though ſhe alledged that this gift was beyond her power, and that it could only be beſtowed by the authority of parliament, he wanted either underſtanding to comprehend, or temper to admit ſo juſt a defence, and often renewed and urged his requeſt

Rizio, the queen's favourite, who had aided his paſſion, and promoted the marriage with all his intereſt, now fell under his reſentment, and he reſolved on his deſtruction. The place choſen for committing ſuch a deed, was the queen's bed-chamber, though Mary was now in the ſixth month of her pregnancy, and though Rizio might have been ſeized elſewhere, without any difficulty, the king pitched upon this place, that he might enjoy the malicious pleaſure of reproaching Rizio with his crimes before the queen's face. This bloody ſcene was therefore executed before the queen, and Rizio was torn from the queen's preſence by violence, and murdered in the next apartment. See the article RIZIO.

The king, with the conſpirators, kept poſſeſſion of the palace, and guarded the queen with the utmoſt care, while her majeſty, who had ſcarce the liberty of choice left, was perſuaded to admit the lords Morton and Ruthven, who had committed the murder, into her preſence, and to grant them the promiſe of pardon. The king, mean while, ſtood aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs and ſucceſs of his own enterprize, and uncertain what courſe to take, when the queen obſerving his irreſolution, employed all her art to diſengage him from his new aſſociates, and a conſciouſneſs of the inſult he had offered to ſo illuſtrious a benefactreſs, inſpired him with uncommon docility and complaiſance. She prevailed on him to diſmiſs the guards which had been placed on her perſon, and the ſame night he made his eſcape along with her, attended by three perſons only, and retired to Dunbar. Love no longer covering the follies and vices of lord Darnly, with its friendly veil, they appeared to Mary in their full dimenſions and deformity. The very power, which with liberal and unſuſpicious fondneſs, ſhe had conferred upon him, he had employed to inſult her authority, to limit her prerogative, and to endanger her perſon. Cold civilities, ſecret diſtruſt, and frequent quarrels enſued. The queen's favours were no longer conveyed through his hands. The crowd of expectants ceaſed to court his patronage. Among the nobles, ſome dreaded his furious temper, others complained of his perfidiouſneſs, and all of them deſpiſed the weakneſs of his underſtanding, and the inconſtancy of his heart. Addicted to drunkenneſs, beyond what the manners of that age could bear, and indulging irregular paſſions, which even the licentiouſneſs of youth could not excuſe; he, by his indecent behaviour, provoked the queen to the utmoſt; and the paſſions which it occaſioned, often forced tears from her eyes, both in public and private. Her averſion for him increaſed every day. He was often abſent from court, appeared there with little ſplendor, and was truſted with no power.

About this time a new favorite grew into great credit with the queen, and ſoon gained an aſcendant over her heart. This was James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, one of the moſt powerful noblemen in the kingdom, who had for a long time been remarkably attached to the queen; and when the conſpirators againſt Rizio ſeized her perſon, was the chief inſtrument of recovering her liberty. He therefore became her principal confidant, and without his participation no buſineſs was concluded, and no favour beſtowed. In the mean time the haughty ſpirit of Darnly, nurſed up in flattery, and accuſtomed to command, could not bear the contempt under which he had fallen. He therefore addreſſed himſelf to the pope, and to the kings of France and Spain, with many profeſſions of zeal for the Catholic religion, and bitter complaints againſt the queen. And ſoon after took a reſolution of embarking on board a ſhip which he had provided, and of retiring into foreign parts. But before he could reach Glaſgow, where he intended to embark, he was ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper, attended with violent and unuſual ſymptoms, which in that age were commonly imputed to the effects of poiſon. His life was in the utmoſt danger; but after languiſhing for ſome weeks, he recovered. However, according to ſome authors, this diſeaſe ſeems to have been only the ſmall-pox. The queen, who had that diſeaſe in her infancy, viſited Darnly, and by all her words and actions expreſſed an uncommon affection for him, and in order to prevent his expoſing her by miſrepreſenting her conduct to foreign courts, employed all her art to regain his confidence; and then, by his own conſent, removed him to a houſe in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, ſituated on a riſing ground, in the midſt of an open field. She there attended him with the moſt aſſiduous care; but on Saturday, the 9th of February, 1567, the queen, at about eleven at night, left the houſe, in order to be preſent at a maſque in the palace, and at two the next morning it was blown up with gun-powder. The noiſe and ſhock occaſioned by this ſudden exploſion, alarmed the whole city. The inhabitants ran to the place whence it came; and the dead body of the king, with that of a ſervant who ſlept in the ſame room, were found lying in an adjacent garden, without the city wall, untouched by fire, and with no bruiſe or mark of violence. This was the unhappy fate of Henry Stuart, lord Darnley, who thus died in the 21ſt year of his age. Had he left the world by a natural death, his end would have been unlamented; but the cruel circumſtances of his murder, in which the lord Bothwell was undoubtedly concerned, and who afterwards married the queen, have made him the object of pity, to which he had otherwiſe no title.

DARTFORD, a town in Kent, with a good market on Saturdays, for corn, with a fair for horſes and bullocks. It is on the road from London to Canterbury and Dover, and has ſeveral good inns. It is ſeated on the river Darent, near its influx into the Thames, fifteen miles eaſt of London. Long. 0. 16. E. Lat. 51. 25. N.

DARTIS (John) a learned civilian, born at Cahors, in 1572, who wrote ſeveral works, which are printed together in folio, and died on the 21ſt of April, 1651.

DARTMOUTH, a ſea-port town of Devonſhire, with a market on Fridays. It is an ancient corporation, contains three pariſh churches, and ſends two members to parliament. It has a very good harbour, which is defended by two caſtles, and had a much better foreign trade than it has at preſent. It is governed by a mayor, aldermen, &c. and is thirty-one miles ſouth-by-weſt from Exeter, and two hundred and four weſt of London. Long. 4. 0. W. Lat. 50. 25. N.

DARWENT, a river which riſes in the Peak, in the north part of Derbyſhire, and running acroſs the county to Derby, falls into the Trent, a few miles beyond it.

DATAMES, a private ſoldier in the guards of Artaxerxes Mnemon, became the general of that prince, and commanded his armies with great valour and prudence; but his enemies miſrepreſenting him to his maſter, he was forced to fly, when he prevailed on the Cappadocians to revolt, defeated Artabaſus, one of Artaxerxes's generals, in the three hundred and ſixty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra, and was killed ſoon after.

DATHAN, one of the ſeditious Levites, who, riſing with Cora and Abiram againſt Moſes and Aaron, were ſwallowed up by the earth, about one thouſand four hundred and eighty-nine years before the birth of Chriſt.

DATI (Carlo) profeſſor of polite learning at Florence, the place of his birth, obtained the eſteem of the learned by his works, and his politeneſs to the learned travellers who viſited Florence. He was a member of the academy Della Cruſca, and in 1669 publiſhed in Italian a Panegyric on Lewis XIV. whom he had before praiſed in ſeveral poems; but his principal work is Della Pittura Antica. This gentleman, who was as much diſtinguiſhed by his humanity and amiable manners, as by his abilities, died in the year 1675, greatly lamented by all who knew him.

D'AUDIFRET (John Baptist) a gentleman of Provence, who was employed in ſeveral negociations, and wrote a Syſtem of Geography, which is printed in three volumes, quarto, and in duodecimo. This work is eſteemed. He died in 1733, aged ſeventy-ſix.

DAVENANT (John) biſhop of Saliſbury, in the ſeventeenth century, was born in London, and educated at King's college, Cambridge. In 1609 he took the degree of doctor of divinity; the ſame year was elected lady Margaret's profeſſor; and in 1618 was ſent by king James I. to the ſynod of Dort. In 1621 he was nominated biſhop of Saliſbury, and continued in favour during the remainder of that prince's reign; but in 1630-1, he incurred the diſpleaſure of the court, by preaching a ſermon before the king at Whitehall, in favour of predeſtination; all curious ſearch into which his majeſty had ordered ſhould be laid aſide. He wrote, in Latin, 1. An Expoſition of St. Paul's Epiſtles to the Coloſſians, folio. 2. Lectures on the Two controverted Points, the Judge of Controverſies, and habitual and actual Righteouſneſs, &c. folio. 3. The Queſtions he diſputed upon in the Schools, &c. He died of a conſumption, on the 20th of April, 1641, and among other benefactions gave to Queen's college, in Cambridge, the perpetual advowſons of the rectories of Cheverel Magna and Newton Tony, in Wiltſhire, and a rent-charge of 31 l. 10 s. per annum, for the founding of two Bible-clerks, and buying books for the library in that college.

Davenant (Sir William) an eminent poet, born at Oxford, in February 1605-6. After ſome ſtay at that univerſity, he entered into the ſervice of Frances, firſt ducheſs of Richmond, and afterwards into that of Fulke Grevil, lord Brooke, who having an excellent taſte for poetry, was much charmed with him. Upon the death of Ben Jonſon he was created poet laureat, but ſoon after retired to France, and on his return the earl of Newcaſtle appointed him lieutenant-general of his ordnance; but Mr. Granger obſerves, that he might eaſily have found a perſon much better qualified for that command. "We read," ſays he, "that Alexander took Homer's works with him in his expeditions, but it is not probable that he would have taken "the poet himſelf, if he had been then living. Lewis "XIV. in his pompous expedition to Flanders, was attended by Vander Meulen the painter, and Peliſſon the "hiſtorian, to deſign and record his victories; but he did "not take Boileau with him to ſing them; much leſs would "he have made him a lieutenant-general."

In 1643, Mr. Davenant received the honour of knighthood, and upon the declining of the king's cauſe, retired again to France, where he changed his religion for that of Rome. He formed a deſign for carrying over a conſiderable number of artificers, eſpecially weavers, to Virginia, by the encouragement of Henrietta Maria, the queen mother of England; but he and his company being ſeized by ſome of the parliament's ſhips, he was carried firſt to the Iſle of Wight, and then to the Tower of London; but by the mediation of Milton and others, he got his liberty as a priſoner at large. At this time he ſet up an Italian opera, in Rutland-houſe, in Charter-houſe yard, which was afterwards removed to the cock-pit in Drury-lane; and after the Reſtoration, he erected a new company of comedians, under the patronage of the duke of York, at the Tenniscourt in Little Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. Davenant was a man of great natural and improved talents, which he unfortunately miſapplied. "He diſtinguiſhed himſelf," ſays Mr. Granger, Granger, "by a bold, but unſucceſsful attempt, to enlarge "the ſphere of poetry. He compoſed an heroic poem, "called Gondibert, in five books, after the model of the "drama; applauded himſelf greatly upon this invention, "and looked upon the followers of Homer as a timorous, "ſervile herd, that were afraid to leave the beaten track. "This performance, which is rather a ſtring of epigrams "than an epic poem, was not without its admirers, among "whom were Waller and Cowley. But the ſucceſs did "not anſwer his expectation. When the novelty of it was "over, it preſently ſunk into contempt; and he at length "found, that when he ſtrayed from Homer he ſtrayed from "nature." He wrote a conſiderable number of dramatic performances, and ſeveral poems. He died on the 7th of April, 1668, aged ſixty-three, and two days after was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey.

DAVENANT (CHARLES) an eminent civilian and writer, was the eldeſt ſon of the former. He was born in 1656, and completed his ſtudies at Oxford. Having a conſiderable ſhare in the theatre, in right of his father, he early turned his thoughts to the ſtage, and wrote the tragedy of Circe: but ſoon after applied to the civil law, in which he had the degree of doctor conferred upon him by the univerſity of Cambridge. In 1685 he was member for St. Ives, in Cornwall, and about the ſame time was impowered, with the maſter of the revels, to inſpect the plays deſigned for the ſtage, that no immoralities might be repreſented. He was alſo at the ſame time a commiſſioner of the excile. He was well ſkilled in political arithmetic, and wrote a conſiderable number of political tracts. He died on the 6th of November, 1714.

DAVENANT (WILLIAM) younger brother to the former, and the fourth ſon of ſir William Davenant, was educated at Oxford, and tranſlated from the French into Engliſh, Animadverſions upon the famous Greek and Latin Hiſtorians. Having taken holy orders, he was preſented to a living in the county of Surry; but travelling with his patron Robert Wymondſole, of Putney, eſq. he was unfortunately drowned, in 1681, as he was diverting himſelf by ſwimming in a river near Paris.

DAVENPORT, (CHRISTOPHER) a learned Franciſcan friar, was born at Coventry, in Warwickſhire, about the year 1598, and ſtudied two years at Merton college, in Oxford; after which he went to Douay, and having remained there ſome time, went to Ypres, where, in 1617, he entered into order of the Franciſcans. After ſeveral removals from place to place, he returned as a miſſionary to England, where he went by the name of Franciſcus a Sancta Clara; and at length was made one of the chaplains to Henrietta Maria, the royal conſort of king Charles I. Here he exerted himſelf in promoting the cauſe of popery, by making converts, and in writing books for the advancement of his religion and order. He was a perſon of a very free diſcourſe, and was very eminent for his uncommon learning, being well verſed in ſchool-divinity, and in eccleſiaſtical and profane hiſtory. During the interregnum, he lived moſtly in obſcurity, ſometimes beyond the ſeas, ſometimes at London, and ſometimes at Oxford. After the Reſtoration, he became chaplain to king Charles the ſecond's queen, and was again choſen provincial of his order for England, where he died on the 31ſt of May, 1680. He wrote, 1. Paraphraſtica expoſitio Articulorum Confeſſionis Anglicæ, which was much railed at by the Jeſuits, who would have had it burnt; but it being ſoon afterwards licenced at Rome, their clamours ſtopped; 2. Deus Natura, Gratia; ſive Tractatus de Predeſtinatione; and a great number of other works.

DAVENTRY, a town in Northamptonſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. It is governed by a bailiff, aldermen, ſteward, &c. and has ſeveral good inns, it being a great thoroughfare town. The fairs are on Eaſter-Tueſday, for horſes and horned cattle; on June 6, for ſwine, and all ſorts of goods; Auguſt 3d. a ſmall fair for horned cattle, horſes, and ſheep; October 2d. cattle, cheeſe, onions, &c. October 27, called Ram-fair, chiefly for ſheep. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt from Coventry, and ſeventy-three north-weſt from London. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 52. 12. N.

DAVID, king of the Jews, and one of the greateſt princes the world has produced; was the ſon of Jeſſe, and was born at Bethlehem in the 1085th year before the birth of Chriſt. While he kept his father's flocks, he was anointed king by Samuel, in the twenty-ſecond year of his age. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and noble exploits; killed the giant Goliath, conquered the Philiſtines; and married Michal, Saul's ſecond daughter; but that prince becoming jealous of his glory, ſought an opportunity to put him to death; but his life was ſaved by Jonathan and Michal. Theſe violent meaſure obliged David to fly into the deſarts, where he was purſued by Saul, whoſe life was twice in David's power, but he refuſed to lift up his hand againſt his maſter, and contented himſelf with letting him know the danger to which he had been expoſed. He at length retired to the court of Achiſh, king of Gath, who gave him, and his men, a city to dwell in. Some time after, that city being burnt and plundered in his abſence, by the Amalekites, David purſued them, and took from them the ſpoils they had taken. Saul having killed himſelf after the loſs of a battle againſt the Philiſtines, he cauſed the Amalekite, who brought the news of his death, and ſaid that he had killed Saul, to be ſlain, and then returning to Judea, was declared king by the tribe of Judah, in the 1054th before the birth of Chriſt. Iſhboſheth, Saul's ſon, being ſome time after murdered in his palace, David put his murderers to death, and was proclaimed king of all Iſrael, in the 1048th year before the Chriſtian æra; and the following year he made himſelf maſter of the citadel of Zion, and choſe Jeruſalem for his capital. David afterwards defeated the Philiſtines, ſubdued the Moabites, conquered Syria, and made war on the Ammonites, who had inſulted his ambaſſadors. David then formed the deſign of erecting a magnificent temple to the Lord; but that honour was reſerved for his ſon. David's heroic actions were tarniſhed by his adultery with Bathſheba, and the murder of her huſband Uriah; but he was brought to ſincere repentance by the prophet Nathan's ingenious parable. His repentance was followed by the revolt of his ſon Abſolom, who obliged him to retire from Jeruſalem, in the 1023d year before our Saviour's birth; and the death of that unnatural ſon, who was killed by Joab, contrary to David's expreſs orders, involved that prince in deep affliction. Scarce was an end put to that war, when another broke out by the revolt of Seba, whoſe death put an end to that ſedition. David then endeavoured to make peace flouriſh in his dominions; but giving way to vanity, contrary to the expreſs command of God, he gave orders for numbering his people, on which ſeventy thouſand of his ſubjects were deſtroyed by peſtilence. Some years after, he placed Solomon on the throne, and died in the 1014th year before the Chriſtian æra, aged ſeventy, after a reign of forty years.

There have been ſeveral other princes of the ſame name.

DAVID I. king of Scotland, ſucceeded his brother Alexander I. in 1124. He built fifteen abbies, and erected four biſhopricks, namely Roſs, Brechin, Dunkeld, and Dumblane, in which he was ſo bountiful, that he greatly impoveriſhed the crown; he alſo new-walled Carliſle. He died after a reign of twenty-nine years, and was ſucceeded by Malcolm IV.

DAVID II. king of Scotland, came to the throne at ſeven years of age, and was crowned on the twenty ſecond of November, 1331. Soon after, Edward Baliol, aſſiſted by Edward III. king of England, forced the young king to fly into France; but after continuing there nine years, returned, and recovered his kingdom. He was ſome time after taken in battle by the Engliſh, who kept him eleven years. This prince died, after a reign of thirty years, and was ſucceeded by Robert II.

DAVID, GANZ, a Jewiſh hiſtorian in the ſixteenth century, who wrote a Chronicle in Hebrew, intitled, Tſemah David, which is very ſcarce, a part of which Vorſtius has tranſlated into Latin, with notes.

DAVID DE POMIS, a learned Jewiſh phyſician of the ſixteenth century, who wrote a Dictionary in Hebrew and Italian, which is eſteemed.

DAVIDI, (FRANCIS) a famous Socinian, born in Hungary, was ſuperintendant of the reformed Churches in Tranſilvania, where he propagated his opinions, on which account he was confined in the caſtle of Deve, where he died in 1579. He wrote ſeveral works which are very ſcarce.

DAVID'S, (ST.) a village of Pembrokeſhire, in Wales. It was formerly a city of good account, but now the walls are decayed, the inhabitants are few, and the market is loſt, though by ſome is ſtill called a city, on account of its being the ſee of a biſhop. But it has a free-ſchool as well as a cathedral. It is one mile from the ſea, and two hundred and ſeventy-two from London. Long. 5. 20. W. Lat. 52. 0. N.

DAVID'S, (ST.) a fort and town in the peninſula of India, on this ſide of the Ganges, belonging to the Eaſt India Company. The fort is pretty ſtrong, and ſtands cloſe to a river, and its territories are eight miles along the ſhore, and four within land. The country is pleaſant, healthy and fruitful, being watered by ſeveral rivers which are as good as walls to fortify the Engliſh colony. The company has a pretty good garden and ſummer-houſe, where the governor generally reſides; and the town extending itſelf pretty wide, there are gardens to moſt of the houſes. They have plenty of ſmall black cattle, and the ſea and rivers abound with good fiſh. Though the river is but ſmall, it is convenient for the import and export of merchandiſe; and that called Cuddelore, which lies a mile to the ſouthward,

ward, in September and October is capable of receiving ſhips of two hundred tons burthen. This colony produces long cloths in large quantities, and ſeveral ſorts of Eaſt-India ſtuffs, as well as ſteel. However, it is ſubordinate to Fort St. George. It is twelve miles ſouth from Pondicherry, and eighty miles ſouth of Fort St. George. Long. 79. 55. E. Lat. 11. 30. N.

DAVIES, (JOHN) writing-maſter to prince Henry, in the reign of king James I. was, during his life, at the head of his profeſſion. He was a correct writer of the Roman, ſecretary, court, text, and mixed hands, and was greatly admired for his prodigious quickneſs in writing the running hand. He alſo wrote in ſo ſmall a character, that it required a magnifying glaſs to read it. After his death, he was ſucceeded in all the branches of his art, by Gething his ſcholar.

The art of writing was little cultivated in England, before the reign of queen Elizabeth, who wrote what was then eſteemed a fine hand, as did alſo her tutor Aſcham, and lord Burleigh; but her father Henry VIII wrote a wretched ſcrawl, reſembling what is called the Devil's handwriting, in Aſhmole's Muſeum in Oxford. There is a good ſpecimen of it in the firſt volume of Stevens's Supplement to Dugdale's Monaſticon.

DAVIES, (Mrs. MARY) a perſon diſtinguiſhed by an uncommon circumſtance in the reign of king Charles II. When ſhe was twenty-eight years of age, an excreſence grew upon her head, reſembling a wen, which continued thirty years, and then grew into two horns. Her print is to be ſeen in Dr. Leigh's Natural Hiſtory of Lancaſhire, Cheſhire, and the Peak in Derbyſhire, publiſhed in 1700. The inſcription ſignifies that her portrait was taken in 1668, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of her age; that the excreſcence continued thirty-two years before it grew into horns; that after four years ſhe caſt them; then grew two more, and in about four years ſhe caſt theſe alſo; that the horns which were upon her head in 1668, were of four years growth, and were then looſe. Her picture, and one of her horns, are in Aſhmole's Muſeum, at Oxford.

In the univerſity library at Edinburgh is preſerved, a horn which was cut from the head of Elizabeth Love, in the fiftieth year of her age. It grew three inches above her ear, and was growing ſeven years.

DAVIES, (Sir JOHN) an eminent lawyer and poet, born at Chilgrove, in the pariſh of Tyſbury, in Wiltſhire. In 1585, he was admitted a commoner in Queen's college, in Oxford, and afterwards removed to the Middle-Temple London. King James I. made him his ſollicitor, and afterwards his attorney-general, in Ireland, where he became ſpeaker of the houſe of commons; and, in 1607, he received the honour of knighthood. He was at length made one of his Majeſty's Engliſh ſerjeants at law, and in 1626, was appointed lord chief-juſtice of the king's bench, but died the ſame year, in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age. He was the author of, 1. A Diſcovery of the true Cauſes, why Ireland was never entirely ſubdued till the Beginning of the Reign of king James I. 2. An Abridgement of Coke's Reports; and other works. His principal performance as a poet, is his poem on the Original, Nature, and Immortality of the Soul

DAVIES, (JOHN) LL. D. a learned divine and critic, was born in London on the 22d of April, 1679, and educated at Cambridge. In 1709, he was one of the proctors of that univerſity, and, in 1711, was collated to the rectory of Fen Ditton, near Cambridge, and to a prebend in the Church of Ely. The ſame year he took the degree of doctor of laws, and, in 1717, was created doctor in divinity. He publiſhed new editions of Maximus Tyrius, Julius Cæſar, Minucius Felix, and Cicero's Philoſophical pieces; and died on the ſeventh of March, 1731-2.

DAVILA (HENRICO CATHERINO) a celebrated hiſtorian, was born of an illuſtrious family in the iſle of Cyprus, but was obliged to leave his country, on its being taken by the Turks, in 1571. He firſt retired to Avila in Spain, whence his family ſuppoſed they had derived their name and origin; from thence he went to France, and made himſelf known at court under the reigns of Henry III. and Henry the Great. He there diſtinguiſhed himſelf on ſeveral occaſions by his valour, and at length went to Venice, where he had a very handſome penſion ſettled upon him by that Republic, in whoſe ſervice his brother Lewis Davila had been a commander. Davila, while he was at Venice, wrote his admirable Hiſtory of the Civil Wars of France, which contains every thing worth notice that paſſed from the death of Henry II. in 1559, to the peace of Vervins, in 1598. He was killed about the year 1635, by a gentleman of Verona, who, in a diſpute about furniſhing him with carriages, in purſuance of his having a commiſſion from the Republic, diſcharged a piſtol at Davila, and wounded him in ſuch a manner, that he died ſoon after. Davile's ſon, a youth of about eighteen, being preſent, had the ſpirit to revenge the death of his father, for inſtantly ruſhing upon the murderer, he cut him in pieces.

DAVILER, (AUGUSTIN CHARLES) an able architect, was born at Paris in the year 1653. The king having granted him a penſion in order that he might improve himſelf by ſtudying architecture at Rome, he ſet ſail for Italy; but was taken by an Algerine pirate, and carried into Tunis where he continued ſix months in captivity. He at length went to Rome, where having perfected himſelf in his art, he returned to France, and embelliſhed Beziers, Carcaſſonna, Montpellier, and Toulouſe. To reward his merit, the States of Languedoc granted him a penſion, with the title of architect of that province. He wrote a complete courſe of architecture, which is highly eſteemed, and died at Montpellier in the year 1700.

DAVIS, (JOHN) a famous navigator in the ſixteenth century was born at Sandridge, a pleaſant ſeat near Dartmouth, in Devonſhire, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by making three voyages to the moſt northern parts of America, in order to diſcovered a north-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt Indies, in which he diſcovered the ſtreights which bear his name. He afterwards performed five voyages to the Eaſt Indies, in the laſt of which he was ſlain in a deſperate fight with ſome Japaneſe, near the coaſt of Malacca, on the 27th of December, 1605. He wrote an account of his Second Voyage for the Diſcovery of the North-weſt Paſſage; A Voyage to the Eaſt-Indies, and other tracts.

DAVISON, (WILLIAM) an eminent ſtateſman, of whom we have little account till he went in quality of ſecretary to Henry Killigrew, who was ſent into Scotland in 1566, to compliment queen Mary on the birth of her ſon. In 1575, he was ſent with a public character to the ſtates of Brabant, the real intention of ſending him, being to ſee how things ſtood in that part of the world, that queen Elizabeth might take her meaſures accordingly, in conſequence of ſeveral applications made to her from the prince of Orange, and the people of Holland. This commiſſion he executed ſo well, that in 1579, he was ordered to go in her behalf to the States of Holland, and negotiated a loan for them in England, upon the ſecurity of plate and jewels ſent hither. In 1583, he was ſent into Scotland to counteract the French ambaſſador. Mr. Daviſon was now clerk of the privy-council, and was afterwards ſent to the States of the Netherlands, who were ſetting up for an independency, to manage the affairs of the alliance between the queen and them; and performed his part ſo well, as to give ſatisfaction to both the queen and the States. After the concluſion of the treaty, upon his return to England, he was made a privy-counſellor, and one of her majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, in conjunction with Sir Francis Walſingham, for which he was chiefly indebted to the earl of Leiceſter. Mary, queen of Scotland, being tried and condemned in the year 1586, queen Elizabeth commanded Daviſon to bring her the warrant for her death, to be ſigned, on which he obtained it from the lord treaſurer, who drew it up, and having given it to her majeſty, ſhe, after ſigning it, expreſly commanded him to carry it to the ſeal, and then to ſend it to the commiſſioners; but having kept the warrant ſealed all that night, and the greateſt part of the next day, he brought it with him to court, and informed her majeſty of it, when finding her reſolved to proceed in it, according to her former directions, and yet deſirous of conducting that black affair in ſuch a manner as to throw the burden from herſelf, he reſolved to have nothing farther to do with it, and therefore, going with the lord Hatton to the lord treaſurer's chamber, he, in his preſence, gave it to the treaſurer, of whom he had before received it, who kept it till he himſelf, and the reſt of the council, ſent it away. Thus carefully did Daviſon avoid having any concern in the death of queen Mary. Yet Elizabeth was no ſooner informed that the queen of Scots had ſuffered, then pretending it was without her conſent, ſhe ſeemed very angry with her council and forbad them the court. But the whole weight of her diſpleaſure fell upon Daviſon, whom ſhe inſtantly deprived of his office, and committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower. He was ſoon after brought to a ſolemn trial in the ſtar-chamber, condemned to pay a fine of ten thouſand pounds, and to be impriſoned during the queen's pleaſure. He languiſhed ſeveral years in confinement, and never recovered any degree of favour or of power. Thus Elizabeth, to palliate this part of her conduct, made no ſcruple of ſacrificing the reputation and happineſs of one of the moſt virtuous and able men in the kingdom. Dr. Robertſon's Hiſtory of Scotland, vol. II.

DAVIS'S Streights, an arm of the ſea, ſeparating Greenland from North America. They begin at ſixty-two degrees north latitude, and extend to ſeventy-five, where they turn to the eaſt, and meet with Baffin's bay. Davis paſſed paſſed them in 1585, when he endeavoured to find out a north-weſt paſſage to China. In one of the iſlands in theſe ſtreights they met with people with broad faces, ſmall eyes, thick lips, no beards, and of a pretty good ſtature, but their hands and feet were ſmall and ſlender. They live moſtly in their boats upon the water, and their diet is chiefly fiſh. Moſt of them have darts, but ſome have bows and arrows for their weapons. They make their nets of whale's fins, and ſeem to be ingenious enough in thoſe few things they make for their own uſe.

DAVOS, or TAFAAS, a community of the Griſons, and the firſt of the third league, occupies part of the eaſtern quarter thereof. It is a wild country, and the air is raw and cold in the winter; but in the ſummer it is agreeable enough. There are two ſmall lakes, which ſupply the inhabitants with plenty of fiſh, particularly a ſmall ſort of a trout which they call a dorado. There are alſo mines of ſilver, copper, and lead. The whole territory, though large, is but a ſingle pariſh divided into ſeveral viſſinages, or neighbourhoods, compoſed of ſeveral hamlets, and ſcattered houſes. The pariſh church is in the village of St. John, beſides which there are three others. The mount Scaletta gives riſe to a ſtream which they call the Rhine, and which ſome take to be the beginning of that river. This community is the principal of all the league, and the aſſemblies of the league meet in their turn at St. John de Davos, where the archives are kept. There alſo is the regency of the country. The grand council is compoſed of eighty-two perſons, out of which fifteen are choſen for the petty council. To the eighty two they join thirty-eight from among the people, who all together elect the members of the grand and petty council, the chancellor, and vice-chancellor. When they are to elect a landamman, or chief of the country, the judge of matrimonial cauſes, the banderets, the officers, the hundred and twenty juſt mentioned, elect two or three perſons by plurality of voices for every office, out of which the people chooſe one. The territory of Firol belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, receive all the duties, and convert them to their own uſe.

DAVITY, (PETER) a gentleman born at Tournon. He wrote a work intitled, The World, in ſix volumes folio, and died at Paris in 1635, aged ſixty-three.

DAUMIUS, (CHRISTIAN, a learned German author, was born at Zwickaw, on the 29th of March, 1612, and after having performed his firſt ſtudies in his own country, continued them at Leipſic. He alſo viſited ſome other cities of Germany, and, at his return, became regent of the college of Zwickaw in 1642, and in 1662, rector of the ſame college, which he enjoyed with great reputation till his death, which happened on the 15th of December, 1687. He was one of the moſt learned men of his time, for he underſtood the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Turkiſh, French, Italian, Spaniſh, and the Bohemian tongues, and was a perfect maſter of the Arabic. He publiſhed, beſides good editions of a great number of works, pieces of poetry, diſſertations, and many other pieces, which are eſteemed; the principal of which are, 1. Tractatus de cauſis amiſſarum Linguæ Latinæ radicum: 2. Indagator & reſtitutor Græcæ & Latinæ Linguæ radicum; 3. Libellus de nullitate aoriſti ſecundi & futuri ſecundi.

DAUPHINY, a province of France, bounded by the Alps, on the eaſt; on the north by the river Rhone and Savoy; on the weſt, by the Rhone, and on the ſouth by Provence. The ſoil is fertile in ſome places, and produces wheat, wine, olives, hemp, barley, oats, ſalt, wood, vitriol, gum, juniper, cryſtal, iron, copper, and lead. But two-thirds of this province is barren, on account of the mountains, which oblige the inhabitants to go abroad one part of the year to ſeek their bread. However, theſe mountains produce a great variety of flowers and herbs for the botaniſts, and ſeveral curious particulars. On the mountains of Ambrun and Die are to be found marcaſites. The mountain Breſier, near the Alps, often emits flames. The golden mountain produces a kind of baſtard diamonds. Some other mountains produce excellent wood for building, which is very durable. It is called melezes, and ſome have taken it for cedar, but it is more like fir. It bears neither fruit nor bloſſoms, but it produces manna, and agaric grows to its bark.

There are animals here not to be met with in other parts of France; as the bouctein, which is grey, and reſembles a deer in ſhape, but partakes of the nature of a goat, for they delight to be among the rocks, and will leap from one to another, though at a good diſtance. On the mountains of Urbon and Valaurie, there are a great many bears, and on that of Voluy there are herds of ſhamoy goats. Theſe differ from boucteins in being red in ſummer, and grey in winter, and they have ſmall broad horns, crooked at the ends in ſuch a manner, that they ſometimes hang by them. The marmot is an Alpine rat, which ſleeps ſix months in the year. When they lay in their ſtock of hay, one lies on his back, and the other loads him; this done, they drag him to their holes by the tail. There are a great many white hares and patridges, as well as pheaſants, eagles, vultures, &c.

The rivers are the Rhone, the Durance, the Iſere, and the Drome. At La Motte is a piece of land, five miles in length, on which there is a burning vapour, and a ſpring of oily bituminous water. At mount Orel the wells are a ſpecific againſt a tertian ague. Thoſe near Gap cure a quartan. The waters of Arjanzon have a vinous taſte, and are good againſt ulcers. In the barony of Aix, near Die, there are two ſprings at about two feet diſtance, whereof the one is ſalt, and the other is freſh. Beſides theſe, there are other ſprings and waters, but nothing uncommon or remarkable.

This province has little trade, and therefore many of the gentlemen go into the army. The common people are cunning, civil, and officious, but ſelf-conceited, and lovers of law-ſuits, and double dealers. It formerly had its own governors, but Humbert II. having no iſſue, gave this country to Philip de Valois, king of France, on condition that the eldeſt ſon of the king of France takes his title of Dauphin from this province.

The principal towns are Grenoble the capital, Vienne, Valence, St. Paul, Trois Chateaux, Montelimar, Creſt, Die, Romans, St. Marcellin, Bourg, d' Oyſans, Brianzon, Ambrun, Gap, and Buis.

DAURAT, (JOHN) in Latin, Auratus, a learned and excellent French poet, in the ſixteenth century. He was particularly fond of Anagrams, and wrote a great many verſes in Latin, Greek, and French, particularly odes, epigrams, and hymns. He died at Paris November 1, 1588, aged above fourſcore.

DAUSQUEIUS, DAUSQUIUS, or D'AUSQUEIUS, (CLAUDIUS) Canon of Tournay, was born at St. Omers, December 5, 1566. He made a Latin Tranſlation of the Forty Homilies of St. Baſil; publiſhed ſome Notes on Quintus Calaber, and Silius Italicus, with an ample Commentary; he alſo wrote, 1. Sancti Pauli Sanctitudo in utero extra, in ſolo, & in cœlo; 2. Antiqui novique Latii Orthographica, 2 vols. folio; and other works.

DAWES, (Sir WILLIAM) archbiſhop of York, was the youngeſt ſon of Sir John Dawes, bart. and was born at Lyons, near Braintree in Eſſex, on the 12th of September, 1671. He received the firſt rudiments of learning at Merchant-Taylors ſchool in London, whence he removed, in 1687, to St. John's college in Oxford, of which, about two years after, he was made a fellow. But his father's title and eſtate deſcending to him upon the death of his two brothers, he left Oxford; and entering himſelf a nobleman in Catharine hall, Cambridge, lived in his eldeſt brother's chambers; and, as ſoon as the rules of the univerſity would permit, took the degree of maſter of arts. Upon his arriving at a proper age, he was ordained deacon and prieſt by Dr Compton, biſhop of London; and being ſoon after created doctor in divinity, he was unanimouſly elected maſter of Catharine hall in 1696. He roſe gradually through ſeveral inferior church preferments, firſt to the biſhopric of Cheſter, and afterwards to the archbiſhopric of York, to the laſt of which he was elected in 1714. In this high ſtation he continued for above ten years, when he was carried off by an inflammation in his bowels, April the 30th, 1724, in the fifty-third year of his age. He was the author of ſeveral works; ſome of which were publiſhed in his life-time, and others after his death; the whole are compriſed in three volumes, 8vo.

DAX, a town of France, in Gaſcony, capital of Lardes, with a biſhop's ſee. It has ſome fortifications, and a caſtle flanked with ſeveral large round towers. There is a fine walk on the ramparts by the ſide of the river. The beſt market in the province is kept here, and there are ſeveral religious houſes. It is ſeated on the river Adour, twenty five miles north-eaſt of Bayonne, ſeventy-five ſouth-by-weſt of Bourdeaux, and four hundred ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 55. W. Lat. 43. 42. N.

DEAD SEA, commonly called the lake Aſphaltus, or the lake of Sodom and Gomorrah, is in Paleſtine, a part of Syria in Aſia. The river Jordan runs into it, and it is ſeventy miles long and twenty broad. It is incloſed on the eaſt and weſt by high mountains, which abound with ſulphureous ſtones, and the bitumen which this lake affords exactly reſembles pitch. Joſephus and other authors have related many fables of this lake, as that there are apples growing near it, fair without, and full of aſhes within; that birds which attempt to fly over it drop down dead; that no perſon can ſink in the waters they are ſo ſtrong; that there is a ſmoke continually aſcending from the lake; and that no ſort of fiſh can live in it; all which have been confuted by Mr. Maundrell in his Journey from Aleppo to Jeruſalem.

DEAL, a ſea port town in Kent, which has a market on Thurſdays, and two fairs, on April 5 and October 10, for cattle and pedlar's ware. It is a member of the town and port of Sandwich, and is ſtrengthened by a caſtle built by Henry VIII. that ſtands by the ſea-ſide. Between this place and the Goodwin ſands, is the famous road for ſhipping called the Downs, where all ſhips going out or coming home uſually ride, which makes this town a place of reſort for ſeafaring men. It is ſeventy-three miles from London. Long. 1. 30. E. Lat. 51. 16. N.

DEBORAH, a celebrated propheteſs and judge of Iſrael, one thouſand two hundred and eighty-five years before the Chriſtian æra. By her advice Barak raiſed troops, and marched againſt Siſera, the captain of the army of Jabin, king of Canaan, who had long held the Iſraelites in ſlavery. The Canaanites were defeated, and Siſera their general ſlain by Jael. Deborah celebrated this victory by a ſublime ſong.

DEBORAH, the wife of rabbi Joſeph Aſcaliel, a Roman Jew, at the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. She applied herſelf to Italian poetry, and tranſlated ſome pieces from the Hebrew into Italian, as The Habitation of the Petitioners, by rabbi Moſes de Rieti, a moral work, printed at Venice in 1602 and 1609. She alſo tranſlated into Italian verſe ſome other works of the ſame author.

DEBRECZEN, a town of Hungary, whoſe inhabitants are moſt of them proteſtants. They have a college for the inſtruction of youth, and are much addicted to commerce, which is now in a flouriſhing condition. It was taken by the Turks in 1684, but was retaken by the Imperialiſts the ſame year. It is forty-four miles ſouth-eaſt of Tokay, and eighty-eight eaſt of Buda. Long. 21. 11. E. Lat. 47. 30. N.

DECAN, a kingdom in the Eaſt Indies, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges. It is bounded on the north by Guzurat; on the eaſt by Golconda and Berar; on the ſouth by Viſapour; and by the Indian ocean on the weſt. The chief inland town is Aurengabad, and upon the coaſt the town of Bombay.

DECEBALUS, a valiant king of the Datians, defeated the generals of the emperor Domitian; but was at laſt vanquiſhed by Trajan, when finding that he was too weak to reſiſt ſo powerful a prince, he killed himſelf in the year 106.

DECEMVIRI, in Roman antiquity, ten magiſtrates annually choſen out of the ſenators of Rome, to govern the commonwealth inſtead of conſuls, with power to make laws for the people. Their power was equal to that of kings or conſuls, though only one of them at a time had the faſces and conſular ornaments. They aſſembled the ſenate, confirmed decrees, and acted in all reſpects as a ſupreme magiſtrate; but to this honour they ſucceeded by turns till the year was expired. It was the decemviri who drew up the laws of the Twelve Tables, thence called leges decemvirales.

There were alſo other decemviri of a much inferior power, created on particular emergencies for the regulation and management of certain affairs, as the conducting of colonies, keeping the ſibyls books, &c.

DECENNALIA, in Roman antiquity, feſtivals celebrated by the emperors every tenth year of their reign, with ſacrifices, games, and largeſſes for the people, who at the ſame time offered up vows for the emperor, and the perpetuity of the empire, which were called Vota decennalia. Theſe ſolemnities were inſtituted by Auguſtus, and complied with by his ſucceſſors.

DECENTIUS (MAGNUS) the brother of Magnentius, was made Cæſar, and had the command of the troops in Gaul; but being defeated by the Germans, and being informed of his brother's death, hanged himſelf at Sens in 373.

DECHALES. See CHALES (CLAUDIUS FRANCIS MILLET DE).

DECIUS (TRAJANUS) born at Bubala in the Lower Panonia, was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious legions, and marched into Italy againſt the troops of Philip. The death of that prince and his ſon ſecured the empire to Decius in 249. He aſſociated with himſelf in the government of the empire his two ſons Decius and Hoſtilianus; raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, which is accounted the ſeventh, and periſhed in a marſh as he was marching to fight the Goths, who had killed his ſon Decius in a rencounter in 251. He was ſucceeded by Trebonianus Gallus.

DECIUS MUS (PUBLIUS) a Roman conſul, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage, and contributed greatly to the victory gained over the Samnites, in the three hundred and forty-third year before our Saviour's birth. When conſul with Manlius Torquatus, he devoted himſelf to the infernal gods in a battle fought againſt the Latins in the three hundred and fortieth year before Chriſt, in which he was killed.

He ought not to be confounded with Publius Decius Mus, his ſon, who was high-prieſt, and four times conſul. He defeated the Samnites and Tuſcans, and, like his father, devoted himſelf to the infernal gods.

This manner of devoting themſelves for the ſafety of their country to the infernal gods, was alſo fatal to Publius Decius Mus, who was conſul, and the ſon of the latter, in the battle fought againſt Pyrrhus in the two hundred and ſeventy-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra.

DECIUS (PHILIP) a very famous civilian, born at Milan in the year 1454. He was ſucceſſively profeſſor of civil and canon law in different univerſities. Several of his works have been publiſhed, and his Commentaries on the Decretals are much eſteemed. He died at Siena, October 13, 1535, at the age of eighty-one.

DECISE, a town of France in Nivernois. It is ſeated near the river Loire, and does not contain above one hundred and forty houſes. It is twenty miles from Nevers, and one hundred and twenty-five ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 31. E. Lat. 46. 50. N.

DECKENDORF, a town of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, thirty ſeven miles ſouth-eaſt of Ratiſbon. Long. 13. 9. E. Lat. 48. 46. N.

DEE (JOHN) a famous mathematician and aſtrologer, born at London on the 13th of July 1527. He ſtudied at Cambrige, Louvain, and Paris, in all which places he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his profound knowledge; and on his return to England applying himſelf to aſtrology and magic, he acquired ſuch reputation, that he was conſulted as an oracle, and queen Elizabeth always called him her philoſopher. He was alſo conſulted and admired by many of the princes of Europe, and was univerſally eſteemed as a magician, he himſelf pretending to converſe with ſpirits. He travelled to ſeveral foreign courts, and died in England in 1608, aged eighty one. He was the author of a great number of works, ſome of which were printed at London in 1659, in folio, with notes, and a learned preface by Caſaubon. This edition is very ſcarce.

DEERING (EDWARD) in Latin Deringus, fellow of Chriſt college, Cambridge, was of the family of that name, ſtill remaining at Surrenden Dering in Kent. He was an eminent preacher at court in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and one of the preachers at St. Paul's. His principal works are his Anſwers to Harding, his Lectures on the Epiſtles to the Hebrews, and his Sermons. He was diſtinguiſhed by his piety, and the purity and integrity of his life; and died on the 26th of June, 1576.

DEERING (Sir EDWARD) a man of parts and eloquence, in the reign of king Charles I. was a great friend to the conſtitution, and no leſs an enemy to the exorbitances of the adminiſtration. He entered with great zeal into the buſineſs of reforming abuſes, but was carried by his vanity farther than he firſt intended to go. We are told by lord Clarendon that his principal motive for bringing the bill into the houſe of commons for extirpating biſhops, deans, and chapters, was the application of two lines of Ovid, which he thought a very pretty introduction to an harangue. Upon the erection of the royal ſtandard at Nottingham, he entered into the ſervice of the king, raiſed a regiment of horſe at his own expence, and commanded it in perſon. He was a great ſufferer in the royal cauſe, by impriſonment, ſequeſtration, and plunder. Eachard ſays that he entered into prieſt's orders, and became an earneſt ſuitor for the deanery of Canterbury, but being diſappointed, turned again from the king, and ended his days in obſcurity.

DE FOE (DANIEL) a very ſucceſsful writer, was bred a hoſier, but quitting that trade, applied to his pen, and ſoon raiſed himſelf many enemies as well as many friends. Though he was not born a poet, his True-born Engliſhman paſſed through nine editions under his own inſpection, beſides its being twelve times pirated. He wrote another ſatire called the Reformation of Manners. But though he had no poetic genius, he wrote with great ſtrength and perſpicuity in proſe, and beſides was capable of touching the paſſions in the moſt pleaſing manner. He wrote many political pieces, in which he ſeems to have underſtood, as well as any man, the civil conſtitution of the kingdom; and for one of theſe he ſtood in the pillory in Cheapſide, where the populace were far from offering him the leaſt inſult, and ſoon after he publiſhed A Hymn to the Pillory. It was probably his political ſentiments that brought him under the laſh of Mr. Pope in this ſevere line:

"Earleſs on high ſtood unabaſh'd De Foe."

He wrote a great number of other works, among which is the entertaining Hiſtory of Robinſon Cruſoe, two volumes, which, though a fiction, was for ſome time thought a true hiſtory. He likewiſe wrote the Life of Moll Flanders, the Life of Colonel Jack, and other fictitious pieces of the ſame kind, in all which he ſhews the greateſt regard to decency, and and to the obligations of religion and virtue, which he enforces in a ſtronger manner in his dialogues called the Family Inſtructor, and the Religious Courtſhip. He died at his houſe in Iſlington in the year 1731.

DEJANIRA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Oenus king of Ætolia, whom Hercules won from Achelous, and made her his wife; but travelling with this princeſs through Ætolia, they had occaſion to paſs a river, when Neſſus the centaur offering Hercules his ſervice to carry her over, he accepted it, and croſſed the river before them. Neſſus now ſeeing a favourable opportunity, offered violence to Dejanira, upon which her huſband pierced him with an arrow dipped in the blood of the Lernæan hydra. Neſſus when ready to expire, gave his bloody garment to the princeſs, aſſuring her that it was a ſovereign remedy to cure her huſband if ever he proved unfaithful. Some time after Dejanira thinking ſhe had reaſon to ſuſpect his fidelity, ſent him the coat, which he had no ſooner put on than he was filled with the moſt excruciating torments, when being unable to ſupport his pains, he retired to mount Oeta, and erecting a pile of wood, ſet fire to it, and threw himſelf into the flames, upon which Dejanira killed herſelf in deſpair.

DEJOCES obtained the kingdom of the Medes; built Ecbatana, and died in the ſix hundred and fifty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra, after a reign of fifty-three years.

DEJOTARUS, one of the tetrarchs of Galatia, gradually aggrandized himſelf in ſuch a manner, that he encroached on almoſt all the rights of the other tetrarchs. He obtained of the Roman ſtate the leſſer Armenia, and the title of king, and was at laſt the ſole tetrach. He took part with Pompey againſt Cæſar, and brought him a conſiderable body of forces; when the former was defeated he ſubmitted himſelf to the conqueror, and was forgiven, but afterwards Cæſar deprived him of Armenia and part of Galatia. He was accuſed of conſpiring againſt Cæſar's life, and defended by Cicero in the fine oration Pro Dejotaro. After Cæſar's murder he took the field for Brutus, and died ſoon after, about the forty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra. It is remarkable that his wife being barren, deſired him to have children by another woman, and preſented him a beautiful captive; ſhe acknowledged the children produced by this commerce, and educated them with tenderneſs and magnificence.

DEIPHILE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Adraſtus, king of Argos, and the wife of Tydeus, by whom ſhe had the famous Diomedes.

DEIPHOBUS, the ſon of Priam and Hecuba, according to Virgil, married the beautiful Hellen, after the death of Paris; but that princeſs betrayed him, and delivered him up to Menelaus, her former huſband, who put him death.

DELAMER (HENRY BOOTH, lord) was the ſon of Sir George Booth, who took up arms for king Charles II. a little before the Reſtoration, and was created a baron on the 20th of April 1661. He was a man of a generous and noble ſpirit, which diſdained upon any terms to ſubmit to ſervitude, and whoſe paſſion ſeemed to center in the love of civil and religious liberty. In the reign of James II. he was accuſed of conſpiring to raiſe a rebellion, and to ſubvert the government, in conjunction with the duke of Monmouth, for which he was tried by his peers. The lords Howard and Grey appeared in court againſt him, but ſaid little or nothing to the matter in queſtion. The principal evidence was one Saxton, an obſcure fellow of an infamous character. But the lords gave no credit to this evidence, and the priſoner was unanimouſly acquitted. The king was very deſirous of his being tried before another tribunal, where even the teſtimony of ſuch a wretch as Saxton would have been admitted. This nobleman had afterwards a principal hand in the Revolution; for his lordſhip, with the earls of Devonſhire and Danby, privately concerted the plan of that great event at Whittington, a village on the edge of Scarſdale in Derbyſhire. The houſe in which they met is at preſent a farm-houſe, and the country people diſtinguiſh the room where they ſat by the name of the plotting parlour. His lordſhip was afterwards ſent with the marquis of Halifax and the earl of Shrewſbury to inform king James that the prince of Orange deſired he would quit Whitehall. Several of his ſpeeches, his advice to his children, and other pieces, are in print.

DELAVAL (ſir RALPH) knight, vice-admiral of the red, was the ſon of a gentleman in the north of England, and entered very early into the navy, under the protection of the duke of York, who treated him with great kindneſs, and at length promoted him to be captain of the York, a third rate man of war, in which ſtation he was found at the Revolution. King William promoted him to the rank of rear-admiral of the blue, and at the ſame time conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. In this ſtation he ſerved under the earl of Torrington, in the famous battle of Beachy-head, on the 30th of June, 1690, in which the Engliſh and Dutch were beat by the French, but without any impeachment of his courage or conduct, as appeared by his being appointed preſident of the court-martial which tried the earl, and his being immediately after raiſed to the rank of vice-admiral of the blue. On the 19th of May, 1692, when admiral Ruſſel engaged the French fleet, and obtained the glorious victory of La Hogue, Sir Ralph, as vice-admiral of the red, formed the rear of the fleet, and did his duty with great reputation. Soon after Henry Killegrew, eſq ſir Ralph Delaval, and ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, knights, were appointed joint admirals of one of the largeſt fleets the maritime powers had ever ſent to ſea, in order to attack the French fleet at Breſt, where it was thought that the Toulon ſquadron was arrived; but the fleet being neither ſufficiently victualled nor manned, and the miniſtry being deceived in their intelligence, there being no ſhips at Breſt, they were ordered back to St. Helen's, and Sir Ralph Delaval and Mr. Killegrew were ſoon after laid aſide, from which time ſir Ralph lived privately as a country gentleman, upon his own eſtate, which was very conſiderable. He died in January 1707, and was interred with great ſolemnity in Weſtminſter abbey.

DELFT, a city of the United Provinces in Holland, capital of Delftland. It is pleaſantly ſituated in a large plain of meadow land, and is about two miles in circumference. It is of an oblong figure, and is ſurrounded by an old wall and ditch. It is defended againſt inundations by three dams or dykes. It holds the third rank in the aſſembly of the ſtates of Holland, and has a chamber in the Eaſt India company. It is an ancient city, mention being made of it in 1062. In 1536 it was burnt down, but ſoon after became in a flouriſhing condition again. The number of houſes are reckoned to be five thouſand and eighty-eight, and the inhabitants twenty-two thouſand.

The trade is not ſo good as formerly, but they ſell a great deal of beer, and their earthern ware has been in much requeſt. It is a very agreeable pleaſant place, being the retreat of wealthy merchants after they have left off buſineſs. Here are two churches and ſeven miniſters, and a French church and two miniſters. The Lutherans have likewiſe one, and the Roman catholics two or three chapels. The two churches have each of them very high ſteeples, and in that called the new is the tomb of the prince of Orange, who was aſſaſſinated in this city in 1584. His ſtatue is in marble on the tomb, and there is another of braſs ſtanding by it. A dog lies at his feet, who was ſaid to die with grief for the death of his maſter. It is adorned with other braſs and marble ſtatues. Here are likewiſe the tombs of prince Maurice and prince Frederick Henry, which are viſited by travellers.

The public buildings are the ſtadt-houſe, which ſtands at the end of the market-place, and is a handſome ſtructure. The arſenal is likewiſe a good building. The haven lies within two miles of Rotterdam, and has a communication with Delft and Rotterdam by a canal. It is ſtrongly fortified and defended by three dams againſt inundations. It is ten miles north-weſt of Rotterdam, and thirty ſouth-weſt of Amſterdam. Long. 4. 15. E. Lat. 52. 6. N.

DELHI, DEHLI, or DELLI, a city of Indoſtan in Aſia, in the dominions of the great mogul, was built in the beginning of the ſixteenth century out of the ruins of the old Delhi. It ſtands on the ſide of the river Damma, and is ſurrounded with walls on all ſides, except that towards the river. There are round towers every hundred paces, after the ancient manner, but no ditches. It is not above nine miles round without the ſuburbs, which is the remainder of old Delhi. The fortreſs, which contains the ſeraglio, is a ſemicircular building, and looks towards the river. The walls of the fortreſs are built much in the ſame manner as thoſe of the city, but they are partly brick, and partly a red ſtone, which reſembles marble, and looks more agreeable than thoſe of the city; beſides they are higher, ſtronger and thicker, as well as ſurrounded with a ditch. This ditch is lined with free-ſtone, and is full of water and fiſh. Round the ditch there is a garden, which is always full of flowers and green trees. Next the garden there is a ſtreet, or rather a royal ſquare, to which the two principal gates of the fortreſs correſpond, and with theſe the two principal gates of the city.

This ſquare is made uſe of for a great many purpoſes, and among the reſt it ſerves for a market, where a great many trifling things are ſold, and for a rendezvous of watermen, and all ſorts of idle people. Here the aſtrologers ſit with a few mathematical inſtruments, and a great book, containing pictures of the ſigns of the zodiac. They are the oracles of the common people, and will anſwer any lawful queſtion for ſo ſmall a price as a halfpenny. Particularly they will point out a lucky hour in which any thing is to be begun. The women will come wrapped up in a white ſheet from head to foot, and whiſper their moſt private affairs in the ear of the aſtrologer, begging him to render the influence of

of the ſtars propitious. But theſe are only the poor conjurers, for ſome of them live very grand, and are conſulted by the great men, and even by the great mogul himſelf, on every important occaſion.

The houſes of the omrahs, officers, and conſiderable merchants make a handſome ſhew enough, but the generallity of the houſes are formed only with earth and ſtraw, for which reaſon when a fire happens it makes a prodigious progreſs. The beſt houſes here ſtand airy, and are open to the wind on all ſides, principally to the north, with courts, reſervoirs, fountains, trees, gardens, and ſmall caſcades in the halls or entrance into the houſe. In ſhort they have all the advantages of the beſt Turkiſh houſes at Aleppo, and are furniſhed within much in the ſame manner.

In the fortreſs there are two large ſtreets, beſides leſſer ones, which run off to the right and left. In one of the large ſtreets is a bazar, covered over in the manner of the Eaſt, which renders it very uſeful in ſummer and the rainy ſeaſon. The ſhops of the artificers are quite diſtinct from the houſes where they lodge; here they come and work all day, and return to their houſes at night. And here we may obſerve that the ſame trade always continues in the ſame tribe or family, and it is not lawful for one tribe to marry into another, which often brings on great inconveniences, to the female ſex in particular.

The great mogul reſided here in a very magnificent palace, till Kouli Khan invaded India, where he kept him priſoner, with his nobility and generals, till he had obliged them to deliver all their wealth, and what they could extort from others. However his ſeverity was followed by an inſurrection, which was ſucceeded by the ſlaughter of one hundred and twenty thouſand, ſome ſay one hundred and fifty thouſand, of the inhabitants. After this the mogul was releaſed, and Kouli Khan obliged him to transfer ſome of the provinces of India which lay next to Perſia, and carried away the greateſt treaſure that ever was amaſſed by any conqueror, chiefly in diamonds, the product of Golconda, a province of India, which Aurenzebe, the anceſtor of this mogul, had wreſted from the king of Golconda, and driven him from his throne about threeſcore years before. Long. 79. 25. E. Lat. 28. 20. N.

DELIA, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival obſerved in the iſle of Delos every fifth year. It was inſtituted by Theſeus in honour of Venus at his return from Crete. The chief ceremonies were theſe: the ſtatue of that goddeſs was crowned with garlands; they appointed a choir of muſic, and horſe-races, and performed a remarkable dance, in which they imitated by their motions the various windings of the Cretan labyrinth, out of which Theſeus, the inventor of the dance, made his eſcape.

DELIA, in antiquity, feaſts annually celebrated by the Athenians, in the iſle of Delos, in honour of Apollo, the principal ſolemnity of which conſiſted in a ſolemn voyage made to his temple.

DELIUS, or DELLIUS, (QUINTUS) one of Antony's generals, who being ſent to Cleopatra, perſuaded her to appear before that prince in her richeſt ornaments. She followed his advice, and by that means conquered her conqueror, in the forty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra. He wrote an Hiſtory of his own time.

DELMENHURST, a town of Germany, capital of a ſmall diſtrict of the ſame name, in the circle of Weſtphalia. The old caſtle is quite demoliſhed. It has been ſubject to Denmark ever ſince the year 1667. It is ſeated on the river Delm, near the Weiſer, eight miles ſouth-weſt of Bremen, and eighteen ſouth-eaſt of Oldenburg. Long. 8. 37. E. Lat. 53. 10. N.

DELOS, the chief of the iſlands called the Cyclades, in the Archipelago, ſeated a little to the ſouth of Mycone and Tinos. According to the opinion of the ancients, Apollo and Diana were born here, and therefore the Greeks inſtituted public feſtivals, offered ſacrifices, ſent prieſts and choirs of virgins here to do them honour; but the iſland is now deſtitute of inhabitants. There is another iſland, called Little Delos, ſeparated from the former by a channel of about five hundred paces, which has a few inhabitants remaining. Long. 25. 50. E. Lat. 37. 29. N.

DELRIO (MARTIN ANTONY) a learned writer of the ſixteenth century, was the ſon of a Spaniſh gentleman, and was born at Antwerp, in 1551. He was received doctor of Salamanca in 1574, became a Jeſuit, in 1580, and taught polite literature and divinity in ſeveral univerſities. He wrote a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. A Latin Treatiſe on magical Diſquiſitions, in three volumes, folio. 2. Commentaries on Geneſis, the Canticles, and the Lamentations; and, 3. Explications of the moſt difficult Paſſages in the Holy Scriptures, three volumes. He died at Louvain, on the 29th of October, 1608, aged fifty-eight.

DELSPERG, or DELEMONT, a town in the biſhoprick of Baſil, in Swiſſerland, in the diſtrict called Salſgaw. It ſtands on an eminence, by the ſide of the little river Sorn. There is a caſtle which belongs to the biſhop, where he ſometimes reſides. Here are likewiſe ſome handſome houſes belonging to the canons of Moutier. It is ten miles north-weſt of Soleure, and twenty ſouth-weſt of Baſil. Long. 7. 56. E. Lat. 47. 18. N.

DELTA, is that part of Lower Egypt which contains all the land that lies between the branches of the Nile and the Mediterranean Sea. It is called the Delta, becauſe it is triangular, like the Greek letter called delta, Δ. It is divided into the governments of Garbija, and Manuſia; and the chief towns are Alexandria, Damietta, Roſetta, Menuſia, and Mehalla. Beſides theſe, there are ſuch a vaſt number of villages on the banks of the Nile, and ſo many ſingle houſes, with gardens, ſcattered all over this country, which is three hundred and ſeventy miles in circumference, that it may, in ſome ſenſe, be looked upon as one ſingle town.

DEMADES, a famous Athenian, who, from being a mariner, became a great orator, and appeaſed Philip by his eloquence, after the famous victory over the Athenians, at Cheronea, in the three hundred and thirty-eighth year before the birth of Chriſt. After having obſerved that that prince inhumanly inſulted his priſoners, "I am aſtoniſhed, "ſaid he, that fortune having given thee to act the part of "Agamemnon, thou ſhouldſt amuſe thyſelf in performing "that of Therſites." Demades was greedy of preſents, and was put to death on a ſuſpicion of treaſon, in the three hundred and thirty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra.

DEMARATUS, the ſon of Ariſto, king of Sparta, whom he ſucceeded, was diſtinguiſhed by his wiſdom and bravery; but his colleague Cleomenes, having corrupted the prieſts of the Delphic oracle, made the Lacedæmonians believe that he was not Ariſto's ſon, on which he was baniſhed. He then retired to the court of Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, who gave him a generous reception, and loaded him with favours. Demaratus, however, informed the Greeks of all the deſigns of the Perſians againſt them, believing, that he was more obliged to his country, though it was unjuſt, than to his enemies, though they were generous.

DEMARATUS, one of the principal citizens of Corinth, of the family of the Bacchiades, about the year five hundred and ſixty-eight before the Chriſtian æra, being unable to live under the government of Cypſelus, who had uſurped the ſovereignty of that city, left his country with his whole family, and paſſed into Italy, where he ſettled at Tarquinia, in Tuſcany. He had there a ſon, named Lucumon, who was afterwards king of Rome, under the name of Tarquin the Elder.

DEMER, a river of the Low Countries, which riſes near Bilſen, and entering Brabant paſſes on to Dieſt, Sichen, and Arſchot, and having received the rivers Geete, Dyle, Senne, and Nethe, it ſoon after takes the name of Rupel, and falls into the Schelde, over-againſt Ruppelmonde.

DEMETRIA, in Grecian antiquity, a ſolemnity in honour of Ceres, called by the Greeks Δημήτηρ, in which it was cuſtomary for the worſhippers to laſh themſelves with whips made of the bark of trees.

Another ſolemnity of this name was obſerved by the Athenians, in honour of Demetrius Poliocrates.

DEMETRIOWITZ, a town of Ruſſian empire, in the duchy of Smolenſko, ſeated on the river Ugra. Long. 54. 0. Lat. 52. 30. N.

DEMETRIUS POLIORCETES, that is the Taker of Towns, king of Macedonia, was the ſon of Antigonus, one of the generals and ſucceſſors of Alexander the Great. He made war on Ptolomy Lagus with different ſucceſs, made himſelf maſter of Pyræum, chaſed Demetrius Phalareus from Athens, made an alliance with the Greeks, and took Megara. He loſt againſt Seleucus, Caſſander and Lyſimachus, the famous battle of Ipſus, in which his father was ſlain, in the three hundred and thirty-firſt year before the birth of Chriſt. Demetrius then retired to the iſle of Cyprus, gave his daughter Stratonice in marriage to Seleucus, made himſelf maſter of Cilicia, Tyre, and Sidon, and plundered the city of Samaria, in the two hundred and ninety-ſixth year before our Saviour's birth. Two years after, he conquered Macedonia, where he reigned ſeven years; but was driven thence by Seleucus, Ptolomy, and Lyſimachus, in conjunction with Pyrrhus; in ſhort, being betrayed by his troops, he had recourſe to the clemency of Seleucus, his father-in-law, who ſent him into Apamia, where he killed himſelf three years after, by his luxurious manner of living, in the two hundred and eighty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra. He was thought the handſomeſt prince of his time.

DEMETRIUS I. ſurnamed Sotor, or the Saviour, king of Syria, and the ſon of Seleucus Philopater, who gave him as an hoſtage to the Romans. His father being poiſoned during his abſence, his brother Antiochus Epiphanes, and afterwards his ſon Antiochus Eupator, uſurped his throne. Demetrius having in vain demanded of the ſenate, to be reſtored to his father's dominions, made his eſcape from Rome, in the one hundred and ſixty-ſecond year before the birth of Chriſt, and recovered the poſſeſſion of his kingdom. He, at length, at the perſuaſion of Alcimus, who had purchaſed the office of high prieſt of the Jews, ſent his generals, Nicanor and Bacchides, into Judea, who ravaged that country, and Judas Maccabeus was killed in a battle he fought againſt Bacchides. After this ſucceſs, Demetrius drew upon himſelf the hatred of the neighbouring princes; and he was defeated and killed by Alexander Balas, in the one hundred and fiftieth year before the Chriſtian æra, after a reign of twenty years.

DEMETRIUS II. ſurnamed Nicanor, the ſon of the former, married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, who placed him on the throne of Syria, in the one hundred and forty-fifth year before the birth of Chriſt. He gave himſelf up to debauchery, and marched againſt the Parthians, but was taken priſoner by Tryphon, who delivered him up to Phraates, their king, and obliged him to marry his daughter Rhodoguna; at which Cleopatra being enraged, married Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, who was afterwards killed in a battle againſt the Parthians, in the one hundred and thirtieth year before the birth of Chriſt. By his death Demetrius re-aſcended the throne, but rendering himſelf inſupportable to his ſubjects, they deſired Ptolemy Phyſcon to give them a king of Seleucus's family. He ſent Alexander Zebina; when Demetrius being put to flight, was killed by the intrigues of Cleopatra, in the one hundred and twenty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra.

DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, a celebrated orator and Peripatetic philoſopher, was the diſciple of Theophraſtus, and acquired ſuch authority at Athens, under the reign of Alexander the Great, that immediately after the death of that conqueror, he was conſidered as the ſovereign. He governed Athens during ten years, and embelliſhed the city with a great number of beautiful edifices. The Athenians, in honour of his virtue, raiſed to him three hundred and ſixty brazen ſtatues, which did not prevent his enemies cauſing him to be condemned to death. Demetrius retired to Caſſandra, and afterwards to Ptolemy Lagus. Diogenes Laertius ſays, that after the death of that prince, Ptolemy Philadelphus baniſhed Demetrius, in the two hundred and eighty-third year before the Chriſtian æra, and that he died ſome time after of the bite of an aſp. Others, on the contrary, maintain, that Demetrius was in great credit with Ptolemy Philadelphus, that he adorned his library with two hundred thouſand volumes, and that he brought that prince to cauſe a tranſlation of the Jewiſh laws to be made from the Hebrew into Greek. However, this celebrated philoſopher died in that prince's reign, after having compoſed many books, all of which are loſt except his Rhetoric.

DEMETRIUS, a celebrated Cynic philoſopher, lived about the year 40. Being informed that Caligula was reſolved to draw him to his court, and to attach him to his intereſt by a preſent, replied that if the emperor would tempt him, he muſt not offer him leſs than the whole empire. Seneca ſaid of him, that nature had produced him to let that age ſee, that a great genius might preſerve itſelf from being perverted by the multitude.

DEMETRIUS MAGNUS, a Greek author, cotemporary with Cicero, who wrote a work on the authors and cities who bore the ſame name, the loſs of which has been greatly regretted by thoſe who apply themſelves to know or compoſe the lives of antient writers.

DEMETRIUS CHALCONDYLAS. See CHALCONDYLAS.

DEMETRIUS GRISKA, a famous Muſcovite, pretended to be the prince Demetrius, ſon of John Baſilowitz, grand duke of Muſcovy. He aſſerted, that Boris Gudenou, who then reigned, had indeed reſolved to have him aſſaſſinated, but that this misfortune fell upon a youth who reſembled him, whom his friends had ſubſtituted in his room. He went to the vaivode of Sandomir, and promiſed, if he would eſtabliſh him in his dominions, that he would embrace the Romiſh communion, and marry his daughter. The vaivode, incited by theſe promiſes, raiſed a powerful army, placed him on the throne, and gave him his daughter in marriage; but the Muſcovites, alarmed at the changes Demetrius was reſolved to introduce, conſpired againſt him under the conduct of Zuinſki, and aſſaſſinated him on the very day of his marriage, which was the 17th of May, 16c6.

Some authors pretend that he was really the ſon of John Baſilowitz; but others make him only a Muſcovite monk, born of a noble family at Geraſlau. After his death, ſeveral impoſtors appeared in Muſcovy, of the name of Demetrius.

DEMOCEDES of Crotona, the moſt famous phyſician of his time, was the ſon of Calliphon, and the ſlave of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. This tyrant having been killed by Orœtes, Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, put the aſſaſſin to death, and removed to Suſa all his riches with his ſlaves, among whom was Democedes. Some time after, he cured the king, who had diſlocated his foot in diſmounting from his horſe. This cure brought him into great credit; a magnificent houſe was given him at Suſa; he had the honour of eating at Darius's table; and no favour could be obtained at court but by his intereſt. At length, having cured Atoſa, the daughter of Cyrus and the wife of Darius, of an ulcer in her breaſt, he was, by her means, ſent as a ſpy into Greece, where he no ſooner arrived than he fled to Crotona, and there married the daughter of the famous Milo, the wreſtler, five hundred and twenty years before the Chriſtian æra.

DEMOCHARES. See MOUCHI.

DEMOCRITUS, one the greateſt philoſophers of antiquity, was born at Abdera, in Thrace. He was educated by the Magi, who taught him aſtronomy and theology, and afterwards was the diſciple of Leucippus, from whom he learned the ſyſtem of atoms and a vacuum. Democritus deſiring to perfect himſelf in the ſciences, travelled into all the parts of the world where he hoped to find learned men. He went to viſit the prieſts of Egypt, conſulted the Perſian and Chaldean philoſophers, and, according to ſome authors, went even to India to conſult the Gymnoſophiſts; but it is doubted whether he was ever at Athens. After having expended above an hundred talents in his travels, he returned to Abdera, and ſhut himſelf up in a garden, where he made philoſophical experiments. Scarce had he publiſhed his great Diacoſm, the moſt excellent of his works, when the public made him a preſent of five hundred talents, and erected brazen ſtatues to his honour. Democritus inceſſantly laughed at human life, as a continued farce, which made the inhabitants of Abdera imagine, that he was mad, on which they ſent for Hippocrates to cure him; but that celebrated phyſician having diſcourſed with the philoſopher, told the Abderians, that he had a great veneration for Democritus, and that, in his opinion, thoſe who eſteemed themſelves the moſt healthy were the moſt diſtempered. Democritus died, according to Diogenes Laertius, in the three hundred and ſixty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra, aged an hundred and nine. He was the author of many books, which are loſt, and from theſe Epicurus borrowed his philoſophy. It is ſaid, that he blinded himſelf, that he might meditate the more profoundly on philoſophical ſubjects; but this has not the leaſt degree of probability.

DEMONA, a valley, which forms the moſt northern, and largeſt province of Sicily, is bounded on the ſouth by the valley of Noto, on the weſt by that of Mezara, on the north by the ſea of Tuſcany, and on the eaſt by the Faro of Meſſina. It is about one hundred and ten miles in length from eaſt to weſt, and fifty in breadth from north to ſouth. It is watered with a great number of rivers, which render it very fruitful. It is famous for mount Gibel, more known by the name of mount Ætna, which caſts forth fire and flames, and often does a great deal of miſchief. Meſſina is the capital city, beſides which there are Melazzo, Pati, St. Marco, Cefaledi, Nicoſia, Randazzo, and Tapormina. Catania was very conſiderable formerly, but it has been almoſt brought to nothing by earthquakes.

DEMONAX, an able philoſopher, born in the iſle of Crete, embraced no particular ſect, but took what he thought good in each. It is ſaid, that being at the point of death, in an advanced age, he cried, "It is time to go; the farce is "over." He lived in the time of Adrian, about the year 120. His Life is written by Lucian.

DEMOSTHENES, the famous Athenian orator, and one of the greateſt geniuſſes that has appeared in the world, was born at Athens, in the three hundred and eighty-firſt year before the birth of Chriſt. He loſt his father at ſeven years of age, and was placed under the conduct of guardians, who robbed him of his ſubſtance, and neglected his education. Demoſthenes repaired this loſs by his love of eloquence and his extraordinary abilities. He became the diſciple of Iſocrates, Plato, and Iſæus, and made ſuch progreſs under theſe excellent maſters, that, at ſeventeen years of age, he pleaded againſt his guardians, and cauſed them to be ſentenced to pay him thirty talents. This was the firſt time that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence, in which he arrived at the higheſt excellence, though he ſet out under the greateſt diſadvantages; for he had an impediment in his ſpeech, which for a long time would not ſuffer him to pronounce the letter R. He had a weak voice, ſhort breath, and a very uncouth manner; however, by dint of reſolution, and infinite pains, he overcame all theſe defects. He would climb up ſteep and craggy places to help his wind, and ſtrengthen his voice; he would declaim with pebbles in his mouth to remedy the imperfection in his ſpeech; he would place a looking-glaſs before him, in order to correct the aukwardneſs of his geſture; and he learned of the beſt players the proper graces of action and pronunciation, which he thought of ſuch conſequence, that he made the whole art of oratory, in a manner, to conſiſt of them. He alſo accuſtomed himſelf to harangue on the ſea-ſhore, where the agitation of the waves formed to him an idea of the commotions in a popular aſſembly, and ſerved to prepare and fortify him againſt them. Thus it is plain that he was not born an orator, but was rather an inſtance how far great mental abilities and application may go in forming a great man in any profeſſion. It is univerſally agreed, that no orator ever a ſpoke with ſuch force, or had the paſſions of others ſo much in his power as Demoſthenes. He could dreſs a thing up in any light he pleaſed, and give it whatever colouring beſt anſwered his purpoſe, and that with ſuch force of oratory as bore down, like a thunder-bolt, all before it. Hence Philip, king of Macedon, ſaid his eloquence was of more weight againſt him, than all the fleets and armies of the Athenians; and that he had no enemy but Demoſthenes. After the death of Philip, he oppoſed Alexander the Great, on which account he was obliged to leave the city; but after the death of that conqueror, he returned to Athens, where he was received in the moſt glorious manner, and continued declaiming againſt the Macedonians. Antipater being informed of this, deſired the Athenians to deliver up to him all the orators who had ſpoken againſt him; on which Demoſthenes withdrew into the iſle of Celauria; when Archas coming thither to ſeize him in behalf of Antipater, he pretended a deſire to write to ſome of his friends, and ſucking ſome poiſon he had concealed in a pen, died on the 10th of November, in the three hundred and twenty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra. Many of his orations are ſtill extant, the ſtyle of which is grand, ſublime, and nervous; and they are all of them maſter-pieces of eloquence.

DEMPSTER (Thomas) a Scotchman who taught claſſical learning at Paris, and at ſeveral univerſities in Italy. He wrote, 1. A Supplement to Roſinus de Antiquitatibus Romanorum. 2. Commentaries on Claudian, and on Corippus. 3. Four books of Letters. 4. Several dramatic pieces and other poems. 5. Some books of law. 6. An Apparatus to the Hiſtory of Scotland. 7. A Martyrology of Scotland, and a Liſt of Scottiſh Writers. It is allowed both by the papiſts and proteſtants, that in ſeveral of the laſt mentioned works, he has quoted authors that never lived, and books that were never written. He died at Bologna, on the 5th of September, 1625.

DENBIGH, the chief town of Denbighſhire, ſeated on the ſide of a ſteep rocky hill, on a branch of the river Cluyd. It was formerly a place of great ſtrength, having been fortified with a ſtrong wall, and an impregnable caſtle. It is now a pretty large town, well built, and inhabited by glovers and tanners. It has a good trade, and is thought by ſome to be the beſt town in North Wales. It is governed by two aldermen, two bailiffs, and twenty-five capital burgeſſes. It ſends one member to ſerve in parliament, and has a good market on Wedneſdays, for corn, cattle, and proviſions. It has three fairs, on May 14, July 18, and September 25, for cattle and ſmall pedlar's ware. It is twenty-ſeven miles weſt of Cheſter, twenty weſt-ſouth-weſt of Aberconway; and two hundred and nine north-weſt of London. Long. 3. 33. W. Lat. 53. 15. N.

DENBIGHSHIRE, a county of North Wales, is bounded on the ſouth by Montgomeryſhire; on the weſt by Merionethſhire and Caernarvanſhire; on the eaſt by Shropſhire and Cheſhire, and on the north by Flintſhire and the Iriſh Sea. It is about forty miles in length, and fifteen in breadth; and is divided into twelve hundreds, in which are fifty-ſeven pariſhes, four market-towns, ſix thouſand four hundred houſes, and thirty eight thouſand inhabitants. The air is wholeſome, but cold and ſharp, on account of the ſnow which lies long on the mountains. The ſoil is various, the weſt part being heathy, barren, and but thinly inhabited, except near the ſea; and the eaſtern part is not much better, except about the river Dee. However, the middle of the county, called the vale of Cluyd, is fruitful, pleaſant, and well inhabited. The chief rivers are the Cluyd, which is formed of ſeveral ſtreams, and paſſing not far from Denbigh, runs into the Iriſh Sea. The Elwy riſes in the north-eaſt ſide of the county, and ſoon after it has left the county, falls into the Cluyd, near St. Aſaph. The Dee comes out of Merionethſhire, to the weſt of Langollem, and croſſing the ſouth corner of this county, becomes the boundary between it and Cheſhire. The chief commodities are goats, ſheep, black cattle, rye, and lead ore. The towns are Denbigh, Ruthin, and Wrexham.

DENDERMOND, a fortified town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſeated in a marſhy ground, at the confluence of the rivers Dender and Scheld; and the inhabitants can lay the country under water. The fortifications are regular, and it was formerly a frontier town. It was taken by the duke of Marlborough in 1706, and by the French in 1745. It is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Antwerp, thirteen eaſt of Ghent, and fifteen north-weſt of Bruſſels. Long. 4. 3. E. Lat. 51. 3. N.

DENHAM (Sir John) an excellent Engliſh poet, was born at Dublin, in the year 1615, and at two years of age brought to London. He ſtudied at Trinity college, in Oxford, and afterwards at Lincoln's Inn. In the early part of his life he was much addicted to gaming; but his father having at laſt reprimanded him in very ſevere terms, and threatened to diſinherit him, he wrote a little Eſſay againſt Gaming, which he preſented to his father, to ſhew his deteſtation of that practice; however, after that gentleman's deceaſe, he returned to his former ill courſes, and ſoon loſt ſeveral thouſand pounds he had left him. In 1641 he publiſhed a tragedy, called the Sophy: he afterwards retired to king Charles I. at Oxford, where he publiſhed his admirable poem, intitled Cooper's Hill. He engaged in the intereſt of his ſovereign, and was employed by him and Charles II. on ſeveral occaſions, both in England and France. At the Reſtoration he was made ſurveyor-general of all his majeſty's royal buildings, and created knight of the bath. He was greatly admired at court for his admirable genius and writings; however, upon ſome diſcontent ariſing from a ſecond marriage, he loſt his ſenſes; but being ſoon reſtored to the uſe of his reaſon, he wrote a fine copy of verſes upon the death of Cowley, whom he ſurvived but a few months. He died in March, 1688, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, near the tombs of Chaucer, Spencer, and Cowley. Moſt of his works are printed together in one volume, duodecimo.

DENIA, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Valencia, with a good caſtle, and commodious harbour. It ſtands at the foot of a mountain, and on the ſide of a hill. It has a very high tower, from whence there is an extenſive proſpect of the Mediterranean, and all the ſhips that way. It was taken by the Allies in 1705, and retaken by aſſault in 1708. It is ſeated over-againſt the iſland of Yvica, fifty-two miles north-by-eaſt of Alicant, and forty-five ſouth-eaſt of Valencia. Long. 0. 33. E. Lat. 39. 0. N.

DENISON (John) D. D. an eminent divine, in the reign of James I. was educated at Baliol college, in Oxford, and was for ſome time domeſtic chaplain to the duke of Buckingham, and afterwards to king James; but ſeems to have had no preferment in the church beſides the vicarage of St. Mary's, at Reading, in Berkſhire, which he held together with the free-ſchool there. He publiſhed many ſermons, and ſeveral pieces of controverſy and practical divinity, the moſt conſiderable of the former was his book, in Latin, on Auricular Confeſſion, againſt Bellarmine. He died in 1628-9.

DENMARK, a kingdom of Europe, bounded on the eaſt by the Baltic Sea, on the weſt and north by the ocean, and on the ſouth by Germany. Nature has formed three different paſſages, by which there is a way from one ſea to the other. Theſe are properly ſtreights, the firſt of which is called the Little Belt. This is a narrow canal, not above four miles over, between the iſlands of Funen and the peninſula of Jutland. The ſecond is the Great Belt, between the iſland of Funen and Zealand. This is twenty miles over. The third is the famous ſtreight called the Sound, between Zealand and Schonen. All theſe belong to the crown of Denmark, by the conſent of the ſeveral nations, who have occaſion to navigate their ſhips that way. But the Swedes were exempted from paying any duty on that account till 1720, when they agreed to it by treaty.

The air of Denmark is colder than that of Germany, though not ſo cold as may be imagined from its ſituation ſo far north; and in general it is wholeſome, for though the country is ſubject to the ſcurvy, yet that may be more owing to their living on ſalt proviſions, than to the climate. This kingdom is compoſed of ſeveral great and ſmall iſlands, which are in general pretty fruitful, and are famous for horſes, which are tranſported to different parts, even as far as Italy. The paſtures are good, and the horned cattle fine, of which they ſend ſeveral thouſands yearly to Germany and Holland. The ſame may be ſaid of the ſheep and hogs, which multiply greatly, and in part are ſold to ſtrangers. They have great quantities of fiſh, particularly a ſmall cod, of which they make ſtock fiſh, and export a prodigious quantity to Roman Catholic countries.

The Danes are well ſhaped, robuſt, ingenious, apt to learn languages, and have a capacity for the ſciences, as well as mechanic arts, they being humane and ſociable. The nobility are valiant, magnificent, and eaſy of acceſs. The general diſpoſition of the nation is to commerce, agriculture, and to feeding cattle. The Daniſh women bear a very good character, and are well ſhaped, and tolerably handſome.

The kingdom of Denmark was formerly elective, nevertheleſs they choſe a king out of the royal family. His authority was not then abſolute, for the clergy, nobility, and the third ſtate had a ſhare of the government. This ſubſiſted till 1660, when the ſtates offered the hereditary and abſolute government to Frederick III. then king of Denmark.

mark. The preſent royal family are deſcended from the counts of Oldenburg, and the firſt king of that race was Chriſtian I. who reigned till the year 1481.

There are ſeven councils eſtabliſhed at Copenhagen, for the good government of the kingdom, which are the council of ſtate, that of war, that of juſtice, that of the finances, the chancellory of Denmark, Norway, and Germany; the council of the marine, and the board of trade.

The religion of Denmark is the proteſtant, according to the confeſſion of Auſburg, which was firſt embraced by Frederick I. and eſtabliſhed by his ſon Chriſtian III. throughout the kingdom, in 1536, ſince which time the biſhops are not allowed to meddle with affairs of ſtate. The biſhopricks are ſix, Copenhagen, Odenſee, Rupen, Alborg, Arhuſen, and Wiburg. The proteſtants of Germany and France have a church at Copenhagen; and the Jews are tolerated, but the Roman Catholics are not permitted to enter the kingdom, unleſs on the account of trade.

The orders of knighthood are two, that of Danebrog, and that of the Elephant. The enſign of the firſt is a golden croſs, fixed to a white ribbon, and enriched with diamonds, and an embroidered ſilver ſtar on their coats with eight points. The number of theſe is ninety. The order of the Elephant has thirty knights, of which the king is one, as well as the chief men in the kingdom. They wear a blue ribbon, at which hangs a golden elephant. In 1732 there was a third order inſtituted, the enſign of which is a golden croſs, fixed to a blue ribbon, waved or watered, and edged with ſilver, with white enamel, and a crown at each corner. On the right ſide the croſs, the lion of the North is repreſented, with the eagle of Pruſſia under it; and on the field of the left ſide the eagle of Pruſſia is above, and the lion below. In the middle are the names of the king and queen, under a regal crown, in an azure field. On the reverſe is this device, In fœliciſſimæ Unionis Memoriam: in Memory of the happy Marriage. They have a body of laws peculiar to themſelves, which are ſo plain, that they leave little room for law ſuits; when there are any ſuch, they are ſoon determined in an equitable manner; for the judge is obliged to inſert the law in his ſentence on which the judgment is founded; and when it happens to be wrong, there lies an appeal to the court of Cophenhagen, who oblige the judge to make good any damage that may have ariſen from his wrong determination.

Denmark is divided into the peninſula of Jutland and the iſlands. Jutland is fertile in corn and fruit, as well as rich in cattle, particularly the red, of which they ſend out eighty thouſand every year. Beſides which they ſell to their neighbours horſes, wheat, barley, oats, Turky corn, grots, malt, beans, peaſe, butter, cheeſe, leather, and wool. It is one hundred and fifty miles in length, and one hundred in breadth, and is divided into four parts, 1. Alburg, the capital town of which is of the ſame name. 2. Wiburg, the chief town of which is Wiburg. 3. Arhus, the principal place of which is ſo called; and 4. Ripen, the chief town of which is likewiſe of the ſame name.

The iſlands which make up the kingdom of Denmark are Zealand, Funen, Langland, Laland, Falſter, Mona, Femeren, and Alſen, beſides ſome which are ſmaller, of which the capital towns in the ſame order are Copenhagen, Odenſee, Ruthkopen, Naxhow, Nykoping, Steg, Berg, and Sonderberg. They have no very conſiderable rivers, nor lakes, except Vennoe, which is twenty miles long, nor yet mountains. They have two univerſities, Copenhagen and Kiel.

Beſides theſe, the kingdom of Norway belongs to Denmark, half the duchy of Holſtein, part of the duchy of Schleſwick, and the counties of Oldenburg and Delmenhorſt, in Weſtphalia, which will be taken notice of in their proper places. In Aſia they have a factory at Tranquebar, on the coaſt of Malabar; in Guinea, Frederickſburg fort; in the Weſt Indies, the iſlands of St. Thomas, and Santa Cruz, beſides Iceland in the North Sea.

It is very hard to determine the revenue of the king of Denmark, becauſe it varies every year; however, ſome pretend it amounts to ten millions of crowns per annum. In time of peace the royal navy conſiſts of twenty-eight ſhips of the line, ſixteen frigates, and ten fire ſhips. The king has always in his ſervice one thouſand eight hundred carpenters, four hundred matroſſes, and three or four thouſand ſailors. All the men belonging to the ſea live in the part of Copenhagen, called Newen Buden. In time of war they can fit out eighty ſhips of the line, becauſe they always have in Norway materials for building ſhips, and in Denmark proviſions to victual them, as well as ſailors to man them. In all the countries belonging to Denmark, with Denmark itſelf, they can raiſe, in caſe of abſolute neceſſity, an army of fifty or ſixty thouſand men. But when they have no occaſion for ſoldiers themſelves, they never diſband them, but place them in the ſervice of ſome neighbouring country, they having a good reputation for valour.

DENNIS (John) a famous critic, was born at London, in the year 1657, and having completed his education at Caius college, in Cambridge, he travelled through France and Italy. Being poſſeſſed of a fortune left him by his uncle, he, at his return, ſet up for a wit and a fine gentleman, deſpiſing every entertainment that did not relate to poetry and taſte. He kept up an acquaintance with perſons moſt diſtinguiſhed by their birth, wit, and learning, among whom were the earls of Halifax and Pembroke, Walter Moyle, eſq. Dryden, Wicherly, Congreve, Southern, and Garth, who were then far from having a contemptible opinion of his talents. Upon his firſt acquaintance with the earl of Halifax, having the misfortune to be intoxicated with ſome very fine wines, which rendered him impatient of contradiction, he ſuddenly roſe, ruſhed out of the room, and as he paſſed overturned the ſide-board of plate and glaſſes. The next morning he had quite forgot what had paſſed, and meeting Mr. Moyle, who had been one of the company, aſked in what manner he went away: "Why," ſaid Moyle, "you went away like the devil, and took one "corner of the houſe with you." He wrote ſeveral poems, among which were two on the battles of Blenheim and Ramilies; for the firſt of which the duke of Marlborough made him a preſent of one hundred pounds, and ſoon after, through his grace's intereſt, he had a fine-cure in the cuſtoms of about one hundred and twenty pounds a year. In 1704 he publiſhed his tragedy of Liberty Aſſerted, in which are ſo many ſevere ſtrokes againſt the French, that he vainly imagined Lewis XIV. would never conclude a peace with England, unleſs he was given up to him: and filled with the idea of his own importance, it is ſaid, that he waited upon his patron the duke of Marlborough, during the congreſs at Utrecht, to deſire that no ſuch article might be ſtipulated, as the giving up the author of that play. The duke told him, that he was ſorry he could not ſerve him, he having then no intereſt with the miniſters; adding, that he fancied his caſe was not ſo deſperate as he imagined; that he had indeed made no ſuch proviſion for himſelf, yet could not help thinking that he had done the French almoſt as much injury as Mr. Dennis had done. This gentle reproof, however, did not cure his vanity; for in a viſit which he made at a gentleman's houſe on the coaſt of Suſſex, he happened to take a walk near the beach of the ſea, when eſpying a ſhip ſailing, as he imagined, towards him, he, not doubting that he was betrayed, took to his heels, and made the beſt of his way to London, without taking leave of his hoſt, whom he proclaimed a traitor, that had decoyed him to his houſe, in order to deliver him up to the French, who would have certainly carried him off, had he not eſcaped as he did.
